Banking had meantime become part of the business which the Mitchell brothers carried on. After the partnership was dissolved Samuel Moore Mitchell put up the building on the southwest corner of Washington and Main streets, establishing a private bank, known as Mitchell's bank. He also went into the mercantile business with his eldest son, which partnership continued until 1890. Mr. Mitchell continued his banking business until his death.

When Samuel Moore Mitchell died, July 14, 1892, Martinsville lost a citizen whose interests had been so varied that there was hardly a phase of local life with which he had not been identified. His business operations, extensive and successful, had made him one of the most substantial citizens of the place, and with the public spirit which was ever one of his notable characteristics he put into practice his cherished theories regarding the real value of a citizen in his community. Energetic, enterprising and capable in overcoming obstacles in the path to his own prosperity, he showed himself equally able in the interest of the public. He believed in progress and improvement in every line, and being liberal as well as active he succeeded in introducing many innovations in the life of the town which were unthought of in the early days. Above all he was zealous in the cause of education and earnest in the practical application of Christian principles—a man who endeavored to do what was right in all the relations of life. His standing was second to none.

That venerable citizen living near Martinsville, Noah J. Major, says of the brothers, J. M. and S. M. Mitchell: "The Mitchell brothers were good business men and citizens, pork packers to New Orleans, later merchant bankers, etc. They were most excellent men. S. M. was a great Whig and later a Republican. He and his brother were great friends of education. S. M. Mitchell was a liberal contributor to the Christian Church, and to other churches as well. He and his wife gave from $6,000 to $7,000 to the Christian Church."

In January, 1840, Samuel Moore Mitchell was married to Jane Dietz, daughter of David Dietz, of Columbus, Ind., and to them were born three children, Henry Hoak, William Constantine and Maria Jane. Henry Hoak died in infancy. Maria Jane married James N. Sweetser, an attorney at law of Indianapolis, son of Philip Sweetser, who was one of the distinguished lawyers of the early days of the State. Maria Sweetser died soon after the birth of her son, who survived her but a short time, and Mr. Sweetser died suddenly in the "New Denison Hotel" at Indianapolis.

Mrs. Jane (Dietz) Mitchell died soon after the birth of her daughter, Maria, and Mr. Mitchell was married Dec. 19, 1849, to Mrs. Ann (Sandy) Eslinger, a widow with one child, William H. Eslinger. She came of a very excellent family of German extraction, daughter of Jeremiah and Elizabeth (Goss) Sandy. Several children were born to this union, some of whom died young, those who reached maturity being: (1) Giles Sandy (known as "Buck") graduated at the Indiana State University and took a medical course subsequently at the Ohio Medical College, in Cincinnati. After graduating there he married Mary Reamy, daughter of one of the professors, Dr. Thaddeus A. Reamy, with whom he engaged in the practice of his profession. His wife did not live long after marriage, and they had only one son, who died in infancy. At this time Dr. Mitchell's health also became very seriously impaired, and he went to Mentone, in the southern part of France, thence making a tour of Europe: during his absence, which covered about two years, he learned to speak German and French. Returning to Cincinnati in improved health he resumed his medical practice and continued it there until his death, in May, 1904. He became distinguished in his profession as a surgeon and a physician. He married for his second wife Miss Esther De Camp, of Cincinnati. (2) Catharine married Myron Dickson, formerly of Indianapolis, and now a merchant of Martinsville, where they reside. They have three children, Anne May, Giles Mitchell and Harold Benton, who is at the Highland Military College, Worcester, Mass. (3) Mary Elizabeth ("Bettie") married Dr. James G. Hyndman, of Cincinnati, now deceased, a distinguished physician and professor. They had no children. Mrs. Hyndman now resides in Cincinnati. (4) Robert Benton is mentioned further on. (5) Indiana ("India") first married James H. Veitch, and had one daughter, Mary C. He died in 1896 and then she married H. B. Bridges. He dying, she married Dr. William M. Williams, of Cincinnati, Ohio. (6) Ann married Edward R. Martin, of Kansas City, Mo., and they have two children, Ruleff Mitchell and Giles Edward.

ROBERT BENTON MITCHELL, M. D., who has been engaged in the brokerage business and farming for a number of years, was born in Martinsville April 6, 1858. He received excellent advantages and acquired a fine education, fitting himself thoroughly for the practical business of life. He was the first cashier of his father's bank, and continued to act in that capacity until 1888, when he went to Seattle, Wash., where he remained for eighteen months. Returning East he went to Cincinnati, where he entered medical college, graduating in 1893, after which he practised with his brother Dr. Giles S. Mitchell, who was a distinguished physician and surgeon of Cincinnati. But he returned to Martinsville before the close of 1893, and assisted in settling up his father's estate. Since then he has been engaged in the brokerage business, and managing his farms.

Dr. Mitchell is a thirty-second-degree Scottish Rite Mason, belonging to the Commandery and the Shrine. In politics he is a Republican in national affairs.

HON. JAMES M. BISHOP, a prominent member of the Morgan county Bar, and a leading citizen of Mooresville, Ind., was born May 31, 1847, in Hamilton county, Ind., and was reared in the vicinity of Westfield, where he attended the common schools, the Westfield Academy and the Noblesville school. He is a son of Joseph and Nancy (Chew) Bishop, the former of whom, born March 25, 1802, in Virginia, died in April, 1880.

John Bishop, paternal grandfather of the Hon. James M., was a native of England and an early settler in Virginia, who became prominently identified with its early history. He was a farmer with extensive estates, and died one of the well-to-do citizens of that section. Of his children: Josephus became prominent and influential and a strong supporter of the institutions of the country; another son was in the Confederate army and lost heavily through the confiscation of his property by the Union soldiers; Alice died in Virginia; and Joseph is mentioned below.

Joseph Bishop was reared to manhood in Virginia, and prior to marriage settled first in Ohio, and finally in Hamilton county, Ind., where he engaged in merchandising and farming. He bought forty acres of land in Hamilton county to secure a cabin in which to settle his family, in the vicinity of Westfield. Soon after he bought a section of land which he cultivated and substantially improved, and resided upon it for several years. Both he and his wife were instrumental in establishing Methodist worship in that part of the newly settled country and their hospitable home was the haven for the pioneer preacher, and for a long period was thrown open to the congregations which came miles to the "preachings." He was a liberal contributor to all moral movements, gave time and money to assist in the building of school houses and church edifices, and he filled almost all of the offices in the church and through the neighborhood. It is recalled of him how zealous he was to assist those in distress or trouble, thereby preventing a selfish accumulation of large means. In 1874 he moved to Mooresville and joined his son, James M., who tenderly cared for him and his wife the remainder of their days, his death occurring in April, 1889, at the age of eighty-seven years. His widow survived until August 26, 1892. She was a most estimable Christian lady, filled with tender solicitude for all in need, with a loving disposition which drew every one to affectionately regard her. Her influence had much to do with the molding of the character of our subject. This beloved mother came from some of the best blood of old Virginia, being related to James Madison, Zachary Taylor and many other distinguished men and statesmen of Virginia. She was a daughter of Andrew Chew, who was a son of Joseph Chew, who was a son of Col. Thomas Chew, of Chewtown, Somers-setshire, England, who came with Lord Baltimore to Maryland, in 1671. The Chews were the friends and associates of such men as George Washington and Thomas Jefferson and they became connected with many of the leading families of the Old Dominion. Col. Thomas Chew reared a large family and two descendants served in the Indian war with Gen. Washington. Capt. Colby Chew was killed at Fort Duquesne in 1758, and his brother, Lieut. Larkin Chew, was wounded at the same time. Both were noted for their valor. The Taylor branch of the family perpetuated his memory by naming descendants of theirs after him. Some of the other members of the Chew family became notably distinguished: Samuel, a prominent jurist, was born in 1690, in Maryland; he became a Quaker, practised medicine with success, later was distinguished in the law as Chief Justice of the District of New Castle. He settled on the Delaware river in 1743, moved to Philadelphia in 1745, was Recorder from 1755 to 1772, Register of Wills and Attorney-General in 1766. In 1774 became Chief Justice of Pennsylvania; served as Speaker in the House of Delegates from the lower counties of Delaware. At the outbreak of troubles incident to the Revolution, both parties courted his support, and he joined the Tories. In 1777, declining to give a parole, he was imprisoned at Fredericksburg. From 1790 until the abolition of the Court, in 1806, he was president of the High Court of Errors and Appeals, Chief Justice, and resided in a spacious stone mansion at Germantown. It is still standing, although in 1777 the doors of the house were riddled with cannon balls. The statues in the surrounding grounds were shattered, but the solid old mansion withstood attacks.

Andrew Chew, son of Joseph Chew, was a prominent and wealthy planter of Virginia, and was influential in public and social life. He was one of the founders of that ideal social fabric which still distinguishes the old "blue blood" of Virginia. His son Andrew was reared on a plantation in Virginia, and was highly educated. He adopted civil engineering and assisted in the Government survey of Ohio, obtaining a large tract of valuable land. Although heir to the large Virginia estate, he was ambitious to make a home in the newly opened territory, and prior to marriage settled in Ohio. Here he afterward married. With the unwisdom of youth, he took little care of his health, and during the months of work along the malarial rivers, slept unprotected on the ground and laid the foundation for rheumatic troubles which finally caused his death, after years of acute suffering. His efforts to regain health, and his long invalided condition, not only prevented his acquiring more means but dissipated what he had. Five children were born to him, namely: Dr. James M., who died in Texas; Rebecca, Mrs. D. Bales; Sarah; Mary, Mrs. Dr. Moon; and Nancy, the mother of our subject. The religious belief of the family was that of the Methodist Church.

The children of Joseph and Nancy (Chew) Bishop were: John T. and Samuel, who both died in infancy; Elizabeth, who married Philip Williams, a soldier in the Rebellion; Anna M., who died aged nineteen; Amelia, an invalid for many years, who died June 9, 1891; Jane, Mrs. William Worrell, who died leaving one daughter; and James M.

James M. Bishop was reared and educated in Hamilton county, Ind. He had the advantages of a Christian home and the best educational opportunities the times and place afforded. In youth he engaged in clerking in a local store, and at the age of twenty-three years entered upon the study of law, at Shelbyville. In 1876 he was admitted to practice in Morgan county and since then has had a successful career, practising in all of the courts of the State. He has been an active political factor since 1876, and has done very effective campaign work through Indiana, occupying a leading position in the Republican party. In 1900 he was elected a member of the State Legislature, and became prominent on account of his being the author of the bill against kidnapping and for the punishing of kidnappers. Mr. Bishop is recognized as a man of political strength because of his firm stand for the right, and is regarded as a proper candidate for congressional honors; he stands high in the legal profession. In religious belief he is a Methodist. Fraternally he is a Mason and an Odd Fellow. He is respected by all for his pure life and high character.

MICHAEL HAMMANS, a substantial citizen of Morgan county, one of the leading and highly successful agriculturalists of his section, comes of typical pioneer stock of this part of Indiana. He was born July 23, 1834, in Washington township, Morgan county, son of John and Susan (Stockwell) Hammans, and grandson of Joshua Hammans, who came to Morgan county in 1830.

Joshua Hammans was born in Wythe county, Va., of Irish descent. He served in the war of 1812, during which he was stationed at Norfolk, Va. Upon his removal to Indiana a large family accompanied him. Settling first in Washington township, Morgan county, he later moved to Johnson county, and when Iowa was opened up for settlement he removed thither. There, in Van Buren county, he passed the remainder of his life, dying at the age of eighty. He married Elizabeth Kimbler.

John Hammans, father of Michael, was born in Virginia. He came with his father to Indiana in 1830, and entering land in Washington township, Morgan county, there made a permanent settlement. His industry and energy were well rewarded, for he converted his property into a fine farm, upon which he passed the remainder of his long life, reaching the age of eighty-four years. Mr. Hammans married Susan Stockwell, a native of Clark county, Ind., where her father, Michael Stockwell, was a pioneer farmer. Mr. Stockwell was born in Marietta, Ohio, and in the early days he was an expert flat-boat pilot on the Ohio river. But he later became a farmer, following that calling in Clark county, Ind., and thence removing to Morgan county, where he died after many years' residence there. He married Mary Palestine, and they reared a large family.

Mrs. Hammans died several years before her husband. She was a member of the M. E. Church, but Mr. Hammans favored the Disciples faith. Three children were born to them, Michael, Mary J. and Winfield S. The daughter married (first) John T. Slough, who was an officer of Company H, 33d Indiana Volunteer Infantry, commanded by Col. (later Gen.) John Coburn. Four of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Slough reached maturity, Dorrette, U. Grant, Grace and Eliza. For her second husband Mrs. Slough married Calvin Kitchen, of Washington township, Morgan county, by whom she had one child, Bessie. Winfield S. Hammans, youngest of the family of John and Susan Hammans, married Hannah Cramer, also of Washington township.

There is little connected with the development, growth or improvement of Washington township which is not very familiar to Michael Hammans, for here his life has been usefully spent. His education was obtained in the old-time subscription schools, when the school-room was supplied with slabs for seats and greased paper took the place of window glass. His instruction books consisted of the English reader and the Webster elementary speller. After completing his allotted time at school he taught for four terms and then began farming, an occupation he has continued until the present time. Until he reached manhood he assisted on the home farm, and after starting for himself rented land until he was able to purchase a tract of twenty acres. Industry and economy made possible the later additions and he inherited fifty-five acres of his father's estate. Mr. Hammans now owns 400 acres, in Section 25, Washington township, and raises stock and grain. He is a man of up-to-date ideas and believes in the value of good improvements. In 1870 he erected a handsome modern dwelling, which is surrounded by commodious and convenient buildings, all adding to the attractive appearance and value of this property. Mr. Hammans is justly proud of his success, for he is a self-made man, having attained his present position through his own efforts.

On Sept. 19, 1858, Mr. Hammans was married (first) to Miss Millie D. Koons, daughter of George and Elizabeth (Cleary) Koons, and three children were born to that union, namely: John, Dora E. and George W. John died at the age of four years; Dora E. married Lewis Shireman, of Martinsville, and they have children: Elmer, Ernest, Walter and Quanette; and George W. died aged two years. Mrs. Hammans died in 1865. She was a member of the Christian Church. Mr. Hammans's second marriage was to Miss Sarah De Turk, daughter of Isaac and Lydia (Wagoner) De Turk, and the three children of this union are Isabel, Josephine and Victoria. (1) Isabel married Robert J. Core, and they live in the State of Washington. They have three children, Ruby, Susan and Leslie. (2) Josephine married B. F. Badgley, a farmer, and they reside in Washington township, Morgan county. They are members of the Christian Church. They have children, Roxy, May, Exie, Dorothea, B. Frank, Jr., Michael A., Floy, Marie and Margerie. Of these May married D. O. Breedlove, and they have one child, Dorothea. (3) Victoria married William N. Bailey, of Washington, and they have two children, Blanche and Beatrice.

For a number of years Mr. Hammans was identified with the Republican party, but he now affiliates with the Populists. He has served very acceptably as school director a number of terms, has been a careful and capable supervisor, and also one of the trustees of the Centennial Chapel, in the neighborhood. His fraternal connection is with the Patrons of Husbandry. Mr. Hammans is a man of sterling character and stands very high in the public esteem.

Mrs. Hammans is of French-Huguenot descent. Her father, Isaac De Turk, came from Pennsylvania, about eight miles from Reading, Berks county, in which county her great-great-grandfather, Isaac De Teurck (as the name was originally spelled), settled. It is supposed that he was obliged to flee from France because of his faith, and he went to England, in the time of Queen Anne, who gave him a rifle upon his emigration to America. He was in business in France, held office in his town, and owned property up to the time of his enforced exile. He preserved his papers, bringing them to Berks county, but he never could recover any of his French possessions. It is claimed the De Turks were of noble origin, Norman, and the name De Teurck means "Fear not," literally, "afraid of nothing." The following account of the De Turk family comprises only their history in this country:

DE TURK (OR DE TEURCK). (I) Isaac DeTurk, born 1686, landed at New York with his sister Esther about 1707 and settled at Esopus and was among the settlers of Quasick Creek, Dutchess Co., N. Y., in 1709, but June 11, 1712, the Commissioners of Pennsylvania (province) issued a warrant to him for 300 acres of land out at a place called "Oley," of which locality this is the first mention. In this he is mentioned as "late of Franklin-thal, in Germany." He was married to Maria Gerber (possibly in New York), who bore him three children. He bequeathed his entire landed estate to his son John, who paid his sisters their proportionate parts according to appraisement. The three children mentioned were: Catharine married Abraham Levan; John married Deborah High on May 13, 1740; Esther married Abraham Bertolet.

(II) John DeTurk married Deborah High May 13, 1740, and they had a family of twelve children, as follows: (1) Isaac, born Aug. 25, 1741, died young. (2) Daniel, born Sept. 18, 1742, married Catharine Levan and had a daughter who married Jacob Briel. (3) Susanna, born March 27, 1745, married a Schaeffer. (4) John, born Jan. 20, 1747, married a Bertolet. (5) Maria, born July 16, 1748, married David Weiser. (6) Samuel, born May 25, 1750, married Catharine Kerst. (7) Abraham, born March 9, 1752, married Anna Weiser. (8) Daughter, born Nov. 18, 1753, died young. (9) Esther, born Feb. 9, 1755. (10) Philip, born April 30, 1757, married (first) Esther Shenkel and (second) Maria Hoch. (11) Jacob, born Nov. 24, 1757 (probably 1759), died young. (12) Debora, born June 12, 1761, married Peter Knabb.

(III) Philip DeTurk, born April 30, 1757, married (first) Esther Shenkel, daughter of Martin, and (second) Maria Hoch, daughter of Daniel. By the first marriage he had Philip, who married Maria Yoder, and had five children, Anna (who married Joseph Hoch), Daniel (who married Catharine Levan and Willi Levan), Esther (who married David Yoder), Martin (who married Rachel Levan) and Lydia (who died young). By his second wife Philip (the father) had children as follows: John, born April 27, 1787, married Susan Knabb; Isaac, born Oct. 19, 1788, married Lydia Wagoner (he died May 30, 1882); Susanna, born July 15, 1790, died young; Daniel, born Feb. 22, 1792, died young; Jacob, born Jan. 13, 1794, married Margaret Babb (he died May 6, 1875); Hannah, born March 31, 1798, married Samuel Hill, and they had a son Abraham, who lives in Berks county, Pa.; Samuel, born May 20, 1799, died young; Esther, born Oct. 15, 1800, died young.

(IV) Isaac DeTurk, father of Mrs. Hammans, married Lydia Wagoner, and to them were born nine children as follows: (1) William died young. (2) Charles died young. (3) Othniel married Cluena Talbot, and had a son, William Sherman DeTurk. (4) Abraham married Lydia Orner, and had three sons and two daughters: Charles, Isaac, Oscar, Mattie and Katherine DeTurk. (5) Isaac, who went to Santa Rosa, Cal., became a great wine merchant and founder of the great DeTurk brand of wine. He never married. He died March 15, 1896. (6) Sarah married Michael Hammans and has three children, Isabel, Josephine and Victoria, all married. (7) Maria married Henry Shireman and has had a family of ten children, Mary (Mrs. Hiram Avery, who has two children, Audre and Mary), Louisa (Mrs. Smith Lewis, who has two children, Henry and Mary), William, Ella (Mrs. John Caldwell, who has four children, Maxville, Ethel, Horace and Lethea), Charles, Harriet, Caroline, Maxwell, Flora and Eugene. (8) Lewis married (first) Julia, by whom he had one child, Eugene (married to Olivia Weathersby); this wife dying he married (second) a sister of his first wife, and they had two sons; his third wife was Mary Lucretia Cox, who had no children; and after her death he married Mary Cramer, by whom he had three children, Lydia, Mabel and Harry. (9) Hannah married Benjamin Orner, and to them were born nine children, Othniel, Joseph, William B., Annie Laura, Nellie, Alica (Dolly), Mary, Ida and Lettie May.

Isaac DeTurk, the father of this family, was a pioneer of Washington township, Morgan county. He was born and raised in Berks county, Pa., where he married Lydia Wagoner, also of Berks county and of German origin, and they came to Morgan county in 1839. Mr. DeTurk was well-to-do in Berks county at the time of his removal to Indiana. He raised fine grapes, was an excellent farmer and horticulturist, and made fine wine that had a great reputation, dealers coming from New Orleans to obtain it. It was from the Catawba grape. For over twenty years the grapes did well, after which they deteriorated, and he stopped making wine. He was one of the first horticulturists in his section, being the first to bring the Catawba grape to Morgan county. He had a large farm, owning several hundred acres in the county, which he divided among his children. Part of his farm is now incorporated into the eastern part of Martinsville.

His daughter, Mrs. Hammans, states that when her father first came to Morgan county he brought some fine long linen homespun wheat sacks, on which his name, "Isaac DeTeurck," was printed. It took a good man to shoulder one of these sacks when filled. The miller and others commented on the name, saying it was too long for Hoosiers, and wanted Mr. DeTurk to drop the "De." They even called him Mr. Turk, but though he laughed he objected to the change and never made it. However, he did begin to spell his name DeTurk, the orthography in present use among his descendants in Indiana. The incident was typical of the man. He was possessed of more than ordinary intelligence, education and ability, and was noted for his fine mental qualities throughout his long life. In his younger days, before coming to Indiana, he was a teacher of English and German. Perhaps he owed his long continued mental and physical strength to the intelligent care he habitually took of his health. He was five feet, ten inches in height, straight as an arrow, with fair skin, blue eyes and brown hair, and was active and quick in his movements. Very methodical and neat in all his ways, he dressed better and more carefully than the average farmer, becoming more particular as he advanced in years. He had a certain hook for each coat, and it had to be hung up properly; the same care was given to all his other garments. He would not even wear his right sock on his left foot. He would not go into a cellar without first putting on his coat; he would not eat hot bread or hot meat, and he counted every swallow; he drank so as to mix his liquids with saliva and not to chill his stomach. He never used tobacco, and would not allow his boys to use it until they were twenty-one, when he reminded them that they might do as they pleased in the matter; but only one ever acquired the habit, and he was very moderate. Isaac DeTurk lived to be nearly ninety-five. As may be judged, he was a strong character in every respect, and he was a deeply religious man. With his wife he was an earnest member of the Lutheran Church. A great Bible student, he was so well versed in the Scriptures that his opinion was often sought by ministers of the Gospel, and he was frequently consulted about Scripture translations. But he did not seek such interviews, for he disliked arguments upon subjects of that kind. He was always kindly but firm in expressing his opinions, always adhering to the original etymology.

Mr. and Mrs. Hammans have a combination cabinet and writing desk, a fine piece of workmanship, that Isaac DeTurk brought from Berks county, Pa., and which he inherited from his father.

CLINTON L. HARE, vice-president of J. C. Perry & Co., wholesale grocers of Indianapolis, is considered one of the most enterprising business men in Indiana, and is known to the trade throughout the country, although he has been identified with that line only for a comparatively short time. The establishment with which he is connected as vice-president is one of the oldest in that line in the State. For several years Mr. Hare was engaged in the practice of law, and for eight years he was chief deputy clerk of the Circuit court of Marion county, holding that office through two administrations.

Mr. Hare was born in Noblesville, Ind., Nov. 7, 1864, son of Marcus L. and Julia A. (Haines) Hare. The parents are also natives of Hamilton county, Ind., and Marcus L. Hare has been a successful farmer and stock raiser, being still engaged in that line. In 1862 he removed to Indianapolis, where he has maintained his residence to the present time. He and his good wife are both members of the Presbyterian Church, and are among the most highly respected people of the city. They had two children, a daughter, Helen, who is now deceased, and Clinton L.

Daniel Hare, the grandfather of Clinton L., was born in Indiana, and was the eldest son in a large family. He was of English descent. He was a farmer and a general merchant at Noblesville, Ind., and there he died of cholera, when in middle life. He left some five or six children. The maternal grandfather of Mr. Hare, Dr. Matthew Haines, was also born in Indiana, of English ancestry. He was a physician and made his home in Noblesville, where he died when about sixty-five years old. He reared a family of seven children.

Clinton L. Hare was reared in Indianapolis, where he passed through the city schools, graduating from the high school in 1882. He was a member of the class of 1887 at Yale, where he received the distinction of an election to "Skull and Bones" in his junior year. Returning home he took up the study of law with Harrison, Miller & Elam, and was admitted to the Bar on Dec. 2, 1889. He at once began the practice of law in Indianapolis, and in that city continued as a practising lawyer until November, 1894, when he was appointed chief deputy clerk of the Marion Circuit court of Marion county. He held the position until Jan. 1, 1903. Meantime he had become interested in the line to which he has since devoted his attention. In 1900 he reorganized the wholesale grocery house of J. C. Perry & Co., one of the oldest in the State, changed it into a corporation, and became its vice-president, Mr. John C. Perry being president and Amos W. Reagan secretary and treasurer of the same.

After leaving the clerk's office Mr. Hare gave all his time to the wholesale grocery business, and when the jobbers of Indiana formed a State association, two years later, he was chosen as its president. He has been a director in the National Wholesale Grocers Association since its formation, and is known as an aggressive advocate for all movements that tend to more firmly establish the jobber as a necessary factor in business.

On Oct. 14, 1891, Mr. Hare married Miss Marea Fletcher Ritzinger, daughter of J. Baptiste and Myla (Fletcher) Ritzinger. To them have been born six children: Helen, John M., Clinton L., Jr., Robert, Myla and Laura. Mr. and Mrs. Hare have lived at No. 1525 North Meridian street, in Indianapolis, for a number of years.

In politics Mr. Hare is a Republican and has been active in the interest of good government for a number of years. He was an excellent official during his connection with the civil administration, discharging his duties with a conscientious regard for the public weal which has marked his conduct in all the relations of life. He is a man of energetic mentality and vigorous personality, and has exerted marked influence in all his associations.

DAVID KREGELO (deceased), a distinguished pioneer citizen of Indianapolis, founder of the first lumber yard and planing mill in the city, was also the founder of the Kregelo undertaking establishment, and in these various lines was known for many years as one of the able business men of his community. He was a native of Maryland and came to Indianapolis when quite a young man. He acquired a knowledge of the trade of carpenter. Six years later began his active identification with the growth of Indianapolis, and for over sixty-three years, or from 1839, he was one of its enterprising and successful citizens, engaging for many years in various businesses, and then shifting the burden of their active prosecution to younger men. The sketch of this successful business man has in it lessons of encouragement for the young man of stout heart and earnest purpose.

Mr. Kregelo was born in Frederick county, Md., June 4, 1813, son of Jacob and Sophia (Buffington) Kregelo, both natives of Maryland. The mother was born near the Pennsylvania State line, about nine miles from Gettysburg, where the decisive battle of the Civil war was fought. Jacob Kregelo and his wife remained lifelong farming people of Maryland, each living to the age of eighty-two, though the mother survived the father four years. David was the eldest of their eleven children. The only surviving members of the family are Ephraim, a Methodist clergyman, now living in Virginia, and Amanda, the youngest of the family, living in Altoona.

Mr. and Mrs. David Kregelo had a family of eight children, three of whom are living: Mary Belle, the wife of H. W. McCune, of Indianapolis; Emma Louisa, the wife of John E. Hough, of Baltimore; and John L., of Indianapolis.

After Mr. Kregelo retired from the undertaking business he lived very quietly at his home on West street, in Indianapolis, where he died at the ripe old age of ninety-one years; his wife passed away at the age of seventy-nine. Their son, Charles Edward Kregelo, continued the undertaking business at Nos. 229-233 North Delaware street, until his death on Aug. 22, 1905.

CHARLES EDWARD KREGELO lived in Indianapolis all his life, and his business career was attended with remarkable success. He obtained his education in the public schools, and while a young man embarked in the undertaking business, to which calling he devoted himself for thirty-four years, having at the time of his decease been the oldest Protestant undertaker in the city.

In 1869 Charles E. Kregelo married Laura J. McCune, daughter of James and Susanna Katherine (Will) McCune, of Chambersburg, Pa. Of their three children but one is living, Mrs. Katherine Louisa Beckwith, who, with her husband and two children, lives in Glendora, Cal. The oldest daughter, Carrie Wilson Kregelo, died in early womanhood, and a son, Charles Wilbur, died at the age of two years.

Mr. Kregelo was a member with his wife of the Second Presbyterian Church, where their many good qualities and generous disposition made them many friends. Fraternally he was a member of Marion Lodge, F. & A. M., the Chapter, R. A. M., and Commandery No. 1, K. T. He was a 32d degree Scottish Rite Mason, and belonged to Murat Temple. Mr. Kregelo belonged to Olive Branch, K. P., and to the I. O. O. F., and in these various organizations his frank and genial disposition, his manly character and good nature won for him a leading place in the estimation of the brethren with whom he was associated. In politics he was a Republican. Mrs. Kregelo is a member of the D. A. R. and she was a delegate to the D. A. R. Convention at Washington, D. C., in 1900.

Gen. John Coburn, under date of March

Chas E. Wright

13, 1907, wrote as follows of Mr. Kregelo: "Charley Kregelo, deceased, was a good, active, honorable business man. He and his father were undertakers and enjoyed the confidence and respect of the entire community. David Kregelo founded the extensive business and followed it until his death. He was a man of fine character and a life-long member of the Presbyterian Church. His son, Charles E., was a worthy successor to his father, a man of excellent tact and executive ability. He was more than the ordinary undertaker—he was a gentleman in all the word implies, and enjoyed the confidence and respect of the best people. He was generous and charitable, and an excellent judge of human nature."

In the course of Mr. Kregelo's long connection with the undertaking business, he buried many of the most illustrious people as well as the most highly esteemed men of the city. Among them may be mentioned ex-President Harrison, Vice-President Hendricks, Governor Morton, Governor Baker, Colonel Ruckle, Governor Hovey, Senator McDonald and Governor G. A. Williams, and Judge Woods, of the United States Circuit Court.

The Kregelo home is a very pleasant and attractive residence at the northwest corner of Nineteenth and Illinois streets, which affords ample evidence of the taste and culture of those to whom it has been an abiding place for many years.

Mrs. Charles E. Kregelo was born in the old college town of Mercersburg, Franklin Co., Pa. Her parents, James and Susanna Katherine (Will) McCune, lived in Pennsylvania for many years. Her father was a grandson of that sturdy Scotchman, Lieut. Robert McCune, who was a gallant soldier during the Revolutionary war, and was noted for his bravery at the battle of the Brandywine, also at the taking of Fort Washington and Germantown. The McCune family settled in Pennsylvania in very early times and the history of that State shows that it owes much to the sturdy and noble Christian Scotchmen for the good which they did in the settlement of that great State. They were stanch Presbyterians in religious faith. One of them served as the first school teacher of Mercersburg, another as the first banker. The first county auditor and the first store keeper of Franklin county were McCunes, and representatives of the name served in cavalry and navy during the entire Revolutionary war.

The paternal grandfather of Mrs. Kregelo, Robert McCune, was an officer in the war of 1812, and his father, Robert McCune, bore arms in the war of the Revolution as a lieutenant.

The parents of Mrs. Kregelo were born in Pennsylvania, and early settled in Middletown, Ind., where her father engaged in the business of manufacturing carriages, and all kinds of farming machinery. His death occurred in 1876, and that of his wife in 1884. They were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church for many years.

WILLIAM FORSYTH, a distinguished American artist, who makes his home in Indianapolis, was born in Hamilton county, Ohio, near Cincinnati, son of Elijah J. and Mary M. (Hackett) Forsyth.

The Forsyth family is of Scotch-Irish descent, and has long been established in America, the original ancestor in this country coming from the North of Ireland. The founder of the American branch was Alexander Forsyth, who emigrated in the latter quarter of the eighteenth century, settling at Baltimore, Md. His wife was Rachel O'Neill. Alexander Forsyth died at a very old age, soon after 1826, and his wife lived to the remarkable age of 104 years. They had a large family, two daughters and four or five sons.

Elijah Forsyth, the paternal grandfather of Mr. William Forsyth, was born in Baltimore, and there died in young manhood. His wife, Mary (Zell), survived him. They had five sons and two daughters.

George Hackett, the maternal grandfather of Mr. Forsyth, was a native of New Hampshire, where he engaged in farming. He married Olive Dunphy. He died when a young man, and she lived to be eighty-six years of age. A family of five children was born to them, two sons and three daughters, of whom only Mrs. Mary M. Forsyth is now living. James Hackett, the father of George, was a Revolutionary soldier. He was of Scotch descent, and was a farmer by occupation. His wife was Leah Spencer.

Elijah J. Forsyth, the father of William Forsyth, was born in Baltimore, and was left an orphan at an early age. He came West in the early forties, and located in Cincinnati, where he engaged in business. He was a commission merchant, farmer and general merchant there. In 1868 he moved to Indianapolis, and during the greater portion of his active life in the city was engaged as a painting contractor. His death occurred in 1895, when he was seventy-five years of age. His wife, Mary M. (Hackett) Forsyth, was born in French Mills, near Ogdensburg, N. Y., and still survives. Both were Methodists. Mr. Forsyth was a postmaster and justice of the peace in Ohio, and was a man of much local influence. Mr. and Mrs. Forsyth had two sons and two daughters: William, Elijah J., Jr., Miss Elizabeth F. and Miss Alice J., all of Indianapolis.

William Forsyth was reared in Indianapolis. His early education was partly gained in the public schools and in country schools in Ohio, but mostly under private instruction. For a few years he assisted his father, but he displayed such talent that it seemed advisable for him to follow art as a profession. Beginning his studies at Indianapolis in 1879, at the Indiana School of Art, under John W. Love, who had been a student of the beaux arts in Paris, and James F. Gookins, who had studied at Munich, Mr. Forsyth made such progress, that he eventually went to Munich, Germany, and for almost seven years studied faithfully and to much purpose. He was a student in the Royal Academy of Art in Bavaria; studied drawing under Professor Benzur and Professor Gysis, and painting under Professor Loeftz. While in the academy at Munich he received honorable mention several times, and won a medal in the painting school. He began exhibiting before he came home, some of his work being exhibited in the National Academy at New York, and at the Munich International Exhibition.

After his long absence Mr. Forsyth returned to America in 1889, and conducted schools at Muncie and Fort Wayne for about two years. Then he took charge of the Second Indiana School of Art, at Indianapolis, and was the principal instructor there for about six years. Since severing his connection with the institution he has done more or less teaching, and at present is an instructor in the Heron Art School, Indianapolis. But nearly all his instruction is given privately. The greater part of his teaching is done in the winter, but his most productive season is from early spring until the beginning of winter. During that period his sketching expeditions take him throughout southern Indiana, where he has found abundant material for effective landscape work. His studio is at his home, and he has another located down town for convenience.

Since establishing himself in this country,

Mr. Forsyth has been a regular exhibitor at the Society of American Arts, New York, and occasionally at the National Academy, as well as at various exhibitions in Boston and Philadelphia. His work is seen at all the western exhibitions of any importance. He was one of the founders and is still a member of the Society of Western Artists, and has held the offices of vice-president and secretary. He has pictures in the prominent galleries of the Minnesota Art Association, as well as at Kansas City and Indianapolis, and in the Indianapolis Art Association, of which body he is an honorary member. He was represented at the World's Columbian Exposition, at Chicago, by three pictures, and by six pictures at the St. Louis Exposition, where he was awarded both silver and bronze medals. Mr. Forsyth's work has merit which gives him standing among the foremost artists of the country in his class, and he is one of the conscientious workers who labor to maintain high standing and worthy ideals in his profession.

On Oct. 14, 1897, Mr. Forsyth married Miss Alice Atkinson, daughter of Robert and Nancy (McClimans) Atkinson. Three daughters have been born to this union, Dorothy Alice, Constance and Evelyn. Mrs. Forsyth is a member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, to the faith of Mr. Forsyth also subscribes. In political sentiment Mr. Forsyth is an independent Republican. He belongs to the University Club, is an honorary member of the Indianapolis Literary Club, a member of the Century Club and of the Portfolio Club. Fraternally he is a Mason. In April, 1906, Mr. Forsyth bought a commodious home with ample grounds at No. 15 Emerson avenue, where he and his family now reside.

DR. ALLISON MAXWELL, physician and surgeon, whose office is at No. 323 North Delaware street, Indianapolis, was born Sept. 25, 1848, in Bloomington, Ind., son of James Darwin and Louisa (Howe) Maxwell, natives of Indiana.

David H. Maxwell, the paternal grandfather of Dr. Allison Maxwell, was a native of Kentucky, of Scotch descent. He came to Indiana about 1810, locating at Madison, where he practiced medicine. He was well educated, a beautiful writer and a good talker. He was the first president of the first board of trustees of Indiana University. He was a member of the first Constitutional Convention of Indiana held at Corydon, when that was the State capital, served also as Speaker of the House of Representatives, and was a member of the Senate after Indianapolis became the capital of the State. He was a surgeon in the war of 1812. His wife was Mary Dunn Maxwell, a sister of Judge Williamson Dunn, of Madison, Ind.; she died at the age of ninety-two years. David H. Maxwell died at Bloomington, Ind., in 1854, aged sixty-eight years. He and his wife were the parents of nine children.

The maternal grandfather of Dr. Allison Maxwell was Joshua O. Howe, a native of Kentucky, of English and Scotch descent. He was a merchant and came to Bloomington, Ind., in 1819, dying there at the age of eighty-six years. His wife was Lucinda Allison, and of their four children, Louisa, who married James Darwin Maxwell, was the last survivor.

DR. JAMES DARWIN MAXWELL, father of Dr. Allison Maxwell, was a physician. He was born at Hanover, Ind., May 19, 1815, and went to Bloomington with his parents when four years old. He practiced medicine there all his life, and was a member of the board of trustees of Indiana University for fifty years. He married Louisa, daughter of Joshua O. and Lucinda (Allison) Howe, and they had ten children, four sons and six daughters, six now living, viz.: Emma, wife of Judge V. Carter, of Indianapolis; Dr. Allison; Annie E., wife of Rev. Allan B. Philpott, of Indianapolis; Louisa A., of Bloomington, Ind.; Fannie Belle, of Lake Forest, Ill.; and Martha Juliette, of Bloomington, Ind. James D., Jr., Mary Maxwell, Howard and David H. are deceased. The father of these children died in Bloomington, in 1893, aged seventy-seven years, his wife surviving until the age of eighty-eight. Both were Presbyterians, he being an elder.

Allison Maxwell was reared at Bloomington, and graduated from the University there in 1868, becoming a tutor there in Latin and Greek for a year and a half. He then went to San Francisco and was in the publishing house of A. L. Bancroft & Co., for two years, after which he returned to Bloomington and studied medicine with his father. He graduated from the Miami Medical College in 1876, served one year in Cincinnati Hospital, and then came directly to Indianapolis and associated himself with Dr. Theophilus Parvin, with whom he remained eight years.

when Dr. Parvin went to Philadelphia. Since then he has practiced alone.

On May 31, 1883, Dr. Maxwell married Miss Cynthia Routh, daughter of James R. and Margaret (Burroughs) Routh, and they have three children, Leslie H., Ruth and Allan B. Dr. Maxwell and his wife are members of the Second Presbyterian Church. He belongs to the Century, University and Commercial Clubs. He is a Republican in his political views, and he was president of the Indianapolis School Board for two terms. He is professor of the practice of medicine and Dean in the Indiana University School of Medicine; Medical Director of the State Life Insurance Company; consulting physician to the City Hospital, and the Deaconess Protestant Hospital. He belongs to the Marion County Medical Society, the State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. His residence is at No. 717 West Drive, Woodruff Place.

LOUIS PHILIP CORNET has been engaged in the grocery business in Indianapolis with his brother, John G. Cornet, under the firm name of Cornet Brothers, since 1890. He is also well-known as president of the Grocers' Baking Company, and has various other interests in the city.

Mr. Cornet, familiarly known among his friends as "Phil" Cornet, was born Nov. 7, 1864, at New Marion, Ripley Co., Ind., son of John and Philomine (Boeglin) Cornet. The parents were originally from Prussia, and on coming to Indiana first located in Jefferson county, near Madison, thence removing to New Marion. Louis Philip Cornet received his early education at his native place, and finished his schooling at Teutopolis, Ill. Meantime he had also applied himself to learning the shoemaker's trade, at which he worked out of school hours, being employed by his father, who had a shoe store and repair shop. He left the trade as soon as opportunity offered to take a position as teacher of a country school in Shelby township, Ripley Co., Ind., holding same for two years. In 1887 he gave up school teaching and came to Indianapolis, where he commenced work as clerk in the retail store of Peter Zimmer, on South Delaware street. There he remained for three years, saving his money and acquiring the experience necessary to embark in the business for himself. He kept his eyes open for a promising location, and in 1890, feeling that he should be competent to start out on his own account, he formed a partnership with his brother, John G. Cornet, and founded what is now one of the most prosperous grocery establishments in Indianapolis. With his usual energy Mr. Cornet wasted no time in putting his plans into operation. He left Mr. Zimmer's employ Saturday night, and by working all day Sunday he and his brother had their own place of business ready by Monday morning. They have been in the same location all these years, but the location is the only thing which these progressive men have not changed. Their patronage has increased steadily year by year, and to meet its growing demands they have been obliged to add to their space and their working force. At present they give employment to seven men and use four delivery wagons.

Mr. Cornet deserves no small amount of credit for the place he has won in the commercial world of his adopted city. He is one of the leaders in his own particular line of business. His success has not been sudden or spectacular, but it is of the substantial kind, for his methods will bear close scrutiny and are, in fact, exemplary. He has adhered to the standards of honor and fairness inculcated by his early training, and neither he nor those who have had dealings with him, have had any cause to regret the fact. As prosperity enabled him to do so, Mr. Cornet invested in real estate, being now an extensive property owner, and he also holds stock in mining and oil companies, and in the Grocers' Baking Company, of which concern he is now president. Mr. Cornet is to be congratulated upon the result of his efforts in the promotion of the welfare of this company, for it bears close comparison with other corporations in the results attained during the short time it has been in existence.

When the officers were first elected Mr. Cornet was made vice-president, and after serving a year as such was made president, which office he has since held. He is a genial man, of pleasant disposition and ways which hold friends, and his re-election to the office of president was regarded as a happy augury for the continued success of a concern which started under such auspicious circumstances.

Mr. Cornet was married June 4, 1888, to Miss Elizabeth Bates, daughter of August Bates and wife (whose maiden name was Schnell), and they have had five children, namely: Ellanora P., Florence M., Esther, John Philip and Leo Nicholas. The family are Roman Catholics in religious faith. Mr. Cornet gives his political support to the Democratic party.

THOMAS M. CHILL, a venerable and highly esteemed citizen of Indianapolis, who passed away Sept. 5, 1907, had been a resident of this city since Jan. 15, 1824, being one of the pioneer settlers of the city. He was born in Ross county, Ohio, May 1, 1812, a son of Thomas and Dorcas (Goldsbury) Chill, both natives of Virginia.

Thomas Chill and wife moved from the Old Dominion to Ross county, Ohio, and from there in 1824 to Indianapolis, taking up their residence in the little hamlet then mostly built of logs. The father did not long survive, dying from typhoid fever in August, 1826. His widow was left with three small children to care for, the older sons and daughters having settled in homes of their own. Of the three left in the mother's immediate care, two were daughters, and upon Thomas M. devolved the responsibility of taking care of his mother and young sisters. This duty was cheerfully assumed and devotedly performed.

When fourteen years of age he secured employment in the brickyard of Joseph F. Wingate, and he continued with Mr. Wingate for four years. During this period he provided for the family, and also completed paying for a lot which his father had contracted to buy. The mother survived only two years. There were nine children in the family and Thomas was the last survivor. His educational opportunities were meager, but he attended a few terms, and was a student in the city's first high school. When nineteen years old he learned the carpenter's trade, and was working at this at the breaking out of the Black Hawk War in 1832, when he enlisted. He was in the service until that famous Indian chief was captured, and he proved himself a brave soldier. On account of his daring he met with the accident which caused the loss of his left eye, and for this the government awarded him a pension. After the close of the war he returned to work at his trade, and carried on building and contracting as long as he was able to do fine work. For a number of years he was on the city police force, and after retiring from that body he became interested in real estate.

Mr. Chill was married (first) to Elizabeth Jane Thornburg, who died two years and seven months later, in 1852, the mother of one son, William F., who married Julia A. Fowler, of Indianapolis, and had four children, the three survivors being: Mrs. Elizabeth J. Berry, of Logansport (who has two sons, Ralph and Lester); Harrison T. and Oliver, both of Indianapolis. On Dec. 18, 1855, Mr. Chill married (second) Hannah Eveline Carter, daughter of Joshua and Elizabeth Carter, of Morgan county. She died June 24, 1901. To this marriage were born two daughters and one son: Sarah Elizabeth, who married Charles L. Pearson, of Indianapolis, and has four children—Francis Byron, Alfred C. M. (who married Hazel Aldrich), Silas (who married Nellie Lackey, of Indianapolis) and Charles; Mary Anna, who married C. W. Chill, of Indianapolis, and has one son, Albert Luther (who married Atta M. Cook, of Indianapolis, and had one son, Robert Cook, who died in infancy); and Charles F., who married (first) Ida E. Lane, of Indianapolis, (second) Susan Jones Sparks, of Gratz, Ky., and his two children were: Alice Pearl (who died aged four years), and Mrs. Elmer Lois Wild, of Loveland, Colo. (who has a daughter Helen).

Mr. Chill united with the M. E. Church at the age of nineteen years, joining what was then called Wesley Church, later Meridian Chapel. In 1850 he was one of nine citizens to build what was called Ames Church, to which he contributed personally one hundred dollars. That church is now known as the Morris Street Church. Mr. Chill belonged to that congregation until he changed his residence, after which he was connected with the Central Avenue Church. He had always been an active member and held church offices, including those of usher, warden and class-leader. He belonged to the Masons, and in politics was a Republican. For a man of his venerable years he had a remarkable memory and was well preserved. He thought nothing of walking from home to the heart of the city twice a day, a distance of three miles. He was never troubled with having to pick his food, eating any and everything at any time. He had an ambition to reach the century mark, but he passed away at ninety-five dying as though going to sleep, at the home of his son Charles F. He led an abstemious life, never having used either tobacco or liquor, and he, and his wife always so lived that they enjoyed the respect and esteem of those with whom they came in contact. Mr. Chill's wide knowledge of the growth and important happenings of the State caused him to be interviewed on several occasions by reporters, historians and others desiring accurate information.

GABRIEL M. OVERSTREET (deceased), for many years a distinguished attorney at law of Franklin, Johnson Co., Ind., was one of the prominent old settlers of this section of the State, and a member of a law firm which was not only known in legal circles for professional strength but also as being without a parallel in the State for the length of time its members continued in active partnership. We refer to his association with A. B. Hunter, which began in the late forties, and endured until Mr. Hunter's death, in 1891. Mr. Overstreet reached the advanced age of eighty-eight years, passing away Feb. 8, 1907. He was born in Oldham county, Ky., on a farm three miles from LaGrange, the county seat, May 21, 1819, son of Samuel and Elizabeth (Hawkins) Overstreet.

The Overstreet family became established in this country by the settlement in Virginia of two brothers of the name, who came from England. The Hawkins family records show that the grandfather was a farmer and a native of Kentucky, had a large family, and was prominent in his community. He died while bathing in the Kentucky river.

Samuel Overstreet, the father of Gabriel M. Overstreet, was a native of Virginia, and came to Indiana in 1834. He settled three miles northeast of the city of Franklin, in what was then Franklin township, but now bears the name of Needham township, there purchasing two small farms. He also entered different farms in Clark township, although he resided in Franklin township until his death, which occurred in August, 1862, when he had reached the age of eighty-two years. During his early years he was a carpenter, but after his marriage he pursued farming the remainder of his life, and met with success in that calling. His wife, a native of Kentucky, died in 1836, aged forty-eight years. Both were Methodists, originally belonging to the Methodist Episcopal branch, but later joining the Methodist Protestant communion, in which Mr. Overstreet was a class-leader and an exhorter, often filling the pulpit in the absence of the regular minister. For many years his house was the home of the preachers, and he was very zealous in the work of the church. Seventeen children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Overstreet, the only survivor of this large family being Robert M. Overstreet, of Emporia, Kansas.

Gabriel M. Overstreet was reared in Kentucky until he was fourteen years of age, and there attended the old-fashioned subscription schools, after the family's removal to Indiana continuing his education in the common schools there. Still later he went to Manual Training School (now Franklin College), and to the State University at Bloomington, from which he was graduated in 1844. Following this, for some time, he taught school and clerked in a store, filling in all his spare moments studying law, to such good purpose that in February, 1847, he was admitted to the Bar. Mr. Overstreet was well educated as a civil engineer, and did much work in that line in Johnson county. He surveyed the first plank road through that section of the State, and directed the placing of the abutments for many of the best bridges in the county. For over fifty years he was actively engaged in the practice of law. For forty-three years he was in partnership with A. B. Hunter, this firm being the oldest law firm in continuous practice in the State of Indiana, and as remarkable for the talents and energy of both its members as for the unusual length of their business relationship. Prior to the formation of this partnership Mr. Overstreet had practiced alone for one year, and after Mr. Hunter's death (which occurred in 1891), he continued with his son Jesse until the latter's removal to Indianapolis, in 1896, when he formed a partnership with John Oliver, a very promising young man, who died, however, in 1902. Then Mr. Overstreet, having been engaged continuously in active work until past his eighty-third year, retired to enjoy his closing years in the community where the greater part of his honorable life had been passed.

During the Civil war Mr. Overstreet enlisted in the one hundred days' service, in Company G, 132d Ind. Vol. Inf., and made many speeches to secure recruits for the service throughout the period of the war. From the formation of the party he was a stanch Republican, and from 1882 to 1886 he was a member of the State Senate of Indiana. During his younger days he served one term as prosecuting attorney for Johnson county, and though never seeking public honors for himself always took an active part in all measures calculated to advance the interests of the community. His activity and public spirit, combined with his great legal ability, naturally brought him into prominence, but it was only a recognition of his worth, and not because he himself craved notice. Mr. Overstreet was one of the strongest jury advocates of his time and enjoyed remarkable success in obtaining verdicts for his clients. The chief characteristic of his life and work was his sincerity. He was exceedingly plain, simple and straightforward in all of his methods and manners. He possessed in a marked degree a homely honesty and candor that at once won for himself confidence and respect. Men believed in him, and were quick to accept as true his statements. With these natural gifts of character he possessed a keen intelligence, a peculiarly acute analytical mind and a masterly forensic ability, which combined to make him a really powerful debater. At the period of his early manhood debating schools were common, and he was a prominent figure in the debates at Franklin. His law partner and most intimate friend, Mr. A. B. Hunter, was a man of extraordinary ability and literary attainments, and the office of this firm was for many years the forum for discussion upon political, religious and social problems, in which part was frequently taken by ministers from the city, professors from the college located there, and associates in the law. As many men of real ability were numbered among them—particularly from 1865 to 1890—the story of that forum and its characters would be most interesting. Mr. Overstreet was one of the most skillful attorneys in the cross-examination of witnesses Indiana ever produced. He excelled as a trial lawyer, and conducted a case with great ability, carefully marshalling his evidence, and presenting his case to court and jury with simplicity and force, while at the same time dissecting the evidence of his opponent with the skill of a surgeon. In exacting fees for his services he was exceedingly modest, and never marred a victory by disappointing a client in the amount of his charges. After a long, active and successful practice, he had but little means for the "rainy day" of his life. He was a pure man, and left a good name as a monument to his memory. The members of his profession held him in great esteem, and we quote the opinions of two members of the legal fraternity whose judgment may not be questioned. Judge Daniel Wait Howe says (July 3, 1908):

"Gabriel Overstreet was the strongest jury lawyer of Central Indiana. In the way he presented his case he exhibited a great many of the characteristics of Lincoln, especially in his homely but forcible illustrations to a jury."

L. Ert. Slack, attorney and counselor-at-law of Franklin, Mr. Overstreet's home town, says:

"Hon. G. M. Overstreet was one of the great and good men of Johnson county. He commanded and received the highest regard of all citizens. His standing at the Bar was the highest and his great ability was well known. His life stands as a model in all respects."

Dr. William H. Wishard, of Indianapolis, writes of the Overstreets:

"The whole family, the three generations that I have known, have been honest, trustworthy citizens. Gabriel, or 'Gabe,' as he was called, was a lawyer of ability and of the strictest integrity, and had the confidence and respect of all. He was eloquent as a jury lawyer, and at the same time plain and unassuming. He was elected State Senator on the Republican ticket, from Johnson and Morgan counties, and although Johnson county was strongly Democratic ran ahead of his ticket because of his personal popularity. His father was a pioneer of Johnson county, whither he came from Kentucky in 1832, settling on Hurricane creek, two miles above Franklin. He was regarded as a good citizen."

The pleasant home where Mr. Overstreet resided until his death was built by him in 1890, and prior to that he resided for twenty-five years in the southeast portion of the city of Franklin, where his family was reared.

On Nov. 20, 1849, Mr. Overstreet was married to Miss Sarah L. Morgan, daughter of Rev. Lewis and Nancy (Evans) Morgan, granddaughter of Andrew Evans, who fought in the Revolutionary war, grandniece of Gen. Daniel Morgan, and great-granddaughter of Elizabeth Taylor, who came of the same family as President Zachary Taylor. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Overstreet, four sons and three daughters, six of this family now living: Irene married Daniel W. Herriott, of Washington, D.

C., and has four children, Ivy Lou (wife of Dr. Clyde Shade, of Washington), Ruth Elizabeth, Hallie Irene and Jesse Star; Samuel Livingston, who died Nov. 13, 1899, married Miss Julia Kern, of Louisville, Ky., who died nineteen years before (he was registrar in the land office at Guthrie, Oklahoma, and United States attorney for that territory); Hubert Lewis, of Washington, D. C., assistant chief clerk in the House of Representatives, married Miss Hannah Stillenger, of Columbus, Ind.; Jesse is the Congressman from the Seventh Indiana District, and resides in Indianapolis (he married Miss Katharine Crump, of Columbus, Ind.); Arthur married Miss Hattie Frances Crump, a sister of his brother's wife, and resides at Columbus, Ind. (he has one son, Francis Monroe); Miss Nina May lives at home; Carrie Hasseltine married Alfred N. Goff, resides on a farm in Needham township, Johnson county, and has one daughter, Bessie Jeane.

Rev. Lewis and Nancy (Evans) Morgan were pioneers in Indiana. When they first came here they lived among the Indians, their nearest white neighbors being twelve miles away, and they had to haul their grain fifty miles to have it ground. The six children born to Lewis and Nancy Morgan were: Madison, Alexander, William, Nancy, Elizabeth and Sarah Lucinda, of whom Mrs. Overstreet is the only survivor. Mrs. Nancy Morgan died in 1837, and Mr. Morgan married a Miss Matthews, by whom he had two children. The third wife of Mr. Morgan was a Miss Cossey, and they had one son, Thomas J. Thomas J. Morgan served in the Civil war, first entering in the three months' service as a member of the 70th Ind. Vol. Inf. (General Harrison's regiment); he began his service as first lieutenant, but was promoted to the rank of colonel of a colored regiment, which he recruited in the South. Later he was brevetted brigadier-general of a brigade of colored troops. Rev. Lewis Morgan married Miss Ann Fane for his fourth wife, and they had two children, one of whom is now living, Hasseltine, widow of Charles Burton, late a lawyer of Denver, Colorado.

Rev. Lewis Morgan was the first agent to solicit funds for the building of Franklin College, an institution conducted under the auspices of the Baptist Church. This good man was very energetic in church work and will long be remembered as one of those who laid the foundations of Christian work and education in the wilderness, amid suffering, privation and discouragements which seemed almost overpowering.

AUGUSTUS LYNCH MASON, attorney at law of Indianapolis, was born Feb. 10, 1859, in Bloomington, Ind., and is the only son of William F. and Amanda (Lynch) Mason, the former a native of Indiana and the latter of Ohio. His paternal grandfather, Anthony Mason, was a native of Kentucky, of English descent, and became one of the early settlers in Sullivan county, Ind., where he followed farming. There he died about 1890, aged eighty-four years. Mr. Mason's father was a Methodist minister in young manhood, but later became interested in a building association in Denver, Colo., whither he moved from Indianapolis in 1883 and where he still resides.

Thomas H. Lynch, the maternal grandfather of Augustus Lynch Mason, was a native of Ohio, of English and French descent, came to Indiana in 1850, and settled in Indianapolis. In his early years he was president of the Indiana Female College, and later officiated as a minister of the Gospel. He died in 1892, aged eighty-five years, the father of three children, two surviving.

Augustus Lynch Mason lived in Cincinnati until 1872, receiving his first schooling in that city. Later he entered DePauw University, at Greencastle, Ind., from which institution he graduated in 1879, after which he began studying law in Indianapolis. He was admitted to the Bar in 1880, and has practised in Indianapolis ever since, chiefly in corporation affairs. His office is at present in Room 526, American Central Life building. He was formerly associated with Senator Joseph E. McDonald and John M. Butler, the latter a prominent railroad lawyer, the style of the firm being McDonald, Butler & Mason, for eight years. Since then Mr. Mason has practised alone, giving his attention principally to his legal interests, which are extensive, but he was also president of the Indianapolis Street Railway Company from 1893 to 1898.

On Jan. 25, 1893, Mr. Mason married Miss Annie Porter, only daughter of ex-Gov. Albert G. Porter and Minerva (Brown) Porter. No children have been born to this union. Mr. Mason is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In political affiliation he is a Republican. He was the author of the Reform charter of the city of Indianapolis of 1891, the result of a public movement by the Board of Trade and Commercial Club for the reorganization of the city government, which was adopted in the Legislature of 1891. He also originated the plan of the county and township reform laws of Indiana adopted in 1899, and assisted in their preparation, in connection with members of the State Board of Commerce committee.

Mr. Mason not only ranks high in his chosen profession, but also among his social companions and in the literary circles of the city, where his classical learning and attainments have won general recognition. His father was a gentleman of the old school, universally loved and respected, and an excellent scholar, and thus during his youth Mr. Mason had the advantage of judicious advice and coaching in addition to superior educational opportunities outside of his home. His naturally broad and optimistic disposition has been developed along the most intelligent lines, and he is regarded everywhere as a high-minded gentleman and an altruist in the best sense of the word.

AUGUST ALDAG, who has been living retired from active pursuits for a number of years, was long known in the business circles of Indianapolis as principal owner of the Indianapolis Varnish Company, the success of which concern was of itself evidence of his excellent qualifications as a manager and financier. He has been identified with other enterprises bearing on the commercial life and progress of the city, and has proved himself a citizen of worth in every relation of life, whether of a public or private nature.

Mr. Aldag was born March 10, 1831, in Obernkirchen, Germany, son of Charles L. and Charlotte (Buahne) Aldag, who were respected residents of that place. Coming to Indianapolis in 1854, Mr. Aldag here joined his older brother, Charles, for whom he worked, the brother having opened a shoe store in the city. With a view of becoming independent in time, he saved his money, and in 1870, in company with others, started the Indianapolis Varnish Company, which, with his valuable assistance, was soon on a substantial footing. The prosperity of this business won for him an enviable reputation among business men, by whom he was regarded with unmingled confidence throughout the years of his active career. He became prominent in other lines, and was chosen to various positions of responsibility, serving long as a director of the Indianapolis German Mutual Fire Insurance Company, of which he was one of the organizers. He owns several valuable pieces of real estate in the city, acquired as the result of business acumen and foresight.

Mr. Aldag has always taken especial interest in the welfare of the Deaconess Hospital in Indianapolis, to the funds of which institution he has made substantial contributions, and he is still a director and secretary of the corporation, giving liberally of his time as well as his means to advance its interests.

On Sept. 20, 1859, Mr. Aldag was united in marriage with Miss Dora Cook, daughter of Christian and Dorothy (Bert) Cook, of Germany, and of the ten children born to this union six survive, namely: (1) William married Ida Krauss and has two children, Herbert and Frederick. (2) John married Recke Richemeyer. (3) Dora married George E. Krauss and is the mother of four children, George, Walter, Alma and Dorothy. (4) Charles M. married Esther Horning and has one child, August. (5) Harry has just returned home after six years' service in the army, during three years of which time he was stationed in the Philippines. (6) Nelly resides at home with her parents. Mr. and Mrs. Aldag still occupy the home at No. 1129 East Washington street, Indianapolis, which he built in 1867, and which was remodeled in 1879. It is a beautiful place and has many dear associations for them. They are both in good health, with memory and faculties unimpaired, and are among the most respected residents of their section of the city. Mrs. Aldag deserves much credit for the aid she has given her husband in the conduct of the home and the management of their interests. They are members of the German Evangelical denomination, belonging to the church at the corner of East and New York streets. Mr. Aldag gives his entire support to the Republican party. He has lived retired from the year 1892, enjoying the leisure earned in a long life of industry and well-directed energy.

GRAFTON JOHNSON, one of the foremost citizens of Johnson county, residing in Greenwood, is a native of the city which has been the center of his activities, born Sept. 14, 1864. A son of Grafton and Julia (Noble) Johnson, he belongs on both paternal and maternal sides to the typical stock which made the history of the region in the earlier days.

The Johnson family was founded in Indiana by his grandfather, who emigrated hither from Kentucky in the pioneer days of its settlement, locating for a time at Brookville, Franklin county, but later establishing his permanent home at Peru, Miami county, where he died in advanced age. His business was that of a merchant. His family was numerous. Mr. Johnson's maternal grandfather was George T. Noble, a member of a family which has long been prominent in the State, many representatives of the name being still numbered among its most conspicuous citizens.

Grafton Johnson, the father of the present bearer of the name, was born in Kentucky, and coming with the family to Indiana passed the remainder of his life in the State. He located in Greenwood at the time of the building of the first railroad to the place. He was a man of excellent business ability, throughout life successful in mercantile enterprises, for a number of years conducting stores at various points in the State. Eventually he concentrated his interests at Greenwood, dealing in grain and stock, and during the Civil war buying and selling horses and mules. Mr. Johnson was much interested in gravel roads and was instrumental in their improvement and development. He acquired large land holdings, both in Greenwood and the surrounding country, and also in Indianapolis, and late in life he did a large private loan business. He belonged to the Indianapolis Board of Trade. Mr. Johnson took a vital interest in the moral and intellectual development of his day as well as the material prosperity of his Commonwealth, and he served as one of the trustees of Franklin College. He was long a communicant of the Baptist Church, and in political sentiment a Republican.

Mr. Johnson married Julia Noble, a native of Indiana, and the following children were born to them: Louisa, who is the wife of Henry B. Longden, professor of Modern Languages in DePauw University; Charlotte, wife of Thomas B. Felder, of Atlanta, Ga.; Grafton, of Greenwood; Julia, wife of Edmund T. Shubrick of Greenwood; Grace, wife of James B. Nelson, of Greencastle; James Albert, cashier of the First National Bank of Greenwood; and two who are deceased. Mr. Johnson died in October, 1883, aged sixty-four years. His widow, who still survives, is connected by membership with the Methodist Church.

Grafton Johnson's effective co-operation in the business, political and social evolution of Johnson county entitles him to a place among the notable citizens of Indiana of the present day. He spent his boyhood in Greenwood, graduated from the city high school with credit in 1880, and the following year entered Franklin College, graduating from that institution in 1887. In this connection it may be mentioned that like his father he is a member of the Board of Trustees of Franklin College.

For several years after graduation from college Mr. Johnson was almost wholly occupied in attending to his private business concerns. In 1890 he first came into the public eye as one of the promoters of the Indianapolis and Greenwood Suburban Railway Company. With the thoroughness which characterizes his participation in any enterprise, it was partially through his active efforts that special laws were passed which provided for the building of this very desirable line. Mr. Johnson also assisted in the organization of the Indianapolis, Greenwood & Franklin Railroad company (the first interurban road built into Indianapolis), which is still in existence, and of which he was the able president for some four years, and was mainly instrumental in having the road built. The right of way was secured through his exertions. In 1897 he retired from that office and severed his connection with the company.

In 1892 Mr. Johnson erected a building for Dwiggins & Starbuck, who were operating a chain of banks. This enterprise failed, in 1893, and Mr. Johnson was made receiver of the bank being operated in Greenwood. After the affairs of this concern were wound up Mr. Johnson in association with his brother, J. Albert, organized the Greenwood Banking Company, a sound, conservative, solvent business enterprise, to meet a growing necessity of the place. This financial institution has since been re-organized as the First National Bank of Greenwood, of which Mr. Grafton Johnson is president and J. A. Johnson cashier.

In 1896 Mr. Johnson became connected with an industry which has grown to unlooked-for proportions and has absorbed much of his time ever since. At that date he was made receiver of a canning company, which he carried on in that capacity for four years. Mr. Johnson, recognizing the possibilities open to this business under efficient management, finally purchased the plants located in Whiteland, Franklin and Tipton, and later those at Kokomo and Noblesville and built plants at Shelbyville and Anderson. The plants at Franklin, Tipton, Shelbyville and Anderson are each considered to be among the largest of their kind in the United States, and in all of these factories, now operated by the Consolidated Canning Company, of which Mr. Johnson is president, is employed a total of over 1,500 people. In 1901 these factories packed as many peas alone as were packed throughout the States of Maryland and Delaware, which are considered among the leading pea-growing States. As an example of industrial activity, there were packed, in one day, in these factories, over 600,000 cans. To meet the demand of his own packing interests Mr. Johnson built a factory for the manufacture of tin cans in Indianapolis, equipped with the latest improvements in automatic machinery, but later sold it to the trust, The American Can Company.

Aside from the management of his other interests which might well absorb the attention of a man possessing unusual executive capacity, Mr. Johnson has dealt largely in real estate, especially in farm lands and suburban property in this and other States, now owning suburban tracts of land in forty of the most flourishing cities of Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York.

In political sympathy Mr. Johnson is a Republican. However, he is essentially a business man rather than a politician. Mr. Johnson is a prominent club member, holding membership in the University Club, the Country Club, the Columbia Club, of Indianapolis, and the Phi Delta Theta college fraternity, in all of which he is valued for his thorough good fellowship, high standards of integrity and engaging social characteristics. Greenwood owes much to his progressiveness and public spirit, and justly numbers him among her leading citizens. That he is favorably known in the other communities which claim his attention may be judged from the remarks of Mr. Edward L. McKee, of Indianapolis, for a number of years vice-president of the Indiana National Bank of that city, whose estimate of Mr. Johnson's ability and character he sketches as follows:

"Grafton Johnson, Greenwood, Ind., the head of the First National Bank, also the head of the Consolidated Canning Company, Greenwood, is a dealer in real estate on an extensive scale. He is one of the few men inheriting large means at an early age who has proven himself competent to not only conserve his patrimony, but to almost immediately begin, by wise investment, to add to his financial worth; his acumen in business must have been natural and not acquired by experience because, at the age when many business men are beginning to climb in the financial world, Mr. Johnson had already made an assured position for himself, a position which is enviable as not only showing his capacity for earning and retaining money, but his ability to do so without sacrificing his higher character. His word has always been good, and is held in particular esteem by those who have had business dealings with him. The best proof of his having retained attributes of a high character, such as should be sought for by those engaged in large financial enterprises, is the close friendship in which Grafton Johnson is held by his associates and the financial public generally. The older residents of this State well remember his father, Grafton Johnson, who for many years was a leading merchant in Greenwood, a man of sterling character and successful in accumulating large means by merchandising.—June 18, 1908."

GEN. GEORGE F. MCGINNIS, formerly postmaster of Indianapolis, is a man whose public services entitle him to an honorable place among the citizens of Indianapolis and the State of Indiana. His military record as an officer of both the Mexican and Civil wars is a matter of pride to his adopted city.

General McGinnis was born in Boston, Mass., March 19, 1826. He is a son of Alexander and Hannah (Smith) McGinnis, natives of New York and Massachusetts, respectively, who had a family of eight children, all sons. The General is the only one now living. The father was a hatter, and coming to Chillicothe, Ohio, about 1830, followed his trade there until his death, in about 1853, at the age of sixty-five years. The mother died in 1827. The paternal grandfather of the General was a native of Ireland.

George F. McGinnis was only eighteen months old when his mother died, and he lived with an aunt, Sallie Myrick, in Maine, near the town of Hampden, until eleven years old. At that time his father went after him and brought him to Chillicothe, where he grew to manhood. He had attended the common country schools of Maine, and he learned the hatter's trade under his father, following it for many years, until after he came to Indianapolis in 1850, and went into the business of manufacturing hats. Before coming here he had served two years in the Mexican war, being first lieutenant the first year in Company A, 2d Ohio Volunteers, commanded by Col. George W. Morgan; and captain the second year, of Company K, 5th Ohio Volunteers, commanded by Col. William Irvin. He had a brother, Robert H. McGinnis, who was an assistant surgeon in the regular army in the Mexican war, and died at Vera Cruz of yellow fever. After the war Captain McGinnis returned to Chillicothe and worked at his trade.

In 1861 General McGinnis raised Company K, 11th Ind. V. I., and at the organization of the regiment was elected lieutenant-colonel. After three months' service he was re-elected lieutenant-colonel in the fall, and in September, 1861, was appointed colonel, being commissioned by Governor Morton. He served as such until December, 1862; was then appointed brigadier-general, and served with that rank until the close of the war, being mustered out at Camden, Ark., in September, 1865. He was at Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Port Gibson, Champion's Hill (where he commanded a brigade with conspicuous efficiency), the siege of Vicksburg, and many smaller battles. A nephew of the General, Charles J. McGinnis, was a captain in the 63d Ohio regiment, now a resident of Indianapolis.

The General's military service won notice from distinguished quarters, and one of his fellow citizens of Indianapolis, Judge Daniel Wait Howe, says: "He is a distinguished citizen and soldier, a veteran of two wars, the Mexican and the Civil wars, and conspicuous for distinguished gallantry in both. Just prior to the siege of Vicksburg was the great and decisive battle of Champion's Hill, where he won the title of 'Hero of Champion's Hill.' His brigade was in a very trying position during that battle and acquired a great reputation for its brilliant fighting. Although past eighty years of age, he is still as straight and erect as he was when a young man. Looking every inch a soldier, and still preserving the martial bearing that characterized him as a soldier in his younger days, anyone looking upon General McGinnis even at this day will at once be impressed by his military bearing and see in him a hero who would not hesitate, if necessary, to march into the very jaws of death. As a county and government officer he discharged his duties with scrupulous fidelity and honesty.—Feb. 27, 1908."

The late Gen. John Coburn of Indianapolis, under date of Dec. 6, 1906, wrote thus of General McGinnis: "General George F. McGinnis is a veteran of two wars. He was an excellent officer, a brave soldier, a fine disciplinarian, and had the love and respect of his soldiers. He first enlisted in the Mexican war from Chillicothe, Ohio, and entered the Civil war as lieutenant-colonel of the 11th Indiana Volunteers. He stands in the front rank of the officers of the Union Army, always brave, active and vigilant—none better."

After the war General McGinnis returned to Indianapolis and bought a farm. He was elected, in 1867, auditor of Marion county, and served one term of four years. He then opened an office as assignee of estates in bankruptcy, commissioner of estates, etc., and was in that business for a number of years. He served as county commissioner about twenty months, and after that for eight years was a member of the board of control for the Indiana Reform School for Boys, resigning to accept the position of postmaster, to which he was appointed Aug. 6, 1900, though not an applicant. On Dec. 22, 1900, he was commissioned for four years, and served until February, 1905.

In November, 1849, he married Miss Josephine Raper, daughter of Thomas D. and Margaret (Mackey) Raper, and five children were born to this union, one now living, Frank, a resident of Chicago, where he is in the employ of a transfer company. He married Miss Jessie Shortridge, and they have four children living: George, a pilot on the Lakes; Edwin S.; Danola; and Gertrude. Mrs. McGinnis died Jan. 3, 1908. She was for many years a member of the Episcopal Church.

General McGinnis resides at No. 1902

North Capitol avenue. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, being a thirty-second-degree Scottish Rite Mason, and also belongs to the Odd Fellows, into which order he was initiated in 1847, during the Mexican war, when he was at home.

CHARLES ALDAG was for over half a century regarded as one of the substantial German citizens of Indianapolis, where he had his home from 1848 until his death in 1902. He has a reputation for sound judgment founded upon a continuous record of success. His enterprises were uniformly prosperous, and he not only acquired a competence in his active and industrious career, but commanded the esteem and admiration, as well as the confidence, of all who knew him or had dealings with him. As a private citizen and in business life he had an honored place, of which his family has just reason to feel proud.

Mr. Aldag was a native of Germany, born March 16, 1826, son of Charles L. and Charlotte (Buakne) Aldag, of Obernkirchen (or Upper Church), Germany. The family was well known and respected. Reared in his home place, Mr. Aldag came to this country in young manhood, in 1848 arriving in Indianapolis, where he passed the rest of his life. His industrious disposition was apparent from the beginning of his career. Though he had little capital to begin with, within three years after coming to this city he had a shoe business of his own, and though he later became interested in other ventures he continued to carry on that establishment until 1896, when he retired. His death occurred Feb. 15, 1902. For over forty years it was located at No. 331 East Washington street, in a building which he erected in 1861, and which his widow still owns. At the time this building was going up the old State house was being torn down, and the old locks and keys were used by Mr. Aldag in his building for some time. They are still preserved as relics by the family.

As he accumulated means, Mr. Aldag widened his interests, investing in other lines, and he was among the organizers of several profitable concerns, in the success of which his advice and judgment were appreciable factors. Among them were the Indianapolis German Mutual Fire Insurance Company, which he assisted in organizing, and to which he gave his time and influence without receiving any fee; and the Ebner-Aldag Varnish Company, now known as the Indianapolis Varnish Company, of which he was one of the organizers and served as treasurer. He was also one of the founders of the Deaconess Hospital, now known all over the State as one of its most reliable public institutions. Mr. Aldag was looked upon by his business associates as a man of excellent ability, and his high sense of honor gained him many warm friends.

Mr. Aldag was a man of kind heart and charitable impulses, believing that a man was responsible for the well-being of his fellow-men, and regarding opportunities for benevolence as a privilege. He gave practical and substantial help where he found need, being ever ready with his purse and his friendship to aid worthy causes, and willing to share his prosperity with others. But he had a very retiring disposition, and was unassuming in manner upon all occasions.

Mr. Aldag was married in Indianapolis, Dec. 11, 1851, to Wilhelmina Westfall, a native of Germany, who has lived in Indianapolis from the age of eleven years. Ten children blessed this union, six of whom still survive, namely: (1) Mary is the widow of J. C. Hirschman, of Indianapolis, and they have five sons and one daughter, Frank (who is married and has two sons, Clifton and Russell), Carl, Albert, Harry, Edward and Alma. (2) Martha married John Eberhardt, and they reside in Oak Park, Ill. Their children are: Minnie, Walter, Clara, Elmer, Eva, Harvey and John. (3) Frank married Christine Koch, of Indianapolis, and they have a family of five children, two sons and three daughters, Carrie (who is married and has one child, Shirley), Charlotte, Arthur, Ruth and Raymond. (4) Laura married Ernest G. Eberhardt, of Indianapolis, and has six children, two sons and four daughters, Herbert, Ernest, Olga, Flora, Ruth and Esther. (5) Minnie married Harry Schaaf, of Indianapolis, and has three children, Freda, Norman and Paul. (6) Cora is the wife of William Gielow, and the mother of one son, William Russell. On Dec. 11, 1901, Mr. and Mrs. Aldag celebrated the golden anniversary of their wedding, and their youngest daughter, Cora, was married that day. The family home at No. 1230 East Washington street, Indianapolis, a handsome and commodious building, surrounded with ample grounds, was built by Mr. Aldag in 1870, and is still occupied by his widow. The house contains many evidences of the artistic taste and ability of their children, principally the work of their youngest daughter, Cora.

Mrs. Aldag proved an able helpmate to her ambitious husband. While he devoted himself to the success of his business concerns she did her full share in the management of the home and the rearing of their children, and the standing of all the members of this family is sufficient testimony of the faithful and intelligent devotion she has given them. She has a splendid memory, which goes back to the early days of Indianapolis when there was little thought of the present beautiful city now the pride of the State. Mr. and Mrs. Aldag were respected by all their friends and neighbors. Mr. Aldag belonged to the First Church of the Evangelical Association, at the corner of East and New York streets, in which his widow still retains membership. His children were all married under and belong to the same religious denomination. In political sentiment he was a strong Republican.

HON. JESSE OVERSTREET, present member in Congress from the Seventh Indiana Congressional district, has the peculiar distinction of having represented three districts of this State in the national legislative body. He was first elected to Congress in 1894, and has served continuously since. During this long period he has performed many valuable services for his constituents, chief among which will rank his labors in behalf of what is generally known as the Gold Standard Act. For a number of years he was one of the most trusted counsellors of the national organization of the Republican party, relinquishing this work in 1906 because of the pressure of other duties.

Mr. Overstreet is a member of the third generation of his family in Indiana, being a grandson of Samuel Overstreet, a native of Virginia, who early settled in Kentucky. From Oldham county, Ky., he moved to Johnson county, Ind., in 1834, among the early pioneers of that section, where he settled down to farming. He died at the advanced age of eighty-two years. Samuel Overstreet was twice married, first to Elizabeth Hawkins, and second to ——— Whitesides. He had a large family, all born to the first marriage, and we have record of the following: Rev. Robert M., a Presbyterian minister, is now living retired at Emporia, Kans.; Richard T. was a banker at Franklin, Johnson Co., Ind.; James and William were merchants at Franklin; John was a farmer; Elizabeth became the wife of John Herriott, merchant, pork packer, farmer and land owner; Matilda married L. W. Fletcher, of Johnson county, later of Indianapolis, farmer, pork packer and banker; Gabriel M. was the father of Hon. Jesse Overstreet; and there were several others, some of whom died in infancy. The Overstreet family is of English extraction.

Gabriel M. Overstreet was but fourteen years old when his father moved to Johnson Co., Ind., in 1834, and he grew to manhood on the pioneer farm. But he had other ambitions for himself, and in order to aid him in securing the education he desired his father advanced him a share of his estate, which he sold for $600—a large sum in those days. This sum, together with what he had saved from his earnings, enabled him to enter the State University of Indiana, at Bloomington, from which institution he graduated in 1844. He had decided to take up the legal profession, and accordingly began the study of law with Gilroy Hicks, of Franklin. He was admitted to the Bar in 1847, and one year later formed a partnership with A. B. Hunter which continued unbroken until the latter's death in 1891, through the remarkable period of over forty-three years. Mr. Overstreet died at his home in Franklin Feb. 8, 1907, in his eighty-eighth year. For years he ranked as one of the foremost lawyers in Indiana, and through an active professional life held the respect and admiration of the legal fraternity throughout the State. Mr. Overstreet devoted himself principally to his private business affairs, but he served as a member of the State Senate from 1882 to 1886. He had positive convictions regarding the great questions of the day, however, and though over age when the Civil war broke out he enlisted in the Union service, becoming a member of Company G, 132d Indiana Volunteer Infantry, in which he served as a private to the end of his term of three months. Returning to civil life, he engaged in the practice of his profession until 1902, when he retired.

On Nov. 20, 1849, Mr. Overstreet was married to Sarah Lucinda Morgan, a native of Indiana, whose father, Lewis Morgan, was a pioneer Baptist preacher of Indiana. Mr.

Morgan was a native of Tennessee, and settled in Shelby county, Ind., in the early twenties. Later he moved to Illinois, where he lived for some years, but returning to Indiana he passed the remainder of his life here, becoming prominent in the work of his denomination in this section. He was one of the founders of the Baptist College at Franklin, Ind., and was its first financial agent. He died at the age of about eighty, after a long and useful life, leaving an excellent name to his numerous descendants. We have the following record of his numerous family: Madison Morgan was a farmer of Johnson county, Ind. Rev. Thomas J. Morgan, a prominent minister and educator, held numerous important positions and was for years a power in the Baptist denomination; he was professor of church history at the University, Morgan Park, Ill.; president of the Normal College at Potsdam, N. Y.; president of the Normal College of Rhode Island; commissioner of Indian affairs under President Harrison; and for a number of years preceding his death was secretary of the Baptist Home Missionary Society of the United States. At the outbreak of the Civil war he left college to enlist, and remained in the Union service throughout that struggle, which he entered as a private soldier, but was mustered out as a brigadier-general. William Morgan was a merchant in Indiana. Alexander Morgan was a merchant and farmer of Kansas, residing near Topeka. Elizabeth Morgan married Col. Samuel Lambertson, a merchant of Franklin, Ind. Iby Morgan became the wife of — Phillips, a prominent educator, who at the time of his death was superintendent of public schools in Kansas City, Mo. Nancy married George Fain, a Californian. Hasseltine married Charles Burton, now deceased, an attorney at Denver, Colo. Sarah Lucinda was the wife of Gabriel M. Overstreet. Mrs. Overstreet was a granddaughter of Andrew Evans, who fought in the Revolutionary war, and was engaged in the famous battle of King's Mountain. She was also a grandniece of Gen. Daniel Morgan, and great-granddaughter of Elizabeth Taylor, who came of the same family as President Zachary Taylor.

Gabriel M. Overstreet was a member of the Presbyterian Church and long served as elder. His wife was a Baptist prior to her marriage, after which she joined her husband's church, and all their children have united with that denomination. Seven children were born to them, namely: (1) Irene is the wife of Daniel W. Herriott, of Washington, D. C., an expert in the Treasury department, where he has been employed for over thirty years. (2) Samuel L. was located at Guthrie, Okla., and at the time of his death was considered the best lawyer in that Territory. He married Miss Julia Kern, of Louisville, Ky., who is also deceased. They left no children. (3) Hubert L., at present engaged as assistant chief clerk in the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., married Miss Hannah Stillenger, of Columbus, Ind. (4) Jesse is mentioned farther on. (5) Arthur, a manufacturer of Columbus, Ind., married Miss Hattie F. Crump, of that place. (6) Miss Nina M. lives at the family home in Franklin. (7) Carrie Hasseltine is the wife of A. N. Goff, a farmer of Franklin, Johnson Co., Indiana.

Jesse Overstreet was born Dec. 14, 1859, in Franklin, Johnson Co., Ind., and was reared there. He attended the public schools, the high school and Franklin College, graduating from the latter institution in 1882 with the degree of A. B.; and he later received the degree of A. M. from his alma mater. His classical course completed, he began reading law with his father, though for some time after leaving school he had very poor health, and was in danger of losing his eyesight. In 1886 he was admitted to the Bar, and subsequently became a member of the firm to which his father belonged, and which then became Overstreet, Hunter & Overstreet. After Mr. Hunter's death father and son continued to practice together until 1896, in which year Mr. Jesse Overstreet, in order to give proper attention to his legislative duties, removed to Indianapolis. He was first elected to Congress in 1894, from the district including Johnson and seven other counties, and served until 1896. In that year he was re-elected, from the new district made up of Johnson and Marion counties, and accordingly moved to Indianapolis. Marion county was afterward made a district by itself, and Mr. Overstreet has since represented it. He has been active in legislation favored by his constituents from his very first term, when he called the attention of Congress to the injustice done the old soldiers in the method of paying them their pensions at the agencies, where they were frequently the prey of designing men and women who relieved and in many instances robbed them of their money. The law Mr. Overstreet succeeded in obtaining required all persons to be paid in checks, which they received at their homes, thus affording the recipients the protection of their families and friends. The system has greatly benefited the soldiers and has been warmly commended in many quarters. President Cleveland pronounced the bill as he signed it the best piece of work enacted by the LIVth Congress. After the national contest of 1896, over the gold or silver standard, a movement originated at Indianapolis of which Mr. H. H. Hanna, of that city, was the leading spirit, in behalf of the gold standard. It resulted in the appointment of a commission directed to prepare and urge upon Congress comprehensive financial legislation, and this body consisted of the following members: George F. Edmunds, of Vermont, chairman; George E. Leighton, of Missouri; T. G. Bush, Alabama; W. B. Dean, Minnesota; Charles S. Fairchild, New York; Stuyvesant Fish, New York; J. W. Fries, North Carolina; Lewis A. Garnett, California; J. Lawrence Laughlin, Illinois; C. Stuart Patterson, Pennsylvania; and Robert S. Taylor, Indiana. The comprehensive measure prepared by this commission was introduced into the LVth Congress by Hon. Jesse Overstreet, but although it was considered by a committee no action was taken upon it by that body. During the last session of the LVth Congress, at a caucus of the Republican members of the House, a committee of eleven was appointed and directed to prepare and report to a caucus of the Republican members at its next session a bill relative to financial matters. This caucus committee consisted of Gen. J. B. Henderson, of Iowa; John Dalzell, Pennsylvania; Sereno Payne, New York; J. W. Babcock, Wisconsin; W. C. Lovering, Massachusetts; W. S. Kerr, Ohio; R. B. Hawley, Texas; Charles Curtis, Kansas; Page Morris, Minnesota; E. F. Loud, California; Jesse Overstreet, Indiana. The committee met at Atlantic City, N. J., whereupon it became known as "the Atlantic City Commission." It agreed upon and prepared a bill, and selected Mr. Overstreet to prepare a report upon the bill and present the report and bill to the Republican caucus at Washington. The report which he prepared was approved by the committee without any changes, and was presented to the caucus and approved by it. This matter of presentation to the caucus was left entirely to Mr. Overstreet, no other member of the committee taking part. Some features of the bill not clearly understood met with opposition in the caucus, and this difficulty was not fully overcome until explained by Mr. Overstreet at the second session, at which the bill was approved in its entirety. Mr. Overstreet opened the debate, and had the management of the bill in the House, which it passed successfully. The Senate passed a substitute therefor, and when the conferees of both Houses to which the bill was then sent—this committee consisting of Senators Aldrich and Allison and Representatives Overstreet and Brosius—met they settled the differences between the two Houses, the bill was passed, and on March 14, 1900, received the signature of President McKinley. It is best known as the Gold Standard Act of 1900, and its effects have been far-reaching, having had great influence in establishing confidence in the United States and strengthening our credit abroad.

As chairman of the committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the House, to which place he was appointed by Speaker Cannon, Mr. Overstreet has proved himself capable and won a reputation for remarkable judgment concerning wise regulations in that department. This committee is unquestionably one of the most important in the House, and, summing up its duties from year to year, possibly the most important, affecting as it does every citizen of the country. Mr. Overstreet entered upon his duties at its head much against his will, realizing the enormous responsibility and vast amount of labor involved in the conscientious transaction of the business intrusted to it. The problems connected with the handling of second-class mail, railway mail pay, readjustment of pay of postal employes, reorganization of the postal service, codification of the postal laws, and the reduction of letter postage have received his especial consideration. In 1906 he served upon the commission authorized by Congress to investigate the subject of second-class mail matter; and in 1908 he was a member of the commission authorized by Congress to investigate the business methods of the Postoffice Department, and make a report concerning a re-organization of the postal service, and the codification of the postal laws. Mr. Overstreet's direct services to his home city are manifest in the beautiful postoffice of Indianapolis, and he deserves great credit for his work in that line, both for securing the appropriation and determining the classical character of the architecture, without in any way sacrificing the utility of the structure. To him also is due the credit for securing the location of the Benjamin Harrison army post near Indianapolis, which has over fifty buildings and 2,500 acres of land; when the full garrison has been established it is estimated that the annual revenue to the city from the post and its men and officers will average $250,000. Mr. Overstreet has labored faithfully in the promotion of these and other large interests which he deems of most importance to the great body of the people he represents. In June, 1908, he was appointed by Speaker Cannon a member of the Monetary Commission authorized by Congress to investigate and report upon the subject of Banking and Currency.

Mr. Overstreet's work in the Republican party organization is worthy of especial note. In 1892 he was a member of the State central committee. In 1895 he was made a member of the National Congressional committee, which deals with the election of members of Congress, and in 1896 he was made a member of the executive committee of the National Congressional committee. In 1898 he was made secretary of the committee, continuing as such until his voluntary retirement from that body. His labors in this association naturally brought him into close contact with the leading men of the nation, and for a period of ten years he was one of the three men who practically managed all the Congressional fights. Representative Babcock, of Wisconsin, who was chairman of the national committee throughout those years, said of Mr. Overstreet that he had the keenest perception and the most accurate judgment of a political situation of any man he ever knew. He refused twice to be chairman of the committee unless Mr. Overstreet remained to assist him. In 1900 both Mr. Overstreet and Mr. Babcock remained on the committee at the special request of Mr. McKinley, and in 1902 and 1904 at the special request of Mr. Roosevelt. In 1906 they both retired from the committee, Mr. Babcock's health making it necessary for him to be released from its duties, and Mr. Overstreet withdrew because of the multitudinous affairs which demand his constant attention. They co-operated as few men find it possible to do, and were successful in every campaign they undertook to manage.

As an attorney Mr. Overstreet is able and scholarly, eloquent in speech, and noted for the integrity and fairness of his professional transactions. His home office is in the Traction and Terminal building, Indianapolis. The local opinion of himself and his work is well summed up in the words of the venerable Dr. William H. Wishard, who recently said:

"I know Hon. Jesse Overstreet. I have known three generations of Overstreets in Johnson county, Ind., and they were the cleanest men I have ever known. All were honorable men. In the early thirties Jesse Overstreet's grandfather came from Virginia or Kentucky and settled in Johnson county, Ind., on Hurricane creek, north of Franklin. He was a farmer, and his reputation was A No. 1. He had sons: William, a merchant, who died at Auburn, Kans.; John, who was a farmer; Gabriel (the father of our present Congressman), an attorney who was raised in Johnson county and practiced there all his life, and I have heard it repeated that if there was an honest attorney ever practiced at the Bar in Franklin, Johnson county, it was Gabriel Overstreet; and Richard, another brother, who was cashier in the Bank of Franklin many years and stood as a man of unimpeachable integrity. They were all men that stood in the community as first-class citizens and men of honor and integrity. Jesse is a worthy representative of his ancestors, a modest, unassuming man, but of great ability and integrity. He has been a faithful representative of his constituents, and of his country. He has an enviable record as a public man and a citizen.

"Mr. Overstreet is a man of the strictest integrity, looking after the financial and real estate interests of his father in the interest of the family. He has the characteristics of his father in his business transactions as a just and generous man."

During his extensive travels, covering both this country and Europe, Mr. Overstreet has gained by close observation much valuable information concerning governmental affairs. He has a host of friends and admirers in his home city, where his career is usually regarded as reflecting great credit upon those whose good judgment has kept him in office, as well as upon himself. In his Congressional work Mr. Overstreet does not rank as an orator, and rarely takes part in the debates except upon subjects with which he is directly associated. He excels particularly in committee work, and in what, after all, is the most important work of Congress, the preparation and construction of laws. The constructive statesman is equal in influence to the oratorical statesman. Mr. Overstreet is a master in detail work, and a good executive officer. He is patient, painstaking and complete in his work, and clear and logical in debate. As a close student he makes preparation with great care, and, having a thorough understanding of his subject, he is usually able to argue a question with great force. He is sincere in all of his dealings and enjoys the confidence of all who know him. He bears an excellent reputation among public men and exerts considerable influence in Congress. His peculiar talents, and endurance in continued hard work, have been recognized, and brought demand in Congress for extra work. He has probably been appointed upon more different commissions and special committees charged with especially important work than any other member during his service in the House.

Mr. Overstreet has resided in Indianapolis since November, 1896, he and his wife living at their home, No. 2015 North Meridian street. He was married June 7, 1898, to a sister of his brother Arthur's wife, Miss Katharyne Crump. Mrs. Overstreet is a daughter of Francis T. and Elvira (Kyle) Crump, of Columbus, Ind., where Mr. Crump is a prominent farmer and manufacturer and also the largest banker of the place. Mr. and Mrs. Overstreet are members of the Presbyterian Church, and fraternally he is a member of the Knights of Pythias and is a thirty-second-degree Scottish Rite Mason.

FASSETT ALLEN COTTON, State Superintendent of Public Instruction in Indiana, 1903-1909, was born at Nineveh, Johnson Co., Ind., son of Marion Irwin and Rachel (Wright) Cotton. His paternal and maternal ancestors were of English extraction. His grandfather, William Cotton, who married Nancy Irwin, came from Kentucky to Indiana in pioneer days and settled in Johnson county. His early life was devoted to farming and later he engaged in business. He moved to Sedalia, Mo., and afterward to California, where he died in old age.

Marion Irwin Cotton was a farmer and a teacher. He spent most of his life in Johnson county, Ind., but moved to Missouri in 1867, and died in Sedalia in 1869. He married Rachel Wright, daughter of William Winford Wright, and she now lives at Nineveh, Indiana. For many years the father was an elder in the Christian Church, and all the members of the family are members of this denomination.

William Winford Wright, father of Mrs. Rachel (Wright) Cotton, was born in Virginia, and early in the nineteenth century came to Kentucky and later to Indiana, settling in Johnson county, near the town of Nineveh. He married Rachel Baker, and they reared nine children. He was a farmer and a man of sterling character.

Mr. Fassett Allen Cotton has been twice married. In 1885 he married Florence N. Wright. To them were born two children, Irwin W. and Carol F. In 1903 he was married to Lena L. Dobson. Mr. and Mrs. Cotton, with the two children, Irwin and Carol, reside in this city. Those who have enjoyed the hospitality of their home carry most pleasant memories of the time spent there.

Mr. Cotton's whole life has been spent close to the school. His career is largely educational. His early education was obtained in the district schools and township high school in Johnson county. He attended Spice-land Academy in 1883-4, Butler College in 1884-5, and Indiana State Normal in 1888-9. In 1902 he was graduated from Butler University, and in the same year from the University of Chicago. He did graduate work in the University of Chicago from Sept. 1, 1902, to March 15, 1903. In 1905 he received the degree of LL. D. from Franklin College. Aside from three years spent as deputy auditor of Henry county, Mr. Cotton's life work has been with the schools. He has been in turn teacher in district, village and town schools, county superintendent six years, deputy State Superintendent six years, and State Superintendent six years.

Mr. Cotton's best work has been done as State Superintendent of Public Instruction. He brought to the office a clear understanding of the educational needs of the State, and an experience that has proved very valuable indeed in his attempt to solve many of the problems that have presented themselves. He mapped out for himself work along definite lines and set about to accomplish certain things. These lines he has followed consistently through his three terms. Probably the thing that has received his closest attention has been his desire to give all the children of the State equal educational opportunities. He has done everything he could do to give the rural schools longer terms, better buildings, better equipment, better teachers, so that they may have advantages equal to the town and city schools. It is but fair to say that much has been accomplished in this direction during his administration. The recent laws that have done so much toward bringing equal opportunity were without doubt largely the result of Mr. Cotton's work.

Another subject that has received Mr. Cotton's constant attention is the development of a rational course of study. While he has not been radical in his changes he has insisted from first to last that present conditions and needs rather than tradition should determine the nature of the work. He believes that education includes the element of utility as well as the elements of knowledge, aesthetics, and character. And so he has insisted that the hand as well as the head shall be trained. In bringing about such notions he has been willing to use conditions as they are until better things can be provided. He believes that the dominant community interest can and must be used in the educational process and that through this means agriculture is gradually to come into its own in education; that in the same way other industries are to receive attention till finally a rational adjustment can be made of manual or industrial and academic work.

Mr. Cotton has made a careful study of the County Institute, and has tried to make it a larger instrument in educational work. He has tried to strengthen its weak points and to put it in closer touch with the State Teachers' Association. As a result of his efforts the work in the County Institute is more carefully planned, better instructors are obtained and larger interest is manifested. Doubtless Mr. Cotton has done more for the development of music in the public schools than has ever been done before. This has been because he appreciates music himself and knows its place in education. During his incumbency as State Superintendent Mr. Cotton has been quick to use every means possible to educate the people. He has issued monthly bulletins to the teachers and through them has kept different departments of education in touch with each other. A certain unity of purpose in school work has been maintained over the State, the importance of which it would be difficult to estimate. The Department is required to make a report to the Governor and Legislature every two years. The two reports issued during Mr. Cotton's term have been models of system and completeness. In addition to the use made of these reports by the Legislature and the general public they have been made a part of the systematic work of the teachers in their monthly meetings of the Township Institute.

Mr. Cotton believes in newspapers as educators and has been at some pains to keep them informed as to the work of the Department. It is probably no exaggeration to say that the newspapers have devoted more space editorially and in their news columns to Mr. Cotton's work than they did to all his predecessors. The work done by the Department in the Indiana Educational Exhibit at St. Louis deserves especial mention. This consisted of the preparation of a volume of 600 pages, "Education In Indiana," which set forth in a definite, systematic way the distinct features of the Indiana system, and of an attractive display of the actual work done in the public schools of the State. The exhibit received much favorable comment. The educational legislation during Mr. Cotton's administration marks a distinct advance in Indiana educational history. The laws placed upon the statutes may be said to stand for things that Mr. Cotton has been working for. The schools are undoubtedly in better shape than they have ever been. Teaching is undoubtedly more nearly a profession than it has ever been.

While it may be said that Mr. Cotton's work as an educator will be measured by what he has accomplished there is one factor that ought to be mentioned that cannot be measured and that is the manhood of the man. Those who know him know that he is genuine, and that his sole ambition has been and is to make life and living in the world better than he found it.

AUGUST M. KUHN. In August M. Kuhn is found one of the leading citizens, capitalists and prominent men of Indianapolis, one who controls large interests in many lines, and who is identified with much of the city's material prosperity.

Mr. Kuhn is of German birth and ancestry. Both grandfathers were agriculturists in their native land, the former adding wine growing and distilling to his farming enterprises. Neither ever left the Fatherland, but in their grandson has been exemplified the traits which made them also successful within their narrower spheres.

Mr. Kuhn was born May 11, 1846, in Bavaria, Germany, a son of Jacob and Barbara (Klundt) Kuhn. They reared two children: Johanna, the widow of Peter Iwig, of Indianapolis, and August, of this sketch. August M. Kuhn was fortunate in having an intelligent father, one who was a teacher in his native land all his life, and one who filled many honorable positions in the city government, serving for a number of years as city clerk. He died in 1871, aged fifty-six years, and his wife passed away in 1862, aged thirty-seven years. Both were members of the Lutheran Church.

With his father's encouragement and partly under his care, August M. Kuhn, by the time he was fourteen years of age, had completed the common and high school course in his native place and from that age engaged more or less in business for himself, depending on his own resources. He was nineteen years of age when he came to America, in search of better business opportunities and, after spending six months in New York, getting his bearings in the new land, he came to Indianapolis in 1866, and it has resulted in much benefit to the city that he has made this his permanent home. For nine years he conducted a millinery business here and then embarked in the coal and building material business. This however is but a small part of his business interest. He has financed a number of very successful enterprises and among those with which he is at present prominently identified may be mentioned: Brinkmeyer, Kuhn & Co., wholesale grocers; the Citizens' Loan and Deposit Company, of which he is vice-president; the Capitol National Bank, of which he is a director, as he is also of the Inter-State Life Association and the Columbus, Greensburg & Richmond Traction Company, those being but a fraction of the enterprises in which he has been more or less interested. He is also a member of the board of directors of the Deutsche Haus and belongs to most of the German social organizations, including the Maennerchor. He was president of the local Festival board of the Thirty-second Saengerfest, North American Singers' Union, held at Indianapolis June 17-21, 1908, one of the most successful in the history of the organization. His fraternal associations are with the Elks and the Masons; in the latter fraternity he has reached the highest degrees.

In politics a Democrat he has always shown a lively interest in the success of his party, both in national and local affairs. He has at various times served as city commissioner, school commissioner and as collector of customs, making a record not only for fealty to party, but for efficiency in the performance of his duties, and for the public integrity which is, alas, so sadly wanting in these days.

On June 21, 1871, Mr. Kuhn was married to Miss Emma Ruschaupt, daughter of Frederick and Katherine (Bonn) Ruschaupt, and they have three children: Cora, Edna and George. Cora married Albert Goepfer, and they have one daughter, Dorothy; Edna is the wife of Dr. Paul Martin; and George is still at school. Both Mr. and Mrs. Kuhn are members of the Lutheran Church, contributing liberally to its support. The home of Mr. Kuhn and family is one of the beautiful residences of a city which has gained enviable reputation for its palatial homes. This mansion he erected in 1902, at No. 602 North Capitol avenue. It is decorated with all that wealth and taste could suggest and is a model of modern comfort and convenience.

WILLIAM LEE THOMPSON, M. D., a distinguished and leading physician of Morgan county, and a descendant of an old, honored and patriotic family which has figured in the early historical annals of Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky and Indiana, was born Nov. 20, 1866, in Howard county, Ind. He is a son of James O. and Julie (Lee) Thompson, the former a native of Orange county, N. C., where the family had been located for several generations, Abel Thompson, the Doctor's great-grandfather, having lived there. His son, Jonathan Hadley Thompson, grandfather of Dr. Thompson, grew to manhood in North Carolina, moving with his family to Indiana in 1845. He became a prosperous farmer and merchant at Mooresville, where he died. His wife, Elizabeth (Latta), daughter of Joseph and Sarah (Chambers) Latta, was a member of a family celebrated in the East.

James O. Thompson came to Indiana with his parents when eight years old, the trip being made overland in a wagon. The family settled first on a farm in Howard county, later removing to Morgan county, where James O. Thompson became engaged as a general merchant in Mooresville. There he passed the remainder of his life, dying in 1902. Mr. Thompson was married in Howard county, Ind., to Miss Julie Lee, daughter of Jonathan and Elizabeth (Lindley) Lee, the former a farmer and land owner in Howard county. Mr. Lee was born in Virginia, and was a descendant of the famous Lee family of that State, being of the same stock as the Revolutionary general, "Light Horse Harry" Lee, and the Civil war general, Robert E. Lee. Mr. Thompson was a member of the I. O. O. F., and his religious connection was with the M. E. Church.

Dr. William Lee Thompson is the only surviving member of his parents' family. He received his early education in the public schools, graduating from the high school at Mooresville in 1885, after which he entered De Pauw University. There he took a preparatory course, with a view to entering medical college, matriculating at the Indiana Medical College in 1887. Upon graduating, in 1889, he located in Mooresville, where he has since been actively engaged in general practice. Dr. Thompson inherited from sturdy ancestors mental and physical qualities of a high order, and possessing a natural taste for medicine and surgery, it is but natural that he should have attained his present high position. While not a specialist, he has been remarkably successful as an obstetrician, in which line he has made an excellent reputation. In all his work his analytical brain and great sympathies have been the secret of his success. He has never spared himself in the prosecution of his professional duties, to which he has given his best resources and energy without stint. Realizing the disadvantages that the physician has to strive against in a small town, the Doctor at a great expense erected a most modern building, located on South Indiana street, adjoining the M. E. Church, in which he has a laboratory; a surgical department; an electrical department, containing apparatus for the treatment of all diseases of the eye, ear, nose and throat; and a department devoted entirely to therapeutics. Here he keeps, at great expense, all the most approved modern remedies known to the profession, having an equipment not usually found in a town of the size, and one of great value to the community. Moreover, he has one of the most complete medical libraries in the State. The Doctor maintains his office in this building, which is provided with special heating apparatus. The electrical appliances are operated by water-power.

Dr. Thompson is a man of unusual enterprise, a trait he has shown from the beginning of his independent career. In his youth he was ambitious for an education, and the fact that it had to be obtained entirely through his own efforts proved no obstacle in its attainment. He worked his way through school and through De Pauw University as successfully as he has battled with the more perplexing problems of his later life. His devotion to his chosen calling has never flagged, and through that medium he has found many opportunities to benefit his fellowmen. He has never been backward in charitable work, and his contributions to the M. E. Hospital and Deaconess Home of the State of Indiana, located at Indianapolis, have been steady and substantial. Any movement for the betterment of humanity claims his serious consideration and enlists his sympathies and help. He is a good citizen in the best sense of the word.

Dr. Thompson married Miss Ida Dakin, daughter of Sylvester and Ann (Hadley) Dakin, Friends and old settlers of Morgan county, related to the celebrated Hadley family of Hendricks county. To this union has been born one daughter, Edith Julie. The Doctor and his family occupy a fine home in Mooresville with ample grounds, tastefully and conveniently arranged for comfort and hospitality. Dr. and Mrs. Thompson are members of the M. E. Church. Fraternally he is a member of the I. O. O. F. and Encampment, I. O. R. M., K. of P., and Masonic fraternity, in which latter he has attained the thirty-second degree and is a Shriner; he belongs to the commandery at Martinsville.

VALENTINE A. MAGENHEIMER, M. D., of Mooresville, Morgan Co., Ind., who has recently become a partner of William Lee Thompson, M. D., was born in St. Charles, Mo., in 1876, son of Martin Magenheimer. His parents are now residents of Morgan county, Ind. Beginning his education in the public schools of his native place, Dr. Magenheimer eventually entered the Central College of Physicians and Surgeons, at Indianapolis, from which he was graduated in 1898. He started practice in Waverly, Ind., where he was successfully engaged until the fall of 1907, later being a student with Dr. Thompson, until they formed the present partnership, known as Thompson & Magenheimer. Dr. Magenheimer is a self-made man, possessed of unusual ability, and is an all-round physician and surgeon, worthy of the high estimation in which he is held.

He has been twice married. His first wife, Sallie (Councilman), of Waverly, Ind., died in 1905, the mother of two children, Clair and Alice Fern. In January, 1908, he married for his second wife Miss Laura Houk, daughter of the late Rev. Mr. Houk, of the German Evangelical Church of Indianapolis.

THEODORE PEARSON DAVIS, former Judge of the Appellate court of Indiana, and one of the leading lawyers of the State, who died April 25, 1907, had a well-deserved reputation for technical knowledge, impartial decisions and a high sense of professional ethics and personal honor. Judge Davis bore a Welsh name, and certain it is that Wales was the home of the family before the emigration to America, but just when that emigration took place is not known. The first of the family of whom there is definite record was

(I) John Davis, a farmer, who prior to the war of the Revolution made his home in North Carolina, but after the close of that war he moved his family to the extreme northwest part of South Carolina. John Davis married Jane Davis, and they became the parents of eight children, as follows: Adam married Ella Black; George married Sarah Meckelny; Paul married Margaret Alexander, and they are mentioned in full farther on; Robert married Mary Black; John married Esther Liddle; Milly married Owen McCorkle; Elizabeth married Samuel Black; Violet married William Brown.

(II) Paul Davis, son of John, was born in Mecklenburg county, N. C., Aug. 6, 1769. He went from his native county to northwest South Carolina, but the name of the county is not known. It is not certain, either, whether this removal was before or after his marriage (about 1791) with Margaret Alexander, daughter of David and Margaret (Morrison) Alexander, of old Scotch Covenant stock, nor again is it certain whether she lived in North or in South Carolina. There is a strong probability, however, that the marriage occurred in Charlotte, N. C., but it is understood that all the children of this marriage were born in South Carolina. In the latter part of 1812, or early in 1813, Paul Davis moved to Harrison, Ohio, but at the end of one year came to Indiana Territory, and located near Connersville, and there he and his family were living in 1814. When the family left the South, all the children except James and George came, also. These two had enlisted in the regular army, and were stationed at Charleston. After they had served one year their father returned to South Carolina, and succeeded in getting them released on account of their youth. Late in 1814 Paul Davis purchased a farm three miles west of Connersville, and on it he made his home during most of the remaining years of his life. He was a man most orderly in his habits, exercising great care not only with regard to his personal appearance, but with regard to his farm and everything connected with it. His stock was kept in perfect condition—his tools and implements cleaned and sharpened, ready for use at a minute's notice. He was possessed of good common sense and was well informed, but was of a very impetuous nature and tenacious of his opinions. His wife Margaret was a woman of decided character, but of even temper, domestic in her tastes, and her death in October, 1839, removed one of the best known pioneer women of the State. To Paul and Margaret Davis were born children as follows: (1) George, born May 9, 1792, married Violet McCorkle, in Carolina, had ten children—Madison, Marion, George, Violet, Marshall, Almira, Volney, Addison, Margaret and Harry—and died in Madison county, Ind., in 1873. (2) James, born May 14, 1794, married Rilla Hackleman, in Rushville, Ind., and died in Vermilion county, Ind. (3) Wilburn, born Jan. 30, 1797, is mentioned in full further on. (4) Robert, born May 17, 1799, married Lena Handley, in Kentucky, and died in Parke county, Ind., prior to 1830, leaving a widow and three children, who moved to California. (5) John, born Dec. 30, 1801, married Elizabeth DeHaven, in Kentucky, and died in Fayette county, leaving a daughter, Nancy, now of Logansport, Ind. (6) Dulcina, born Dec. 24, 1804, married, in 1826, Moses Caldwell, in Fayette county, Ind., had four children—Margaret (deceased), Thomas J., J. W. and Ezilpha—and died Jan. 14, 1896. (7) Paul, Jr., born Oct. 31, 1806, married Jane Gordon, in Ohio, and died in Madison county, Ind., leaving five children, John (deceased), Nancy, Isaac, Oliver (deceased) and Albert C., the last named being formerly recorder of Madison county. (8) Thomas Jefferson, born March 31, 1810, married Maria Ball, in Fayette county, Ind., and had nine children, all yet living, William, J. N., Eliza, James H., Doctor B., Sarah J., Elizabeth M., Rachel and John; he died in 1856. (9) Jasper N., born Sept. 25, 1812, married Miranda White, in Fayette county, Ind., and had three children, Helen M., and Mary Elizabeth and Horace C., deceased; he died March 22, 1895, and his widow July 8, 1902.

After Mrs. Margaret (Alexander) Davis died Dulcina kept the home for her father for some time. Mr. Davis eventually deeded eighty acres of his farm to Jasper N. (the part including the brick house), who was crippled, and ten acres to Dulcina, keeping seventy for himself. In 1842 he married again, and settled in a log house on the farm, later moving to Henry county, Ind., there remaining until he and his wife, by reason of their advanced years, could no longer wait on each other. She went to her relatives, and he to his son's at the old Fayette county home, and there he died in 1858. In politics he was originally a Democrat, but in 1828 became a Whig, and a great personal friend of Oliver H. Smith. All of Paul Davis's sons became Whigs except Wilburn and James, Wilburn and all his descendants being invariably Democrats. In his younger days Mr. Davis was a Presbyterian, and a strict observer of the ordinance of family prayer, but before he left South Carolina he had abandoned the church because of the disgraceful conduct of some of the members in high authority. He was always temperate in his habits, and after he reached the age of fifty years never used either whiskey or tobacco.

(III) Wilburn Davis, son of Paul, was born in South Carolina, Jan. 30, 1797, was brought up on a farm, and became thoroughly familiar with all the duties connected with successful agriculture. On March 1, 1821, at the home of Alexander Dale, near Harrisburg, Fayette county, he married Nancy Dale, daughter of George and Hannah Dale, and one of the most enduring and sprightly of women, noted as the fleetest of foot of all her associates. After her eldest son was grown she could easily outdistance him in a foot-race. She died of malarial poisoning in 1855. To Wilburn and Nancy (Dale) Davis were born the following children: William Alexander, born Jan. 8, 1822, married Sarah Ann Kimble, and died in Sheridan, Hamilton county, in 1895, the father of a large family; Newton Jasper was born Nov. 23, 1823; Dulsina, born Jan. 1, 1826, married Phineas Gardner Pearson, and died in 1875, near Sheridan; Cordelia, born in 1827, married Coswell Boxley, and died in 1858, at Boxley, Ind.; Albert Cole married Elizabeth Overlease, and died in 1864, on his farm in Adams township; Hannibal died on his Adams township farm Nov. 12, 1855; Wilburn, Jr., died in infancy; and Henrietta died in Adams township Nov. 19, 1855. At the time of his marriage Wilburn Davis owned a farm in Shelby county, Ind., on the banks of the Blue River, and there he and his young bride went. They had nothing except a few simple necessary articles, and that first year they planted and cultivated six acres with hoes. This is now said to be one of the finest farms in the State, but Mr. Davis sold it in 1822, and returned to Fayette county. In March, 1825, they moved to Hamilton county, Ind., and there settled on a farm he owned near Noblesville. In April, 1830, they moved to Noblesville, where he engaged in the hotel business in the building previously erected by George Shirts, and where the Hollenbach barber shop now stands. He became quite popular as landlord of the best hostelry in many miles, but in 1835 he moved to a section of land he owned in Adams township, near Sheridan. This was then all wild prairie land, but he made of it a fine farm. He was the first brick maker in Hamilton county. A man of strong positive character, he was bound to make an impress upon the community in which he dwelt, and he was always active and alert in public affairs. He was a captain in the Indiana militia, and he served Hamilton county as agent, an office similar to auditor. The deed to the public square on which the court house is located was executed to Wilburn Davis, as county agent. He died at Noblesville Aug. 31, 1837, from the effects of exposure in assisting some pioneers to move across the country near Lafayette in 1833.

(IV) Newton Jasper Davis, son of Wilburn, born Nov. 23, 1823, was second in the large family of children, and upon him devolved the care of the household at the death of the father. At that time he was but fourteen years of age, but farmers' sons in pioneer days early learned to shoulder responsibility and to face bravely whatever duties came their way. In the spring of 1838 the family returned to the vicinity of Noblesville, where the lad put out a crop of corn. The next year he worked for six dollars a month. In 1840 he moved the family back to Adams township, and he spent four years in clearing and cultivating the old farm. At the end of that time he returned to Noblesville and worked on what is now the County Poor Farm at eight dollars a month, paying his board in wet weather. That fall (1844) he rented a farm two miles northeast of Noblesville, on the White River, and to it brought his family. While he worked the farm, and from it procured most of the living, ready money was scarce, and it was necessary for him to get other work to do in order to meet such expenses as required actual money payment. In August, 1846, he joined a surveying corps at Peru, and helped survey the Indianapolis & Peru Railroad to Indianapolis, now known as the Lake Erie & Western Railroad. He also assisted in the survey for the Indianapolis & Terre Haute Railroad to Terre Haute. In 1847 he rented the Carey Harrison farm, and operated it until 1851, when he moved to Westfield and there, in partnership with John Davis, started a tannery, and in connection a large harness and saddle shop. This venture proved successful, but the work was not congenial, so Mr. Davis, in 1855, purchased a farm in Section 29, Adams township, where he afterward resided. The first home on this farm was a hewed log house, with puncheon floors covered with boards, and a loose loft, while the fire place was built of mud, mortar and sticks. This was in the midst of the woods, and all the surrounding country was a wilderness. Mr. Davis set resolutely to work, cleared the primeval forests and literally carved out his farm of 100 acres. In order to get the few groceries needed prior to his marriage, he walked to Lafayette, where he chopped wood at 37½ cents per cord, and carried his wages home on his shoulders in the form of groceries and dry goods. He was a man of excellent mind, and was a close reader of books and newspapers, keeping in touch with all the events of the day. Especially was he a student of Holy Writ, and he was liberal in his religious views, being an ardent admirer of Theodore Parker.

On July 10, 1853, at Boxley, Ind., Newton J. Davis was united in marriage with Louisa Pearson, born in Ohio, in 1827, daughter of Herman and Jocabad (Teller) Pearson. She lived in Ohio for many years, and there worked as a tailoress. She was a noble and excellent woman, proud and ambitious, and one of the neatest of housekeepers and best of home-makers. She died Oct. 25, 1862, the mother of children as follows: Theodore Pearson; Harriet Luella, born May 22, 1856, married in February, 1877, Milton Hiott, and lives in Sheridan, Ind.; Wilburn B., born Feb. 23, 1858, lives near Seattle, Wash.; Austin, born April 3 (or 4 ?), 1860, died when about three weeks old; Jasper P., born Oct. 6, 1862, married in July, 1884, Margaret Pallum, and lives at the old home farm near Sheridan. On Sept. 10, 1863, Newton J. Davis married, for his second wife, Mary J. McMindes, and of the five children of this marriage three died in infancy. The survivors are: Viola E., born in November, 1871, is a school teacher, and lives with her mother and brother in Urbana, Ill.; and Charles G., born in March, 1875, a graduate of the State University, and later a student in a university in Germany, is one of the instructors in the University of Illinois at Champaign, Ill. Newton J. Davis died on his farm near Sheridan June 9, 1904. He was an able and honest man and good citizen, and he had the confidence and respect of all who knew him. His life had been the busy one of the pioneer looking to the advancement and development of the country, and he reared his family to useful and honorable manhood and womanhood, worthy bearers of an honored name.

(V) Theodore Pearson Davis, eldest son and child of Newton J., was born Jan. 5, 1855, at Westfield, Ind., and his life up to the age of seventeen years was passed on the farm, attending the district schools and assisting his father. In 1872 he went to Lebanon, Ohio, and there for four months attended the National Normal School, preparing himself to teach the home school. This he did for one year, and then went to Noblesville, where for a short time he attended Normal School. In September, 1873, he became a teacher in the graded schools there, but the profession of teaching was to the ambitious youth only a means to an end. He had long before determined that his life work was to be the practice of law, and he began his legal studies in the office of Moss & Trissel, continuing there under the able guidance of those successful old school practitioners until 1875, when their partnership was dissolved. However, he continued with Mr. Moss, in the latter's new partnership as a member of the firm of Moss & Kane, until October, 1876, when that firm dissolved, and he became a partner of Thomas J. Kane, under the firm name of Kane & Davis. Mr. Davis had been admitted to the Bar at the age of nineteen. From the beginning the new firm enjoyed a good practice, and they found it a rapidly growing one for sixteen years. In 1892 Mr. Davis was elected judge of the Indiana Appellate court, and he held the office for a term of four years, discharging his duties with dignity and impartiality. After his retirement from the Bench he was actively engaged in practice at Noblesville and Indianapolis, maintaining his residence in the latter city from June 1, 1901. After January 1, 1897, he was associated with Judge Frank E. Gavin and the latter's son, James L. Gavin, under the firm name of Gavin & Davis. They had offices in the Lemcke Block, Indianapolis.

Judge Davis never swerved from the political faith of his fathers, but was a Democrat of pronounced convictions. From the time he started out in the world for himself he was active in work for his party, and from the time he attained his majority he was almost constantly in some office of public trust. At twenty-one he was chairman of the Democratic County Central Committee, and alternate delegate to the Democratic National Convention; at twenty-four he was a delegate to the Democratic National Convention; and at thirty-five a candidate for Circuit Judge, and notwithstanding an adverse majority of 1,500 was defeated by only 181; he was elected Appellate Judge in 1892; for several years until 1898 was a member of the State Central Committee; and for three years was a school trustee. In every position he was faithful to his trust.

As a Mason the Judge attained the thirty-second degree; in the I. O. O. F. he passed all the chairs including that of noble grand, and represented his lodge in the Grand Lodge of the State. He also belonged to the I. O. R. M. and K. of P. He was a member of the University Club, the Commercial Club, and the Indiana Democratic Club (in the latter of which he was a director). In 1902 he was elected president of the Indiana Bar Association, an office he capably administered for one and one-half years. There were several thousand people who formerly lived in Hamilton county and who later lived in Indianapolis, and they formed an organization, holding annual reunions, and of this association the Judge was president, as he also was of the association of the many descendants of Paul and Margaret (Alexander) Davis, now residing in the counties of Marion, Hamilton, Madison, Hancock, Grant and Fayette.

In spite of the manifold duties of his professional and political connections, Judge Davis did not overlook the material advancement of the commercial interests of his section, but was found in the front in furthering such enterprises as would substantially aid in the progress and well-being of the community. He organized the Noblesville Gas and Improvement Company, the Noblesville Water and Light Company, and many other corporations. Although not a member of any religious denomination, he attended the Presbyterian Church.

On March 1, 1877, Judge Davis was united in marriage in Piqua, Ohio, with Anna F. Gray, who was born Dec. 5, 1852, daughter of Jacob Chrisman and Catharine (Houser) Gray, and three children blessed this union: Helen, born July 23, 1879; Gray, born Jan. 11, 1885; and Paul, born Jan. 10, 1887.

Gen. Jefferson C. Davis, a prominent soldier and officer from the State of Indiana in the War of the Rebellion, was also a member of that branch of the Davis family that moved from the Carolinas, and is said to be a grandson of George Davis, son of John Davis, and brother of Paul.

ALEXANDER. The Alexanders of North and South Carolina have played an active part in some of the formative chapters of American history, and in each generation members have distinguished themselves in patriotic and honorable service for country or State. Six of the signers of the famous Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, May 20, 1775, were Alexanders, and when the original of that historic instrument was destroyed by fire in 1800, it was John McKnitt Alexander, secretary of the original convention, who transcribed it anew from memory.

[It is stated that David Alexander, father of Margaret, wife of Paul Davis, was one of the signers, but his name does not appear as such in the history of Mecklenburg county.] The Alexanders came to America from Ireland, and were of Scotch Covenanter ancestry there. David and Margaret (Morrison) Alexander, parents of Margaret, wife of Paul Davis, were the parents of nine children: David, who married Jane Woods; James, who married Martha Moore; Jane, who married John Moore; Ann, who married a Gocher; Catharine, who married Samuel Brown; Ellen, who married Archibald Reid; Elizabeth, who married Robert Woods; Ruth, who married Joseph Archer; and Margaret, born Jan. 31, 1767, wife of (II) Paul Davis.

The first Southern woman to enter the medical profession was Annie L. Alexander, of Mecklenburg Co., N. C., who graduated in Philadelphia in 1884, and has since been a successful practitioner.

Nathaniel Alexander, a native of Mecklenburg county, was a graduate of Princeton in 1776. He entered the Revolutionary army; served in the State Legislature in 1797; State Senate, 1801-2; and while holding a seat in Congress in 1805, was chosen by the Legislature Governor of the State, serving two years. He died at Charlotte Nov. 8, 1808, leaving no children. His wife was Margaret Polk, daughter of Col. Thomas Polk.

Tilghman Alexander Howard, who was a prominent lawyer at Rockville, Parke Co., Ind., senior member of the firm of Howard & Wright (the latter afterward Governor of Indiana), and also at one time a partner of Governor Whitcomb, was Democratic candidate for Governor in 1840. He was a descendant of the Alexander family, and a relative of Margaret, wife of Paul Davis.

DALE. Mrs. Nancy (Dale) Davis, wife of (III) Wilburn Davis, was born in December, 1802, daughter of George and Hannah Dale, natives, respectively, of Virginia and Maryland, who were married in the Old Dominion in 1775. The Dales were originally from Scotland. In the first half of the Eighteenth century three Dale brothers emigrated from England, and upon reaching this country they separated, one going to New England, one to Virginia, and one to the South. George Dale was a son of the one who located along the Potomac river in Virginia. George lived in Westmoreland county, that State, until 1786, when he moved to near Craig's Station or Versailles, Woodford Co., Ky., and there exchanged feathers in a feather bed for land at the rate of one pound of feathers for an acre of land. In 1817 or 1818 he moved to Connersville, Fayette Co., Ind., and in 1821 to Noblesville, where he died in 1833. He was a soldier in the War of the Revolution, and was present with Washington at the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. His wife, whose maiden name was Hannah Dale, was no known relation. They became the parents of the following children: Elizabeth, born Jan. 1, 1777; Catesby, Oct. 3, 1778; Frankey, Oct. 3, 1780; George, March 9, 1782; Hannah, born Sept. 14, 1783; Alexander, Feb. 3, 1786; Letty, March 15, 1788; Polly, April 21, 1790; Joseph, April 3, 1792; John, June 7, 1794; Sylvan, Jan. 27, 1796; Samuel, Jan. 6, 1798; Rebecca, Nov. 8, 1800; and Nancy, Dec. 7, 1802.

PEARSON. Mrs. Louisa (Pearson) Davis, wife of Newton Jasper Davis and mother of Judge Theodore P. Davis, came of New England stock, of English, Scotch and Irish descent. Her grandfather, Jonas Pearson, was born in Massachusetts in 1779. His father was an Englishman, and his mother a Scotchwoman. In 1800, at Lowell, Mass., Jonas Pearson married Rhoda Underwood, who was born in Massachusetts, daughter of Asa Underwood, an Irishman, and his wife, who was of Scotch parentage. Soon after their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Pearson came West, settling in Brown county, Ohio. He was the first dairyman who ever made cheese in the State of Ohio. The Pearsons and the Grants (the family of which Gen. U. S. Grant was a distinguished member) were long residents of the same neighborhood in Ohio. To Jonas and Rhoda Pearson were born children as follows: Louisa; Heman, mentioned below; Prudence; Sophia; Suel; Sarah; Charles, who is living in Ohio, and whose son, David V., was for many years an attorney at Georgetown, Brown Co., Ohio, while another son, Samuel, was a lawyer in Kansas; Joseph; Maria; Orilla; and Jonas.

Heman Pearson, son of Jonas, was born in Brown county, Ohio, in 1803, and there in 1824 married Jocabed Teller, whose mother, Lottie (Gardner) Teller, was a daughter of Benjamin Gardner, of New York. Mrs. Pearson died in Hamilton county, Ind., Jan.

28, 1837, the mother of two children: Phineas Gardner, born in 1825; and Louisa, born in 1827, who married Newton Jasper Davis. After the death of the mother of these children, Heman Pearson was twice married, and had children by his second marriage. He died on his farm near Sheridan in 1880.

GARDNER. Benjamin Gardner, great-great-grandfather of Judge Theodore P. Davis, in maternal lines, was a native of New York, and was a soldier in the Revolutionary war. His daughter Lottie married a Teller, in Brown county, Ohio, and her daughter Jocabed married Heman Pearson. Mills Gardner, a lawyer of Washington, Ohio, was a member of the same family. The Gardners were strong people with some peculiar characteristics, punctual and exacting in their engagements. There were several ministers of the Gospel in the family.

GRAY. The Gray family to which Mrs. Anna F. (Gray) Davis, widow of Judge Theodore P. Davis, belongs, is thought to have been native of Ireland. It was planted in this country by Daniel Gray, who, emigrating from either England or Ireland, settled in New Jersey.

Amos Gray, son of Daniel, moved to Ohio about 1809. In 1811 he married Sophia Chrisman, and he died at Piqua, Ohio, in 1875, aged eighty-eight years. Jacob Chrisman, grandfather of Sophia, was born May 5, 1720, and died Jan. 22, 1785. His son, Jacob Chrisman, Jr., was born in Pennsylvania, perhaps in Berks county, Nov. 2, 1745, and had no educational advantages. In his youth he was a farmer and house carpenter. In early life he married Mary B. Summers, and shortly after they left Pennsylvania for Guilford county, N. C., where they lived until 1794-5, when they moved to Bowman. In the meantime he had become a member of the Reformed Church, and on moving to Bowman, he entered the ministry. On May 1, 1798, on the call of six congregations in Bowman and in adjoining places, he was regularly ordained to the Gospel ministry by the Synod of the German Reformed Church of North America, during its regular meeting at Lancaster, Pa. In 1802 he made a tour on horseback to Ohio, and after traveling seven hundred miles, arrived on Feb. 1st in that part of Warren county, Ohio, then generally known as the Clear Creek settlement. At the end of five months, during which time he preached in private houses, he returned to Carolina, but at the end of one year again went to Ohio.

Jacob Chrisman Gray, son of Amos and Sophia (Chrisman) Gray, was born Aug. 6, 1812, and he became a carpenter and contractor. He was a zealous member of the Baptist Church at Piqua, Ohio, and there died in February, 1881. On Dec. 25, 1838, he married Catharine Houser, who was born March 30, 1821, daughter of Jacob and Mary (Haney) Houser, the former born in Northumberland, Va., Nov. 17, 1796, a grandson of Henry Houser (who emigrated to this country from Germany, and died Feb. 25, 1795), and a son of Martin Houser (who was born in 1762). Jacob Houser and his wife lived many years at Dayton, Ohio. Mrs. Catharine (Houser) Gray died at Piqua, Ohio, in May, 1897. Of the children born to Jacob Chrisman and Catharine (Houser) Gray, John H. makes his home in Cincinnati, Ohio; William H. lives in Chicago; Anna F. married Theodore P. Davis, of Noblesville and Indianapolis, Ind.; Sarah Margaret is the wife of Major R. D. Cramer, of Memphis, Mo.; Martha Alice is the wife of Dallas D. Sigler, of Piqua, Ohio.

DEMARCHUS C. BROWN, the present State Librarian of Indiana, is a scholar whose studies and researches have taken him into educational centers all over the world. As an authority on the Greek language and literature he is known throughout the State and he ranks among the best in the country.

Mr. Brown was born June 24, 1857, in Indianapolis, son of Philip Brown and grandson of Andrew Brown, of Butler county, Ohio. Philip Brown passed most of his life in Butler county, where he was born in 1800, moving to Indianapolis in 1852. He died in this city in 1864. He located in the northeastern part of the city, on what is now Massachusetts avenue, and followed the business of lumber merchant. From him his son undoubtedly inherited his studious tastes, for though a self-educated man Philip Brown was a persistent and thoughtful reader, and the many scholarly works his library contained gave an estimate of his intellectual calibre. He married Julia Tröster, a lady from Reutlingen, in Wurtemberg, Germany, born in 1832, who survived him some years, dying in 1874. They had a family of four children, Amptor, Hilton U., Demarchus C. and Fe-mina, Amptor and Femina dying when children. Hilton U. Brown is now general manager of the Indianapolis News.

Demarchus C. Brown received his early education in the public schools of his native city, taking his preparatory and college course at the North Western Christian University, from which institution he was graduated in 1879. The professor of Greek having died, Mr. Brown became a tutor of Greek before he was graduated. He received his master's degree in 1880, a year after graduation. In 1882-83 he devoted himself to study at the University of Tübingen, Germany, and the British Museum; in 1883-84 he was instructor in Greek and secretary of the board of directors of Butler College, in 1884 becoming professor of Greek at that college, with which he retained his connection in the same capacity until called to his present duties in 1906. Meantime he had taken various opportunities for study abroad—in Paris, France, in the autumn of 1892; at the American School of Classical Studies, Athens, Greece, in the winter of 1892-93; at the Berlin Museums in the summer of 1896; and in company with Mrs. Brown was engaged in work at Munich, and the museums of Athens and Rome, in fall of 1897; in 1899 they worked together in the museums and libraries of Paris and London. Mr. Brown has published translations from Lucian (Bobbs-Merrill Company, 1896), and a translation of Freudenthal's "American Criminology," brought out in 1907 by the State Board of Charities. He belongs to various societies maintained in the interest of his special lines of work and thought, having been a member of the American Philological Society since 1893; of the American Archaeological Institute since 1895; of the Classical Association of the Middle West and South since its organization, in 1905; of the American Library Association; of the Indianapolis Literary Club (serving as president this year—1908); of the Contemporary Club and the Athenaeum, both of which he has served as president; and of the Indiana Historical Society.

With all his professional labors Mr. Brown has kept in personal touch with the practical side of progress as well as the higher intellectual development, and since 1893, when first appointed by Governor Matthews, he has been an active member of the State Board of Charities, having been re-appointed by every successive governor; he was president of the State Conference of Charities for one year.

In September, 1906, Mr. Brown was chosen State Librarian by the State Board of Education, and was re-elected the following April. Already the library is showing evidences of his progressive administration, for he has made many improvements which increase its value and render its treasures more accessible. Two departments have been enlarged since he took charge, the Legislative Reference department and the Indiana Archives department. As a linguist and general scholar he is widely known and appreciated, particularly for his learning in his special field of study, in which, in the opinion of his associates, he has few equals.

In March, 1881, Professor Brown married Miss S. Anna Rudy, of Paris, Ill., who died in April, 1891. In 1897 he married Miss Jessie Lanier Christian, whose mother, Mrs. Eliza Christian, was a daughter of Angelina (Logan) Williams, whose mother was a daughter of Col. Benjamin Harrison, of Virginia. One son, Philip C., was born to Mr. and Mrs. Brown in 1901. Professor Brown is a member of the Disciples Church.

RICHARD V. DITMARS, one of the oldest business men of Franklin, Johnson county, and a representative merchant of his section of Indiana, is one of the early settlers of that city and a member of a family not only included among the pioneers of this State but also among the earliest in America.

The emigrant ancestors of this branch of the Ditmars family came to these shores two hundred and seventy-one and more years ago. In the year 1636 a man of the name of Ditmars purchased a farm on Long Island, comprising 135 acres. In the year 1886 fifty acres of this tract, which was still in the Ditmars name as it had been for two hundred and fifty years, were sold out of the name by Adrian Vandever, a real estate broker of Flatbush, Long Island, to a prominent business man of Broadway, New York City, for $125,000. This fifty-acre piece was included in the town corporation of Flatbush, a suburb of the city of Brooklyn, and on the day of the sale mentioned the old Ditmars homestead, which had been built one hundred and twenty-five years before, was still standing. The property was at once laid out in building lots for sale.

According to Hon. W. D. Ditmars, of Holmesville, Ohio, the name had its origin in the Duchy of Ditmarszen, Holland. There are families in this country who spell their name "Dittmar," but they hail from Germany and are no relation whatever to the Ditmars family.

Two sons of John Ditmars, of Flatbush, Long Island, settled in New Jersey in the year 1730. Their names were Dow Ditmars and Rem Ditmars, and from the latter the branch of the family in which we are interested trace their lineage. Rem Ditmars died June 17, 1775,, and his wife, Hellen, died April 24, 1778. They were the parents of the following named children: John, born Dec. 27, 1741; Frederick, born Dec. 27, 1742 (married Phebe Dumont); Peter, born Feb. 23, 1744; Abraham, born July 23, 1747; Helena, born Sept. 16, 1749; Ioine, born Jan. 11, 1752; Dinah, born Feb. 16, 1754; Martha, born March 21, 1756 (married Garrett Vorhes); Mariah, born Dec. 2, 1759 (married Peter Vorhes); Catharine, born Nov. 9, 1761 (married Jacobus Van Nuys); Phebe, born April 1, 1763 (married Ryneer Moore). [The foregoing data were copied from the manuscript of "Aunt" Moore in New Jersey.]

Peter Ditmars, son of Rem, born Feb. 23, 1744, died Feb. 25, 1792. His wife, Margaret, died Nov. 27, 1781, the mother of the following named children: Peter, born May 22, 1771; Sarah, born March 13, 1773 (died Oct. 1, 1776); Rem, born Aug. 28, 1774 (died Sept. 5, 1774); John, born Oct. 11, 1775 (died Sept. 22, 1776); John (2), born April 23, 1778; Abraham, born Jan. 24, 1780 (died Jan. 17, 1876); and Frederick, born Nov. 8, 1781 (died Dec. 10, 1781). The records would indicate that the father of this family contracted a second marriage, and had children also by that union, as there is mention of three other children of Peter Ditmars, Cornelius, Garrett and Margaret, though no dates are given. [The foregoing record was copied from the McKissics manuscripts at Millstone, N. J.]

Abraham Ditmars, son of Peter, married Cornelia Stryker, of New Jersey, who was born March 2, 1781, and died Dec. 19, 1843, on the farm now occupied by her grandson, W. D. Ditmars, of Holmesville, Ohio. To Abraham and Cornelia (Stryker) Ditmars were born children as follows: Margaret Pummy, Sept. 3, 1801; Peter, Feb. 1, 1803;

R. V. Dilmars

Jane, June 1, 1804 (died Sept. 3, 1805); Isaac, Sept. 3, 1806; Eliza, April 3, 1808; Cornelius, Nov. 16, 1809; John, Nov. 28, 1811; Garrett, Sept. 13, 1814; Henry, Oct. 15, 1816; William, Nov. 3, 1818; Abraham, June 3, 1821. All of this family were born in Hunterdon county, N. J., and a number of their descendants are found in Ohio and Indiana. There are also families of this branch living in northern New York State, in central Michigan, at Eldon, Iowa, and at Cameron, Mo. A Mr. George F. Ditmars is Surrogate at Canandaigua, N. Y. In Brooklyn there is Raymond Lee Ditmars, of the Zoological Gardens, and his father, John V. H. Ditmars, all more or less distantly related to the Ditmars of whom we write. From data at hand it is evident that those of the name have been generally enterprising and successful, active in the progress of the various communities with which they have been identified, and creditable citizens in every respect. Mr. W. D. Ditmars, of Holmesville, Ohio, previously mentioned, has an old English musket that an ancestor carried in the war of the Revolution as a member of the army of New Jersey, under Washington. It is one of his most cherished possessions.

Garrett Ditmars, father of R. V. Ditmars, of Franklin, Ind., was like his father, Peter Ditmars, a native of New Jersey, born about 1791. He grew to manhood there, and in an early day emigrated westward, moving from Millstone, N. J., to Warren county, Ohio, where he followed his life occupation, farming. In about 1837 he moved again, this time to Johnson county, Ind., where he bought land in Union township and settled with his large family. He died on his farm there in 1851, at the age of sixty. Garrett Ditmars married Sarah Verbyke, like himself a native of New Jersey and of Holland-Dutch descent. Her father, Capt. Cornelius Verbryke, was born in New Jersey, and was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, serving as a captain at the battle of Trenton. He died in his native State when an old man. He was the father of a large family. His wife lived to the advanced age of ninety-five. Mrs. Sarah (Verbryke) Ditmars survived her husband, dying in 1854, at the age of about sixty. Both were members of the Presbyterian Church during their later years, though they had originally been identified with the Reformed Dutch faith. They were the parents of twelve children, six sons and six daughters, five of this family still surviving, namely: Peter, who is a resident of Franklin, Ind.; Cornelius L., of Hopewell, Johnson county; John T., of Franklin township, Johnson county; Richard V.; and Rebecca, widow of Orion Donnell, of Minneapolis, Minnesota.

Richard V. Ditmars was born in 1834, in Warren county, Ohio, and was two years old when brought to Indiana. His home has ever since been in Johnson county, where he has long been regarded as one of the most substantial and reliable citizens who have been identified with practically all of its history and modern development. During his youth and early manhood he worked upon his father's farm, and he attended the local educational institutions, first the log school house typical of the early days and later the academy at Hopewell, where the advantages were good for the time. In 1861 he enlisted, at Franklin, in Company F, 7th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, which went into camp at Indianapolis, where the regiment was organized under Colonel (later General) Dumont and sent at once to western Virginia. There it went into camp at Elk river, and not long afterward participated in the battle of Greenbrier. Mr. Ditmars was subsequently in many skirmishes, and when he had served eighteen months was injured at the battle of Port Republic, having his left leg broken; there was a compound fracture of both bones, and he was given an honorable discharge.

Returning home after his military experience, Mr. Ditmars became a clerk in the dry-goods store of J. L. Jones, in the autumn of 1863, continuing thus for three years, at the end of which period he commenced business on his own account. He began modestly, but on a sound basis, and his advancement was rapid, for within a few years he had an assured place among the most reliable merchants of his section, and in all the intervening years his standing has never suffered the slightest deterioration. Now he is one of the leading merchants of Franklin and one of the solid business men of the community in every respect. His establishment is not surpassed as a dry-goods and carpet house in the city, and all the stock is complete and contains an unusually good assortment. The store is fully equipped with all modern appliances for the prompt and efficient discharge of the large business daily transacted, and employment is given to a large force of people.

On Dec. 2, 1873, Mr. Ditmars was married to Miss Alice Barnett, of Greenfield, Ind., only child of Dr. Robert E. and Eliza (Pierson) Barnett, and three children were born to this union, Jessie, Eugene and Lillian. Lillian, who lives at home, is the only survivor, Jessie having died at the age of three years and Eugene in infancy. The mother died in 1888, at the age of thirty-eight. She was a devout member of the Presbyterian Church.

In 1893 Mr. Ditmars married Miss Mary Mather, of Indianapolis, daughter of Mrs. Anne Mather, and they reside at No. 50 West Madison street, where Mr. Ditmars has had a pleasant home since 1873. In addition to this property he owns a fine farm of 283 acres just south of the city of Franklin.

By his thrift, energy and excellent judgment in business matters Mr. Ditmars has risen from the position of a clerk to the standing of a wealthy and respected merchant, and he has not only advanced his own interests but also those of his town, county and State. His public spirit has made him one of the most desirable and useful citizens of the region, which in the long period of his residence here he has seen develop from the primitive conditions of pioneer days to its present prosperous state. With his wife he belongs to the Presbyterian Church, in which he has been active and prominent, doing much for the advancement of Christianity and benevolent movements in general, as well as aiding zealously in the welfare of his own church. His influence in religious circles, as in all other interests with which he is identified, has always been directed toward the most praiseworthy ends, and his life has much to show in works that have been of benefit to his fellowmen. He has always taken particular interest in the young men of his acquaintance, and has proved a helpful friend to more than a few, giving them both counsel and material aid in securing desired educational advantages and a fair start in the world.

Mr. Ditmars is a member of Wadsworth Post, G. A. R., No. 127. In political sentiment he is a Republican, almost invariably supporting the candidates of the party, to which he has given liberally of his time and sympathy, since its organization.

EDWARD LODGE MCKEE, of Indianapolis, president of the Merchants Heat & Light Company, is one whose activities have not only brought him into prominence in the business life of Indianapolis, but have made his name known throughout the West. He was formerly vice-president of the Indiana National Bank, of Indianapolis, and is still a director of this conservative institution. His record is characteristic of the stock from which he springs, its members in every generation giving evidence of mental and moral strength, freedom of thought and a love of justice—qualities which conduce to useful citizenship and high character in any generation. The McKees are of Irish extraction, and on his mother's side Mr. McKee is descended from Kentucky and Indiana pioneers whose names are famous in the early annals of the Middle West.

The McKees were among the Scotch Covenanters who, driven from their native land by persecution because of their stanch allegiance to their religious principles, took refuge in Ireland. Sir Patrick McKee, to whom the McKee family traces back, was early a resident of the Province of Ulster, having two thousand acres, a castle and a bawn in County Down. From this same region have emigrated many families whose names have become recognized among the bulwarks of early American history, the Grants, McClellans, Camerons, Stuarts, Polks, Todds, and others too numerous to mention, having aided loyally in laying the foundations of the Republic.

James McKee, the grandfather of Edward Lodge McKee, was born May 23, 1793, and his wife, whose maiden name was Agnes McMullan, was born Nov. 14, 1793. They were married Dec. 6, 1813, and had children born as follows: James M., Nov. 4, 1817; William H., Aug. 10, 1819 (died Nov. 24, 1867); Robert S., Jan. 8, 1823; Eliza Ann, April 29, 1824 (died April 20, 1851); Margaret, Sept. 18, 1825; Sophie, Aug. 3, 1828. The mother of this family died Oct. 5, 1837, the father, who survived her many years, passing away in August, 1863.

Robert S. McKee was born in Tullycavy, County Down, and there passed his early life. His educational advantages, compared with modern facilities, were meager. But unpromising circumstances did not seem to hamper him. The spirit which dominated his life was early made manifest. When only thirteen he pluckily left the land of his birth to join his brother William, who had settled in Philadelphia. Crossing the ocean alone, the boy found his brother. Within a short time after his arrival he had obtained employment as clerk for a company engaged in transporting goods over the mountains between Baltimore and Wheeling, and later the company established him as a clerk in their grocery store at Wheeling. In this connection he gained an experience that gave him confidence to start in business for himself while still a young man. In 1847 he floated down the Ohio river on a flat-boat, and located at Madison, Ind., where in partnership with Josiah S. Weyer he embarked in the wholesale grocery business under the firm name of Weyer & McKee. The business was subsequently conducted by R. S. McKee & Co., and the house became well known all over the country, before the Civil war attaining such proportions that its trade amounted to a million dollars annually. As his capital increased he became interested in other lines, being prominently associated with the National Branch Bank at Madison, and with the Madison Fire and Marine Insurance Company. In 1865, removing to Louisville, Ky., he there founded the wholesale grocery house of McKee, Cunningham & Co., who controlled a large patronage throughout the entire South. The business gained such proportions that Mr. McKee erected a large building for its use and extended its operations in various ways. He became prominent in other connections in Louisville, being a member of the first board of directors of the Citizens National Bank, and was active in various enterprises that tended to promote the best material interests of the city.

In 1872 Mr. McKee removed to Indianapolis, where he met with a degree of success that completely overshadowed his earlier achievements. Organizing the wholesale boot and shoe house of McKee & Branham, which later became incorporated under the name of the McKee Shoe Company, Mr. McKee was made the president and continued to serve as such until his death. It was largely as a result of his intelligent and effective management that the concern met with the success which made it notable. Under his capable guidance the company became foremost among the leading shoe houses of the country and held an important relation to the trade at large.

Though he started life with no material advantages Mr. McKee demonstrated the fact that ability and strength of will are superior weapons to fight the battle of life. His mental faculties were clear, his mind active and receptive, and his intelligence keen and broad. He became noted for his mental acquirements and remarkable information. His qualities as a leader were unquestioned, and he became one of the foremost figures in commercial and financial circles in Indianapolis, where the last thirty years of his life were spent. He was director of the Indiana National Bank, was the first secretary of the Belt railroad and Stock Yards Company, and during his later years he owned a large amount of valuable realty in the city. All his investments were marked by a judgment and foresight that testified to his keen business ability. Of most positive character, he had a force of personality which well befitted his Scotch-Irish blood. He was noted for his integrity and for the honorable methods that characterized all his dealings—perhaps his most notable trait was his abhorrence of debt. Consistent in his adherence to the faith of his forefathers, Mr. McKee was long recognized as a leader in the First Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis, in which he served for many years as an elder. His death, which occurred at his home in this city June 10, 1903, removed from Indianapolis one who had done much to promote its best interests and to bring it to a position among the leading business centers of the United States. His high ideals and public spirit made him ready to lend his support and active co-operation to whatever promised to serve the public interests or benefit his fellowmen in any way. Mr. McKee was interred in Crown Hill Cemetery amid simple funeral services, conducted by Rev. M. L. Haines, of the First Presbyterian Church. His sons acted as pall bearers.

Robert S. McKee's first wife was Celine Elizabeth Lodge. Later he married Mary Louise Lodge. He was the father of six children, namely: William J. McKee, who served as a brigadier general of Indiana Volunteers in the Spanish-American war; Edward L. McKee; James Robert McKee, general manager of the General Electric Company of New York, married to Mary S. Harrison, daughter of the late President Harrison; Frank Latham McKee, of New York; Richard Boone McKee, of Indianapolis; and Celine Lodge, wife of Charles W. Merrill, of the Bobbs-Merrill Company, publishers, of Indianapolis. The family home was at No. 1126 North Meridian street, Indianapolis.

Mrs. McKee, like her husband, was a Presbyterian in religious connection. She was a daughter of William Johnston and Mary Grant (Lemon) Lodge, through her father being a descendant of Christopher Clark, and through her mother of the Boones, Grants, Lemons and Morgans. William Johnston Lodge was named for his mother's family, her maiden name being Johnston. She was a direct descendant of Christopher Clark, who came to this country in 1625, receiving a grant of land from the King. He settled in what is now Hanover county, Va. His daughter Agnes Clark married Lord Robert Johnston, a younger son of the Earl of Shaftesbury. In two generations there were only two sons. They dropped the "t" and were known by the name of Johnson.

Capt. William Grant, great-great-grandfather of Mr. Edward L. McKee, was born Feb. 22, 1726, and married Elizabeth Boone, born Feb. 5, 1733, daughter of Squire Boone and Sarah (Morgan) Boone, and sister of Daniel Boone. Mr. and Mrs. Grant died June 22, 1804, and Feb. 25, 1814, respectively. Their children were as follows: Mary, born Sept. 22, 1752, married Moses Mitchell; John, born Jan. 30, 1754, died Nov. 11, 1825, married Mollie Mosby (he was a colonel); Israel, born Dec. 14, 1756, died in October, 1796, married Susanna Bryan; Sarah, born Jan. 25, 1759, died March 28, 1814, married John Sanders; William, born Jan. 10, 1761, died Feb. 20, 1814, married Sarah Mosby; Samuel, born Nov. 23, 1762, died Aug. 13, 1789 (killed by Indians), married Lydia Craig; Squire Boone, born Sept. 19, 1764, died June 10, 1833, married Susanna Hand; Elizabeth, born Aug. 28, 1766, died Jan. 18, 1804, married John Mosby; Moses, born Oct. 3, 1768, died Aug. 17, 1789 (killed by Indians); Hannah, born March 30, 1771, died March 30, 1777; Rebecca Boone, born June 4, 1774, died Dec. 7, 1858, married John Lemon.

The father of this family, Capt. William Grant, was a man of good education for the time in which he flourished, had substantial standing as an extensive land owner, and was a stanch patriot during the Revolution, being a trusted member of the Committee of Safety in North Carolina. He also gave active service in that struggle. Later, in company with his intrepid brother-in-law, Daniel Boone, he was among those who defended the frontier, and he was one of the few who escaped with Boone at the battle of the Blue Lick in Kentucky, Majors Hugh McGary and Levi Todd being also among the survivors of that encounter. "The Story of Bryans Station," Kentucky, sets forth that it was founded by those North Carolinians, William Morgan, James and Joseph Bryan, William being the leading spirit. With them were William Grant, whose wife, like the wife of William Bryan, was a sister of Daniel Boone. All the Bryans were elderly but stalwart woodsmen at the time of their settlement in Kentucky, and each was blessed with a large family of children. As the children were nearly all grown they felt "prepared for straggling Indians at least, as with dogs and flint lock rifles, pack horses and cows, they set out from the valley of the Yadkin." At the battle of the Elkhorn William Grant was wounded, and his brother-in-law, William Bryan, was killed. In the record of William Grant's family previously given it will be noted that two of his sons, Samuel and Moses, were killed by the Indians. They had come over to Indiana from Kentucky, with Colonel Johnson on an expedition to punish thieving Indians, and with others were ambushed, a number being killed, among them one of the Grants. The other brother went back to look for him in company with a relative who volunteered to assist him, and they, too, were slain. Grant county, Ind., is named in their honor.

William Grant lived to a good old age, and to the close of his life was respected as a superior character, a typical gentleman of the old school, dignified, honorable and worthy of the regard in which he was held. He left property and slaves. Many of his descendants still reside in Indiana and Kentucky.

Edward Lodge McKee was born in Madison, Jefferson county, Ind., March 13, 1856. There he commenced his education, which was continued in the public schools of Louisville, whither his father removed in 1865. He also attended the high school at Madison. When sixteen he decided that he was old enough to go into business and accordingly began work in a wholesale shoe house in Indianapolis. As he has been connected with the same line ever since the choice seems to have been happily made. He has been employed in every business capacity known to the shoe trade except that of traveling salesman. Beginning as a clerk, he applied himself so diligently that in 1870 he ventured into the business on his own account, he and his brother, James R. McKee, founding the house of Jones, McKee & Co. In 1896 this business was merged into the corporation known as the McKee Shoe Company, of which Edward L. McKee was vice-president. The same year he accepted the office of vice-president of the Indiana National Bank, which he continued to hold until 1904, when he resigned. He is at present a director of the Union Trust Company, vice-president of the extensive dry-goods house of H. P. Wasson & Company, and president of the Atlanta Tinplate & Sheet Iron Company. His important relation to the commercial activities of the city is well told by Mr. Volney T. Malott, of Indianapolis, himself distinguished as a financier, and who has been associated with both Edward L. McKee and his honored father:

"Robert S. McKee was one of our best citizens, a man of sterling worth, possessed of the highest honor, a merchant of the old school, thoroughly and carefully trained, exact with himself and others in all business transactions. He took a large interest in civil affairs. He was liberal in his contributions to his church and various charitable institutions. As a bank director in Madison, Ind., Louisville, Ky., and Indianapolis, covering a period of more than fifty years, he was always prompt and regular in attendance and was a valuable member of the board, his business training and large experience rendering him conservatively progressive and, together with his closely analytical mind, making him a valuable counsellor on any board. His son, Edward L. McKee, president of the Merchants Heat & Light Company, was carefully trained by his father, and inheriting many of his qualities is a man of quick grasp and fertile resources. He has a pleasing personality that has won for him hosts of friends."

Mr. McKee married Miss Grace Wasson, daughter of H. P. and Ada (Morris) Wasson, and has two children: Edward L., Jr., generally known as Teddy; and Hiram Wasson. Mrs. McKee is a member of the Meridian Street M. E. Church, Mr. McKee belonging to the church of the family, the First Presbyterian.

DAVID M. PARRY, of the Parry Manufacturing Company, stands at the head of one of the most important industrial establishments located in Indianapolis. His connection with that business alone would entitle him to the position he occupies as one of the foremost citizens of Indianapolis. But he has other claims to recognition—the higher claims of the man who is interested in the welfare of his city and his fellow citizens. Although he is not one of the older residents of Indianapolis he is one of the most public-spirited, and he has been identified with many projects for the betterment of the city and the conditions under which her people must live. In his investigations and work toward this end he has become deeply interested in sociological problems, upon which subject he has written considerable, and he has also edited a work on sociology which has commanded wide attention.

Mr. Parry represents the third generation of his family in America. The Parrys are of Welsh origin, Henry Parry, the grandfather of David M. Parry, being a native of Wales. He was a civil engineer by occupation, and followed same after coming to this country, building the first courthouse west of the Alleghany mountains. He settled at Pittsburg, Pa., where he died at an advanced age. During the war of 1812 he had charge of the American cannon. He married a daughter of Gen. John Cadwallader, and twelve children were born to them.

Gen. John Cadwallader was one of the most celebrated men of his day. He was a general in the Revolution, serving on General Washington's staff, laid out old Fort Duquesne, and had previously to the war been active in the agitation for American independence, his father, Dr. Thomas Cadwallader, presiding over the first "tea party" ever held in this country. It took place in a coffee house in Philadelphia, some time before the famous Boston tea party. The Cadwalladers were of Welsh origin, and the family has always been famous for intellectual superiority. Dr. Thomas Cadwallader was a distinguished physician and pathologist, and was an associate of Benjamin Franklin. He was a man of unusual scientific attainments, and in company with Dr. Rush was one of the founders of the University of Pennsylvania.

Thomas Parry, youngest child of Henry Parry, was born in Pittsburg, Pa., and in 1853 came west to Indiana, making his home at first near Laurel, Franklin county. Thence he moved to Connersville, where he lived until near the close of his life, passing his last years in Indianapolis. He died in that city in 1899, at the age of seventy-six years. He was a lifelong farmer. Thomas Parry married Lydia Maclean, like himself a native of Pittsburg, and to them were born four sons and one daughter, namely: Edward, David M., Jennie (widow of O. P. Griffith), Thomas H. and St. Clair. After the father's death the mother made her home with her daughter in Indianapolis, where she died Dec. 12, 1903. Both parents were stanch members of the Presbyterian Church.

Matthew Maclean, the maternal grandfather of David M. Parry, was a native of Scotland, and on emigrating to America settled in Pittsburg, for about fifty years owning and editing the Pittsburg Gazette. He lived to an advanced age. His family consisted of four daughters and one son.

David M. Parry was born March 26, 1852, near Pittsburg, and was a very young child when his parents moved to Indiana. He was reared on a farm near Laurel, where he attended the district school, and when he was sixteen left the farm to take a position as clerk in a store at Laurel. He received the munificent salary of ten dollars a month, out of which he had to board himself. Later he clerked two years in a dry-goods store at Lawrenceburg, and for a few months clerked for his brother Edward, at Columbus City, Iowa, after which he found employment in New York City as a bookkeeper for the New York Enamel Paint Company. This place he held for nearly a year, after which he clerked in the wholesale dry-goods store of Overholser & Keefer until 1873, that year returning to Connersville, Ind., where he embarked in the hardware business in company with his brother Edward, on capital furnished by their father. A few years later the father became financially involved, and to prevent his losing the farm the brothers sold their hardware store and turned the money back to the father.

At this juncture David M. Parry, going to Cincinnati, secured an engagement as traveling salesman for a hardware house, for some three years covering eastern Indiana and western Ohio. Meantime he managed to save enough to buy a hardware store in Rushville, Ind., where he established his home and did business until 1882, when he sold out. He had made arrangements to go to South America early that year, to sell agricultural implements, but his wife died, leaving him with two little children, and he abandoned the trip. His plans having been changed so radically, he invested a little money in a small carriage shop in Rushville, which he carried on for two years, at the end of that time moving to Indianapolis, where he has since been established. The immense concern of which he is now the head was begun in a very modest way. Mr. Parry rented a part of the old Woodburn Sarven Wheel Works, and began manufacturing vehicles and farm implements, meeting with success from the very start. He began with about forty people on his pay rolls, and the business has increased so phenomenally that he now gives employment to between 2,300 and 2,400. The factory is particularly noted for its light weight vehicles of all kinds, which are marketed all over the world. For several years Mr. Parry's brother Thomas was bookkeeper for the establishment, in which he had an interest from the beginning, and about 1891 his brother St. Clair entered the firm. In 1899 the eldest brother, Edward, came into the business, which is now conducted under the name of the Parry Manufacturing Company. They have a number of large buildings, situated on Illinois, Henry and Eddy streets and Capitol avenue, the offices being on South Illinois street.

Mr. Parry was married Oct. 13, 1875, to Miss Cora Harbottle, daughter of Thomas and Helen (McIntosh) Harbottle, and to them were born two children, Helen and Cora. The former married Frank N. Fitzgerald, of Indianapolis, and the latter is the wife of Warren D. Oakes, also of this city. Mrs. Cora Parry died in July, 1882, at the age of twenty-four years. She was a member of the Brooklyn Church over which Henry Ward Beecher presided so many years.

On Oct. 3, 1883, Mr. Parry married Miss HESSIE MAXWELL, daughter of John M. and Isabel (Moffett) Maxwell, and to this union have been born seven children: Lydia, Maxwell, Addison, Isabel, Ruth, Jeanette and David.

Mr. and Mrs. Parry are members of the First Baptist Church, of which he is a trustee. He is prominent in fraternal circles, having risen to the thirty-second degree in Masonry (Scottish Rite), and also belonging to the Odd Fellows and the Elks. His handsome home is at Golden Hill.

John Byars Wirt

adoption. To an extremely artistic temperament he adds marked inventive genius, having especial ability in the work of the Arts and Crafts. He has three distinct trades at his command, and has achieved remarkable results with masterly skill. He was ship architect and builder, well versed in naval architecture, and employed in Cramp's shipyard, in Philadelphia. He was an expert woolen manufacturer, and put in the first woolen mill, of Jenk's make, erected in Washington, Daviess county, Ind.; he also put up the first 312-spindled mule, also of Jenk's make, which was put up in the State. He also put up a factory, at Milan, Ind., for Hatch & King, the machinery being furnished by George Merritt, of Merritt & Coughlin, Furbush & Gage make. Captain Wirt is an artificer of metals and an adept in the casting and forging of steel.

The higher things of life have special significance for Captain Wirt. He loves music, poetry and the drama, but Nature's own magnificent handiwork is the most beautiful work of art to him. He is an earnest advocate of the "simple life." As a lad, he was taught to regard Truth above all things. His word and his honor must never be questioned. When he gave his word, it must be kept at all hazards, though it involved the relinquishment of all that he held most dear. This was his childhood teaching, and that he early learned his lesson, and knew it well, is illustrated by the following little anecdote of his early boyhood, which gives also his idea of a "trade." He never sought to give the other fellow the "worst of it."

When he was a little chap, at home, there lived at the Cross Roads where he was born, on the waters of Evan's Creek, an aged woman who was known to everybody as "Auntie Bixler." Little John often went over to her house to amuse himself with looking over all her old curiosities, which to his childish imagination were veritable treasures and works of art. Among the things which filled his heart with the desire of possession there was a tiny iron mush-pot, with a lid, for which he had a craving that amounted to a complete obsession. He wanted that mush-pot and he wanted it badly, and he told Auntie Bixler that he did.

"Well, John," she said to him, "what can you give me for it? What have you got that I want that you will give me for my beautiful pot, John?"

John thoughtfully deliberated. "I've got a cow," he finally said. And so he had. A cow that was his very own, and one which he some way did not quite like to think about anybody else owning.

"Would you give me your cow, your nice old cow, for my mush-pot?" asked Auntie Bixler.

"Yes," slowly returned John. "I would if I had to."

"All right," said Auntie Bixler. "You bring the cow over, and the mush-pot is yours."

"I will," was the sturdy reply, and away went the little fellow to complete his part of the bargain. With great pride that night he drove the cow over to the house, gleefully anticipating the possession of the mush-pot, which he obtained and triumphantly carried home to show to mother and the assembled family.

"Where did you get it?" he was asked.

"Traded for it," was the laconic reply.

"What did you have to trade for that?" was the inquiry.

"My cow."

"What?" questioned they, with exclamations.

"Yes, I gave old Brindle for it, and I took her over there and got the pot, just like I said I would."

And he had done so, although he was greatly pleased and astonished afterward to find his beloved Brindle still a useful as well as an ornamental addition to the family.

The little mush-pot remained a valued possession in the Captain's family many years after the demise of Auntie Bixler, whom he loved so dearly as a boy.

Brave and generous to a fault, Captain Wirt possesses the admiration of all who know him for his physical and moral courage. Indifference to danger, fearlessness in peril, pluck and self-reliance have been attributes of his life from boyhood. When but twelve years old he had an experience which proved his heroic spirit and was a trial which would have made many a mature person flinch. Having promised to visit his old grandparents, he determined to keep his word, even though he were compelled to go alone and walk all the way from his home in Ohio to their little farm by Jordan's grist-mill, on the banks of Soap creek, in Iowa. This feat he accomplished, and with occasional lifts from some charitably disposed people going his way, barefooted, ragged, travel-stained and sore, he reached his destination only to find both his old grandparents very sick in bed and entirely alone. The neighbors were few and far away, and the little grandson was obliged to depend entirely upon himself to furnish them with food, drink and such medicines as he knew anything about, and to give attention to their various wants. Both passed to the beyond with only this devoted little grandson near to attend them, and after the end came he had to wait an entire day before the welcome voices of the neighbors broke the silence of the dead. The pluck and resolution here shown by this boy afterward resulted in the nerve and mettle of the man who went alone, since nobody else would go near, to a neighbor dying of cholera. Captain Wirt went to him, cared for him until he died, then shrouded and buried him, carrying the burden of expense, care, food, medicine, everything alone, simply because there was no one else who would do it.

Captain Wirt has a remarkable record as a soldier and a sailor. In the army, volunteers were sought for especially important and dangerous work. Often it was all a man's life was worth to attempt these missions, and Captain Wirt was one of very few men to volunteer his services. With superb indifference to the dangers to which he himself was exposed he thought only of the fate of others, and neither flinched nor faltered when following the call of duty. Cowardice had no place nor part in his nature. He crossed and recrossed the enemy's lines six times, being captured every time, and every time escaping, although the last time the noose was actually around his neck. Calm and imperturbable, he faced his accusers, and with not a tremor to betray his knowledge that he stood face to face with death he gave the evidence that saved his life.

"No man could know what he does and not be loyal," said one man, when the Captain, with unerring tact and diplomacy, had imparted information the nature of which proved his accurate knowledge of the affairs of the enemy.

"Let him go, boys. We have no evidence against him on which to inflict the punishment of hanging," said another who was noticeably impressed by the gallant behaviour of the Captain. So they released him; but presently, gingerly feeling his neck, about which the rope had so recently been thrown, "Boys," he said, "who's thirsty? I believe I'll go to the creek for some water"; and walking very deliberately away, pail in hand, he made his way out to freedom and his own country, far as he says, with a laugh, to-day, "I haven't got back there with that water yet."

The history of Captain Wirt's life abounds with incidents that reflect creditably upon his bravery, his resourcefulness and quick wit. He was possessed also of immense physical strength, added to the sure foot and nimble step of the sailor. While in Washington, Daviess county, Ind., engaged in the business of recruiting for his regiment, he was given an opportunity to exhibit his superb physical strength by a feat that will be remembered many a day by those who witnessed its performance. A Captain Childs was home on short leave, with a squad of men, engaged in the same mission of recruiting. While in the midst of a crowd somebody yelled "Hurrah for Jeff Davis." Immediately everything was in commotion, swords were out, and all was uproar. An idle looker-on started to run, and the crowd started after him, yelling, racing, knocking down and striking out with great vigor of voice and body. As they ran, Captain Wirt realized the man's danger, and knew that he must reach him before the crowd did. A two-horse wagon stood in the way, but the Captain, running at the top of his speed, leaped completely over and across the wagon-bed, and caught the man—just in time—for somebody had used a knife with frightful effect, almost disembowelling the poor fellow. The Captain rescued him from the excited mob, and literally took him away from the crowd. Once he was down, with angry heels striking and kicking him, then up, with a half a dozen men clinging to him. With muscles of steel and wrist of iron, he fought his way out of the raging mob and carried the man to the Doctor's; he ultimately recovered. To the training of an athlete and superb physical valor Captain Wirt added a moral courage that dared all odds to support the right and help the weak and oppressed.

During the war Captain Wirt was sent on special duty by the Government to Indianapolis to ferret out the "Knights of the Golden Circle" at that time an exceptionally hazardous task. Personally, his unusual appearance permitted of little disguise. Carrying an old carpet-bag, in which were $67,000 and some old hammers, he tossed the bag carelessly to the clerk of the "Spencer House," and asked him to check it. This money the Captain had saved from the wreck of his ship, the "Sea Weed," pounded to pieces in a storm off the coast of Newfoundland. At this time Captain Wirt was tall and very slender, with piercing black eyes; his hair, which he wore combed back straight and hanging down his back, was black as a raven's wing, glossy and twenty-one inches long; his cheeks were rosy, his complexion fair, like a woman's; his voice, clear as a bell, had a flute-like quality, and he spoke fluently the soft, musical tongue of Castilian Spanish. Although not in the least effeminate, he had an air of refinement and good breeding which caused him to be suspected of being a woman, a spy in disguise, and the rumor spread so persistently that a little later he was told he must consider himself under arrest. In spite of his indignant protests, he was told that he must submit to an investigation, which needless to state resulted in his complete exoneration. He hunted down and placed in the hands of the Government officials Horsey, Miligan and Bowls, who were tried and convicted for treason, being sentenced to death. But they afterward escaped, and the penalty was never inflicted.

Captain Wirt has been a great traveler, having visited every known and important port of his day on the globe. He speaks several languages fluently and is a brilliant conversationalist. His English is choice, his diction correct, and it is no unusual sight to see him, surrounded by his friends, relating some queer incident of his life or travels, his hearers listening with eager interest. His is a distinct individuality, all his own. To his friends he is very devoted, winning their confidence easily, respecting it and retaining it for all time.

He is well known in lodge circles, as he is a Mason, a Pythian, a Red Man and a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, and he is always eagerly welcomed around the camp fire, to relate, in his inimitable manner, in language both forceful and elegant, some pathetic story that has come under his observation. Well may he be proud of the position he occupies in these different organizations, and the place he holds in the hearts of the men that compose them.

Captain Wirt is intensely patriotic. His love of country is ideal. In this respect he is the stuff that heroes and martyrs are made of. At the present time he holds the highest position which it is within the power of the National Association of the Naval Veterans of the United States to bestow on any man, the position of Commodore Commanding. This is an instance where the man and the position are alike honored. The position is a high one, and Captain Wirt is considered the only man who, by virtue of his past experience and knowledge of its requirements, could fill it with such complete acceptance.

To Captain John Byers Wirt also belongs the proud and exclusive distinction of being the first man to advocate the placing of the Union Jack of the United States navy on land, and by the authority and order of the Secretary of the United States navy his advocacy was not only recognized but respected, and out of ninety millions of men he was selected by the Naval Bureau of the United States as the proper person to run up the Union Jack on land for the first time in the history of America. He also not only secured the recognition of the Union Jack on land, but he is the author of the Digest of the Union Jack of the flag, which he claims is the national flag. Of the flag he so proudly claims, Captain Wirt speaks as follows:

"I was the first man to advocate the placing of the Union Jack of the United States navy on land, and securing for it proper recognition. I maintained and have proved that it was the original National Flag.

"By Act of Congress in June, 1777, it was declared that the Union Jack of the United States shall be white stars, equal in number to the number of sovereign states, placed in a blue field as the base and substance of the National Flag. This, therefore, by Act of Congress, is our National Flag, the fly of the red and white stripes representing but its ornamental part, the thirteen stripes representing but the thirteen original States, while the Union Jack represents what we are as a nation to-day, with our continuous growth and expansion. And for every sovereign state adopted by Congress, another silver star is added to the blue field. The white stars placed in the blue field represent to-day, as they did in the beginning, with the new constellation designated by its motto, E Pluribus Unum, a vigorous Republic made up of many sovereign States united under one government. And wherever the Union Jack is unfurled by the United States navy, this is what it symbolizes and sets forth to every eye which beholds it. It gathers new meaning with the lapse of years. Admirable Dewey shed tears of joy upon receiving the sea flag under, and in behalf of which, while upholding the Union Jack, Admirable Farragut won his way to imperishable fame."

The author of the foregoing beautiful expression has been in the employ and service of the Government, both civic and military, all his life. For more than forty years he has been in the mail department in Indianapolis—a Republic of Letters. In this capacity no more faithful and efficient servant of Uncle Sam can be found, none more trusted, none better loved or more highly honored and respected, alike by his co-workers, his friends or the public, than Captain John Byers Wirt. He has made for himself an enviable record.

In his social life Captain Wirt is pleasant and agreeable. No better test of a man's character can be found than the way in which children regard him. The little children have a staunch supporter and a faithful friend in Captain Wirt, and one and all they love him. They cluster round him with shouts of welcome as he makes his rounds, and they follow after, shouting "Good-by, Uncle Sam," as he rides away. One tiny three-year-old never fails to take his seat upon the sidewalk to wait for the familiar wagon, the old brown horse, "Bob," and the smiling face of "Uncle Sam." Occasionally a proud little creature is perched for an instant on "Bob's" broad back, and so on from box to box. All this is life and gladness to the kindly heart of Captain Wirt. The laughter of little children is music to his ear. He knows them all, these little ones, and their childish confidence, trust and love keep him the simple, frank and open nature that he is. Nor are the children alone in this expression of friendliness. Among all ages and all classes, he wins and keeps hearts everywhere.

Captain Wirt's individuality is very decided, original and distinct, and at the same time very pleasing. His manner is courteous and affable, abrupt at times, but never offensive; his eyes, scarcely less piercing than in the days of his youth, meet all with a directness that tells the clean, honest, whole-souled thought that lies behind them. He has a whimsically humorous mood at times that belies the assumed severity of his manner. The criminal, the wrong-doer, the offender against the law, must receive justice, but it is a justice always tempered with mercy. An appeal for charity is responded to almost before it is made, when Captain Wirt is approached with it.

In November, 1868, at Salem, Ohio, Captain Wirt was married to Miss Sara Cassena Shoenaker, who comes of old Revolutionary stock, and whose ancestry is traced back to the Bruces. Her grandparents served in the Revolutionary war and the war of 1812. A woman of high intellectual attainments, of charming, hospitable manner, she is alike queen of her husband's home and heart and true friend to those who are the fortunate possessors of her favor. Her scholarship, her keen perception and good judgment, combined with an almost masculine comprehension and grasp of public affairs, has made her an invaluable aid to her husband, in his literary work especially. There is one child of their union, a daughter, Janauscheck, and a sharer in the gifts that this talented family possess. She is a brilliant musician, a sculptor of rare talent, and enjoys the artistic interpretation belonging to true genius.

To all the qualities of heart and mind that go to make a manly man Captain Wirt adds the gentle and tender soul of a woman. Brave and courageous, loyal and honest, modest in his own desires and ambitious for those he loves, patient in the face of obstacles that would discourage an ordinary man, disciplined in the school of "long ago" that turned out "men," stern and unyielding to what he considers his own faults, but charitable and forgiving to the follies of others, Captain Wirt is a man whom to call "friend" is to make of that word a sacred term, a flower, to shed its fragrance over an entire life; a jewel, the brightness of which is only equaled by the most radiant star; a name which lingers in the memory and becomes the brightest, tenderest, most cherished possession; such a friend is Capt. John Byers Wirt.

JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY, the Indiana poet known to all English speaking people as an unrivaled master in the delineation of "Hoosier" life, scenes and character, is a native of the State whose fame he has spread throughout the civilized world, born in 1854, at Greenfield, Hancock county, a small town about twenty miles from Indianapolis. His father, Capt. Reuben Alexander Riley, was the son of a Scotch-Irishman who had come to this country from the North of Ireland, settling in Bedford county, Pa., where he engaged in farming. There he married Margaret Schleich (pronounced "Slick"), a member of a prominent German family of Bedford county, and herself noted as a talented exhorter of the Methodist Church and possessed of poetical gifts. A woman preacher in that day was much discussed and admired. Her facility of speech was inherited by her son, Captain Riley, who became distinguished as a lawyer, and after settling in Hancock county, Ind., took his place among the prominent citizens of his day in that locality. He was noted for his bravery and gallantry as a soldier, and his success as a stump speaker made him widely known in his section of the State, which he represented in the Legislature. Possessed of a fine mind and a rich sense of humor, he had personal attractions which gained him as much popularity as his legal abilities, and he commanded a large practice. Of him the late Gen. John Coburn once wrote (Jan. 10, 1905): "I knew him after he became a practicing lawyer in Hancock and neighboring counties. He was a good speaker, eloquent, argumentative and witty, and would entertain a crowd as a stump speaker in central Indiana as well as any one. He served as a representative from Hancock county in the Legislature of Indiana. He was also State's Attorney for this circuit. He was a good lawyer, of a kind, friendly disposition, and made many warm friends. He was a brother of Frank Riley, treasurer of Marion county. Capt. Reuben A. Riley was a soldier in the war of the Rebellion, first captain of the 8th Ind. Vol. Infantry, in the three months' service, then re-enlisted and was made captain of Company G, Indiana Cavalry Volunteers. He was an upright man and citizen and had very few if any enemies."

Captain Riley married Elizabeth Marine, a descendant of a North Carolina family celebrated for culture and poetical talents. A member of this family, William Marine, of Baltimore, Md., now deceased, a cousin of James Whitcomb Riley, won fame as a poet and published a volume of poetry. He was Customs Inspector at Baltimore.

Mr. Riley's father had ambitions for his son to attain eminence in his own profession. He attended the public schools of his native town until sixteen years old, and then took up the study of law. But the boy's bohemian tastes found nothing appealing in the perusal of Blackstone, and in characteristic vein he ran away. When discovered he was entertaining a mixed crowd from a patent medicine and concert wagon, which had passed through the town, assisting in singing songs, doing character impersonations, and, in fact, general comedian work, incidental to lecturing on the curative properties of certain Indian remedies. At the end of the summer he was a long way from home and with no money for the return trip, but he secured brush and paint and made his way back, painting fence signs and advertisements, for which he had a gift that amounted to genius in its way. For a number of years he continued to follow the bent of his own inclinations, traveling around the country, following various callings, and during that period gained quite a reputation as a sign painter, becoming a master hand at that trade.

Naturally with his inborn love for harmony and rhythm, and his keen appreciation of the life he saw daily about him, he drifted into journalism and kindred fields, revised and recast plays and songs, and was himself a strolling actor for a time, before he began to devote himself to serious literary efforts. His first work as a journalist was done for a country paper, the Anderson Democrat, and it was while engaged on this journal that he perpetrated the now famous hoax—the publication of his poem "Leonainie" as a hitherto unknown production of Edgar Allan Poe.

The keen human insight shown in Mr. Riley's work has found a place in human hearts everywhere. But his first reputation was won among the people of his native heath. His sympathetic observation of the "Hoosier" people, as revealed in verse and writings that appeared in the public press from time to time, soon began to attract favorable notice, and he found his place in the public favor as the most popular exponent of "Hoosier" days and scenes that has yet sung the songs of her typical early times. Like most artists who have attained note he has acquired his greatest renown in the faithful and vivid depiction of common scenes. His extensive knowledge of the "Hoosier" State and its people, his memory for detail, his familiarity with their dialect and idioms, their virtues and their peculiarities, give his word pictures a local color of indisputable quality. Simple, direct and appealing, his verses have the touch of humanity which reaches the hearts of all.

Mr. Riley began steadily contributing dialect verses to the press when about twenty-three years old. The spirit of the big-hearted, whole-souled, jolly boy, his generous nature, and the social disposition which made him a good "mixer" and a general favorite, shone out in his earlier productions, as they have in his more pretentious work. The lad who loved nature, who knew where the best "swimmin'-hole" was to be found, where the fish bit best, where the saplings grew tallest and straightest for fishin'-poles, where the most beautiful wild flowers were to be found, drew others back in memory to the treasured days of youth by his vivid presentations of these rural charms. His themes have usually been homely ones, so lifelike in their graphic narration, so full of his appreciation of their significance, that they appeal to the masses as well as the classes, and his fame has spread all over the country, and beyond it wherever the English tongue is in common use. To quote from Senator Albert J. Beveridge, in a speech made at the Teachers' Meeting held in Mr. Riley's home city in 1905: "Dearer to the universal man than soldier, statesman or scholar are the world's poets; for the poet interprets the soul of man to itself and makes immortal the wisdom of the common mind. After all, the source of all poetry is in the hearts of the people. In the consciousness of the masses is that intelligence of the higher truths of the universe, of which this life is but a reflection; and it is this intelligence, uttered in words of music, that constitutes real poetry.

"So he who knows not the people nor loves them can not sing that song to which their very natures are attuned. The aristocrat may make verses whose perfect art renders them immortal like Horace, or state high truths in austere beauty like Arnold. But only the brother of the common man can tell what the common heart longs for and feels, and only he lives in the understanding and affection of the millions; only the man who is close to the earth and, therefore, close to the skies, knows the mysteries and beauties of both: Only he who is close to humanity is close to humanity's God."

Mr. Riley's two great characteristics, his talent as a poet and philosopher and his fidelity as an impersonator, have won the praise of two of the world's greatest actors, one of France and one of England. Sir Henry Irving gave him a dinner during a visit to London, at which Coquelin, the great French actor, was also present. After hearing Mr. Riley the actors declared that he possessed naturally what they had been years acquiring. They knew little of his early life and the influences which shaped his character, though this fact takes nothing from their recognition of his art.

Mr. Riley's high ideals of patriotism and religion, and his very inclination to express himself in rhyme, may be traced to his forefathers in both paternal and maternal lines. His long experience as a student, both of human nature and of English poetical construction, has enriched his mind with ideas and with a facility of expression most enviable.

Mr. Riley has always had grateful memories of the late Simon Yandes of Indianapolis. Like most people, he had thought of Mr. Yandes, if at all, as a man devoted to money-getting, wholly devoid of sentiment or sympathy, and he was more than surprised one day when the noted capitalist accosted him in a restaurant to ask him if he was not the young man who had been writing certain verses which appeared from time to time in the papers. Without the least idea that the retiring, dignified business man took any interest in poetry, it was Mr. Riley's first impulse to respond with indifference. But Mr. Yandes's serious remark, "There seems some merit in your lines," aroused his interest; and he was further surprised to find that Mr. Yandes had an amazing familiarity with the poets, ancient and modern. He particularly advised the young man to study Chaucer, Herrick and other masters, invited him over to his office, and encouraged him to such an extent that Mr. Riley has always attributed his highest success to this man's influence. Mr. Yandes humorously told Mr. Riley that few knew of his taste for poetry, and were it generally known he would doubtless be imposed upon. Mr. Riley has frequently commented upon the fact that at this time so few people knew of the strict justice, high nobility and purity of this modest, religious, kindly man; and it was not until he had given a million dollars to colleges, churches and charities, before his death and in his will, that the goodness and true disposition of this grand and lonely old man were appreciated.

Mr. Riley first wrote under the pseudonym "Benj. F. Johnson, of Boone," but his works have long been published under his own name. Among his best known works are "Neighborly Poems," "Sketches in Prose and Occasional Verse," "Orphant Annie," "The Old Swimmin' Hole," "Rhymes of Childhood," "Afterwhiles," "Character Sketches, etc.," "Old-Fashioned Roses, etc.," "Pipes o' Pan, etc.," "An Old Sweetheart of Mine," "Green Fields and Running Brooks," "Poems Here at Home."

In 1902 Mr. Riley was honored with the degree of Master of Arts by Yale College, and in 1904 he was given the degree of Doctor of Letters by the University of Pennsylvania. On Dec. 28, 1905, he received an unusual compliment from the Indiana State Teachers' Association, which held a special session at Tomlinson Hall in his honor. The success of the meeting surpassed even the expectations of the promoters. It was a tribute few living men can include among their experiences. The speakers of the occasion were such representative men of Indiana as Dr. Edwin H. Hughes, Senator Beveridge, Mr. Charles R. Williams and Mr. Meredith Nicholson, besides Hon. Henry Watterson. Mr. Riley's response was characteristic, and followed, at the request of the teachers, with several readings from his works. He is highly gifted as a public reader, and has been much in demand in that capacity. His home is on the now famous Lockerbie street, in Indianapolis, with old friends.

JOSEPH M. WISHARD, M. D., late of Greenwood, was one of the oldest medical practitioners in Johnson county, and a leading member of the profession in his section. He was born Jan. 1, 1828, in White River township, Johnson Co., Ind., son of John and Agnes H. (Oliver) Wishard.

The ancestral line of Dr. Wishard reaches on both sides of the family to Scotland, leaving which country his paternal ancestors located in Ireland, where William Wishard, the Doctor's paternal grandfather, was born. Coming thence to Pennsylvania, prior to the Revolutionary war, he first located in Delaware, served as one of the minute-men, in 1776, and took part in the battle of the Brandywine. He afterward moved to Redstone Fort, near Brownsville, Pa., and in 1793 removed to Kentucky, settling in Nicholas county, where he engaged in farming. His last days were spent in his home in Kentucky, where he reared a large family on extensive estates. In early life he was a weaver, but in the United States he became interested in agriculture.

On the maternal side Dr. Wishard was a grandson of John and Agnes [elsewhere the name is Martha] (Henderson) Oliver, who were also of Scotch ancestors who came to this country from the North of Ireland. They moved to Pennsylvania from Kentucky with the Wishards, and Mrs. Oliver was the first white person buried in Nicholas county, Kentucky.

The maternal great-grandfather of Dr. Wishard was Archibald Oliver, born in Scotland, also, who came to the United States and became a resident of Kentucky and one of the early developers of her agricultural resources in the vicinity of Lexington. His family was large and many descendants have since honorably perpetuated the name.

John Wishard, son of William, and father of Dr. Wishard, was born in June, 1792, in Pennsylvania, and came from Kentucky to Indiana in 1825. In White River township, Johnson county, he bought ten acres of land from Archie Glenn. This was situated on the line adjoining Marion county, where "Uncle" John Sutton resided until his death in 1908. Some time later he purchased an extensive tract containing 520 acres, which he set about improving. His family was reared principally upon this farm. Mr. Wishard was a man of excellent business ability, of thrifty habits and industrious life. As a result, he was able to distribute $17,000, in government bonds, among his children. In advanced years he removed to Greenwood, and passed his last days in the home of his son-in-law, Dr. Noble, where he died Sept. 8, 1878, aged eighty-six years. On account of service during the Black Hawk war, in 1832, he was entitled to the official name of "Colonel" Wishard. His wife passed away in 1849, at the age of fifty-seven years. She was a native of Lexington, Ky. She had been reared a Methodist, but when her husband united with the Presbyterian Church she also accepted that religious belief. They were the parents of a large family, three of whom still survive, namely: Dr. William H., of Indianapolis; Rev. Samuel E., a Presbyterian minister; and Margaret A., the widow of Dr. Noble, of Greenwood. Martha, the widow of Robert Jennings, died in 1902; and John O., a farmer at Danville, Ind., died in 1906.

Dr. Wishard was a true son of Johnson county, having been born and reared within its pleasant boundaries, where he passed the major part of his life. His boyhood sped away on his father's farm, in White River township, and he was given every educational advantage afforded in the subscription schools. Later he was sent to Wabash College and remained there for two years, becoming then a teacher for several terms. After his removal to Greenwood, in 1854, he began the study of medicine, pursuing it with such success that he was graduated from the Ohio Medical College, at Cincinnati, in 1857. He commenced practice in Greenwood where he had formed all of the dearest ties of his life. His early medical education was supplemented by a post-graduate course in the Indiana Medical College.

On April 14, 1852, Dr. Wishard was married (first) to Miss Rachel Lyons, daughter of Robert R. and Jane (Van Arsdall) Lyons, the former of whom was a soldier in the war of 1812. Eight children were born to this union: Ella, Wilbur and Maggie are all unmarried; Watson, who married Laura Alice Brunnemer, has two children; Hadley died at the age of three years; Jennie, who married May Harmon, now deceased, had five children: Joseph, who resided in Denver, Colo., died in February, 1908; and Arthur, who married Miss Kate Pierce, has four children, Charlotte, Wilbur, Fred and Donald. Mrs. Rachel Wishard died July 30, 1871, aged forty-five years. Her early religious training had been in the Methodist faith, but she later attached herself to the Presbyterian Church. On June 27, 1877, Dr. Wishard married (second) Mrs. Vandalina Louisa Elizabeth Creasy, widow of Lawrence Creasy, and daughter of John and Ellen (Smock) Shortridge. Mrs. Wishard had been married twice previously. Her first husband, Richard Free, a member of the 70th Ind. V. I. in the Civil war, was killed at the battle of Resaca. One son was born to them, Charles A., who married Winnie Magee, and with their one daughter, Alice, they live near Eldorado, Okla. Mrs. Wishard's second marriage was to Lawrence Creasy and two daughters were born to this union, Ollie and Bertha, the latter of whom married Samuel Van Nuys, and they reside, with their son Leo, in Franklin.

Dr. Wishard belonged to the Presbyterian Church, of which his widow is also a member. In politics he always strongly supported the Republican party. During the Civil war he was attached to the 5th Indiana Cavalry, enlisting in 1863, and was made surgeon of the regiment the next year, serving as such to the end of the war. Although exposed to many dangers in the skirmishes of the regiment, he participated in but one great battle, that at Resaca. Dr. Wishard was captured and taken first to the prison at Macon, Ga., later to Charleston, and was then exchanged and sent to New York. His service was with the army in East Tennessee. Dr. Wishard was the last survivor of the charter members of Greenwood Lodge, No. 198, I. O. O. F., and he was a valued member of the Johnson County Medical Society. With interest he watched these organizations, as others, grow from feebleness to strength and importance, and he ably promoted their advancement as he did the best interests of the county in every respect. He died May 31, 1905, widely lamented in the community, for he was greatly valued as a citizen and beloved as a man and friend, as well as in his capacity as an excellent and honored physician. Mrs. Wishard resides on West street in Greenwood. She is the last survivor of the charter members of Rebekah Lodge, No. 141, of Greenwood.

Mrs. Wishard is descended from two old American families, the Shortridges and the Smocks. The Shortridges came from North Carolina to Wayne county, Ind., in an early day. George Shortridge, Mrs. Wishard's paternal grandfather, moved from North Carolina to Mercer county, Ky., as a young man, and there he married Miss Elizabeth Shortridge, a distant relative. They came to Wayne county, Ind., and later to Marion county, settling just south of Southport on a farm, where both died. Mrs. Wishard's maternal grandfather, John B. Smock, was raised in Mercer, Ky., where he married Jane B. Brewer. They came to Johnson county in September, 1823, and he was a soldier in the Black Hawk war, from Johnson county. He and his wife were pioneer Presbyterians of that section. The earlier Smocks were from Pennsylvania, whence they emigrated to Mercer county, Kentucky.

LEOPOLD G. ROTHSCHILD has exemplified in his brilliant career the fact that this is an age when force of character alone makes for individual greatness. The accident of birth, or favoritism of those high in power, counts for little against talent and effort. The possession of an analytical brain, intellect to comprehend the things that count in their just proportions, pluck that refuses to be discouraged, patient industry that never tires, combined with an honesty of purpose and a spirit of kindly helpfulness which mark the routine of his daily life, are some of the characteristics and virtues which have won recognition for Mr. Rothschild. This recognition has taken substantial form in his appointment to responsible positions. His honors have come both as an acknowledgment of his personal worth and of his earnest and effective labors in behalf of the great party to which he has given such staunch allegiance throughout his mature years. His qualities of leadership and executive force have won him high rank in the Republican party, which has so signally honored him in various ways.

Born Oct. 3, 1871, in the city of Clifty, Decatur Co., Ind., Mr. Rothschild is a son of Ferdinand and Fannie (Turkenkoph) Rothschild, the former a native of Metz, on the Mosel, Germany, and the latter a member of an old and honored pioneer family of Pennsylvania. Mr. and Mrs. Rothschild came out to Indiana in the late fifties. They had a family of four children: Urbin H. and Joseph J., both now prominent business men of Indianapolis; Callie, the wife of Isaac Bietnan, also a well-known business man; and Leopold G.

Leopold G. Rothschild completed his preparatory education in the Connersville high school, and then took a course in the law school of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, graduating in 1891. Coming to Indianapolis in 1892 he took a suite of offices with Albert J. Beveridge, and engaged in the practice of his profession, in which line alone he has attained eminence unusual for one of his years. But it was inevitable that a man of his activity should confine himself to one field, and within a few years he had attracted such favorable notice that in 1897 he was appointed, by the State auditor, as chief of the Land, Bank and Building & Loan of the Indiana State Auditor's office, at that time managed by one head. This responsibility was a great one, particularly for a young man. Some idea of the extent of the duties involved may be gained from the statement that the same authority he exercised is now vested in three heads. Nevertheless he carried on the work successfully, giving the highest satisfaction, and remained in that connection until 1903, in which year he was singled out for preference by Attorney-General Charles W. Miller, who appointed Mr. Rothschild his assistant. He was still very busy with the functions of this office when called to higher service by the National Chief Executive, on Feb. 10, 1906, receiving appointment as surveyor of customs for the port of Indianapolis. On March 15th of the same year he was appointed, by the Secretary of the Treasury, to the honorary position of custodian of the United States courthouse and postoffice building at Indianapolis. This latter office is filled without remuneration, but Mr. Rothschild has shown his appreciation of the honor by giving his untiring attention to the service it involves in connection with his work as surveyor, and he is practically the "czar" of the Federal building.

It is hardly necessary to state that the honors and position attained by Mr. Rothschild are unusual achievements for a man of his age. Upon his own merits, without any recommendation but a record of hard work and remarkable accomplishments in every responsibility, he has risen to an enviable standing. He was not long in office before he demonstrated his ability as a manager, much to the pleasure and gratification of those who were instrumental in his appointment, and he has never given his supporters any reason to regret their choice. It has been his aim to devote his abilities to the public service with the same zeal he would display in the conduct of his private interests, regarding his office as a trust and not merely as a means of attaining his own ends. Nevertheless his faithfulness has more than once proved a stepping-stone to greater things, and it is safe to predict that he is not by any means at the zenith of his career yet. His development has so far been a continuous progress, which has given no evidence of cessation.

Mr. Rothschild's activity in the Republican party has made him a well-known figure in State politics. He has served on the city and county campaign executive committees, was on the State executive committee in 1904, and has given his time to numerous minor activities. By his untiring support of the Republican cause he has deserved the high regard in which he is universally held in the working ranks of the party. He has long been a leading member of the Marion Club, a Republican club famous throughout Indiana, of which he was first vice-president from 1893 to 1896, and president in 1896 and 1897. During his presidency he started the movement for buying a permanent home for the club, which materialized before he went out of office. He also organized the Marching Club of the Marion Club, which in 1896, 1898, 1900, 1904 and 1906 was under his management, and he toured the State with that organization during the State campaigns of 1896 and 1900. He is also a prominent member of the Columbia, Northwestern and McKinley and Morton Clubs; is a Mason, affiliated with Capital City Lodge; and holds the high position of chancellor commander in the Knights of Pythias, belonging to Commandery No. 56. Mr. Rothschild is familiarly known among his friends as "Baron" Rothschild.

DR. PATRICK HENRY JAMESON, one of the prominent physicians and surgeons of Indianapolis, who resides at No. 1412 Broadway, has an office at No. 212 Newton Claypool Building, where he still, notwithstanding his advancing age, continues in a limited practice among old patrons. He was born in Jefferson county, Ind., near Madison, April 18, 1824, son of Thomas and Sallie (Humphreys) Jameson, both of whom were natives of old Virginia.

Thomas Jameson, Sr., father of Thomas, and grandfather of Dr. Patrick Henry, was born Nov. 7, 1733, in Pennsylvania, of Scotch-Irish parents, and became a tobacco planter in Virginia, being quite wealthy at one time. In the Revolutionary war he bore a gallant part, and was with Gen. Greene in 1781, during his southern campaign. He was in Gen. Morgan's brigade, and took a part in the battle of Guilford Court House, and the siege of Ninety-Six, about seventy-five miles northwest of Charleston, S. C. When Gen. Greene retreated from that point before Rawdon, it is an interesting fact that his command covered 110 miles in three days. From Kentucky, Mr. Jameson removed into Indiana about 1810, where he died at the advanced age of ninety-seven years. He had two sons who fought with him in the cause of the Revolution, Samuel and John. His death occurred in Jefferson county, Ind., where he had made his final home. He is remembered as a man of energy and force, and even after he had reached the age of ninety-seven, he was quite active. He left many descendants.

Thomas Jameson, son of Thomas, and father of Dr. Patrick Henry, was a farmer and came west to Kentucky, where he spent a short time, but disliking slavery he came to Indiana territory, in 1810, locating first in Jefferson county, where he engaged in farming, owning a tract of some three or four hundred acres, which he converted into what was one of the best farms in the township where he lived. There he died June 27, 1843, when just past sixty years of age. His wife, Sallie Humphreys, who was a highly endowed woman, died in 1841, when she was fifty-six years of age. Though he had been reared in the old Seceder's Faith, he and his wife early became members of the Christian (Disciples) Church, in which he was an elder. Mr. Jameson and his family were sincerely religious, and he was one of the pillars of his church in Southern Indiana, where his house was the home of the traveling preachers and their friends. For a short time he served as a soldier in the war of 1812, being stationed on the Indiana frontier. While still a boy he made the acquaintance of Henry Clay, and followed the lead of that distinguished statesman as long as he lived. To Thomas and Sallie (Humphreys) Jameson were born five sons and three daughters, of whom Miss Lucy, now deceased, formerly lived with the Doctor; Patrick Henry is mentioned below; James Monroe is in Indianapolis; Mary M. is the widow of the late Berry R. Sulgrove (deceased in Montana), who long stood at the head of State Journalism, during the stormy period that ushered in the Civil war and for many years after, and who wrote a valuable history of Marion county, Indiana.

William Humphreys, father of Mrs. Sallie (Humphreys) Jameson, was born in Virginia of English descent. For a long time he lived near Charlottesville, in Albemarle county, near the home of Thomas Jefferson, whose acquaintance he enjoyed and prized. A short time before his death Mr. Humphreys removed to a location seven miles southeast from Staunton, Augusta county, where he died about 1800, when some fifty years old. He reared a family of four sons and three daughters. His religious faith was that of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Dr. Patrick H. Jameson, the subject of this narrative, was reared in Jefferson county, Ind., until he reached the age of nineteen years. In 1843 he came to Indianapolis and this city has since been his home. His early life was passed on the farm, and his education was very largely secured in the old-fashioned subscription schools. From 1843 to 1847 he taught school in Indianapolis, and displayed the fine qualities of an education that had been almost entirely secured by him with no other help than a quick and receptive mind. Before he was ten years old he finished Kirkham's English grammar, and without a teacher had acquired a knowledge of algebra, geometry, physics, botany, and various other branches. Zerah Colburn's Algebra, with all its problems, was mastered by him without a teacher before he was fifteen years old. Of marked ability as a student, when he came to Indianapolis, he was well equipped considering the times, for pedagogic work, having added to his other acquirements a limited knowledge of Greek and Latin. While he was teaching Dr. Jameson began the study of medicine with the late Dr. John H. Sanders, of Indianapolis. He attended a first course of medical lectures at the University of Louisville. His medical studies were concluded in the Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, from which institution he was graduated in March, 1849. Soon thereafter he returned to Indianapolis to form a partnership with his old preceptor, Dr. Sanders, a partnership which was broken a year later by the death of Dr. Sanders from cholera, April 4, 1850, on a Mississippi river steamboat, being at that time on his way from New Orleans.

Dr. Jameson was alone in his professional life until 1858, when he became associated with the late Dr. Funkhouser, with whom he was in partnership for sixteen years. Subsequently Dr. Jameson was associated for a number of years with his nephew, Dr. Henry Jameson.

Dr. Jameson was married June 20, 1850, to Miss Maria Butler, daughter of Ovid and Cordelia (Cole) Butler. To this union were born four children: Mary, Anna Maria, Ovid Butler and Cordelia. (1) Mary married John M. Judah, now a retired lawyer and capitalist of Indianapolis, who was for ten years a loan agent for a syndicate of English capitalists, which had its headquarters at Memphis, Tenn. He and his wife have spent much of their time abroad. They have two sons, Harry Brandon, a lawyer in Indianapolis; and Victor, a student in Harvard University. (2) Anna Maria married Orville Peckham, of Chicago, now and for many years the attorney for the Chicago First National Bank, and the head of a well known legal firm of that city. They have two children, Sallie Maria and John Judah. (3) Ovid Butler married Miss Mary B., daughter of Judge Tarkington, of Indianapolis, and sister of Booth Tarkington. They have two children, John T. and Ovid Donald. Mr. Jameson is a prominent member of the Indianapolis Bar, and has a pleasant office at the corner of Washington and Delaware streets, in what is known as the Brandon Block. (4) Cordelia married Albert Sloo Caldwell, a prominent and wealthy citizen of Memphis, Tenn., and died in 1888.

Dr. Jameson and his wife celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding, June 20, 1900. They are members of the Christian (Disciples) Church. He is a member of Center Lodge, F. & A. M., and is the oldest Mason in the lodge.

Dr. Jameson is one of the two surviving charter members of the State Medical Society, organized in 1849. He has always been a very busy man, and among many of his published writings may be included "The Commissioners' Annual Reports, for the Indiana Hospital for the Insane," from 1861 to 1879, inclusive, and several similar reports for the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb, and the Institute for the Blind, all of which were published by the State. He also presented a paper to the Indiana Medical Society on "Veratrum Viride, in Typhoid and Puerperal Fevers," which was published in the proceedings of the society for 1859. This was almost entirely republished in the American Journal of the Medical Sciences of that year. An address of his, on "Scientific Medicine in its relation with Quackery," appeared in the Indiana Medical Journal in 1871.

From April, 1861, to March, 1866, Dr. Jameson was surgeon in charge of the unorganized troops in the Indianapolis Military Post, and acted as assistant surgeon in the United States Army during the same period. From 1861 to 1869 he was physician for the Indiana Institute for the Deaf and Dumb, and from 1869 to 1879 he was president of the several boards of the benevolent institutions of Indiana. The holding of this position made him a member of the three boards that managed the affairs of the Hospital for the Insane, the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb, and that for the Blind. To this responsible place he was twice re-elected by the General Assembly for the term of four years.

As chairman of the committee on Revision of Ordinances in 1865, Dr. Jameson made a complete revision of the city laws, which was then published in book form. From 1865 to 1869 he was chairman of the Finance Committee of the City Council, and under his guidance and by the aid of his associates such levies were made and expenditures ordered as restored the depreciated credit of the city and cleared it of a heavy debt by the close of his term. In its session of 1872-73, the General Assembly made him a member of a provisional board to erect a hospital for insane women in connection with the Hospital for the Insane, having for his associates, Gov. Hendricks, and other distinguished citizens of the State. The State appropriated $600,000 for this work, and it was put into the hands of Dr. Jameson as treasurer for the board. Under its direction the Indiana Central Hospital for the Insane was completed.

Dr. Jameson has been for more than thirty years a director of Butler University, and was the sole agent for the sale of its extensive real estate holdings in Indianapolis, as well as for the erection of its fine buildings in Irvington. While president of its board he effected a union between the University and the Indiana Medical College, which continued several years.

Dr. Jameson is a business man, and has much to do with the affairs of the city and State. He accepts the cardinal truths of the Bible, and its principles of life. He believes in a good man and loves a good deed, but dislikes bigotry and cant. As a physician he is well versed in all branches of medicine. As a practitioner he is conservative, preferring established methods and agencies to those of doubtful utility. He is deservedly popular, both in his profession and out of it.

HON. JOHN J. W. BILLINGSLEY, who is now living retired in the suburbs of Indianapolis, is a man who has exemplified in a singularly useful life the theory that every individual is fitted for some special achievement. His work has been along lines particularly helpful to this section of the country, having extended beyond the confines of his home State into Illinois, Iowa, Michigan and other states. As regards the theory and practice of land drainage and up-to-date farming, he has probably few equals in this section. For a number of years before his retirement his efforts were devoted principally to two subjects of great importance in this region, drainage and manufacture of drain tile, in connection with which his name will ever occupy a place among the benefactors of agricultural interests of his day and generation. He was one of the first to recognize the value of spreading scientific knowledge among farmers, and for fifteen years he has been one of the State speakers at the State Farmers' Institutes of Indiana and other states, where his common sense views and thorough practical knowledge have won the respectful attention of his hearers.

Mr. Billingsley belongs to a family which has been represented in America since pre-Revolutionary days, and which has had useful citizens in every generation. They are of English origin, John Billingsley, the first ancestor of John J. W. Billingsley in this country of whom we have record, having been a descendant of one H. M. Billingsley, who at one time was Lord Mayor of London. His great-grandfather, John Billingsley, served in the war of the Revolution on the American side and suffered in the Patriot cause, his home having been twice burned by the enemy while he was away on duty. He lived in North Carolina, moved thence to Tennessee, and after but a short residence there moved to Kentucky, where the rest of his life was spent. His son, John, of Kentucky, was the father of Alexander D. Billingsley. Thus the Billingsleys have been represented among the pioneers of three great States, North Carolina, Kentucky and Indiana.

Alexander D. Billingsley was born in Kentucky, and there grew to manhood and was married, bringing his family thence to Indiana in 1834. He settled in a heavily timbered section, and cleared up a large farm in the northern part of Putnam county, near Roachdale, and for many years was profitably engaged in stock farming. He passed the last few years of his life in retirement in Indianapolis, dying there in January, 1870, at the age of sixty-eight years. He married Elizabeth McMurray, and to them were born three sons and three daughters. Mrs. Billingsley died in September, 1864.

John J. W. Billingsley was born Sept. 18,

1832, near Bowling Green, Warren Co., Ky., and was in his second year when the family came to Indiana. He received his early education at the home schools in Putnam county, later attending Franklin College, at Franklin, Ind. After finishing his course there he returned home, where he was his father's assistant on the farm until his marriage, when he decided to start on his own account. Selecting 400 acres of fertile land in Effingham county, Ill., he moved there with his wife, and for some years worked the farm, also dealing in live stock. In 1861, when the war broke out, he sold the property. He was ready to offer his services in defense of the Union, and after counselling with his two brothers they decided that he, having a family, should remain at home to take care of the family, and of their father and mother, who were invalids, and to carry on the business, his brothers volunteering to defend the Union. This he did faithfully for four years. His parents then moved to Indianapolis in order to receive medical treatment. Our subject bought a 160-acre farm in the southwestern part of Marion county, so that he could be nearer his parents and give them the attention which he was ever ready to bestow upon them.

Upon moving to Marion county, Ind., Mr. Billingsley settled in Decatur township, where he lived for several years. In 1870 he had become interested in a trade journal called "The Northwestern Farmer," which name was later changed to "The Indiana Farmer," a publication which today is to be found among the leading agricultural journals. In 1872 seeing the possibilities of the journal, to whose success he could only contribute by giving more of his time and active assistance, Mr. Billingsley sold his farm and with his family moved to Indianapolis. "The Indiana Farmer" soon showed the efforts of his personal attention, and it was not long before the growth of the journal was visible. However, he sold his interest in 1873, and for a time traded in real estate. But the publishing business got its meshes around him again, and in 1879 he established "The Drainage and Farm Journal," a paper devoted chiefly to the subject of drainage, with which Mr. Billingsley was very familiar. He had given careful study to this problem, and with the assistance of his journal, whose instructive columns soon made it a necessity to all interested, organized State Drainage associations in Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Michigan and Indiana. Mr. Billingsley, who is quite a forceful speaker, was always among the first speakers on the program at the meetings of these associations. Meantime he had become interested in another line which he recognized as deserving of special attention, and following his conviction that a journal devoted to the interest of clay working would be well received he founded in 1882 what is still known today as "The Clay Worker," a paper run on the same principles as "The Drainage and Farm Journal." His interest in all these periodicals was continued for many years and brought him into close relations with farmers and clay workers throughout the wide territory covered by their extensive circulation.

Owing to a serious fall on his head from a street car, which nearly resulted fatally, Mr. Billingsley was advised by his physician to give up his office work, and in 1902 he sold "The Drainage and Farm Journal," having prior to this sold "The Clay Worker," to his son, Denton, and his son-in-law, T. A. Randall, who are now conducting it, under the name of T. A. Randall & Company.

Mr. Billingsley, having been reared on a farm and having a taste for farm life and country air, bought a suburban home north of the city, where he has a comfortable house and nine acres of ground, and where he conducts a miniature farm, with a dairy business attached. No other pursuit has ever lessened his interest in agriculture, to which he is as keenly devoted as in his more active years. The intelligent and enlightened services he has given to promoting the welfare of the farmer, lightening his labors, broadening his interests, increasing his profits, raising his work to the high standing it deserves in the economy of the nation, has won him a measure of esteem and respect which would win admiration from the enterprising in any field of endeavor. He may well feel that he has had his part in the progress of the age—the highest ambition of every thinking man. Mr. Billingsley is a Mason, and a staunch Republican, and though but a very young man at that time, 1854, he had the honor of presiding over the first Republican convention held in southern Illinois. In 1872-1874 he represented his county as the choice of his party in the State Legislature, where he displayed ability as a student of public needs and a wise legislator in many important movements. His sole ambition in accepting public office was to further the cause nearest his heart, and his earnest efforts and sincerity won him many friends among his colleagues.

Though now leading a comparatively retired life, Mr. Billingsley has by no means relinquished all his activities, and he is still responsible for many instructive and interesting articles on his favorite topics appearing in the trade and other papers, to whose columns he has made many contributions. As previously stated he has devoted much of his time to the Farmers' Institute of the State, and for fifteen years has been among the speakers representing this educational work. His audience always looked forward to his speeches, which were invariably of an instructive nature, drainage, soil conditions and dairy work receiving special attention. Having studied the minutest details of these subjects it was an easy matter for him to lecture intelligently and instructively on them. This work he is still engaged in, and taking as much interest as ever in preparing for it.

On Dec. 24, 1852, Mr. Billingsley was married to Elizabeth Hymer, daughter of Jesse P. and Eliza (Gill) Hymer, of Kentucky. Seven children were born to them, four sons and three daughters, as follows: Ada A. (wife of T. A. Randall), Denton F., Eva B. (Mrs. Harry Rowley), James H., Nettie H. (wife of Dalton Stivers), Alexander D. and Judson W.

Jesse P. Hymer, Mrs. Billingsley's father, was a native of Kentucky, of Pennsylvania Dutch stock. The name originally was Pickelhymer. Mr. Hymer, who was a farmer, settled in the vicinity of Roachdale, Putnam county, in the early days, cleared a farm there, and cultivated it until his death, at the age of eighty-two. He and his wife had eleven children. Mr. and Mrs. Billingsley are members of the College Avenue Baptist Church, of which he has been a trustee for many years. He is also prominent throughout the denomination, at present serving as treasurer of the Indiana Baptist State Convention, and as a member of the State Mission Board. Charitable and kindly by nature, he has ever been ready to give a helping hand where it is needed, and his friends are many wherever he goes.

FRANKLIN McCRAY was born in Wayne township, Marion county, Ind., March 30, 1855. His ancestors came from Scotland early in the eighteenth century and settled in New Jersey, afterward removing to Pennsylvania, where Phinehas McCray was born about 1756. He was the son of Samuel McCray, who was prominent among the Patriots of the Revolution.

Phinehas McCray married Jane Peters in Berks county, Pa., about the year 1779. She was closely related to Judge Richard Peters, an intimate friend of Hamilton and Washington. Phinehas and Jane (Peters) McCray lived a number of years in Berks county, Pa., and had a large family of children. About the year 1798 they moved to Butler county, Ohio, and thence to Fayette county, Ind., while the State was yet a Territory. Phinehas and Jane McCray died in Fayette county and were buried in the little cemetery at Connersville, Ind. Among their children were: Samuel McCray; Moses McCray, who settled in Hancock county, Ind.; John McCray, at College Corner, Ohio; and Jemima (McCray) Casady, mother of the venerable Judge Phineas McCray Casady, of Des Moines, Iowa, who is still living, now in his ninety-first year.

Samuel McCray, son of Phinehas and Jane (Peters) McCray, was the grandfather of Franklin McCray and was born in Berks county, Pa., in 1786. In January, 1810, he married, in Butler county, Ohio, Elizabeth Lucas, who was related to ex-Governor Lucas of Ohio. They moved to Fayette county immediately after their marriage, remaining there until 1833, when they moved to Marion county, Ind., where they died, Samuel in 1856 and Elizabeth in 1864. All their children were born in Fayette county, viz.: John McCray, who died in early life; Aaron McCray; George W. McCray; Richard L. McCray, who was a captain in an Iowa company under General Grant and was killed at Black River Bridge, in the siege of Vicksburg; Simeon McCray; Jemima (McCray) Harding; Sarah (McCray) Royster; Nancy (McCray) Martin; Mariah (McCray) Moffett; Elizabeth (McCray) Martindale and Susan (McCray) McDaniel, of Hendricks county, Ind., the only two still living. The parents, Samuel and Elizabeth (Lucas) McCray, lie buried in the Little Eagle Creek Church yard, just west of the limits of the city of Indianapolis.

Aaron McCray, the father of Franklin McCray, was born in Fayette county, Ind., in October, 1820, and died in Marion county in October, 1882. He was a prominent farmer and stock raiser. He served as trustee of Wayne township, and was six years county commissioner of Marion county, Ind. It was during his administration that the Marion county poor house and court-house were built, and many iron bridges were constructed across White river and Fall creek. He was a conductor on the "underground railroad" and settled many fugitive colored people on his farm. at his own expense he built a schoolhouse and employed a teacher for their children before they were permitted to enter the public schools of the country. Aaron McCray was married in 1845 to Caroline Bridgeford, daughter of William and Polly (Wakeland) Bridgeford. William Bridgeford was born in Virginia. His parents were of English descent. He moved to Fayette county, Ind., while the State was yet a Territory, and afterward to Marion county, Ind., where he died in 1864, and was buried in the Bridgeford graveyard north of Crown Hill. He was a man of sterling worth. The best index of his character is to be found in a number of wills executed by his neighbors, in which a request made that he be permitted to serve as executor without giving bond. He served as justice of the peace for many years. Mrs. Caroline (Bridgeford) McCray, mother of Franklin McCray, was born in Fayette county, Ind., in 1825, and died in Marion county, Ind., in 1893. She was married to Aaron McCray in Marion county in 1845. Hers was a life of industry, patience and self-denial. There were twelve children born to her, eight of whom are still living: Eliza (McCray) Jones, Mary (McCray) Thomas, Samuel McCray, Richard H. McCray, and William Bridgeford McCray, all now of Los Angeles, Cal.; Franklin McCray, Lydia McCray and Leatha (McCray) Renard, of Marion county, Indiana.

Franklin McCray has lived in Marion county, Ind., all his life. He worked in the brickyard and at farming during summer and hauled cordwood to the city during winter, attending the country schools but a short time each winter. He went to Normal School at Valparaiso, Ind., and afterward attended college at Dennison University, in Ohio, for a year. He taught school through the winter and read law through the summer and was admitted to the Bar in 1883, beginning the practice of law in January, 1884. In 1885 he was appointed by the board of county commissioners to defend the poor of the county. He was elected judge of the Criminal court of Marion county, Ind., in 1894, where he served until 1898. During his long term of office he established the system of suspending sentences and placing juvenile offenders upon probation, which has since been crystalized into law and adopted by the Juvenile courts of the country. His administration was also noted for the rigid enforcement of the liquor laws. The "Nicholson Bill," a stringent temperance measure, was passed by the Indiana Legislature in 1895. This law was somewhat in advance of public sentiment, and the liquor interests assailed it with violence. Several "nisi prius" courts held it void, but Judge McCray sustained the law in every particular and his opinion was afterward affirmed by the Supreme court of the State. He resumed the practice of law in 1898, with offices in the Baldwin building, where he has a lucrative business and enjoys the respect of the Bench and Bar and the confidence of his clients.

Mr. McCray has a fine private library, has read extensively and has given special attention to the Revolutionary and Constitutional history of the country, and has prepared an interesting and instructive lecture on Alexander Hamilton and his contemporaries. He has always been a Republican in politics, is a member of the Marion Club, and has canvassed the State several times under the auspices of the State committee.

Mr. McCray has been married twice, in November, 1888, to Miss Clara Pugh, of Peru, Ind., who died fourteen months later. Four years afterward he married Miss Catherine Lampard, of Hendricks county, Ind. He has no children. Mr. and Mrs. McCray are members of the Central Christian Church. They have a modest and comfortable home at No. 211 East Twenty-third street.

LYNDEN P. HOLLOWELL, until lately the vice-president of the Indiana Lumber & Veneer Company, at No. 1101 East Twenty-third street, Indianapolis, was born in Newport (now Fountain City), Wayne Co., Ind., July 22, 1871, and is the only child of Amos K. and Adaline H. (Parker) Hollowell, both of whom were born in Indiana.

James Hollowell, the grandfather of Lynden P., was born in Orange county, Ind., in 1821, and came of mingled Welsh and Scotch descent. He was the father of ten children, and he passed away at about the age of seventy-five years. Joel Parker, the maternal grandfather of Mr. Hollowell, was born in North Carolina, but came to Indiana at a very early day, where he engaged in business as merchant in Newport for many years, and he died when about sixty-nine years old. He was of English lineage and had a family of three children.

Amos K. Hollowell was reared in Orange county, Ind., and became a clerk in a store in Paoli when he reached early manhood. For about a year he was a traveling man for a Philadelphia dry goods house; and about 1865 came to Indianapolis, where he secured a position in a wholesale hardware house. After a time he removed to Newport, where he had a grocery and dry goods store for some years, removing then to Richmond, becoming interested in the Nurdyke & Marmon Company, extensive manufacturers of flouring mill machinery. This prominent firm was removed after a few successful years of business at Richmond to Indianapolis, where it is still in operation. About 1896 Mr. Hollowell withdrew from the corporation and was made president of the Jenny Electric Light & Motor Company, a position he held two years. Since that time he has been the president of the Indiana Lumber & Veneer Company, an enterprise with which he has been connected since its organization in 1892. Mrs. Adaline Hollowell died in April, 1900, at the age of forty-nine years. She and her husband were both Quakers, and he is still actively identified with the Friends' Society, being a trustee of Earlham College. In politics he is a Republican, awake to the interests of the city, and anxious to help along all important enterprises.

Lynden P. Hollowell lived in Wayne county until his parents removed to Indianapolis, in 1876, and that city was his home from the time he was five years old until his removal to New York City. His education was begun in the city schools and continued in the Military Academy of Orchard Lake, Mich., from which he was graduated in 1891. Mr. Hollowell entered upon a business career as a member of the Indiana Lumber & Veneer Company, and became its vice-president, as noted in the opening paragraph of this article. This corporation is the largest manufacturing enterprise in the world in its line. The business extends from coast to coast, and much of the product is shipped abroad. One of the specialties of the firm is quarter-sawn veneering for pianos, furniture, cars, ships and architectural wood-work.

Mr. Hollowell was married May 22, 1896, to Miss Helen Shurtleff, a daughter of Walter and Jeannette (Rich) Shurtleff. Mr. Hollowell has a birthright membership in the Friends Church, while his wife belongs to the Christian Church. He is a Master Mason, and belongs to the Elks Society. In political matters he is a Republican, and belongs to the Columbia Club.

DAVID DONNAN, as an extensive builder and contractor of his day, built many of the early residences of Indianapolis. He was a native of Glasgow, Scotland, born March 8, 1815, son of David and Margaret (Dunning) Donnan, of Glasgow, who came to America in 1817, settling on a farm in Richland county, Ohio. Mr. Donnan as a boy attended the common schools in Richland county, and later became an apprentice to a cabinetmaker in Mt. Vernon, Ohio. He came to Indianapolis in the middle thirties, and for some years continued to work at his trade. But he gradually widened his interests until he found himself established in business as a prosperous contractor and builder, in which line he met with well deserved success. However, he passed away when comparatively a young man, in his fortieth year, his death taking place Jan. 16, 1855. Mr. Donnan was a Methodist in religious faith. Fraternally he belonged to Center Lodge, I. O. O. F. Mr. Donnan was a man of strong intellect as well as a fine workman and able business man, and he was a benevolent man in every sense of the word.

On April 18, 1841, Mr. Donnan was married, in Indianapolis, to Barbara Pressel, who was born in Lancaster county, Pa., daughter of Henry and Caroline Pressel, who were married in Germany and came to Pennsylvania about 1808. Mrs. Donnan survived her husband and passed away forty-five years later, on Aug. 8, 1900, having devoted her life to the rearing of her children. They were the parents of six children, namely: Margaretta (Mrs. J. G. Pendergast), Caroline, Wallace (deceased), Theodore, Emma and Laura. Wallace Donnan (deceased), the eldest son, was for many years engaged in the tinning business in Indianapolis, and was a man of marked courage, integrity, industry and generosity of disposition. He is survived by a wife and two children—Mrs. May W. Donnan and Margaret and Hugh.

GEORGE POGUE. There has been considerable controversy among local historians as to who the first settler of Indianapolis was. The best historians and histories credit George Pogue as being the first settler, and careful investigation would seem to substantiate this. The Pogues, Hacklemans, Tyners, Nobles, Saylor, were all related. George Pogue was evidently a descendant of Gen. Robert Pogue, of Revolutionary fame. Prior to 1814 he went from South Carolina to Kentucky, where he had relatives. In 1814 we find him living at the blockhouse of Major Conrad Saylor (who was a major in the war of 1812), who had moved to the vicinity of Brookville, Ind., about 1800. Conrad Saylor's wife was a descendant of one of the Hessian soldiers who were brought over by the King to fight in the Revolution, and she was the aunt of Gen. Pleasanton Hackleman. Some time prior to all this George Pogue's eldest son, William, married Conrad Saylor's daughter. They later moved to Rush county, Ind., and left many respected descendants.

George Pogue was a man of herculean strength, and a typical pathfinder. More, he was a blacksmith and rifle-maker. In Brookville he formed the acquaintance of the two Conners, William and John, and in 1816 he removed to the trading post of Conner, near the present city of Connersville. In 1818 he moved into the city. In February, 1819, he started West, arriving at what is now Indianapolis March 2, 1819. The high waters prevented his going further. He decided to locate. He lived in the covered wagon until he erected a cabin of roughly scored logs. About 1822 his horses strayed away. He was last seen by his family (his son Thomas) ten miles from Indianapolis, but was seen later in Fayette county, at Connersville and the old trading post, where he had hoped his horses had returned. Finally he was seen on his way to Indianapolis, expecting to visit an Indian camp where he had heard his horses were. That was the last account of him. It is suspected that a treacherous, drunken Indian, Wyandotte John, who made his home in a large hollow log near Indianapolis, killed Pogue; for Pogue was suspicious of him, and he it was who told Pogue he had seen the horses, "wearing iron shoes," among the Indians.

Mr. Pogue married in South Carolina Cassie Ann Payne, born about 1777, a native of the North of Ireland, who came to this country with some friends. Her eldest child was a girl, born about 1798, and they had altogether about eighteen children. Two granddaughters of George Pogue are living in Indianapolis—Mrs. Harrison, on Yandes street, and Miss Nancy Pogue, at Brightwood.

HERMAN WEINBERGER, deceased. This highly respected business man, who was living in retirement at his home, No. 714 Union street, Indianapolis, Ind., at the time of his death, Dec. 14, 1905, was born in Bavaria, Germany, Sept. 10, 1826.

His parents, Christian Frederick and Margaret Magdalene (Rebesberger) Weinberger, were also natives of Germany, and had twelve children, of whom three are now living: Miss Fredericka Weinberger, of St. Helena, Cal.; Sophia Magdalene, widow of Gustavus Wageman, of St. Helena, Cal.; and Ernest of Los Angeles, same State. The father was a manufacturer of ornamental trimmings for soldiers' uniforms and church ornamentation, etc., which calling he followed all his life. He died in 1835 in Germany, aged forty-seven years, leaving a wife and nine children. His wife lived until 1868, and also died in Germany, aged sixty-nine years. Both were Lutherans in their religious faith.

The paternal grandfather of Herman Weinberger was a native of Austria, and in 1731 was driven out from Salzburg by the Catholic persecution, and with a colony settled in Bavaria, where he reared a family and died at the age of eighty-two years. He was a mechanic and belonged to the highest order of the working class. The maternal grandfather was George Rebesberger, who was a native of Germany and a tailor by trade. He died in Germany aged seventy-two years. He had a family of three children by his first marriage and one by his second. He had a brother who came to America with the Hessians, but joined the Patriot army in the Revolutionary war, and drew a pension.

Herman Weinberger received a good common school education, and when thirteen years old began learning the cabinet-maker's trade, which he followed eighteen years. In 1848 he came to America, landed in New York City in May, and stayed there fifteen months, following his trade as a journeyman; in the meantime he learned the English language. From New York he removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1849, and followed his trade there until 1855, then coming to Indianapolis, where he passed the rest of his life. He here went to work for his brother, John C., in a confectionery store and restaurant on Louisiana street, near the Union depot, and remained with him until 1868, when he bought him out, his brother going to California, where he died in 1881. Herman Weinberger conducted the confectionery, restaurant and hotel business up to 1891, when he retired, his son, Herman becoming his successor. Herman carried on the business for five years, when he died, and his brother, Edwin, became his successor, and conducted the business until 1900, when the father sold the property.

On Aug. 28, 1853, Herman Weinberger married Miss Anna Bornkessel, daughter of John George and Eva (Weiss) Bornkessel, and they became parents of twelve children: Of these Charles died in infancy; Johanna died aged fifteen months; Anna married Wilhelm Wiegel, of Indianapolis, who died in 1905, and they had four children, Cora (married to Charles Cost, of Indianapolis), Bertha (married to J. E. Conway, of Indianapolis), Louis (at training school) and Helen (at school); Albert, who is single, was a jeweler and watchmaker; Kate and Sophia died in infancy; Herman died in 1894, aged twenty-eight years; Bertha died in 1898 aged twenty-six years; Mina died aged ten months; Adolph and Rudolph also died in infancy; Edwin married Agnes Donahue, who died in 1905 (they lived in Indianapolis, and had three children, Bertha, Herman and Edna). Mrs. Weinberger, the mother of these, died May 7, 1904.

Mr. and Mrs. Weinberger were Lutherans in faith. Mr. Weinberger belonged to Pentalpha Lodge, No. 564, F. & A. M.; Indianapolis Chapter, No. 5, R. A. M.; Indianapolis Council, No. 2; and to Raper Commandery, No. 1, K. T. He was also a thirty-third degree Mason, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite Masonry, Valley of Indianapolis, and was connected with Masonry for over fifty years. In politics Mr. Weinberger was always opposed to slavery; he was always identified with the Republican party, and voted for Fremont for President.

Mr. Weinberger owned a fine home at No. 714 Union street, where he passed the last years of his life. His estate was divided among the three surviving children, and Mrs. Wiegel was left in charge of the home, at No. 714 Union street. At present she resides at her new home, No. 3122 Central avenue.

While Mr. Weinberger lived in Cincinnati he was foreman in the passenger car railroad shop of the finishing department in George Cake's and Davenport's shops. He had a natural talent for art and made many creditable drawings. As a wood workman he was somewhat remarkable, being a superior designer.

COL. ZEMRO A. SMITH, whose connection with the Indianapolis Journal covered a number of years, has established a reputation as a newspaper writer of the ability necessary for success in modern journalism. He was born in Weston, Maine, Aug. 26, 1837, son of D. C. and Maria (Small) Smith, natives of the same State. Joseph O. Smith, the father of D. C., was born in Maine, and came of English ancestry, the history of the family dating back to the early settlers of Standish, Mass. Joseph O. Smith was a physician. He died at about the age of eighty years. His family consisted of three sons and one daughter.

D. C. Smith, who was a farmer, died in Maine Jan. 31, 1881; his wife died in March, 1864. They were Baptists. They were the parents of four sons and two daughters: Col. Zemro A.; Joseph O., of Skowhegan, Maine; Susan, wife of Frank C. Nickerson, of Monticello, Minn.; Neil D., of Portland, Maine; Clara L., the wife of Frank S. Roberts, of Portland, Maine; and George A., who was killed May 19, 1864, at the battle of Spotsylvania Court House.

Samuel C. Small, the maternal grandfather of Col. Zemro A. Smith, was a native of Maine, of English descent, and was a master ship builder. He passed away at an advanced age, leaving a large family of children.

Colonel Smith was reared in Maine, where he was given a common school education. He attended the Waterville College, graduating in 1862. That year he enlisted in Company C, 18th Maine Volunteer Infantry, and afterward in the 1st Maine Heavy Artillery. He entered the service as a private, was made captain of Company C, and later, in turn, major, lieutenant-colonel, and brevet colonel, serving until the close of the war. This regiment sustained the heaviest loss of any in the army. Colonel Smith was wounded in the battle of Spotsylvania, where his brother George was killed only an hour before. Colonel Smith was on leave of absence while recovering from his wound, and returned to his regiment in July. He was in the entire siege of Petersburg, participating in all the engagements of the 2d Army Corps, and was in many battles. It was his privilege to be in at the closing scenes of the great conflict and he was at Appomattox when Lee surrendered. He was mustered out at Bangor, Maine, Sept. 19, 1865.

Following his return from the war Colonel Smith engaged in the newspaper business at Ellsworth, Maine, for a short time, and was in the same line at Skowhegan for about two years, when he was made associate editor of the Portland Press, being thus employed for about six years. For eleven years he was with the Boston Journal, and in 1887 he went to Leavenworth, Kans., where he was connected with the Times. In 1899 Colonel Smith came to Indianapolis to take a position as editorial writer on the Journal. His office is in Room 64, When building.

Colonel Smith was married Oct. 8, 1889, to Miss Jane, daughter of William Steel. Mrs. Smith is a member of the Plymouth Congregational Church. Their home is in the "Blachurne," on Meridian street. The Colonel has been commander of George H. Thomas Post, No. 17, G. A. R., Department of Indiana, and he is also a prominent member of the Loyal Legion, of which he served as National Recorder. In politics he is a stanch Republican, though the only time he was ever willing to take a public position was when a combination of circumstances led him to serve as alderman, in Maine. He was secretary of the Maine Republican committee for eight years when Mr. Blaine was chairman.

RICHASON ALLEN YOKE (deceased), one of the pioneers of Marion county, Ind., who arrived here as early as the spring of 1828, was a native of Lexington, Kentucky, where he was born Oct. 11, 1808. Mr. Yoke's first American ancestor came to this country from Germany but a short time subsequent to the war of the Revolution.

Richason Allen Yoke came from Kentucky with his parents to Indiana when he was but a child, and lived at Bethel, where they settled. He was one of a family of nine children, all of whom became residents of this State, and all have passed away. Mr. Yoke came from Bethel to Marion county, and purchased a quarter section of wild land situated southeast of what was then Indianapolis, on the Shelbyville road, and which is now included in the corporate limits of the Capitol City. Here he erected a log cabin, and began clearing the land, and as the years went by more and more of the heavy timber fell before the axe, and presently the heavily wooded land became beautiful fertile fields. The log cabin was replaced by a modern and commodious residence of comfort and convenience.

Richason Allen Yoke married Isabel J. Moore, a daughter of one of the pioneers of the State, Thomas Moore. She was a worthy and estimable woman, and together they began married life on the frontier, poor in purse but rich in their mutual affection, health, energy, and boundless determination to make for themselves and their children a comfortable home. Their laudable ambitions met with large success, and here they passed their declining years amid comforts which were the results of their own labor and energy. The husband and father died Oct. 27, 1868, and the wife and mother, in February, 1893. They were the parents of children as follows: Mrs. Sarah J. Smith, of Kansas City, Mo., died in December, 1904. Catherine, widow of Dr. Lewis Manker, a surgeon of the 7th Ind. V. I., in the War of the Rebellion, died in January, 1905. Prof. Nelson Yoke is mentioned below. George J., and his brother, Dr. Charles Yoke, are both residents of Indianapolis. John, Richason A., Mrs. Margaret M. Hill, and Ellen are deceased, the last named dying in childhood.

Richason Allen Yoke was a sturdy, upright and industrious man, a great lover of home, one of the chief desires of his heart being to make it bright and cheerful. Deprived of the advantages of education in early life by the conditions then existing, he realized its value, and encouraged his children to improve all opportunities offered them to secure an education. His earnestness in the establishment of schools is illustrated in the fact that he gave a building he had erected on his place to be used as a schoolhouse, and that when later, owing to the increasing number of settlers it was deemed best to remove the school to a more central site, he gave the building to be removed to the selected spot. Both he and his wife were long faithful and consistent members of the Methodist Church, in which both were earnest workers and liberal contributors. When he died he was past sixty years old, and his widow passed away at the age of eighty-one.

Mr. Yoke was a Whig in the early days and then became a Republican. His two sons, who served their country in the Civil war as soldiers gallant and true, were the only ones old enough to enter the service. John Yoke was a member of the 3d Indiana Cavalry, in which he served three years, and his comparatively early death, in 1880, was hastened by the effects of his army experience. He is survived by a widow and three children.

PROF. NELSON YOKE was born in the Marion homestead, May 14, 1844, and there was spent his boyhood. On Aug. 8, 1862, he was enrolled as a member of Company G, 70th Ind. V. I., Benjamin Harrison commanding. He served in the Army of the Cumberland during the war, being on the firing line most of the time at the very front. No time was passed by him in the hospital, and he was always ready for the duty of the hour. He was in the Atlanta campaign, and fought in all the principal battles of that struggle. After Harrison was made a general, Professor Yoke was named as his orderly, and his services were in demand until the return of peace, when he received an honorable discharge.

On his return home, in 1865, Professor Yoke resumed his farm work, and the fall of the same year entered DePauw University and was a student at that institution for two years. For a year he was a student at Butler College, and began teaching in 1869. From that time until his death, which occurred Nov. 27, 1905, he was continuously engaged in educational pursuits. From 1871 his connection was with the Indianapolis schools, where he occupied the position of supervising principal, and was recognized as a successful educator and a public spirited citizen. A Republican in politics, he served two terms in the city council. He belonged to George H. Chapman Post, No. 209, G. A. R., and in religion he was a member of the Fletcher Place Methodist Church.

Prof. Nelson Yoke married Isabella Catherine Chambers, a native of Broadalbin, N. Y., who went with her parents to Grant county, Wis. At one time the Chambers family was quite numerous, and its representatives were many in southwestern Wisconsin. Mrs. Yoke died in June, 1881. Professor Yoke and his wife had three sons: Charles Richason, Nelson, Jr., and Robert. The first two were formerly residents of Old Mexico, but both are now residents of the United States.

HENRY STOLTE, whose residence in the capital city of Indiana has extended over a long term of years, and who has been prominently identified with the business interests of the same, witnessing the development of Indianapolis from the status of a mere village to its present position as one of the most attractive and prosperous cities of the Union, is well deserving of recognition in a work of this kind.

Mr. Stolte is one of the sterling citizens whom the great German empire has contributed to the American republic, since he was born in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, Feb. 12, 1837, growing up under the sturdy discipline of the farm and having the advantages afforded by the excellent schools of his native place. He is a son of Henry and Elizabeth (Honeur) Stolte, both of whom were born and reared in Westphalia, where their marriage was solemnized and where the former passed his entire life. He served seven years in the Franco-Prussian war, accompanying Napoleon's army on the long and weary march to Moscow, going through that historic campaign poorly clad and with the most meagre supply of food; during the winter many of the soldiers were frozen to death. Mr. Stolte, with many others, was taken a prisoner, being held in captivity about seven months, during which time he was well cared for. He was finally exchanged, after which he continued in active service until the close of the war, when he returned home, wasted in strength and vitality, so that two or three years elapsed ere he regained his wonted vigor. After his marriage he engaged in farming, being energetic and industrious and meeting with due success. He came of an honored family and was a man of inflexible integrity, respected by all who knew him. Both he and his wife were devoted members of the Reformed Church. He died in 1850 and his loss was deeply felt in the community, for he had been helpful as a citizen, his advice being sought by those who knew him, and he was frequently called upon to arbitrate and settle minor difficulties among neighbors, who placed implicit confidence in his judgment and impartiality. His wife survived him and in 1854 came to Indianapolis, where she thereafter was cared for with true filial devotion by her children, her death here occurring in 1868. Of the children we enter brief record as follows: Elizabeth, who was married in her native land to H. Kruse, came to Indianapolis, where she died in 1854; William is a resident of this city; Adolph resides in Fort Wayne on a farm; Henry is mentioned below; Christena is the wife of Rudolph Rogge, of Westphalia; and Sophia is the wife of Richart Brocking of Westphalia. The eldest son, William, was the first representative of the family in America, whither he came in 1850; Henry came in 1852, and two years later they were joined by their mother and the other members of the family. It is gratifying to note the fact that all have been successful in their adopted home, having come to the United States with but limited means but having gained prosperity through honorable and well directed effort.

Upon his arrival in America Henry Stolte came to Indianapolis, where he was employed for the first season in a brick yard. He then became an apprentice in Huey's chair factory and cabinet works, where he was employed three years, after which he was engaged for a number of years as clerk in a grocery. He had been careful in conserving his resources, and after resigning his clerkship he engaged in farming on his own responsibility, devoting himself to this vocation until 1859, when he went to Colorado, where the gold excitement was then at its height. There he remained for a few months, at the expiration of which he returned to Indianapolis, where he was again engaged in clerking until 1870, when he again made a tour through the West, being absent about six months, two of which were passed in Montana, where his fortunes reached the lowest ebb. He then returned to Indianapolis and resumed clerking, at which he continued two years, at the expiration of which he engaged in business for himself, continuing thus for a period of seventeen years and gaining a high degree of success through his energy, close application and honorable dealings, thereby providing a competency for his declining years. In 1889 he retired from active business and, secure in the confidence and esteem of all who know him, he is now enjoying the rewards of his earnest toil and endeavor, having an attractive and commodious residence, which is pleasantly located at No. 616 Stevens street. He is a distinctive type of the self-made man and so worthily has he achieved his success that none can begrudge him the same. Ever true to the duties of citizenship, he has been known as a progressive and public-spirited man and has given his political support to the Democratic party, though he has never sought official preferment. He has, however, served as inspector of elections and has been a delegate to various conventions of his party, in whose cause he has ever maintained an active interest. He was reared in the Protestant faith and his religious views are in harmony with the tenets of the Reformed Church. He has become the owner of valuable realty in Indianapolis, including four dwelling houses and business property, while he also has charge of real estate owned by his wife, so that he finds ample demand upon his time and attention in looking after his interests, and is by no means idle, though he has retired from the more exacting and arduous labors of his earlier life.

In 1874 Mr. Stolte was united in marriage to Mrs. Minnie Jasper, widow of Frederick Jasper, both of whom were born in Westphalia, Prussia. The first marriage of Mrs. Stolte was solemnized in Indianapolis, where Mr. Jasper was a successful business man and where he died in 1872, leaving his wife and their six children well provided for. Mrs. Stolte is a daughter of William Showe, a representative of a sterling old family of Westphalia, and she and her brother were the first of the family to come to America, where they were joined by their father and the other members of the family two years later, the mother having died in her native land. They all settled in Indianapolis, where the father passed the residue of his life, finding a good home with his daughter, Mrs. Stolte, during the last nine years and entering into eternal rest in 1889, at the age of eighty years, a devoted member of the Reformed Church. His children were as follows: William, Frederick, Jacob and Minnie (wife of Mr. Stolte). By her first marriage Mrs. Stolte had six children, and they received the most devoted paternal care and guidance from Mr. Stolte, and the mutual affection and regard could not have been more marked had he been indeed their father, and he has ever shown the deepest interest in their welfare, having had no children of his own. Of the children of Frederick and Minnie Jasper we have the following record: Minnie is the wife of J. F. Reinecke, a coal dealer at Haughville, Marion county; Lizzie, the wife of J. Howard, died in 1896; Frederick died at the age of thirty-nine years; Emma is the widow of Eugene Curren; and William, formerly a successful life-insurance agent of Indianapolis, is now working in a wholesale dry-goods house.

TURNER B. HORN, deceased, was a well-known and highly respected citizen of Indianapolis. When a small child, more than seventy years ago, he was brought by his parents to Indiana, and the family became pioneers of the State. His father, John Horn, was born in Virginia in 1792, the son of Philip Horn, of German ancestry. Philip Horn removed with his family from Virginia to Kentucky when John was a boy of about ten years, and there lived the remainder of his life. His wife lived to the age of ninety-one years, and the longevity of her family was remarkable, her mother living to the age of 127 years and other members of the family to an extreme old age.

John Horn grew to manhood in Kentucky. He enlisted in the war of 1812 and fought under General Jackson in the battle of New Orleans. In 1813 he married Miss Margaret Bottom, and in 1831 with his wife and eight children, migrated from Kentucky to Johnson county, Ind. A daughter was born to the parents after they reached their new home. The family settled on a farm of 160 acres, which Mr. Horn purchased. Remaining here a number of years he sold the property, and removed to Bartholomew county, where he died in 1850, his wife preceding him to the grave by some years. John Horn was an industrious and esteemed citizen. His business through life was farming and milling. In politics he was a Whig and he and his wife were members of the Christian Church.

Turner B. Horn was born in Kentucky, Dec. 20, 1825, and was about six years of age when brought to Indiana by his parents. He was reared on the farm and at the age of seventeen years he began a three-years' apprenticeship at the carriagemaker's trade, at Columbus, Ind. At the completion of his apprenticeship, he followed his trade, and when the Civil war began he was engaged in business at Edinburg, Johnson Co., Ind. He enlisted Dec. 1, 1863, in Co. L, 10th Indiana Cavalry, serving in Tennessee, Alabama and Mississippi under Gen. Thomas, and participating in many important battles. Engaging Gen. Forrest at Pulaski, Tenn., the Tenth followed Gen. Wood to Decatur, Ala., engaged Gen. Wheeler at Athens, Ala., Gen. Hood's army at Franklin and participated in the famous battle of Nashville. He was severely injured while under fire. While the Union forces were pursuing the Confederates, after the battle of Nashville his horse was struck and instantly killed and in falling fell upon Mr. Horn, breaking his hip and maiming him for life. He was honorably discharged from service Aug. 30, 1865, at Indianapolis.

Mr. Horn returned to his trade, working at Columbus and Jeffersonville. He was, at the latter city, inspector of the United States Depot for several years. He removed to Indianapolis about 1882. Later he engaged in the grocery business at Louisville, Ky., but his property there was destroyed by a cyclone. Returning to Indianapolis he there worked at his trade as much as he was able, until his death Oct. 9, 1904.

On Jan. 9, 1846, Mr. Horn married Mary Wayland, daughter of Joseph Wayland, and to them were born ten children, seven sons and three daughters. The wife and mother, who also represents a well known pioneer family of Indiana, was no less a patriot during the Civil war than her husband who was fighting at the front. Left at home with eight small children to care for, she, like many another brave wife and mother, struggled hard and faithfully for their support. Mr. Horn was a member of Anderson Post, G. A. R. Mr. Horn, as is his wife, was held in high esteem by his many friends. Their lives were severely tried in the struggles and privations of the old pioneer days, but their characters developed strongly under adverse circumstances. He was a typical representative of that strong fiber in American life, which has constructed this nation's greatness and won for it the respect of the entire world.

FRED HERGT. There is no one country that has contributed to the complex composition of our American social fabric an element of more sterling worth or of greater value in fostering and supporting our national institutions than has Germany. That great empire has given us men of sturdy integrity, indomitable perseverance, high intelligence and much business acumen, the result being the incorporation of a firm and strength-giving fiber through warp and woof. A man who may well look with pride upon his German lineage and upon his personal accomplishments as a citizen and business man is Fred Hergt, who has been long and prominently identified with industrial activities in the city of Indianapolis, attaining a success worthy the name and ever holding the unqualified confidence and esteem of his fellow men.

Mr. Hergt is a native of Weimar, Province of Saxony, Germany, where he was born Dec. 5, 1842, a son of Anthony and Anna (Conrumpf) Hergt. Both the parents were likewise born in that Province, where their marriage was solemnized and where they reared their children. They were people of utmost integrity of character and made their lives count for good in all relations. Both the Conrumpf and Hergt families were influential and prominent in the social and business affairs of the Province of Saxony for many generations. Morris Conrumpf, the grandfather of Fred Hergt, was a successful farmer in that section of the empire.

Anthony Hergt was a stone mason by trade, and became one of the leading contractors and builders of Weimar. He completed a number of government contracts in his line and was concerned in the erection of many important buildings. A man of marked business ability, in addition to operations in the line noted he also conducted a successful meat-market for a number of years. As a young man he served in the German army, in harmony with the wise regulations of the government. He died in his native Province in 1849, at the age of fifty-three years, respected by all who knew him, and he was survived by his wife, who passed away in 1862, at the age of sixty-four years. Both were devoted members of the Presbyterian Church. Of their children we enter the following brief record: Dorothea, who became the wife of Christian Michael, still resides in Germany; Renatte is the wife of Gottlieb Mangold; Mary is the wife of Adolf Hollenstein; Teresa is the wife of William Hampf; Theodore still retains his residence in Germany; Christena is the wife of Theodore Doeffer; Carl is a well known stone mason and contractor of Syracuse, New York; Paulina is the wife of Karl Callenback and still resides in Germany; Martha is the wife of George Eckert, a successful farmer of Germany; and Fred is mentioned below.

Fred Hergt was but six years of age at the time of his father's death, but he was reared with the most solicitous and kindly care by his widowed mother, who gave him the best possible educational advantages in the excellent schools of his native place, while by precept and example she trained all of her children to become honorable and useful members of society. At the age of fourteen years, in preparation for the personal responsibilities of life, Mr. Hergt entered upon an apprenticeship at the butcher's trade, devoting his attention to the same until he had completed a service of three years and had become thoroughly skilled in his chosen vocation. After completing his trade he continued to work at the same in his native Province for about one year, at the expiration of which, believing that America offered superior opportunities to the young man dependent upon his own exertions, he severed the ties that bound him to home and native land and in 1860 emigrated to the United States, landing in New York, whence he forthwith made his way direct to Indianapolis, which has thus been his home and the scene of his well directed efforts for a period of more than forty years. Like the average young man who thus emigrated from the Fatherland, Mr. Hergt had but little financial reinforcement, but he was well equipped for the battle of life, being of strong physique and animated by a spirit of inflexible integrity, industry and indomitable perseverance—the most salient characteristics of the true German type. Soon after his arrival in Indianapolis he found employment as a journeyman in a local butcher shop, and he continued in the service of others until 1865, when he gave inception to his independent business career by opening a market of his own. Two years later his marriage was solemnized and he then established both his home and place of business on East Washington street, where he continued to conduct a successful business until 1876, when he purchased an eligibly located lot, at No. 444 East Washington street, and there erected a substantial brick building to which he removed his market, and this building he still owns. Later on, as his financial resources justified, he purchased vacant lots at a point farther east on the same street and there erected a commodious and attractive two-story residence, where the family have since maintained their home—No. 1624 East Washington street. He also erected three stores at the corner of the same block, and these he rents. He has also accumulated other local real estate of distinctive value, including desirable residence properties, and his rent list is one of no inconsiderable importance, while his holdings represent the just rewards of his thrift, enterprise and unremit-ning, and passed up through the various departments. In 1875, when sixteen years of age, he came to America with his father, for whom he clerked until 1884, in which year he opened a shoe store at No. 22 East Washington street, Indianapolis, going into business for himself with a cash capital of $167. From this very small beginning he has enlarged his business until it has reached its present proportions, his patronage requiring the employment of thirty-seven clerks.

Mr. Marott is widely known as a shoe merchant, though his numerous other interests are much more important. He is president of and owns controlling interest in the Kokomo, Marion & Western Traction Company, which has a system from Kokomo to Marion, Ind., with the railway system and electric light plant of Kokomo. He has been a prime mover in the formation of the Citizens Gas Company, which is being established as a "people's company," owned by the people of Indianapolis, to supply gas at a price not exceeding sixty cents per thousand feet. In 1890 Mr. Marott became proprietor and was made president of the Logansport Street Railway Company, but sold the road in 1902. He owns much interest in the Muncie Heat, Light and Power Company, which supplies natural gas to Muncie, and which has 110 miles of pipe line and 14,000 acres of gas and oil territory. Mr. Marott is vice-president of the Security Trust Company of Indianapolis; is vice-president of the "Claypool Hotel"; owns considerable Indianapolis real estate, and is interested in a large per cent of the business enterprises of the commonwealth. His realty holdings alone amount to over $400,000 and he has mercantile interests to the value of more than one million dollars.

The opinion of some of Mr. Marott's associates regarding his career will be of interest. Mr. John L. Holliday, financier, president of the Union Trust Company, founder of the Indianapolis News, has this to say of him: "Mr. George J. Marott is one of our successful men and owes that success to his persistent energy, good judgment and close adherence to sound business principles and methods. As a merchant he has taken a comprehensive view of modern conditions and adapted his business accordingly. As an investor and promoter of enterprises he has been shrewd and daring, yet at the same time conservative, putting money only in such things as promised well in the future and managing those concerns with extreme care and efficiency. He always calculates the cost, never goes beyond his depths, and makes no engagements that he does not keep."

Mr. Volney T. Malott, who is regarded as one of the greatest financiers of the West, writes under date of April 28, 1906: "George J. Marott is one of the leading business men of Indianapolis and through his native ability and foresight has placed himself in the foremost ranks of the merchants of the middle west. Starting with meager beginnings he has by the strict observance of good business principles accumulated a large fortune. His operations have not been entirely confined to mercantile pursuits, but he has also been a heavy investor in real estate and in public utilities within the State."

On Nov. 27, 1879, Mr. Marott married Miss Ella Meek, of Richmond, Ind., daughter of Jesse and Nancy (Meek) Meek. His comfortable home, which he erected in 1893, is located at No. 423 North Alabama street.

Truly Mr. Marott is a self-made man. His successful business career is but the logical sequence of earnest and forceful efforts, intelligently directed, and is indicative of his character, his life affording an example which every ambitious young man would do well to follow. Naturally he is recognized as one of the leading and public-spirited men of Indianapolis, and he takes a deep pride in his city. In politics he is a Democrat, and in his religious matters he is governed by the promptings of his conscience.

With all his business cares Mr. Marott finds time to be sociable, affable, polite and companionable, and not only does he enjoy high standing in the commercial world but he is very popular personally, his friends numbering legions.

JOHN W. APPLE, a Christian minister and farmer at Oaklandon, Ind., was born on the farm where he is now living in Lawrence township, Sept. 7, 1841, a son of Christopher and Catherine (Crumbaugh) Apple, both of whom were natives of Clermont county, Ohio.

Christopher Apple was a farmer all his life, and became very successful in that occupation. In 1837 he came into Indiana, settling on the farm where his son, John W., is now living, and there he died in 1871, when about sixty-five years old. His widow survived him five years, and died in 1876 at the age of sixty-nine years. Both were members of the Christian (Disciples) Church. They had a family of eight children, five of whom were sons, and of this family five are still living: Eliza J., widow of A. J. Springer, of Lawrence township; Phoebe, the wife of David Springer, of Franklin township; John W.; Maillon, of Hancock county; and William M., of Lawrence township.

Christopher Apple, the grandfather of John W., was born in Pennsylvania, and came of German ancestry. He was an early settler in Clermont county, Ohio, and about 1833 came to Indiana, settling upon 240 acres of land in Lawrence township. He married Julia A. Shafer, a member of a large and distinguished family, widely scattered over the United States, many of whose members occupy prominent stations of life. He reared a large family, and died at an advanced age. Jacob Crumbaugh, the maternal grandfather of John W. Apple, was a native of Pennsylvania, and also came of German ancestry. His death occurred in middle life, and his widow lived to be over ninety years of age. Both husband and wife passed to their rest in Clermont county, Ohio.

John W. Apple has spent his entire life on the farm where he is found at the present time. His education began in the district school, and he made such progress that he was early qualified to teach, which he did for about two years. At the expiration of that period he attended the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, after which he resumed teaching, which was his occupation until 1878. He was ordained a preacher in 1868, and began preaching, at the same time carrying on his farming operations.

Mr. Apple was married March 10, 1872, to Miss Sarah A., born July 7, 1849, a daughter of John and Leah (Klepfer) Mock. To this union were born three children: Arthur V. is a farmer in Lawrence township, near Oaklandon; he married Clara Klepfer and they have one child, Edgar. Edward F. married Alice McCord, and lives on his farm in Lawrence township; they have two children, Beatrice and Howard. Mary Adelaide married Irvin Ellsworth, and has her home near Anderson, in Madison county; they have three children, Vennis, Bennett and Francis. The mother of these children died Jan. 25, 1879, and Mr. Apple married (second), Feb. 22, 1880, Margaret J. Mock, a sister of his first wife. To this union have come five children:

Demia A., Porter, Mina, Dorus and Freeman. Mrs. Apple's parents came to Indiana in 1831, and made their home in Lawrence township, where they lived until their death, the father passing to his rest, Jan. 28, 1894, at the age of seventy-four years, and the mother, who was born in 1824, dying in 1863. Both were stanch members of the Methodist Church.

Mr. Apple belongs to the I. O. G. T., and is a strong Prohibitionist. He has always taken a firm stand against the open saloon and the liquor traffic.

Mr. Apple has never held any regular pastorate, although he was ordained in 1868. His services are much in demand at weddings and funerals, and his acquaintance is extended throughout the county, where he is much respected and loved for his high character. All his life he has been a lover of farm work, and he has a fine and well improved farm just at the southwestern edge of the village of Oaklandon. Mr. Apple's parents having been among the earliest settlers in this county, he grew up with a knowledge of the hardships and privations that were incident to a life on the frontier. Well does he remember the trying experiences of those days of which the present generation knows nothing. It is well that the history of his parents, and many others, sturdy pioneers of their day, should be preserved in a fitting way, so that those to come may know something of what the making of the beautiful State of Indiana has cost.

JOHN C. TILFORD, a descendant of an honored pioneer family of Indiana, was born Feb. 18, 1850, near Madison, Jefferson Co., Ind., where he attended the common schools. His parents were George and Minerva (Anderson) Tilford, both born in Indiana and married in Jefferson county. The grandparents on both sides were pioneers in the State. The Tilfords came from Kentucky and were of Scotch descent, Grandfather Tilford settling in Jefferson county, Ind., where he became a prominent farmer and valued citizen. He served in the war of 1812. His children were: Sarah, Mrs. Carr; George, father of John C.; and Sarelida, Mrs. Chambers. The mother of these children married (second), William Monroe, also a pioneer and prominent farmer of Indiana, and two children were born to this marriage: Susan, who died unmarried; and Alexander, who served through the war of the Rebellion and resides in Jefferson county.

George Tilford was born and reared in Jefferson county, there passing his entire life, his death, the result of an accident, taking place in 1857. For many years he was a school teacher and later was a groceryman and huckster. In politics he was a Whig and filled many offices of honor and trust. In religious belief he was a Primitive Baptist, which he interpreted as being strictly honest and honorable in all his dealings with others. Mr. Tilford married Minerva Anderson, who was born in 1829, a daughter of Thomas Anderson, of Welsh descent, and a prominent and much respected merchant of Kent, Ind. Thomas Anderson was twice married and had two children by the first union: William, who died from the effects of a wound received in the war of the Rebellion; and Minerva, mother of John C. Tilford. Mr. Anderson married (second), Elizabeth Monroe and to them these children were born: Mrs. Kate Riker; Thomas; Susan, who died unmarried; Miss Nancy; and Mollie, Mrs. John Monroe. This family all belonged to the Baptist Church. The children of George and Minerva Tilford were: Geneva, who died unmarried; John C., of this sketch; Ione, Mrs. L. Johnston, who at death left two children; and Laura, Mrs. Dr. Dellett. After the death of her husband Mrs. Tilford married (second), William Campbell, a groceryman of Madison, Ind., but no children were born to this union; after his death his widow married (third), Hon. William Smith, a very prominent and widely known citizen of Vernon, Ind., who served his district in Congress with integrity and honor. His death took place at Vernon, where his widow resides with a grandson. She has always been a worthy and consistent member of the Baptist Church.

John C. Tilford was born and reared in Jefferson county. He learned the carpenter trade and was employed as a steamboat carpenter on boats running from Jeffersonville, and later he secured employment in the Indianapolis & Jeffersonville Railroad shops at the latter place, where he remained two years. In 1873 he was sent by the company to Indianapolis as car inspector at that end of the road and he held this important position until 1881, when he took service with the Indianapolis Union R. R. Co., as foreman of their car shops. This latter position he has held to the present, a fact which reflects the greatest credit upon him. He is a practical, competent man and a first-class mechanic. During his long business career he has made but three changes and all of them have been by his own desire, and with satisfaction he remembers that the most cordial feelings have ever existed between himself and his employers. As he has never missed a pay day he has been able to accumulate quite a little money and is in very comfortable circumstances, owning his handsome residence on West Morris street. In politics he is a strong Republican and has served as police commissioner in West Indianapolis. Fraternally he belongs to the Knights of Pythias, Knights of Honor and to the Knights and Ladies of Honor.

On Nov. 3, 1870, Mr. Tilford was married to Miss Mary E. Johnston, who was born near Richmond, Va., July 7, 1848, a daughter of Fountain and Winnifred (Moon) Johnston and a granddaughter of Abraham Johnston, who, with his brothers, Isaac and Jacob, all came from Scotland to Virginia and became prominent and wealthy planters. The children of Grandfather Abraham Johnston were: James; William, who settled in Tennessee and became very prominent, being elected Senator; Clifton; Jeremiah; Lucy, Mrs. James Wright; and Fountain. The late President Johnson, of Tennessee, was a representative of this family. Fountain Johnston, father of Mrs. Tilford, settled at Madison, Ind., where he followed the trade of cabinet-maker. He was a strong Democrat, but never desired office. He was a consistent member of the Methodist Church in which he was long one of the elders and was a liberal supporter of it. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Tilford were: May, who married G. A. Brown, died in 1892, leaving one daughter, Lula P., who now has her home with her grandparents; George F. is at home; Opal, a most highly accomplished and cultured young lady, who was secretary to Senator Beveridge, died Feb. 19, 1901; Pearl W. married George F. Kohnle, who is with the Vancamp Hardware Co.; Elmore A. and Howard A. are both at home. Mrs. Tilford is a consistent member of the Christian Church.

STRANGE N. CRAGUN, the editor and proprietor of the Patriot, the oldest paper published in Lebanon, Boone county, comes originally of Irish descent, on both sides of the family. He was born July 24, 1857, and is in the fourth generation from the first American ancestor of the family.

(I) The great-grandfather was born in Ireland and came to America settling in Virginia, where he became a wealthy man for those days, the owner of several plantations and of a large number of slaves. He was a soldier in the Revolution and died at an advanced age.

(II) Elisha Cragun was born in Virginia and was a farmer by occupation. He migrated from Virginia to Indiana, settled first in Rush county, near the Franklin county line, and then, in 1835, moved to Boone county, entered government land, and improved a farm. While on a journey west in the fifties he was taken sick, and died at Council Bluffs, Iowa, when well advanced in years. His wife had died some years previously and was buried on the home farm in Eagle township, Boone county. Her maiden name was Osborne. Four sons and three daughters were born to them.

(III) Hiram Cragun, born Dec. 8, 1816, passed his boyhood and youth in Rush county, and was nineteen years of age when the family moved to Boone county. He spent the remainder of his life there, in Eagle township, as a farmer. He was a man of great energy, and after helping his father clear a farm, he improved another of 245 acres for himself, working a good deal in the timber. He supported the Democratic party until the war of the Rebellion, but from the day the Confederates fired upon Fort Sumter, he was an ardent Republican. He was an enthusiast in the Masonic order, a master Mason, and so loyal that only matters of the greatest import were allowed to interfere with his regular attendance upon the lodge meetings. In church affiliation, Mr. Cragun was a Methodist, as also was his wife. He was one of the early members of the Pleasant View Methodist Episcopal Church in the east part of Boone county, and for a long time was a class leader. His death occurred in 1884, at the age of sixty-eight years.

The wife of Hiram Cragun was Miss Reiter Dooley, a native of Shelby county, Ky., who came to Indiana when she was nine years old. Her father, Robert Dooley, married a Miss Shelburn. Both parents were of Irish descent. They brought their family to Boone county in 1835, traveling in the old way by wagons and on horseback, and settled on a farm in Union township, where both died in middle life. Mrs. Reiter Dooley Cragun was born Aug. 8, 1826, and was married to Mr. Cragun in 1842. She bore her husband nine children, six of them sons. Those still living are Josephine, wife of S. C. Peters, of Zionsville; Melvina, who married the late John St. Clair, of Zionsville; George of Center township; Hiram N., of Whitestown; Strange N., of Lebanon; and Lorenzo D., of Indianapolis. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Cragun married John Bowers, an old friend of the family. He was a farmer in Marion county and owned a farm in the vicinity of Bethel Church. For many years he was a class-leader of the Bethel Church, and was in every way a prominent resident of that region. He died in 1905.

(IV) Strange N. Cragun was born on the family homestead in Eagle township, near Zionsville, and there passed his youth. He attended the district schools, then the graded schools at Whitestown, and next the academy at Zionsville. At seventeen years of age he began teaching, and by so doing earned the money necessary to attend Purdue University for a time at Lafayette and the Normal school at Lebanon, Ohio. During this period his attention had been gradually centering on the West Point Military Academy, in New York, where he was admitted with the class of 1883, but defective eyesight prevented his completing the course, and he returned to a civil life after two years. He resumed his former profession of teaching, was principal of the school at Whitestown, held a joint principalship at Zionsville, and later was principal of the high school at Lebanon for four years. He was then elected county superintendent of schools, first filling out the unexpired term of Harvey M. Lafollette, and afterwards being twice appointed his own successor.

With a leaning toward a business life, Mr. Cragun decided in May, 1891, to give up his school work, and enter the field of journalism. He bought the Lebanon Patriot, the oldest publication in the city, and has since devoted his entire attention to editing and publishing that paper. He supports the politics of the Republican party. In connection with the paper there is a job printing office, fully equipped for all kinds of commercial printing.

On June 17, 1883, Mr. Cragun was united in marriage with Miss Adelaide M. Booher, daughter of Benjamin, Sr., and Margaret (Beelar) Booher. Three children were born to this union, but only Dwight is living, a boy of sixteen who is attending high school. Opal and Ethel, twins, died at the age of six and twelve years, respectively. Mr. and Mrs. Cragun belong to the Methodist Church in Lebanon. The family resides at No. 404 West Main street, where Mr. Cragun has built a comfortable home. He and his wife are both interested in fraternal societies, and are members of Lebanon Chapter, No. 23, Eastern Star. He is a Thirty-second degree, Scottish Rite Mason; is Past Eminent Commander of Lebanon Commandery, No. 43, Knights Templar; belongs to Boone Lodge, No. 9, F. & A. M.; to Lebanon Chapter, No. 39, R. A. M.; to Boone Council; to the Knights of Pythias; Modern Woodmen; the American Plowmen; and the Order of Ben Hur. Mr. Cragun is known as an editor and printer, and is also known as one of the business men of Lebanon, in financial circles. He is a stockholder and director in the First National Bank of Lebanon, and in the Citizens Loan and Trust Company, is a stockholder in the Lebanon National Bank; president of the Dairy Cream Separator Company; and a stockholder in The Indestructible Steel Wheel Company. In all the various phases of his life he is a man of firm convictions, and endeavors to stand for those things that make for good citizenship, and a prosperous and happy community.

WILLIAM M. BLYTHE, a descendant of an honored and prominent pioneer family of Indianapolis, was born in that city July 19, 1837, a son of Samuel and Ruth (Meredith) Blythe.

Samuel Blythe was a son of Samuel Blythe of Scotland, who with a brother came to the United States during colonial days, and both served through the Revolution, after which they settled in Pennsylvania near Chambersburg, where the grandfather owned and conducted a mill and farm, and there passed the remainder of his days. His children were as follows: Jemima, Mrs. Irvin; Benjamin I.; Abigail, wife of Judge Thompson, of Pittsburgh, and the mother of the late president of the Pennsylvania Railroad; and Samuel. Of these, Benjamin Blythe was a civil engineer, an early settler of Indiana and assisted Mr. Ralston in the survey and platting of Indianapolis; he was an enterprising and public-spirited man, was the pioneer pork packer of Indianapolis, and engaged in many enterprises, being an eminently successful business man, and he died in St.

Augustine, Fla., about 1858, leaving one daughter, Sarah, who married L. W. Graves, had three children, and is now deceased. In politics the father of the above family was a Whig, and in his religious affiliations he was a consistent and worthy Presbyterian.

Samuel Blythe, father of William M., was born and reared in Pennsylvania, and assisted his father upon the farm and about the mill, and there remained until his marriage, after which he drove a stage coach. About 1828 he came West, locating at Indianapolis, although later he settled at Greencastle, Ind., and engaged in the boot and shoe business for a number of years. He returned to Indianapolis, about 1843, at which time he embarked in a tannery and leather store, with his brother, Benjamin I., and was engaged in that line at the time of his death, Dec. 8, 1850. He was of a retiring disposition, and did not desire public office, preferring to devote his attention to his private interests, although he supported the candidates of the Whig party. For many years he was a consistent member of the Presbyterian Church. He married (first), Mrs. Ruth (Meredith) Scott, who died in 1837. He married (second), in 1840, Ruth Bennett, of New Jersey, who early settled in Shelbyville, Ind., where her family became widely and favorably known. By his first marriage he had a family as follows: Samuel, a locomotive engineer, who died and left two children; Benjamin, a pastry cook by trade, later a miner in Denver, Col., and now deceased; and William M. The children of the second marriage were: Abigail, died unmarried in December, 1896; James G., a bookkeeper and banker, died in 1896; Alexander, a soldier of the Civil war, died in the year 1900.

William M. Blythe remained at home attending school until he was twelve years of age, when he went to work for William N. Bennett upon a farm in Shelby county, Ind., but only remained two years when he returned to Indianapolis and went to live with his uncle, Benjamin Blythe, a business man who often made trips to New Orleans. Our subject remained with this uncle until 1855 when he engaged with the Lawrenceburg and Upper Mississippi railroad, first as a brakeman, but in six months he was made fireman and in 1862 was promoted to be engineer and run passenger trains. Later he was passenger engineer on the trains of the Big Four system between Indianapolis and Bellefontaine, but in 1865 he resigned and engaged at Indianapolis in the grocery line, continuing in this business for three years. He then sold his interests and became an engineer on the Indianapolis & Cincinnati road, but in a short time was employed by Gen. Thomas A. Morris on his new road from Indianapolis to Terre Haute, now the I. & St. L., and he thus continued until the consolidation of the road, when he, in 1872, took service with John McKinna on the old Peru road, and there he remained two years, when he resigned and returned to Indianapolis, and engaged in handling real estate with Dan Martin until 1876. In that year he was appointed deputy sheriff under John Pressly, serving one full term and a portion of another. In 1880 he again returned to his engineering, engaging with the I. D. & W., and for ten years was one of the road's trusted employees. At the end of that time he retired from railroading. He next turned his attention once more toward a grocery business, but after two years sold his store and accepted the agency of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, he acting as secretary and general utility manager for the organization, and since 1894 he has retained this position, his wide experience and extensive acquaintance making him especially fitted for it. His office is known as Division No. 11, B. of L. E. During his long service he was never discharged or received a rebuke, and was so trusted that he was allowed to manage his engine to suit himself. Being a good friend to those under him, he gained their respect, and is very well known and highly esteemed among railroad men all over the country. In politics he is a staunch Republican, but while working to advance party interests, he does not seek office. During the time he was engaged in the real estate business he was very successful and gained a knowledge of realty values which proves of benefit to his friends even to this day. He is a member of the Foresters, Court No. 1820, and also of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, No. 11.

Mr. Blythe was married at Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1860, to Mrs. Ann E. (Jackson) Middaw, widow of J. W. Middaw, of Portsmouth, Ohio, who served in the Rebellion and later was a railroad man who was killed on the Big Four road. To Mr. and Mrs. Blythe has come one son, James M., born July 20, 1863, and now a salesman with the Simmons Hardware Company, of St. Louis, being consigned to special territory; he has a son and a daughter, the former attending school at Oxford, Ohio. Mrs. Blythe died in 1896, firm in the faith of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Blythe is the last of the old stock, and he now looks back over many busy years of a well spent life.

JAMES McMURRY, who died at his home, No. 2222 College avenue, Indianapolis, July 2, 1903, had lived in Indiana since 1835. Born in Kentucky Dec. 6, 1817, he was a son of James McMurry, Sr., and came of Scotch ancestry.

Thomas McMurry, father of James, Sr., came from Scotland about the middle of the eighteenth century. He was a farmer and a practitioner of Thomsonian medicine, in which he was quite successful. By his first marriage he had two sons—William (who lived and died in Kentucky) and James—and two daughters.

James McMurry, Sr., was born May 13, 1788, and was reared to manhood in the Kentucky home. The tanner's trade became his occupation. Mary Goodnight, his wife, was born in Lincoln county, Ky., Dec. 30, 1792, daughter of Jacob Goodnight, who came of German ancestry. One of her brothers served in the War of 1812. Mr. and Mrs. McMurry were the parents of eleven children, nine of whom lived to maturity. The first of this family to live in Indiana was a daughter, Elizabeth Billingsley, who settled with her husband in Putnam county in 1833. James McMurry, Jr., followed in February, 1836. The father, however, had visited the State in 1828, and was here several times before any of his children. He entered land in Putnam, Hendricks and Montgomery counties, securing in all about 2,400 acres. In 1834 he bought a farm on the south line of Montgomery county.

James McMurry, Jr., prepared for the coming of the family the following fall, when all except the parents, joined him, the latter coming in February, 1837. The father died on this farm Sept. 9, 1838, of a fever that prevailed in this section for many years. Hard work had probably shortened his life. His widow survived his loss about fifteen years, and died at the old Montgomery farm in 1855, aged sixty-seven years. Four of her nine children are living at this writing, two sons and two daughters. Mrs. Mary M. Patterson, of Chicago, and James McMurry, Jr., are twins. Luke R. McMurry lives in Washington. Mrs. Sarah M. Claypool is a resident of Bowling Green, Ky. Those who have died are as follows: Mrs. Elizabeth Billingsley, of Indianapolis; Jacob Shelton, who died in 1839; Isaac, who died in Kentucky, in 1892; Henry Goodnight, who died in Kentucky in 1834. Thomas H. McMurry, the youngest son, was a member of an Illinois regiment in the war for the Union and was killed at Champion Hill, May 16, 1863. He was a brave soldier and fell while defending a battery.

James McMurry, whose name introduces this article, was reared a tanner and farmer, and for six years lived on the Montgomery homestead, giving devoted attention to his mother, and settling the family patrimony. When he left the homestead he located, in 1841, on land in the northeastern part of Putnam county, and it is worthy of note that he sowed a large acreage of blue grass, being among the first to do that. Before he left his mother's farm he seeded a hundred acres to this valuable grass, and later put in about six hundred acres for himself. His plan was to girdle the trees, and when they were dead to set fire to them, and sow grass seed, thus affording ample pasturage. In stock raising he was eminently successful, and after a time took up the raising of mules, and in that part of the State was known as one of the very largest stock raisers. For a period of twenty-nine years he lived on one farm. In 1872 he established a bank in Warsaw, which he sold in 1876, and since that time has lived in Indianapolis.

Mr. McMurry was married in February, 1843, to Livonia, a daughter of Turpin Darnell, of Putnam county. She was born in Montgomery county, in 1822, and died in Indianapolis, April 26, 1898, being remembered as a most estimable and worthy wife and mother. She left two sons and two daughters: Mrs. Mary L. Pratt; Joshua B.; Mrs. Sarah E. Lewis; and James T.

Mr. McMurry was reared a Democrat, and remained such through several campaigns. In 1852 he voted for Franklin Pierce. The Repeal of the Missouri Compromise in 1854 estranged him completely from that party, and he assisted in the organization of the Republican party. In his business he was very successful, and had broad and upright views, and was a most estimable citizen.

A very remarkable gathering of a social character was held some years ago in the home of Mr. and Mrs. McMurry, when a half dozen of the friends and neighbors, all of whom had passed the age of eighty years, were invited to spend an evening. The oldest of these guests was John E. Hines, who was born in North Carolina July 4, 1809, and came to Marion county, Ind., in 1831. Another was Christopher Tyler Arms, who was born in Franklin county, Mass., March 29, 1813. A third was John Losey, who was born in Delaware, Dec. 13, 1813, and who came to Indianapolis in 1862. John W. Griffith another of the guests on this occasion, was born in Frederick county, Va., Sept. 16, 1816. Dalphon Hutchings, also present was born in Clark county, Ind., in 1818; he came to Indianapolis in 1856. Rev. A. Goodwin, who was born in Brookville, Ind., Nov. 2, 1818, came to Indianapolis in 1857. A fine dinner was served, and a very enjoyable time was had.

WILLIAM G. YORK, late of No. 3611 North Meridian street, who entered into rest eternal Aug. 9, 1902, was a veteran of the war of the Rebellion, in which he served as a member of the 17th Iowa Volunteers. Mr. York was born in Decatur county, March 5, 1843, son of Jennings Thomas and Nancy Jane (McLung) York, the former born in Maysville, Ky., in 1816.

The paternal grandfather of William G. York was born in Kentucky, and was a contemporary of Daniel Boone and Simeon Kenton, being acquainted with these men. He was a soldier in the second war with England. His last years were spent in Indiana, and his widow located land in the northern part of the State on a warrant issued to her on account of her husband's military services.

Jennings T. York was one of quite a numerous family, but all have now passed away. In early life he learned the trade of a carpenter and cabinet maker, and following the family in its migration from Kentucky into Indiana, became one of the first carpenters in Indianapolis, as well as a well known citizen. Several of his brothers, as well as himself became well known citizens of Indianapolis and vicinity. Among these brothers were Cyrus and John York. With his brothers Jennings T. York put up many dwellings, and bought and sold much property, carrying on heavy operations in choice real estate. Finally he removed to Hamilton county, where he settled on 160 acres of land which his wife had inherited, and which he had bought from the other heirs, and which soon became very valuable property. Mr. York married for his first wife Nancy Jane McLung, of Marion county, a daughter of one of the old pioneer families there. She died in Indianapolis, and Mr. York married a Miss Dorsey, who also died in this city. It was soon after her death that he removed to Hamilton county, and it was there that he married the third time. By his first marriage Mr. York had three sons and a daughter: William G.; Jennings Lyle, of Hamilton county; Mrs. Eliza Jane Potter, of Oakland, Cal.; and Robert B. F., of the same city. To the second marriage was born one child, who died at birth; and to the third union was born a family of four children, only one of whom is now living, Jennings Thomas, of Fortville, Hancock Co., Indiana.

William G. York was about four years of age when the family located in Hancock county, and was about thirteen years old when his father died. At the age of seventeen years he started out in life for himself, going to Monona county, Iowa, where he engaged in farm work. He enlisted March 15, 1862, at Onawa City, Iowa, in what became Company H, 17th Iowa Volunteer Infantry. During his connection with this command he took part in the siege and second battle of Corinth and for forty-seven days was in the rifle pits during the Siege of Vicksburg. He was at Missionary Ridge, in many important events of the Atlanta Campaign, and was captured with two companies of his regiment by the cavalry of Gen. Joseph Wheeler, near Dalton, Ga. Mr. York was paroled, but soon after returned to his regiment, which was entirely captured by Gen. Hardee, Oct. 13, 1864. Mr. York was kept a prisoner until the close of the war, first at Cahaba, near Selma, Ala., in the Milan prison, near Macon, Ga., and in the famous stockade at Andersonville, being confined six and a half months altogether. His final discharge was made out May 1, 1865, at Davenport, Iowa. When he had somewhat recovered his health and strength, Mr. York returned to Indianapolis to make his home, and engage in business, and here he maintained his residence to the time of his death, Aug. 9, 1902. His remains were interred in Crown Hill cemetery August 11, the services being in charge of Joseph R. Gordon Post, G. A. R., of which the deceased was a comrade.

Mr. York was married Nov. 11, 1866, to Miss Belinda Garberick, who was born in York county, Pa., in 1845, daughter of Samuel and Sarah (Steffey) Garberick. The family came to Ohio in 1848, and two years later to Hamilton county, Ind., where they made a home for twenty-two years, at the end of that time returning to Ohio, where they spent the remainder of their lives. Mrs. York was one of eight children, who are living out of a family of twelve. She is herself the mother of seven children: Charles C.; Lulu Annetta; Edward Oscar; Nathaniel Webster; Elizabeth Jane; Sarah Florence; and Grace Irene. One member of this family died in infancy. Both Mr. York and his wife were numbered with the best people of the city.

ALEXANDER S. CAMPBELL, former county assessor of Boone county, comes of Scotch blood on both sides of the family, and has inherited many of the sterling virtues of that fine old race. His maternal grandfather, by name Scott, was a native of Scotland, while his father's father was of Scotch-Irish descent.

Josiah Campbell, grandfather of Alexander S., was a farmer and an early settler in Kentucky. His wife's name was Jane Tanner, and they were the parents of many children. Among them was James, the father of Alexander Campbell. He was born in Kentucky and there married Elizabeth Scott, who was born in Pennsylvania, but who had lived in Kentucky from the age of three years. After their marriage the young couple joined the pioneers who were settling in Indiana, and lived for some time in Putnam county. They returned to Kentucky for a brief stay, but soon went back to Indiana, and about 1835 took up land in Boone county, which became their permanent home. James Campbell died there several years after his wife passed away, she dying Jan. 8, 1864, in her sixty-fifth year. Both were Presbyterians. Nine children were born to them, four sons and five daughters, of whom only two are now living, Martha and Alexander S. The father of Mrs. Campbell came over to America with his father from Scotland, and both were soldiers in the Revolution. Mr. Scott was twice married, and Mrs. Campbell's mother was the second wife; her maiden name was Ramsey. Mr. Scott died in Pennsylvania in middle life, and left only a small family.

Alexander S. Campbell was born in Boone county, Nov. 3, 1840. His sister, Martha, who is older than he, was also born there and the two were brought up on the farm and attended the old fashioned subscription schools. Later Alexander was sent to the public schools, and fitted himself to teach, a profession which he had followed only two terms when the Rebellion broke out. After the war was over he taught two terms more, but then devoted himself to farming. In April, 1861, at the first call for volunteers, Mr. Campbell enlisted in Company I, 10th Ind. V. I., for three months service. At the expiration of that time he entered the army again, joining Co. F, 40th regiment, as a non-commissioned officer. He became second lieutenant before he was mustered out. After very nearly three years of service, he was obliged to resign on account of wounds received at the battle of Missionary Ridge. He was also engaged in the battles of Rich Mountain, Shiloh and Stone River, and was in a number of skirmishes. After he returned home he turned his attention to farming settling in Boone county, which has since been his home except for one year spent in Kansas. His present homestead is a farm of eighty acres situated in Marion township.

Not long before leaving the army, on Jan. 25, 1864, Mr. Campbell was married to Miss Margaret A. Caldwell, daughter of David and Nancy (Bradshaw) Caldwell. To them were born six children: Sheridan, the eldest, married Miss Leota Clark, and has three children—Dwight, Alva and Ruth. Bertha became the wife of Charles V. Neal, and the mother of Glenn and Annabel. Nannie B. married Joseph S. Clark, and has two daughters, Sylvia and Marie. Elizabeth lives at home. Ella I. lived only thirteen years. One child died in infancy. Mrs. Campbell belongs to the Presbyterian Church and her husband to the Baptist.

In his political convictions Mr. Campbell is a Populist. He has always taken considerable interest in politics, has been active in local work, and has many warm friends. In 1900 he was elected county assessor, an office which he resigned in 1904, and which he filled with the greatest efficiency.

CHRISTIAN F. WISHMIRE has been identified with the development and progress of Indiana's fair capital city from the days when it was but a village, and his interest in its welfare has been constant and vital during all the long intervening years. He is the pioneer of the sawmill industry in Indianapolis, and through his well-ordered life he has gained and retained uniform confidence and esteem.

Mr. Wishmire was born in the village of Frille, Province of Westphalia, Prussia, on the 21st of August, 1822, and there he received excellent educational advantages in his youth. He is a son of Carl F. and Christena (Bussy) Wishmire, both of whom were likewise natives of Westphalia and representatives of fine old patrician stock. Carl F. Wishmire was a son of Carl Wishmire, a man of erudition and sterling character, and one who devoted his life to the pedagogic profession, having been an honored and successful teacher and having been a Protestant in his religious faith.

Carl F. Wishmire was reared in the village of Frille, where he learned the carpenter's and cabinet-maker's trades, which he followed for many years. When eighteen years of age he was pressed into Napoleon's army, from which he deserted on three different occasions, his last attempt being effectual. He then resumed the work of his trade, and eventually married and continued his residence in Frille, where all of his children were born. In 1843 he emigrated with his family to America, landing in the city of Baltimore on the 8th of June, and within the same year going to Columbia, Pa., and thence by canal boat to Pittsburg, where they embarked on an Ohio river steamer for Cincinnati, Ohio. Arriving in the city mentioned, Mr. Wishmire hired teams, and thus effected the transportation of his family and effects to Indianapolis, where they arrived in the month of June, 1843. Shortly after his arrival the father purchased a tract of land on the Michigan road, and not far distant from the little capital town. No improvements had been made on the place with the exception of the erection of a small frame house, and the land was still covered with its heavy growth of native timber, so that the outlook was not one to tempt a man of sybaritic tendencies, but one which could not baffle the sturdy German emigrant who had the will to dare and to do. He at once began the work of clearing his land and making it eligible for cultivation, and as the years passed the results of his well-directed effort became evident, while he was not denied a due quota of prosperity. He there continued in agricultural pursuits until 1864, when he decided to retire from active labors, and in harmony with this idea bought property in the city, and in 1864, while hauling lumber with which to build a stable there he was accidentally killed. He was twice married, his first wife having died in Westphalia in 1824, while in the following year he consummated a second marriage, and his widow survived him and maintained her home in Indianapolis until her death, at the venerable age of eighty-four years. Both were devoted members of the Lutheran Church, and their lives were lived in harmony with its teachings. Of the first marriage three children were born, namely: Charles, who was a successful carpenter, died in Indianapolis at the age of seventy-three years; Christina became the wife of C. Reasoner; and Christian F. The second wife, in her maidenhood, was Miss Christina Nieman. By her marriage with Mr. Wishmire she had children as follows: Anton, who was a cooper by trade, was signally loyal to his adopted country, having served valiantly as a soldier in the Mexican war and also that of the Rebellion; Eleanora is the wife of William Peel, a starch manufacturer of Indianapolis; Louisa is the wife of Ernst Peel; Sophia is the wife of Fredrick Keager; Mary first married Carl Wylan and after his death became the wife of William Dader; and Henry is employed in railroad shops in Indianapolis.

Christian F. Wishmire was about three years of age at the time of his mother's death, but his step-mother gave him devoted care and attention during his childhood days, and ever retained his deep filial affection. After leaving school he learned the trades of carpenter and cabinet maker under the direction of his honored father, whom he accompanied on his emigration to America, being then in his twenty-first year. He aided his father in establishing the family in the new home and then came to Indianapolis to begin the battle of life on his own responsibility, his equipment being willing hands, a strong heart and an inflexible integrity of purpose. He worked at his trade for two years, being a natural mechanic, and being thus enabled to turn his attention to varied classes of work. Finally he went to Lafayette, Ind., where he found a chair manufacturer in need of a workman, and while he had never had experience in this special line he was given a trial, and so acceptable was his work that he was given a position in the making of the best class of chairs, proving himself as well qualified as the expert artisans of the factory. After one year Mr. Wishmire returned to Indianapolis, where he entered the employ of J. F. Ramsey, who here conducted a cabinet and chair-manufacturing business, receiving in compensation half of the profits resulting from his work. He was thus employed for two and one-half years, when he withdrew to engage in contracting and building on his own responsibility, continuing in this line until 1853, when, in order to secure a ready supply of material at less cost, he built a sawmill in Indianapolis, this being the first mill of the sort in the city. Eventually he abandoned contracting and building, and devoted his attention exclusively to the manufacturing of lumber and building materials, having a well equipped plant with adequate yards. His first mill was destroyed by fire in 1858, and he then purchased a larger tract of land, upon which he erected a better plant and there he conducted a profitable and extensive business. To facilitate manufacture he purchased a tract of eight hundred acres of timber land in Tipton county, and from this reserve drew his stock for manufacturing, while incidentally he thus gave evidence of his progressive methods and marked business sagacity. He continued to hold the land after it was cleared, and the same has been developed into valuable farms, occupied by his three daughters. Mr. Wishmire continued to carry on his mill and lumber yard for eighteen years, and in 1873 he leased the mill and closed out his stock of lumber, the mill being later destroyed by fire. He still owns the land, a portion of which he leases, while the balance has been improved with buildings, which he rents.

In 1863 Mr. Wishmire purchased four eighty-acre tracts of land near Bridgeport, on the old National pike, and after renting the same for one year he there instituted farming operations upon his own responsibility, hiring men to do the practical work involved. He also erected a sawmill on the farm, utilizing same in working up the native timber on the place, and in making requisite improvements. In 1873, upon disposing of his business in Indianapolis, Mr. Wishmire removed to his Bridgeport farm, and here he has ever since continued to make his home. He manufactured brick on the farm very extensively for some time, and in 1873 erected a magnificent brick residence with slate roof and other model equipments, the residence occupying a natural building site and commanding a fine view of the surrounding country, while the attractions of the home have been enhanced by effective landscape gardening and the retention of fine groves of native trees. On the farm are to be found fine orchards and various sorts of small fruits, and the demesne is one of the show places of the locality. A large brick barn, three tenement houses similarly constructed, and a fine array of other substantial buildings contribute to the attractions of this fine country seat, which now includes four hundred acres. Mr. Wishmire also continues to hold his real-estate in Indianapolis and also owns twenty acres at Mount Jackson, this place having a fine mineral well, the water having high remedial values, and here he has erected the substantial and commodious brick buildings of the Mount Jackson Sanitarium, a favorite health resort, and one in which are to be found all the modern improvements and accessories. The marked success which Mr. Wishmire has attained is the more gratifying to contemplate on the score that it represents entirely the result of his own efforts. He has been an indefatigable, able and conscientious business man; his education and inherent talent have enabled him to avoid mistakes, though he has, of course, had his quota of losses, but the lesson of his life and character stands out in bold letters and proclaims a sane and well-balanced personality, and an integrity and honor beyond question. He has a fine estate, and is one of the solid and honored men of Marion county, where he has lived and labored to goodly ends. He attributes his success in no small degree to the co-operation and devotion of his estimable wife, who has, indeed, proved a companion and helpmate to him, and their upright policy in all things has been dictated by counsel with each other at all times, so that theirs may be well said to have been an ideal union. Mr. Wishmire has had a high sense of his stewardship as his prosperity has increased, and has shown himself public-spirited and helpful along legitimate lines, while his benefactions have been many and invariably unostentatious. In 1850 he assisted in the construction of the Peru Railroad from Indianapolis to Fall Creek, and he has otherwise been prominently concerned in various enterprises and projects for the general good and the development of the resources of this section of the State. Such men honor humanity and the nation. In politics he has ever been a staunch supporter of the Democratic party, and in 1860 he was actively concerned in promoting the cause of Stephen A.

Douglas, the presidential nominee of his party. His party colleagues have frequently urged him to become a candidate for responsible offices, but he has believed that his duty lay along other lines, and has invariably refused to permit his name to be used in such connection. For many years he and his wife were prominent in the work of the M. E. church, in which he served as trustee and class leader, and in the early days church services were customarily held in their home. As they are now at some distance from any church they are not actively affiliated with any religious organization.

In 1847 Mr. Wishmire was united in marriage to Miss Wilhelmina Vailing, who was born in Prussia, Aug. 2, 1825, and who came to America with her brother Frederick in 1845. They took up their residence in Indianapolis, where they were later joined by their brother Charles, who was a carpenter. Frederick Vailing, who was a railroad man and also a grocer, lived to attain the patriarchal age of ninety-one years. For more than half a century our subject and his wife have journeyed side by side on the pathway of life, sharing its joys and sorrows, while they have reared their children to lives of honor and usefulness, and can look back with satisfaction on the years that have dropped into the abyss of time since their destinies became united. Of their children, Mary is the wife of Henry Neiman, a farmer of Tipton county; Martha is the wife of Louis Smith, likewise a farmer of that county, as is also Albert Shaver, the husband of Amelia, the third daughter; George died unmarried at the age of thirty-five years; and Charles remains on the homestead with his parents.

BENJAMIN JACKSON PEAKE, who passed away Dec. 17, 1903, one of the native sons of Indiana, who here passed practically his entire life and who attained a high degree of success through his energy, integrity and progressive methods, was recognized as a representative business man of the capital city of the State, where he conducted an important enterprise as a retail grocer. He also had the distinction of being a member of one of the pioneer families of the State, and he well upheld the standard of an honored name, while he gave evidence of his intrinsic loyalty and patriotism by going forth in defense of the nation when its integrity was menaced by armed rebellion. Such are the men who are peculiarly worthy of consideration in a compilation of this nature, and we are pleased to offer at this point a resume of the life of this popular and honored citizen of Indianapolis.

Mr. Peake was born on a farm in Rush county, Indiana, April 21, 1838, and under the sturdy and invigorating discipline implied he waxed strong in mental and physical vigor as the days and years passed by. His preliminary educational training was secured in the district schools in the vicinity of his home, and later he continued his studies in Princeton Academy, in Ohio, where he had as a teacher Professor Daniel Gary, who had likewise been an instructor to his father when the latter was a youth. Our subject was a young man at the time when he entered the academy, and he earned his tuition and board by work which he performed about the school, so that he has been dependent upon his own resources from an early age and has a true conception of the value and dignity of honest toil and endeavor.

Benjamin and Abigail (Murphy) Peake, the parents of our subject, were both born in Butler county, Ohio, where they were reared to maturity and where their marriage was solemnized. The former's father was one of the pioneers of Butler county, and one prominently identified with the development of that section of the Buckeye State, the family being of pure French extraction but having been for many generations identified with the annals of American history. The ancestors of Benjamin J. Peake in the maternal line were of Irish descent and the grandparents were likewise prominent pioneers of Butler county where both the Murphys and the Peakes were identified with agricultural pursuits from the period of original reclamation of the land. Grandfather Peake was thrice married, and two of the sons of the first marriage were active participants in the war of 1812, having been with Hull at the time of his surrender. Of the last marriage five children were born: Ruth became the wife of Jeremia Virgin; Cassie became the wife of Joel Peake, a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in Kentucky; Sarah is the wife of Thomas Van Swarngin; Ann died at the age of seventy-two years, unmarried; and Benjamin, the youngest, father of Benjamin J., was born in 1806, from which fact it becomes evident that the family settled in Ohio in a very early epoch and long before it had been admitted to Statehood.

After his marriage Benjamin Peake came to Rush county, Ind., where he rented land and was engaged in farming until 1848, when his father-in-law, Mr. Murphy, purchased a tract of eighty acres of heavily timbered land in Shelby county, this State, and there Mr. Peake took up his abode, reclaiming the land from the forest wilds and developing a good farm, of which he became the owner. Eventually he added to the area of his landed estate, the homestead farm comprising two hundred acres, while he improved the same with substantial and commodious buildings and gained prestige as one of the most influential and successful farmers in that section, where he was a pioneer and where he took an active part in local affairs of a public nature, ever holding the uniform confidence and esteem of all who knew him. In politics he was originally arrayed with the Democratic party, but his sympathies were entirely with the cause of the Union during the days leading up to the Rebellion, and thus when the Republican party was organized in 1856, he forthwith transferred his allegiance to the same and ever afterward remained a staunch advocate of its principles. He never aspired to office or in any way courted notoriety, being a plain, honest farmer, a man of excellent judgment and high principles and one whose life, though not one of exaltation, was a power for good. During the Rebellion he was a zealous supporter of the Union, and three of his sons were in active service as soldiers in the federal armies. Benjamin Peake was a man of fine physique, being above the average height, and he was genial and kindly in his intercourse with his fellow man, while his spotless character gained to him unlimited respect. He and his wife were liberal in their personal aid and contribution to church work and their home was one in which a hospitable welcome was ever assured. When the final summons came for them to pass from the scene of life's activities they were mourned by a wide circle of devoted friends, while their memories are enshrined in the hearts of all who came within the immediate sphere of their gracious and kindly influence. Mrs. Peake died on the old homestead, in February, 1894, at the age of seventy-nine years, and in death she was not long separated from her loved companion, since he entered into eternal rest in the following July, at the venerable age of eighty-five years. Both rest side by side in the Norristown cemetery, in Shelby county, where also repose the mortal remains of still older members of the family, including Grandmother Lucy Peake, who died at the age of ninety-five years; and her daughters Ann, who died at the age of seventy-two; Sarah, aged eighty-seven; and Ruth, aged ninety-four. Notable longevity has been shown in the family, and it may be noted that the maternal grandmother, Eunice (Seward) Murphy, was ninety-eight years of age at the time of her death.

The Murphy family was one of the most prominent in the early settlement and development of Rush county, Ind., where the name has been held in the highest honor during several generations. The maternal grandparents of our subject were James and Eunice (Seward) Murphy, the former of whom became a successful farmer and trader of Rush county, where he accumulated a large and valuable estate. In politics he was a Whig, and in religion both he and his wife held to the faith of the New Light church. They became the parents of seven children, namely: Jane, Mrs. Turner; Jessie; Peter; Abigail, mother of Benjamin J. Peake; Mary J., Mrs. Davis; Jackson; and Julia A., Mrs. Shanks.

Benjamin and Abigail (Murphy) Peake had children as follows: Lucy A., who resides in California, is the widow of David Vaughn, a soldier in the Civil war who was killed in the battle at Thompson's Station; Joseph died when a young man; Benjamin Jackson Peake is mentioned below; Frank, who served throughout the Civil war, is now a resident of Indianapolis; Charlotte, twin sister to Frank, is the wife of Thomas Conger, of Shelbyville, Ind.; Sarah is the wife of William Coleman, of Shelby county, a member of the Thirty-third Indiana Volunteer Infantry during the war of the Rebellion; James T. is a successful grocer of Indianapolis; Albert N. is engaged in business at Waldron, Indiana.

Benjamin J. Peake, whose name initiates this review, was a mere child when his parents removed to Shelby county, and there he was reared to maturity on the old farmstead, being nineteen years of age at the time he went to Ohio to enter upon his course of academic study, as has been previously noted. He there continued his educational work until the winter of 1861, when he returned to Indiana and secured employment as clerk in the general store of Bill Bone & Son, at Lewis Creek Station, Shelby county, and while thus engaged he was successful in his efforts to secure the establishing of a postoffice at that point and was made deputy postmaster, the office being in the store of the firm. He remained thus engaged until the summer of the following year, when his loyalty and patriotic ardor led him to respond to the call of higher duty, and in August, 1862, Mr. Peake enlisted as a private in Company D, Thirty-third Indiana Volunteer Infantry, commanded by Colonel Coburn, who subsequently became commander of the brigade, which was comprised of this regiment, the Eighty-fifth Indiana, the Nineteenth Michigan and the Twenty-second Wisconsin. Mr. Peake was mustered into the service at Indianapolis and his command was assigned to the Army of the Cumberland, with which it took part in many of the most notable engagements of the great civil conflict, having been on duty in Tennessee, Alabama and Georgia and having accompanied Sherman on his ever memorable march to the sea and thence through the Carolinas. The first battle in which Mr. Peake participated was that of Thompson's Station, Ga. The entire brigade was sent on a scouting expedition and on March 5, 1863, the entire number were captured by the Confederate forces, the number thus taken being thirteen hundred men, all of whom were incarcerated in Libby Prison, at Richmond. On the 1st of the following April Mr. Peake was paroled, and on the 10th of June was exchanged, and forthwith rejoined his command at the front and thereafter took part in the Atlanta campaign, in which connection he participated in the hotly contested engagements at Buzzard's Roost, Rocky Face Ridge, Snake Creek, Resaca, Cassville, Burnt Hickory, Pine Mountain, Golgotha, New Hope Church, Kenesaw Mountain, and Peach Tree creek. In the last mentioned battle of the twenty-eight men of Mr. Peake's company who entered battle only ten were eligible for duty at the expiration of the engagement, four having been killed and fourteen wounded. From Atlanta the command marched to Savannah and thence to Sisters' Ferry, on the Savannah river, whence it started on the campaign of the Carolinas, having a brisk engagement with the enemy in North Carolina, March 16, 1864, and another on the 19th, and at the time of Lee's surrender the regiment was stationed at Rolla, N. C. Soon afterward it started on the march to Richmond and thence proceeded to the city of Washington, where it participated in the grand review of the victorious armies. A few days after this memorable event the regiment was sent to Louisville, Ky., and there Mr. Peake received his honorable discharge, on June 25, 1865, having proved himself a leal and loyal son of the republic and a soldier ever at the post of duty.

After the close of the war Mr. Peake returned to Shelby county, Ind., where he was married in the following year, and he then purchased a farm, which he successfully conducted until 1873, when he disposed of the property and came to Indianapolis, where he engaged in the flour, feed and grain business, on Virginia avenue, and he conducted a successful enterprise in this line until 1881, when he disposed of his interests in the business and engaged in the commission trade, in company with a partner. At the end of one year he retired from this business and assumed charge of the grocery business of J. Madden, being thus employed until 1884, when he embarked in the grocery trade upon his own responsibility, opening a well equipped grocery and meat market at 1630 East Washington street, where he continued operations; his business career in the one location to the time of his death, Dec. 17, 1903, covered a period of twenty-one years, within which, by fair and honorable dealing and by progressive and well directed methods he built up a profitable enterprise and secured a representative patronage, the establishment being one of the most important of the sort in the city. To a large extent before his death Mr. Peake laid aside the more exacting duties of business and enjoyed the rewards of his years of toil and earnest application. He erected a beautiful residence in the city and was there able to enjoy the comforts and attractions of an ideal home. Though well preserved, Mr. Peake felt to a certain extent the effect of the privations and hardships of his army days, and as the shadows of his life began to lengthen he willingly shifted a portion of the active responsibilities upon younger shoulders and rested from his labors in a degree. In politics he ever gave stalwart support to the Republican party, but never sought the honors or emoluments of official preferment. He advanced to high distinction in the Masonic fraternity, having attained the thirty-second degree of the Scottish Rite, and he was also a member of the Mystic Shrine and the Order of the Eastern Star. The more grateful associations of the military days were perpetuated through his membership in George H. Thomas Post, G. A. R., and in the Veteran Legion, and he was held in the highest esteem in both business and social circles.

On Feb. 24, 1866, Mr. Peake was united in marriage to Mrs. Zelpha Ann (Walker) Trimble, who was born in West Chester, Butler Co., Ohio, in 1844, a representative of a prominent pioneer family of that section, and widow of Henry Trimble, who died seven weeks after their marriage. She was a daughter of Liberty and Sarah (Bone) Walker, who were numbered among the early settlers of Shelby county, Ind., where they located in 1852, and where the father devoted the remainder of his life to agricultural pursuits, being one of the honored and influential men of the community. Both he and his wife were consistent members of the Methodist Church. They became the parents of eight children, namely: Elizabeth, who married J. Hill, and after his death became the wife of John Good, died in Kansas; Thomas died in youth; Ollie died in childhood; Abigail is the wife of David Fateley, who was a soldier in the Civil war; Emma is the wife of F. Howell, who was likewise a Union soldier; Zelpha was the wife of Mr. Peake; Taylor is a farmer of Shelby county; and Florence is the wife of Thomas Harker, a commercial salesman.

Mr. and Mrs. Peake became the parents of seven children, of whom two, Benjamin Peake and Ople May Peake, died in childhood, each when three years old. The others, all still living are: Clara Belle married Oscar L. Crockett. Arie married E. E. Dildine. Sarah Evaline married John C. Miller. William Burton is now proprietor of his father's store, which is of many years standing and which now ranks as one of the largest grocery and meat markets in the city of Indianapolis; it is located at the same old stand, Nos. 1628 and 1630 East Washington street. Alonzo Walker Peake is a machinist.

Benjamin J. Peake passed away Dec. 17, 1903, and his funeral was in charge of the Scottish Rite Masons. The Rev. Lewis Brown, Rector of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, a member of that order, conducted the services at the old homestead, No. 222 N. State avenue. The music was by the Scottish Rite quartette, and he was buried in the beautiful family lot in Crown Hill cemetery. Mrs. Zelpha Ann Peake, his wife, died April 25, 1906. Services at the old homestead were conducted by Rev. Brown also, and the Order of Eastern Star held their beautiful services at the grave. They chartered a car to the cemetery and marched in the grounds at the head of the procession. At both funerals the floral designs from the different orders and friends and business men of the city were many and most beautiful. Mrs. Peake was a member of the Womans Relief Corps, George H. Thomas Post, U. V. L., Queen Esther Chapter, No. 3, O. E. S., and was chaplain of same at the time of her death. Besides, she was very prominent in different literary societies and in charitable work among the poor.

WILLIAM OLIVER DARNALL, an attorney-at-law and a loan agent in Lebanon, Boone county, was born in that county Jan. 23, 1851, the son of Harvey B. and Jane (Turner) Darnall.

The Darnall family was originally of Welsh stock, and the founder of the family came over with Lord Baltimore and settled in Maryland. The earlier generations were Catholics. The great-grandfather of William O. Darnall, was named John; he was a native of Maryland and one of the pioneers of Kentucky, where he died. His son, James, was born in the latter State, and seemed to inherit his father's venturesome spirit, for he moved on from Kentucky to Indiana in the very early days, and encountered all the hardships of frontier life. He was a large land owner and followed farming first in Decatur and then in Boone county. He did military service in the war of 1812. He died when about seventy years of age leaving a family of six children, born to him by his wife, Jane (Bridges) Darnall.

Harvey B. Darnall was born in Decatur county. By trade a carpenter, he followed his calling there for some years, and then went to Boone county in 1849, locating in the southern part. There he worked as a carpenter and also taught singing school until his marriage, when he abandoned the latter calling and settled down to steady work at his trade. In 1863 he moved to Lebanon and added contracting to his carpenter work. He died in Lebanon in September, 1902, aged seventy-seven years. He was for many years an elder in the Christian Church, and at one time served on the school board. Harvey B. Darnall was twice married; his first wife, whose maiden name was Jane Turner, died in 1874, aged forty-five, a devout believer in the teachings of the Christian Church. She was the mother of two sons: William O.; and James S., freight agent at Lebanon for the Big Four railroad. For his second wife Mr. Darnall married Miss Ursula Kernodle, who still survives him.

The maternal grandfather of William O. Darnall was William Turner, a native of North Carolina. He was one of the early settlers of Indiana and entered land in Boone county which is still owned by the family. Previously to his settling in Boone county he had spent a brief period in Hendricks county. He died in Boone county well advanced in years. He was an Old School Baptist. By his wife, Matilda Roark, he had a large family, but all but two of their children died during an epidemic of yellow fever. The Turner family is believed to be of English descent.

William Oliver Darnall grew up in Boone county and received his education in the public schools. Since 1863 he has made his home in the city of Lebanon. When only seventeen years old he began to learn the printer's trade, and followed that as long as his health permitted. He became a half owner in the Lebanon Patriot, and was editor of that sheet until his health failed, and he was obliged to give up that business. For some time he did out of door work, teaming, etc., and then for four years served as deputy sheriff under Sheriff Reynolds. During the succeeding term he was deputy recorder under Samuel S. Heath, and it was while he was there in the recorder's office that he prepared his set of abstract books and made preparation for his later occupation. When his term of deputy recorder was completed he went into the abstract and loan business, and up to 1902 devoted his attention to that. In 1885 he was admitted to the Bar, and has used his legal knowledge mainly as an assistance in his abstract business.

In 1870 Mr. Darnall was married to Miss Flora C. Scott, daughter of John M. and Mary (Bliss) Scott. One son was born to them, Harry H., now deputy postmaster in his home city. Mrs. Flora Darnall died in her native city in 1873, and on March 1, 1876, Mr. Darnall married Miss Sarah E. Kemp, daughter of Christopher C. and Elizabeth (Davenport) Kemp. Of the five children born to this union, one died in infancy. Herbert O. is a homeopathic physician of St.

Mary's, Idano; he married Miss Edna Jenkins, and they have one child, Dorothy Dale. James C. is associated with his father in the loan business and also runs an abstract business. The two other children are Nora E. and William L. The family residence is at No. 324 E. South street, where Mr. Darnall owns a fine home. Mr. and Mrs. Darnall and their children are all members of the Christian Church, and he has been an elder in the Central Church at Lebanon for several years. In politics Mr. Darnall is a Republican. He is much interested in the work of the fraternal orders and is a member of several, including Boone Lodge, No. 9, F. & A. M.; Lebanon Chapter, R. A. M.; Lebanon Commandery, Knights Templar; and is a thirty-second degree Scottish Rite Mason, belonging to the Indianapolis Valley Consistory.

LAURENCE LOGSDON, one of the honored pioneer residents of Indianapolis and Marion county, and one who has been prominently identified with the industrial and material development and progress of this favored section of our great commonwealth, was born in Madison county, Ky., March 15, 1833, son of William and Ann (Warland) Logsdon, both of whom were born in Kentucky, in the year 1799.

William Logsdon was a son of Joseph and Ellen (Hayden) Logsdon, the former of French and the latter of Scotch lineage. The original ancestors in the agnatic line came from France and became members of a French colony in Maryland, the land having been ceded to France by the English government. In the same vicinity was a Scotch settlement, and frequent intermarriages occurred, so that throughout the Union may now be found many descendants bearing the two strains of blood, and tracing their lineage back to the sturdy pioneers of these settlements of the colonial days. Joseph Logsdon was born in Maryland, and after attaining maturity he emigrated to the wilds of Kentucky, where he took up a tract of land, erected a primitive log cabin and began the work of reclaiming a farm. After remaining a year he returned to Maryland to claim his bride, with whom he soon afterward came to the pioneer home which he had established, both trips having been made on horseback. On the return trip he and his wife each had a saddle horse, while all their worldly goods were transported on one pack animal. Mr. Logsdon manufactured all his own furniture with the rude tools available, and he and his wife endured all the hardships and deprivations incidental to life on the frontier, earnestly working to reclaim their land and develop a good home, while the settlers were compelled to dispute dominion with the Indians and wild beasts, both of which were numerous. About 1795, while clearing his first patch of ground and living in his first cabin, he walked out through a dense forest on his farm and found where a large body of Indians had been camping. He knew nothing of the Indians, and they knew nothing of him or they would have killed him. Joseph Logsdon succeeded in developing a fine farm, being the owner of 200 acres, and he became one of the prominent and influential men of Madison county, where he died, honored by all who knew him, at the venerable age of eighty-seven years. He enlisted for the war of 1812, but the conflict closed before his command started for the front. He was a staunch admirer of Henry Clay, and thus supported the Whig party, and he was conscientiously opposed to human slavery and never held any negroes in bondage. He was a man of high principles and his life was worthy in all its relations. His wife survived him and died when more than four score years of age. Their six children were as follows: William, father of our subject; Laurence; James; Basil; Diana, Mrs. Boga; and one whose name cannot be recalled.

Joseph Logsdon was a first cousin of Brig.-Gen. Joe Logsdon, the great Indian fighter, who lived in Madison Co., Ky., and fought Indians until the land became settled, and then he went to Shawnee Town, Ill., where all trace of him was lost.

William Logsdon was reared to maturity in Madison Co., Ky. He married there, and remained a number of years afterward, nine children being added to the family circle. He then removed to Washington Co., Ky., where he purchased 212 acres of land, upon which slight improvements had been made, and there he developed a fine property, eventually increasing the area of his estate to 400 acres, and making the best of permanent improvements in the way of buildings. He prospered and became one of the most influential men of the locality, owning a large number of slaves and devoting his attention to general farming and stock-growing, while he was known as a broad-minded, progressive and able business man, and as one whose integrity was beyond reproach. He was a leader in the local ranks of the Whig party, but never sought personal advancement in an official way. He died in 1882, at the age of eighty-two years. Though a slave-owner he was most loyal to the Union during the Civil war, and he sent two of his slaves to enlist in the federal army. He was not personally molested by the Confederate forces, but met with heavy losses of live stock, produce, etc. His first wife, Ann (Warland) Logsdon, was a daughter of Jack Warland, who was born in Virginia, and who became a prominent pioneer farmer and slave-owner of Kentucky, and whose children were: Henry, a mechanic; William, a prominent turfman; James, a manufacturing hatter; Ann, mother of our subject; Rebecca, Mrs. Weatherton; Mrs. Durbin; Ellen, Mrs. Kinnary. William and Ann Logsdon became the parents of the following named children: James, of Louisville, Ky.; Joseph, deceased; Franklin B., a teacher, now deceased; Basil and William, who are deceased; Diana (Mrs. Smith), residing at Thompsonville, Ky.; Laurence, subject of this sketch; Mary E., who died unmarried, as did also the youngest child, Catherine. The devoted wife and mother died in August, 1838, and one year later William Logsdon married Miss Alice McIlvoy, who was born in Ireland and who was a child of three years at the time of her parents' emigration to America, the family settling in Kentucky, where she was reared. Of this union were born nine children, namely: Thomas, a farmer in Kentucky; Maggie, Mrs. G. Nunan; Amanda, deceased; Emma, Mrs. Clements; Miss Lulu; Alice, deceased; Eliza, Mrs. Cameron; Charles, of Kentucky; and Josephine, Mrs. Bevan. The mother of these children died in 1903, aged eighty-seven years.

Laurence Logsdon was about four years old at the time of his parents' removal from Madison to Washington county, Ky., and in the latter he was reared to manhood, receiving his early scholastic training in the local schools, while he remained at the parental home until twenty-two years of age, assisting in the work and management of the home farm. In 1854 he came to Indiana and took up his abode in Marion county, being here employed at farm work until 1857, when he was married and forthwith settled on a rented farm, to whose cultivation he devoted his attention until 1862, when he purchased two acres of land on the outskirts of the city of Indianapolis, and there established his home. He has made excellent improvements on this land, having erected a commodious and attractive residence, and here he has continuously resided during the long intervening period of forty years, within which the city has extended in every direction, and his home is now far inside the municipal limits. After locating here Mr. Logsdon began contracting on public work in the way of grading and graveling streets and roads, and also in connection with the construction of various railroad lines in this State, while his energy, executive ability and honorable methods conspired to render him successful in his various undertakings, and he continued to follow general contracting for a number of years. During the war of the Rebellion he was a member of the State militia and was in service in pursuit of Morgan for twelve days during the time that doughty general made his celebrated raid through Ohio and Indiana. He held himself in readiness to respond to the call for regular service in the Federal army, but the services of his regiment were not demanded.

In 1872 Mr. Logsdon purchased land, and there established himself in business as a brick manufacturer, continuing this enterprise about seven years, when he closed out the business and disposed of the land. In 1879-80 he gave efficient service as superintendent and manager of the county infirmary, and he then resumed contracting, in the line of constructing gravel roads, and macadamized roads and bridges, and he carried the business successfully forward until 1899, when he retired from active business, having accumulated a competence through his assiduous and well-directed efforts. His pleasant home, which is located on Churchman avenue, is an attractive brick residence, and is surrounded with well-kept grounds, on which are to be found a variety of fine fruit trees and ornamental trees and shrubbery. He is essentially a self-made man, and in all the relations of life he has so ordered his course as to retain the implicit confidence and esteem of his fellow men. His first use of his franchise was in support of John C. Fremont for the Presidency, in 1856, and he has ever since been a stalwart advocate of the principles of the Republican party, having been an active worker in the cause, but never having been an aspirant for office, the only one of which he has ever been incumbent being that of infirmary superintendent. He and his wife are members of the Baptist Church.

In 1857 Mr. Logsdon was united in marriage to Miss Catherine H. Denny, who was born in Marion Co., Ind., Sept. 20, 1838, being a daughter of Theodore B. and Elizabeth Denny, the former born and reared in Massachusetts. Elizabeth Denny was born in Washington Co., Ky., and came to Indiana when four or five years old. Her marriage to Mr. Denny occurred in Indiana about 1824. Mr. Denny bought his land of the government, and was numbered among the pioneer settlers of Marion county, where he improved a good farm. His death occurred in January, 1854, his wife surviving him many years, passing away in 1892, in Indianapolis, having been tenderly cared for by her children during her declining days. Both she and her husband were devoted members of the Baptist Church, in which the latter held various official positions, while both were most zealous workers in the church. Mrs. Denny retained the old homestead until her children had attained maturity and established themselves independently, after which she sold the property. Her children were as follows: Martha, Mrs. J. W. Thompson; Catherine, who became the wife of our subject; Joseph A., a resident of Iowa; William C.; Lucinda, the wife of J. H. Vandeman; Austin, a prominent attorney of Indianapolis; and Albert, who is here engaged in the real-estate business. Mr. and Mrs. Logsdon became the parents of five children, namely: Charles E., a civil engineer by profession; Elizabeth, wife of W. J. Prindle, of Chicago; Frank F., a farmer in Iowa; Edwin D., a member of the board of public works in Indianapolis; and Martha, a teacher in the public schools at Menomonie, Wis. Mrs. Logsdon was summoned into eternal rest Jan. 30, 1881, and on the 25th of Feb., 1886, our subject was united in marriage to Mrs. Louisa M. Hannah, who was born at Lyons, N. Y., a daughter of Lorenzo Lawrence, who was born in Germany, whence he emigrated to America when a young man, locating in the State of New York, where he remained until 1863, when he removed with his children to California his wife having passed away prior to this time and there he passed the remainder of his life. His children were as follows: Augusta, wife of J. Creighton; Netta, wife of Henry Nelson; Louisa, wife of our subject; William, a resident of California; Raymond, a traveling salesman; and Lorenzo, a physician, now deceased. Mrs. Logsdon's first marriage occurred in California, where she wedded George Hannah, son of the late Gen. Robert Hannah, of Indianapolis, and they became the parents of one child, Madison, who died at the age of six years. Mr. Hannah had been in poor health for some time and finally left California to return to his old home in Indianapolis, but he died while enroute, his remains being brought here for interment. Mr. and Mrs. Logsdon have no children. Mr. Logsdon is a member of the Masonic fraternity, as are also his sons.

MILTON LEE CLAWSON, an attorney-at-law, whose office is at No. 803-4 Traction building, Indianapolis, has attained to an enviable position in his chosen profession for so young a man, and gives much promise of a brilliant career at the Bar. Mr. Clawson was born at Greenville, Ohio, July 31, 1872, only child of Columbus S. and Louise (Fitzgerald) Clawson.

Isaac Clawson, the grandfather of Milton L., was born in Greenville, Ohio, where he died at the age of eighty-seven years. He was a veterinary surgeon. His ancestry was English and Pennsylvania-Dutch. His was a numerous family.

Columbus S. Clawson was born in Richmond, Ind. He followed contracting in Ohio, and in 1899 came to Indianapolis. He married Louise Fitzgerald, who was born in Lebanon, Ohio, and who died June 17, 1900. Mr. Clawson has remarried and now lives in Dayton.

George Fitzgerald, maternal grandfather of Milton L. Clawson, was born and bred a farmer in Ohio. His ancestry was English and he died in his native State well-advanced in years. His wife died when almost ninety years of age.

Milton L. Clawson was born and reared in Greenville, where he attended the public schools, and was graduated as valedictorian from the Union high school in 1892. For four years he was a student in the University of Michigan, from which he has received the degrees of LL. B. and LL. M. Here he was also valedictorian. In 1895 he was admitted to the Ohio Bar, and began his professional career in Greenville, Ohio, where he practiced for about a year. About the same length of time he had an office and a practice in Alexandria, Ind., and in 1897 he came to Indianapolis to open an office, and engage in the practice of his profession. Here he has been signally successful and has won many friends and patrons, and is now engaged in corporation work.

Mr. Clawson was married Nov. 21, 1900, to Miss Keturah Hunt. She belongs to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and he is a member of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Clawson is a prominent Republican, and has been one of the campaign speakers of that party for the last ten years. While still a young man he stands high in the councils of the Republican party, and has a creditable reputation throughout the Central West as a platform speaker. During the year 1900 he spent eight weeks in continuous campaigning, and was by far the youngest speaker the State committee employed, and he has done so each campaign since.

His pleasant and attractive home at No. 1210 Newman street affords evidence of taste and refinement.

WILLIAM H. JONES, one of the honored veterans who rendered to the nation the valiant service of a loyal son of the republic at the time of the war of the Rebellion, is now living practically retired in Indianapolis, where he has maintained his home for many years, and where he is known as a representative citizen.

Mr. Jones was born in New York City Dec. 11, 1841, son of Edward E. and Elizabeth (Campbell) Jones, the former of whom was born in Wales, and the latter in the city of New York.

Edward E. Jones was reared to the age of eleven years in his native land, and then came to America with an uncle who was a sea captain. He remained in New York City, where he served a thorough apprenticeship at the printer's trade, to which he devoted his attention for a number of years, finally becoming a publisher on his own responsibility. He became the editor and publisher of the Spirit of the Times, a factional paper, and one which received a strong support and patronage in the South. He continued this publication for a number of years, disposing of his interests in the same at the outbreak of the Civil war, his sympathies being with the cause of the Confederacy. He thus went to the South at the time of this crucial epoch, drifting into the city of Nashville prior to its occupation by the Federal troops, and there becoming correspondent for two New York papers—the Watchman and the New York Journal. In this connection he wrote articles for the Journal which were pronounced treasonable, resulting in his being taken prisoner and confined in Nashville, which was now under Northern rule, and he continued to be held a prisoner until reprieved by President Johnson, who was at that time military governor of Tennessee. After his release Mr. Jones formed a partnership, under the firm name of Bell, Jones & Co., and established a newspaper in Nashville. He became manager and chief editor, and so continued until the close of the war, when he sold his interests to Mr. Bell, in whose employ he continued as local editor of the paper for many years. In 1863, before Nashville had been taken by the Union forces, his family joined him, and there they all remained until after his death, in 1876, his sympathy having ever continued to be enlisted in the Southern cause. His editorial career in New York had been very successful, and he had accumulated a handsome fortune, the greater portion of which was sacrificed through his zeal in behalf of what became known as "the lost cause," though his marked business ability enabled him always to provide amply for his family, and he in a degree recouped his finances. As an editor he had marked ability and attained a high reputation, while his sincerity and integrity gained for him the esteem of all who knew him, even though differing with him in matters of grave import. His name is held in grateful memory by reason of his charity and invariable kindness, for he was ever ready to extend a helping hand to the sick and afflicted, the orphans and the needy, and held a warm place in the hearts of the poor of Nashville.

The mother of our subject was a daughter of John Campbell, who was a soldier in the war of 1812, in which he was killed in battle, and but little is known concerning the family history. There were only two children, John, who is a manufacturing tailor; and Elizabeth, mother of the subject of this sketch. Mrs. Jones came to Indianapolis after the death of her husband, and here she remained until she was summoned into eternal rest, in 1896, at the venerable age of eighty-five years. Both she and her husband were devoted members of the Catholic Church, and he was familiarly known in Nashville as "Father Jones."

William H. Jones, subject of this sketch, passed his youth in New York City, receiving his early educational discipline in the public schools, and at the age of thirteen years entering upon an apprenticeship at the printing trade. Later he was employed as clerk in a local dry-goods establishment, where he remained until 1862, when the great conflict which had indeed made a man's foes "they of his own household," caused him to tender his services in defense of the cause which he believed to be right, even though his father was strongly arrayed on the opposing side, and he enlisted in Brooklyn, for a term of three years, or until the close of the war, as a member of Company C, 84th New York Volunteer Infantry, which was assigned to the Army of the Cumberland, under General McClellan. Mr. Jones was an active participant in many important and hotly contested engagements, and saw a full measure of hard service, ever being at the post of duty and proving a true and loyal soldier. He received only slight wounds, and was never captured, but the exposure, hard service and improper food finally so seriously affected his health that he was compelled to enter the regimental hospital, later being sent to the national capital, and still later to hospitals in Philadelphia, where he remained until he received his honorable discharge, on account of physical disability, having served for nearly three years. After his discharge Mr. Jones returned to New York City, and when he had sufficiently recuperated he entered the employ of a photographic supply house, with which he remained about a year. His father then sent for him to join the family in Nashville, the war having now closed, and he went there and became united once more with the family. He here secured employment as clerk for a government contractor, who had been furnishing wood, and held this position about one year, when the government abandoned most of the business and discharged the greater number of clerks. Mr. Jones then conducted a grocery in Nashville about four months, after which he again entered government employ, being assigned to the work of cleaning up their wood business at this point. He took charge of the sales, and closed out the business with marked ability, after which he resumed his grocery business, in which he continued two years, at the expiration of which he disposed of the same and engaged in the cigar trade in Nashville, continuing this enterprise about eight years, while during the ensuing five years he was employed by a Chicago firm which published a literary newspaper. He then located in Memphis, Tenn., where he was employed until he left the place on account of the yellow fever epidemic. After the scourge had abated he returned to Nashville, where he remained until 1879, when he came to Indianapolis and engaged in the meat-market business on North East street, where he remained one year. He then took a stand at the Market House, and there he built up a large and successful business, continuing his operations for nearly twenty years, and accumulating a competence which now enables him to live retired from active business, and to enjoy the ease and comfort which constitute a just reward for his years of toil and endeavor. He erected, in 1892, his present attractive residence, at No. 15 Bevil avenue, and his home life is one of ideal character, while he has the respect and esteem of all who know him.

In politics Mr. Jones maintains an independent attitude, giving his support to men and measures rather than being guided along strict partisan lines. He has never sought or desired official preferment, though he has at all times been known as a progressive and public-spirited citizen. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias.

At Nashville, Tenn., in 1875, Mr. Jones was united in marriage to Miss Carrie C. Longhurst, who was born in that city, Oct. 6, 1858, daughter of John and Anna (McDonald) Longhurst, the former of whom was born in County Kent, England, and the latter in Canada, their marriage having been solemnized in New York City, whence they removed to Nashville prior to the Civil war. There they passed the remainder of their lives, both consistent members of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Longhurst had been previously married, and two children were born of this union—Charles, and Sarah (who became the wife of P. Harris). Seven children were born of the second marriage, namely: Laurence, now a resident of Georgia; Richard and John, both deceased; William, of Nashville; Carrie C., wife of our subject; Annie, wife of E. Leckey; and Russell, of Nashville. Mr. and Mrs. Jones have two children, namely: Lottie L., the wife of Fred Zick, who is engaged in the cigar business in Indianapolis; and Carrie, the wife of Walter Ruske, a traveling salesman.

SPAFFORD E. TYLER, who entered into rest June 2, 1902, in his ninetieth year, at his pleasant and attractive home at No. 810

North East street, Indianapolis, was one of the few remaining pioneers of this important city, and it is fitting that his last years should have such charming setting. He was born in Worcester county, Mass., Jan. 2, 1813, son of Phineas and Tabathy (Hartwell) Tyler.

Phineas Tyler was a son of Moses Tyler. It is said that two Tylers were banished from England for some political offense, and one of these settled in Virginia. From him that John Tyler, who was once President of the United States, is descended. The other Tyler settled in New England, and from him descends the Indianapolis family whose history forms the theme of this article. Dr. Hartwell, the maternal grandfather of S. E. Tyler, served in the war of the Revolution, and is remembered as a man of vigorous and potential personality.

Spafford E. Tyler was the youngest member of a family of twelve children. He had eight brothers and three sisters, and was the last survivor of his family, having attained a greater age than that reached by any of the others. After leaving school he became a book binder. He left Boston May 1, 1836, in a company of young men, who were bound for St. Louis by way of Cincinnati. In this journey he fulfilled one great ambition of his youthful days to look upon the Mississippi, and, satisfied, he started for home. At Cincinnati, planning to stop for a time, he called at a book bindery for work. The river had closed, and winter was upon him. At the office of the bindery he was told that William Stacey had written for a journeyman book binder. Mr. Tyler determined to respond to the demand, and started at once for Indianapolis, where Mr. Stacey had his establishment. The journey, which was made by stage over rough roads, through deep mud, was toilsome in the extreme, though it was completed in the surprisingly quick time of two days. He at once went to work, and this city was his home to the end of his days, for many years being actively engaged in the book binding business. His last years he lived retired.

Spafford E. Tyler married Martha Faquar for his first wife, but she did not live long after marriage. He married (second), Kate Kenzell, and they had a son and a daughter, Frank and Katie, both of whom are deceased. Their granddaughter, Ethel Tyler Hutchinson, was born Dec. 13, 1887.

Mr. Tyler was one of the oldest citizens of Indianapolis, where he lived for so many years, and he saw it emerge from an almost wilderness and attain its present metropolitan proportions.

THOMAS A. MCCLINTOCK was born in Marion county, Ind., Jan. 9, 1844, son of William H. and Sarah (Mattox) McClintock, both natives of Kentucky.

William H. McClintock was a son of Thomas and Rebecca (Holiday) McClintock, both of whom were of Scotch-Irish ancestry. In an early day there emigrated to America five brothers, three locating in Pennsylvania, and two in Kentucky. The Holidays served in the Indian wars. Thomas McClintock settled in the vicinity of Indianapolis in 1827, where he cleared land for a farm on which he resided many years. He was a plain and honest farmer, a good citizen and a consistent and worthy member of the Presbyterian Church. His children were as follows: William H.; Joseph, who died in California; Thomas, who died at the old homestead; Martha married (first), a Mr. Nesbitt, and (second), J. R. Patton; Rebecca, who died unmarried.

William H. McClintock was seventeen years old when his parents came to Indiana in 1827, and his were the usual experiences of life on the frontier. He assisted his father in the improvement of the family homestead, assisted the neighbors in building log cabins and rolling logs, remaining at home until a grown man, and then starting out for himself. Indianapolis was then a village of log cabins, and when the desire for better buildings became active, he worked as a hod carrier at eight dollars a month, being compelled to take a portion of that in trade. At that time he knew everybody in the city and the surrounding country. His father had settled some three and a half miles north of Indianapolis, and north of Fall Creek. When the waters of the creek ran high communication with Indianapolis was cut off, as there were no bridges at that time.

When William H. McClintock was thirty years of age he was married, after which he settled on the old homestead, one-half of which eventually passed into his possession, and there he reared his family. After his children had all grown to maturity he sold the farm, and moving to the city, he bought a small tract of land between Illinois street and Capitol avenue. There he made a good home, and there his wife died in 1895, after a wedded companionship of more than fifty years. In June of the same year he died in the home of his son, whither he had removed after the death of Mrs. McClintock. In early life he was a deacon of the Presbyterian Church. Later he and his wife united with the Methodist Church, in which he served as a steward. In 1856 he assisted in the organization of the Methodist Church at Mapleton, and contributed largely to the erection of the building. He was a Republican, but was content to let others seek the places of honor and profit, and the height of his ambition was to be a useful and successful farmer. His was a spirit of charity and kindness to all, and hatred and malice to none. A good neighbor and friend, he had no difficulties with his neighbors. In times of distress and sickness he was ever ready to help, and he was known far and wide as a man of fine feeling, sympathetic nature, generous disposition, and of the most unblemished reputation. His wife's people were residents of Kentucky, where she was born, and they came to Indiana at a very early day, making their home in Union county, where the father was a well known and much respected farmer. In Kentucky he owned slaves, but becoming disgusted with the institution, left the State to escape it. An old family servant, who was not willing to be turned adrift, came with him to Indiana, and remained with him throughout life. He had a large family, and the names of some of his children were as follows: Asberry; Mary, better known as Polly, married a Mr. Laflin; Lydia; Josiah; Sarah was the mother of T. A. McClintock, and was among the younger children; and Thomas. The others are not now known.

The children of William H. McClintock and his wife were as follows: Thomas A., whose name appears at the beginning of this article; Edmund A., of San Jose, Cal.; William D., a physician, who died in Kansas.

Thomas A. McClintock was born and reared in Marion county, where he has always lived. Remaining under the parental roof until he was of age, he took a course in a commercial college, that he might better prepare himself for life. For a time he was employed in a general store at Arcadia, Ind., but its promiscuous dealing did not agree with him, and he threw up his position to return home, and do job work for the neighboring farmers. Mr. McClintock enlisted in 1864, for one hundred days, as a member of Company C, 132d Indiana Volunteer Infantry, under Col. Sam Vance. The regiment was attached to the Army of the Tennessee, and served in that State and at Stevenson, Alabama, where it was engaged in guard duty on the railroad, and in care of Union deserters. After four months' service Mr. McClintock returned to Indianapolis, where he received an honorable discharge, and resumed his job contracting with the farmers. In 1867 he bought five acres of land on credit, which he managed to pay for by hard work. The following year he married, and for a time lived on the old homestead. In 1871 he established his home on the five-acre tract, where he had made extensive improvements. For a number of years he was engaged in farming rented land as well as his own. In 1892 he platted a portion of his land, and sold it out as lots. Since that time he has made a second addition to the city, his land lying between Illinois street and Senate avenue. His attention has been very largely given to selling lots and building houses, owning at this time several valuable rental properties. Elsewhere he owns four acres, which he devotes to truck farming. His career shows the value of preparation, and slow but sure progress. In politics he is a Republican, and a strong temperance man, never having been in a saloon, and never having used tobacco in any way. In 1866 he united with the Methodist Church.

Mr. McClintock was first married to Miss Mary C. Carter, who was born in Hendricks county, a daughter of Elwood and Maria (Hodson) Carter, natives of North Carolina, and early settlers in this State. They were members of the Friends' Society. Her father is now living retired at Plainfield, Ind., at a ripe old age. His children were as follows: Mary C., who was Mrs. McClintock; Cynthia A., who was Mrs. Millice; Nathan P., a physician of Indianapolis. To Mr. and Mrs. McClintock were born the following children: Maud, who is Mrs. Roach, of Indianapolis, Ind.; Frances E., who is Mrs. Bourne; Bessie, now Mrs. Schoub; and Edward, a lumber inspector. Mrs. McClintock died Feb. 1, 1895, in the faith of the Methodist Church.

Mr. McClintock was married Jan. 1, 1896, to Miss Dovey Baliff, who was born and reared in Indiana. Her parents were early settlers of the State, and her father, who was a farmer by occupation, served though the Civil War as a private. He died in 1894, leaving behind him precious memories of an honorable, upright and kind-hearted man. His widow yet survives on the old homestead. She was mother to the following children: Emma, who is Mrs. Long; Winthrop; Uzilla, who married a Mr. Baker; Zerilda, the wife of J. Quick; Dovey, Mrs. McClintock. The parents and family are all Methodists.

Mr. and Mrs. McClintock have had two children, Willard T., born Sept. 19, 1901; and Esther, March 20, 1904.

ASA TOUT. This esteemed representative of the early settlers of Indianapolis was a veteran of the Civil war, serving for three years and enduring, in addition to the usual privations of soldier life and the dangers of the battle field, the sufferings of long imprisonment. He was born in Fleming county, Kentucky, on the banks of the famous Licking river, May 6, 1826, son of Isaac W. and Elizabeth (Foster) Tout, both natives of Kentucky, grandson of Bazel Tout and great-grandson of Bazel Tout, Sr. The latter was born and reared in London, England. Bazel, Jr., the grandfather of our subject, emigrated to America and became one of the early settlers of Kentucky.

Isaac W. Tout, his son, was born in Kentucky in 1802. He acquired the trade of brick mason, and in the fall of 1831 migrated to Indiana, settling in Danville, Hendricks county. He brought his family and household goods the entire distance by wagon, passing through Indianapolis on his way to his new home. For several years he worked at his trade at Danville and assisted in building many of the first substantial structures of that city. He then purchased a farm on which he resided until his removal to Indianapolis in 1847. He first leased what is now the State farm and operated it for two years, working meanwhile at his trade and turning over to his boys a large share of the farm work. In 1849 the family moved to the city proper, and here Isaac W. Tout continued steadily at his trade until his death, which occurred in 1874. His wife was born in 1805, and passed away Aug. 2, 1889. Of the children born to Isaac W. and Elizabeth (Foster) Tout two now survive, Wilkinson M. and Jane (wife of Martin Comerford, of Peoria, Ill.). All the deceased children attained to mature years. They were Emily, Margaret, Sarah, Henry, William, Asa and Zenas F. Most of the children married and left families.

Asa Tout was four years of age when he was brought to Indiana by his parents in 1831.

He acquired from his father the trade of brick mason, which he followed nearly all his life. He enlisted Sept. 22, 1861, for three years or during the war in Company I, 26th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and participated in many important engagements. He was in the battle of Lone Jack, Missouri, and the battle of Prairie Grove, Dec. 8, 1862, and to reach that hard fought battlefield, his regiment marched 112 miles in two nights and one day. With about four hundred of his regiment he was taken prisoner near Morganza Bend, La., Sept. 29, 1863. They were taken to Camp Ford, Tex., and there imprisoned for about ten months, in one of the worst prisons in the South. The fare of Mr. Tout while there was a pint of coarse corn meal and a quarter of a pound of the poorest kind of beef per day. Each prisoner was allowed one tablespoonful of salt once in ten days. The meal Mr. Tout would mix with water and dry on a chip or piece of bark before the fire, and it often had to be eaten half raw. He was exchanged July 22, 1864, at the mouth of Red river, and was taken to New Orleans. His term of enlistment expired soon after, and he came home for discharge.

Mr. Tout resumed work at his trade, which he afterward followed. He married Nov. 29, 1866, Miss Harriet Winnan, daughter of Jasper and Mary (Jackson) Winnan. Mrs. Tout was born in Toronto, Canada, March 5, 1840. Her mother died in Canada, when she was quite young. The father removed to Michigan, and there the daughter went, in 1861, to keep house for him. The father died from the effects of an accident, and in 1863 Mrs. Tout came to Indianapolis. Two children were born to Asa and Mary Tout, Asa B., who died at the age of eight years and six months, and William A., who was born July 9, 1879, in the house at No. 1011 Fayette street, where he still lives with his mother, a comfort to her in her declining years. Mr. Tout was an honored member of Gordon Post, No. 281, G. A. R., and also Camp 80, Union Veterans League. He was a member of the Christian Church, while his wife holds allegiance to the Methodist Episcopal faith. He was highly respected, and his long residence in the city won for him many close friends, who were attracted by his sterling and lovable traits of character.

Mr. Tout died June 12, 1906, at the age of eighty years, from paralysis, superinduced by rheumatism contracted at Camp Ford, where he was without shelter. Three years of invalidism followed his army life, and the devoted and watchful care of his faithful wife did much to prolong his useful life.

DALPHON HUTCHINGS, who was born eight miles from Charleston, Clark county, Ind., Oct. 5, 1818, spent all his life in his native State.

Francis Hutchings, his father, was born in Maryland, but was reared in Virginia, where he married Elizabeth Turner, a member of an old Virginia family. Soon after their marriage they removed to Kentucky, where their first child, Bushrod, was born in 1812. A few years later they entered what was then the Territory of Indiana, where, in Clark county, Mr. Hutchings cleared a farm; later, however, they removed to Hendricks county, where they spent the rest of their lives on a farm, Mr. Hutchings passing away in his sixty-sixth year. His widow long survived, and died at the age of ninety-two. Mr. Hutchings was a man of high character, and though born and reared in a slave community, was a Whig, and a pronounced opponent of slavery as a great moral wrong. In religion both he and his wife were members of the Baptist Church in their later days, and still later were members of the Christian Church. Mr. and Mrs. Francis Hutchings were the parents of fourteen children, the last two survivors having been Dalphon; and Mrs. Lucinda Robeson, of Iowa, who died in 1903.

Dalphon Hutchings lived at the homestead until 1839. On Oct. 22, 1840, he married Elizabeth Anderson, who died April 2, 1856. Mr. Hutchings was again married Nov. 5, 1857, to Nancy Star, who died Feb. 24, 1861. He was married (third) to Mrs. Ellen (Greenled) Markin, who died several years ago. Mr. Hutchings's children were: Martha E.; John D.; Sarah E.; Mary E.; Maria; Emma (deceased), and Nellie (twins); and William Hampton (died in infancy).

Dalphon Hutchings spent the active years of his life in farming, and after 1856 he lived in Indianapolis. Well did he remember Indiana when it was very largely a howling wilderness, and he watched its slow growth and development into an inland empire, becoming one of the wealthiest, proudest and most prosperous of the sisterhood of States. Indiana was admitted into the Union but two years before he was born, so that the story of his life would run close with the development and progress of the State. Mr. Hutchings had his troubles, but was remarkably well-preserved for a man of his advanced years. In the early days he was a Whig and voted for Gen. Harrison in 1840, but after the formation of the party he was a Republican. Like his parents he was a Baptist in the early days, but for many years before his death he was a Methodist. He was held in the highest esteem by all who knew him, and passed his declining years in the home of his daughter, Mrs. Billingsley, of Indianapolis. His death occurred in February, 1904, when he was aged eighty-five years.

MILTON S. RANDOLPH, whose pleasant residence is at No. 833 Elm street, Indianapolis, was born in Preble county, Ohio, Aug. 8, 1844, a son of Isaac Moore and Sarah (Bennett) Randolph. The father was born in Ohio, and his father came from Pennsylvania to Ohio at an early day. Isaac Moore and his wife spent their entire lives in Ohio, where both died and were buried, with memories of good and useful lives to follow them.

Milton S. Randolph was the oldest of eight children born to his parents, and was reared to early manhood in the Ohio home, where he enlisted in May, 1864, in Company E, 156th Ohio Volunteer Infantry, which was assembled and organized at Camp Dennison, Ohio. For some two months the regiment was encamped at Cincinnati, and for three weeks the regiment was waiting at Paris, Ky., when it was sent to Cumberland, Md., being finally returned to Camp Dennison, Ohio, for mustering out. The health of Mr. Randolph was much broken by his military experiences, and he has never recovered from the effects of his soldier life.

Mr. Randolph was married April 5, 1870, to Mary Spurrier, born in Shelby county, in July, 1849, daughter of Joseph G. Spurrier. They have a family of four children: Harry M.; Pearl and Earl (twins); and Edith. Mr. Randolph is a member of the Joseph R. Gordon Post, G. A. R., where he has many warm and intimate friends. In politics he is a Republican, and he is universally known as a valuable citizen, and useful member of the community.

ROBERT D. BACON was born in Indianapolis in 1830, and has been a resident of this city all his life, his absences being of the most temporary character. Mr. Bacon belongs to one of the well-known pioneer families of Indianapolis, his parents, Elisha W. and Eliza Jane (Conn) Bacon, having located here at a very early day. A sketch of their career and that of other members of the Bacon family appears elsewhere.

As a boy Robert D. Bacon attended the early schools of Indianapolis, and his preceptor for some time was Dr. Patrick Henry Jameson, and also the Rev. Dr. Holliday. For some time he attended the public schools. Mr. Bacon learned the trade of a silversmith, and followed that work until 1858, though he had also become expert as a house painter. For many years he has been connected with the Merchants' Detective Police Association of the city, and has been president of that body.

Mrs. Bacon was formerly Miss Elizabeth Kirk, a daughter of Rev. Nathaniel Kirk, a preacher of the Methodist Church in the pioneer days. Mr. and Mrs. Bacon have five children: William T.; Kirk D.; Charles Wesley; Mrs. Etta B. Carlin; and Mrs. Emma L. George. Mr. Bacon is a well-known citizen, and his high character and varied accomplishments are alike known and recognized in Indianapolis.

EDGAR JEROME HICKS, well known in the land of mechanics and invention, having inherited much of the genius of his grandfather, R. E. Poindexter, was born on a farm in Madison county, Ind., not far from Columbus, Aug. 26, 1873.

When Mr. Hicks's ancestors came to America from England, in the early part of the eighteenth century, they first settled in Bucks county, Pa. His paternal grandfather, Samuel Hicks, moved from Lebanon county, Pa., to Madison county, Ind., where he was one of the early settlers, and where Jeremiah Hicks, father of Edgar Jerome, was born. Mr. Hicks's maternal ancestors, the Poindexters, are mentioned elsewhere.

Mr. Hicks received his education in the public schools of Indianapolis, Ind., after which he entered the factory of his grandfather, where he learned the machinist's trade. A natural aptitude for the handling of tools made this comparatively easy, and in a short time he was made foreman. For about ten years before his grandfather sold the factory to E. C. Atkins & Co., Mr. Hicks had had sole charge of it, and after the sale was consummated he became foreman for the new firm, a position he still holds. He has a number of inventions to his credit, several of which he has patented.

Mr. Hicks takes quite an interest in athletics, and was a member of the prize team of the Indianapolis Light Artillery, the champions of the world. His fraternal connections are extensive, he being a member of Monument Masonic Lodge; Marion Lodge, K. of P.; Red Cloud Tribe, I. O. R. M.; the Maccabees; and Forest Camp, Woodmen.

On Feb. 1, 1896, Mr. Hicks was united in marriage with Miss Laura Katherine Spurgeon, daughter of William and Missouri Marguerite (Murphy) Spurgeon. Four children have blessed this union, namely: Robert Lewis; Marguerite Katherine; Edgar Warren; and Jeremiah Donovan. Mr. Hicks casts his ballot in support of the men and measures of the Democratic party. Besides his inventions Mr. Hicks has become interested in real estate, and is the owner of some good property.

CHARLES E. BRUMMING. The practice of medicine is the life work to which this well known resident of Indianapolis has devoted himself. The profession had for him a fascination, while he was yet in his youth, and it was then that he began its study. Dr. Brumming is a native of Germany, but when four years of age he was brought to America by his father. He received his first education in the city of Buffalo, and it was while he was yet a resident of that city that he entered upon the study of medicine. He received instruction in the best medical schools of Germany, France and England. Returning to the United States, he for many years engaged in medical practice in accordance with the general systems in vogue. From long study and practical experience he has evolved his present business, preparing medicines from his own prescriptions. He has become widely known, not only throughout Indiana but in many other States, for the excellence of his medicines. "Brumming's Medical Compound" has attained a wide reputation, and is said to have accomplished many remarkable cures. Dr. Brumming came to Indianapolis in September, 1892, and now resides at No. 504 East Morris street. His work is confined exclusively to office practice and to the sale of medicines, which has attained to large proportions and is constantly on the increase. Dr. Brumming is an associate member of the "Century Association," an organization which has the indorsement of leading educators and literary authorities throughout the United States.

JOHN B. WILKINSON was born July 20, 1834, at Orange, N. J., son of Joseph W. and Mariah (Baldwin) Wilkinson, both of whom were natives of New Jersey, where they were married. The father was a son of John Wilkinson, also of New Jersey, a member of an honored pioneer family of Colonial days which located in that State before the Revolution. Various representatives have settled in different States and engaged in agricultural, mechanical, industrial and commercial life.

Joseph W. Wilkinson was born in New Jersey, where he lived and died and is buried. During a long life he pursued the trade of shoemaker, and he was a plain, honest mechanic, and never sought any public office. In religious belief he was a consistent and active member of the Presbyterian Church. His wife was a daughter of Stephen Baldwin, also of New Jersey, and the latter's father, John Baldwin, was also born in New Jersey. The wife of John Baldwin came from the family of Kitchell, and her father served all through the war of the Revolution. Stephen Baldwin was a prominent farmer and land owner, and died in his native State. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church. The children of Stephen Baldwin were: John; Ira; Stephen; Aaron, who was a detective of wide reputation; Lydia, Mrs. J. Young; Mariah, mother of John B. Wilkinson; Sally, Mrs. Anderson; and Julia, Mrs. J. Wilkinson. The following children were born to Joseph W. Wilkinson and his wife: John B.; Elizabeth, unmarried; Hannah, Mrs. Lyman Young; and Mary, unmarried.

The early life of John B. Wilkinson was spent in his native place, and he was educated in the public schools. When at the proper age he was apprenticed to the harness-making trade, and after he had served his time began working as a journeyman, moving from place to place, and finally settling in Indiana in 1859, finding employment first at Liberty, Union county, where he followed his trade for a few months. His next change was to Indianapolis, where he worked in the same line for John Heath. An opportunity offering itself at Brazil, Ind., he went there and formed the plan of working his way through to Oregon, this being the time when the gold excitement was very high. His next forward movement was to Worthington, Ind., where he gave up his plan of working to the coast. In 1860 he was a salesman for W. M. Oborn, at Worthington, and the following year, fired with patriotism, he enlisted for three years, or during the war, in Company H, 31st Ind. V. I., with Colonel Kruft in command. They were mustered in at Terre Haute, being attached to the Army of Tennessee, and while at Calhoun, Ky., he was detailed as hospital nurse. Performing heavy duties with untiring zeal, he was prostrated with typhoid fever and for ten weeks was almost at the point of death. As soon as he had sufficiently recovered he was sent to the Evansville (Ind.) hospital, and complications set in which resulted in heart trouble from which he has never recovered. The many painful results of his gallant services to his country are a constant reminder of the days when he gave all he had for the flag which still is so dear an emblem to him of all that is highest and best in our country. Mr. Wilkinson remained at the Evansville hospital until his honorable discharge, Feb. 5, 1863, on account of disability. One little incident of Mr. Wilkinson's hospital life will give an excellent insight into the noble character of the man. The report was started that the enemy was going to attack the town, and Mr. Wilkinson, although in a very critical condition, was with difficulty prevented from attempting to march in defense of the government stores.

After receiving his discharge Mr. Wilkinson returned to Worthington, Ind., and resumed work at his trade, although rheumatism, superinduced by various complications, made this difficult. He made a visit to his old home in New Jersey, and for a short time appeared to have benefited by the change, but grew worse and worse. After remaining at Worthington until 1873, he purchased a home at Vincennes, Ind., which he still owns, but as he had become so crippled with rheumatism and disabled with other complications, it was deemed best for him to discontinue house-keeping, and for a short time he lived at Washington, Ind., with a son. In 1899 he moved to Indianapolis, where he now resides, highly respected by all who know him.

In 1865 Mr. Wilkinson was married, at Washington, Ind., to Mrs. Mary A. Harman, widow of Daniel Harman, who died while in the service of his country. Mrs. Harman had one son by that marriage, George E. Harman, a mechanic of Washington, Daviess county.

Mrs. Harman was born in Greene county, Ind., Aug. 11, 1843, a member of an honorable pioneer family, being a daughter of Elijah and Matilda (McCoy) Lumsford, natives of North Carolina and Tennessee, respectively, who were married in Greene county, Ind. The latter's mother was reared in Tennessee, where she was married to Mr. McCoy, and after his death she removed to Indiana, and there married twice. Her family was as follows: Nettie, Mrs. J. Carroll; William, a farmer; and Matilda, Mrs. Lumsford. Elijah Lumsford was born and reared in North Carolina, where he first married, and in 1837 removed to Indiana, locating in Greene county, where his wife died, leaving him with a family of three children: John, James, and Alexander. Later he married Mrs. McCoy, by whom he had the following children: Mary A., wife of Mr. Wilkinson; William, a farmer; Asenath, Mrs. Stergeon; Alvin, a farmer; Marguerite, who died young; and Isaac, who died young. Elijah Lumsford was a pioneer farmer of Greene county, well and favorably known. In politics he was a prominent Republican, but while always taking a deep interest in local affairs did not aspire to office. His wife was a consistent member of the Methodist Church.

Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Wilkinson: William, who is a detective of note in service at Washington, Daviess Co., Ind.; John, a painter by trade, who makes his home with his parents in Indianapolis; and Mary E. and Mariah E. who died in infancy. Mr. Wilkinson is a Catholic, and his wife is a member of the Christian Church. Fraternally he is a member of Captain Gray Post, G. A. R., Indianapolis.

THEODORE WILES, of No. 623 East Pratt street, Indianapolis, is a son of Akan A. Wiles, who migrated to Indiana in 1821, and was one of the pioneers of the State. He made his home at Columbus.

Akan A. Wiles was born and reared in Ohio, learned the potter's trade, and in 1821 established a pottery in Columbus, which he operated for many years. His death occurred in 1845. He was married in Ohio to Maria Stansbury, a native of New Jersey, who long survived him, and a family of ten children was born to them, three dying before reaching maturity. Only three of the ten children are now living. Five of the sons served in the Union army during the war of the Rebellion: Samuel Wiles was a member of the 22d Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and died after the close of the war, as did his brother George, who fought in the same regiment. Theodore belonged to this command, at whose head was Col. William McKinley Wiles, the fourth of the brothers. Robert Wiles was the fifth member of the family to unite with the 22d. Of the soldier brothers only Robert and Theodore are living, Robert being a resident of Atlanta, Ga., where he has been for many years. The only surviving sister, Miss Maria, has her home with Theodore.

Theodore Wiles was born in Columbus, Ind., in 1832, and while still a boy assisted his father in the pottery. He had but little opportunity for schooling, though during the mid-winter season he would for a brief time walk four miles to attend the nearest subscription school. When he was thirteen years old he began to earn his own living, and while he was still a youth became proficient in the house painting trade, which has been his main business in life.

Mr. Wiles was married April 13, 1858, to Margaret Benson, of Jefferson county, Ind., and to this union came two children, both of whom died in infancy. Mrs. Wiles was called to the better life in 1868, and Mr. Wiles was married in 1870 to Mrs. Nancy (Johnson) Tout. She was born in Marion county in 1838, a daughter of Samuel Johnson, who was a pioneer of that county, and died when Mrs. Wiles was a small girl; his widow survived many years. Mrs. Wiles was the youngest of a family of six children, four of whom are now living: Mrs. Elizabeth Johnson, Mrs. Rachel Coverdale (widow of Thomas), Mrs. Mary Shearer, and Mrs. Wiles. All are residents of Center township, Marion county, excepting Mrs. Shearer, whose home is in Warren township. The only son of the family, John, died at the age of ten years. Elizabeth, the eldest, died in early childhood. Mrs. Wiles was first married in 1856 to Henry Tout, who died Aug. 23, 1868.

Mr. Wiles enlisted Sept. 19, 1861, in the 7th Indiana Battery, served in the Army of the Cumberland, and was discharged on account of disability Nov. 26, 1862. His health was badly broken by the exposure incident to his army career, and he has never fully recovered from the effects of the life. He is a member of Major Robert Anderson Post, No. 369, G. A. R. Mrs. Wiles belongs to the Central Avenue Methodist Church, and was reared in that faith.

JOHN W. MILNER, late of Indianapolis, was born in Ohio Dec. 26, 1837, son of Joseph and Mary (Stephenson) Milner.

John Milner, grandfather of John W., a tailor and farmer by occupation, passed his early life in England. As a preparation for life's activities he learned the tailor's trade. Hoping to better his prospects, at an early date he broke home ties and came to America, first settling in Philadelphia, where he experienced no difficulty in securing work, and for many years followed his trade there with much success. Impressed with the exceptional business openings for a man of energy farther west, he later moved to Ohio, and there purchased a fine farm, whereon he settled and engaged in agriculture for the rest of his active life. Though this was comparatively new work for him he soon familiarized himself with the best methods of farming, and being a man of excellent judgment applied his knowledge to his work with excellent results. He improved his farm, and became in time one of the solid farmers of the county. He married before coming to Ohio and most of his children were born during his residence in Philadelphia. There were eight in all. Joseph, William, John, Philip, Leroy, Jessie, Elizabeth and Rachel. The father was a good business man, and an intelligent, public-spirited citizen, widely known and highly respected for his marked integrity of character. The Methodist Church counted him among its most worthy and respected as well as substantial members.

Joseph Milner, father of John W., achieved marked success as a farmer in Ohio. Born in Philadelphia, he there passed his earlier days, and when still a boy came with his parents to Ohio, where, on his father's well conducted farm, he grew to manhood. Reared to agriculture, upon reaching manhood he naturally continued in that occupation, and settling upon a farm of his own began conducting a flourishing industry, following this pursuit throughout his business life. In time he won for himself a very solid prosperity. He always kept himself well informed upon the best methods of agriculture, and, being very successful in applying them to the practical work of his farm, he won for himself a leading place among the agriculturists of his county. A large framed, vigorous man, he was hard-working throughout his life, especially in his younger days. He died in Ohio in 1890.

During his young manhood, Mr. Milner married, at Hebron, Ohio, Mary Stephenson, who was born in Baltimore, Md., daughter of George Stephenson, who in the early days carried on a large team freighting business over the old national turnpike between Baltimore, Md., and Zanesville, Ohio. After the opening up of the railroads he moved to Licking county, Ohio, and found work at canal boating, a business in which he was engaged for several years. He passed his last days with his children. He married and had eight children: Ruth, Sarah, Mary (Mrs. Milner), Rebecca, Arabel, Isaac, Wesley, and Pierce. Mr. Stephenson was a man of marked prominence in his day, and occupied a most responsible position. He was widely known, and as a man of sterling worth was most highly respected. Mary (Stephenson) Milner survived her husband, dying in 1895. Of this union there were seven children: John W., who is mentioned below; Nathan, who served in the Civil war; Henry; Joseph T., who served in the Civil war; Phillip F.; Oliver, and William N.

Mr. Milner possessed all the hardier virtues, eminently fitting him for life in a sparsely settled region. He was strong, energetic, fearless in venturing upon new enterprises, and persevering in the pursuit of any object. Honest, large-hearted, and hospitable, he won friends for himself far and near. He was one of the pillars of the Methodist Episcopal Church, acting as class leader and filling many other important offices, and giving liberally to the support of the institution.

John W. Milner passed his early life in Ohio. Reared on his father's farm, he there had some early training in agriculture, forming habits of industry and thrift of much value to him in later years. At the age of eighteen years he apprenticed himself to a cabinetmaker, but seeing a better opening in the carpentry line, he later applied himself to that craft, which he mastered in a short time, and soon began following it as a regular business. The building up of his section of the country enabled him to find plenty of work in his line, and commanding good wages he continued the business until the opening of the Civil war, in which he enlisted at Pickerington, Ohio, Sept. 5, 1861, for three years or during the war. As a member of Company F, 1st Ohio Cavalry, with Colonel Millikin in command, he was soon consigned to the 14th Corps, Army of the Cumberland, and went to the front. After a few preliminary skirmishes in Kentucky he participated in many of the harder battles of the war, including the engagements at Shiloh (Pittsburg Landing), the first hot one, and Corinth. At Stone River, Jan. 11, 1863, he received a flesh wound in the leg, but bravely kept his horse, refusing to be taken to the hospital. The battles of Perryville, Chickamauga, Shelbyville (Tenn.), Brown's Ferry and many others are listed among his engagements, and in all of them he acquitted himself with marked credit, and was usually found in the thickest of the fighting. He served his full time without once receiving a furlough or being taken prisoner. During a hot skirmish at McMinnville, while in pursuit of Wheeler, he fell from his horse and received a severe injury, which caused him to be laid up in the hospital at Nashville for about two months. He received his honorable discharge at that place, Sept. 5, 1864. He never entirely recovered from his accident, and drew a small pension.

After the war Mr. Milner returned to Ohio, locating at Lancaster, where he resumed his carpenter business, and continued there for about twelve years. Then, in 1876, finding a better opening in his line in Indianapolis, he moved to that city, where he remained to the close of his life. An expert workman, skilled in directing affairs, he found no difficulty in securing plenty of work, and his services were employed upon many of the large buildings of the place. Finally, on account of impaired health as a result of his army service, Mr. Milner, in 1901, retired from active work. He was a good business manager, and in the steady pursuit of his trade won for himself a good livelihood.

In Lancaster, Ohio, in 1875, Mr. Milner married Mary A. Benner, who was born and reared in Ohio, daughter of John Benner, who served as a teamster in the Mexican war, in which he was killed. He married a Mrs. Stover, and they had one child, Mary A., who was born shortly after his death. By her first marriage Mrs. Benner had four children, of whom the three sons served in the Civil war, Henry, Edward (who was taken prisoner), and John (who died in Andersonville prison); Elizabeth was the only daughter by this union.

Mr. and Mrs. Milner had two sons: John E., who is engaged in the insurance and real estate business in Indianapolis; and William E., an engineer for the Big Four Railroad Company, who lives at home in Indianapolis.

Mr. Milner became well informed upon general topics, having by extensive reading and by contact with the world greatly supplemented his early common school education. In politics a staunch Republican, he always gave his support to that party. He was an honored member of Chapman Post, G. A. R., of Indianapolis.

DAVID H. FREEMAN is one of the native sons of Indiana who lent honor to the State by his valiant services as a soldier of the Union during the war of the Rebellion, and he is also a member of one of the pioneer families of this Commonwealth, which has been his home practically throughout his life. For two-score years he has been identified with railway interests, and he enjoys marked popularity in the capital city, where he has long maintained his home. Mr. Freeman is a native of the town of Greenwood, Johnson Co., Ind., born April 15, 1842.

That the Freeman family has been ever loyal and patriotic can not be doubted when we revert to the fact that it had representatives in the Revolution, the war of 1812 and the Civil war. The paternal grandfather of Mr. Freeman was a soldier in the Continental line during the war of the Revolution and was one of the pioneer settlers of Tennessee, where he died. In the second conflict with England, Thomas Freeman, father of David H., was a valiant soldier, as was also his brother Johnson, who made his home in Tennessee until he died.

Thomas Monahan, maternal grandfather of Mr. Freeman, was born in Ireland, and his wife was a native of Germany. They were numbered among the pioneers of Tennessee, where Mr. Monahan was extensively engaged in farming and where he also owned and operated a distillery. He died on the old homestead when well advanced in years. Of his children, Samuel, who became a very influential planter and slaveholder in the South, owned all the land surrounding the town of Warm Springs, Ala., where he died; Nancy was the mother of David H. Freeman.

Thomas Freeman, father of David H., was married in Hancock county, Tenn., to Nancy Monahan, like himself a native of that county. After that event he continued to devote his attention to farming in Tennessee for a number of years, and there eleven of his children were born. In 1840 he came to Indiana, locating in Johnson county, where he rented land and engaged in farming, while he was also identified with the construction of the canal from Broad Ripple to the South. He had made preparations to purchase a fine farm south of Indianapolis, but his death occurred before the deal was consummated, he passing away in 1847, at the age of forty-five years. In politics he was a Democrat, and his religious faith was that of the Presbyterian Church, of which his wife was also a member. Thomas Freeman was a man of impregnable integrity and honor and commanded uniform respect and confidence. Three children were born after the removal to Indiana, and the care of the large family devolved upon the widowed mother, who spared neither her strength nor personal comfort to provide for her children and to rear them to lives of usefulness and honor. She labored faithfully and zealously, making innumerable sacrifices, and no word of complaint or protest came to impair the noble beauty of her self-abnegating life. After her sons had attained sufficient age to undertake the work involved she rented a farm, and there the entire family found a home, the mother acting as financier and manager while her sons carried on the farm work. In time the younger sons found employment elsewhere in the vicinity, but always brought their earnings to their devoted mother, thus showing their trust and appreciation. In 1858, when an epidemic of typhoid fever broke out, David H. was the first of the family to be attacked with the disease, and within one week the loving mother and two of her sons were consigned to the grave, entailing the greatest possible bereavement and loss to the children who survived. The subject of this review, with the aid of his eldest surviving brother and sister, assumed charge of the farm, paid all debts and continued to follow agricultural pursuits until he responded to the call of higher duty and tendered his services in defense of the nation's honor and integrity, leaving the farm in charge of his brother John, who died of smallpox in 1864. Of the other children who lived to years of maturity we enter the following brief record: Mary, who became the housekeeper after the death of her mother, became the wife of George Taylor, and died in 1891, leaving three children; Eliza J., wife of John Wright, died in 1885, leaving five children; Jonathan and Rufus died in 1858 of typhoid fever, in the same week as did their mother; David H. was next in the order of birth; Margaret became the wife of John Tilton, their residence when Mr. Freeman last heard from them being near Houston, Texas.

David H. Freeman was reared on a farm and received his education in the public schools. In September, 1862, he enlisted at Indianapolis, becoming a private in Company E, 29th Ind. V. I., which was first commanded by Colonel Brown and later by Col. Benjamin Gregory. The regiment was assigned to the 14th Corps, Army of the Cumberland, and proceeded to Chattanooga, where it became a part of General Thomas's command, participating in the various campaigns conducted by him and taking part in many hotly contested battles and numerous skirmishes. Mr. Freeman recalls that on one occasion he went sixteen days without removing his shoes or clothing, while scant rations was the rule and the ordeal at all times severe, since death and victory hung in the opposite sides of the balance. He continued in active service until victory crowned the Union arms, ever being found at the post of duty, and having been incapacitated by illness for one day only. He was never wounded or captured and never received a furlough, being on active duty from the time of his enlistment until he was mustered out, at the close of the war. He started with Sherman on the march to the sea, but was sent back to Nashville to assist in the pursuit of Hood, and was at Chattanooga when Lee surrendered. From that point he went to Dalton, Ga., where he was mustered out, thence proceeding to Nashville, where he received his honorable discharge in June, 1865.

After his loyal and gallant service as a soldier Mr. Freeman returned to Indianapolis and then went to the home of his sister, Mrs. Taylor, in Perry township, Marion county, where he remained one year. In May, 1867, he entered the employ of the Pan Handle Railroad Company, in the capacity of section hand, and in the same year married and established his home in Indianapolis. After eight years' service as a section worker he became a helper in the blacksmith shops of the company, in Indianapolis, and also assisted in the repairing of cars, being thus engaged until 1876, when he became switchman with the same corporation, still serving as such. His long retention in the service of the Pan Handle stands as the best evidence of his faithfulness and ability. He has the confidence and esteem of all who know him and is one of the well known railroad men of the capital city. He has resided in Indianapolis since 1867, and now has a commodious and attractive home on Iowa street. Mr. Freeman is a Republican in politics and his religious faith is that of the M. E. Church; his wife is a member of the Baptist Church. He is fraternally identified with George H. Chapman Post, No. 209, G. A. R., and with the I. O. O. F.

On Aug. 11, 1867, Mr. Freeman married Miss Anna Sauley, who was born in Madison, Ind., in 1848, a daughter of Samuel and Cynthia (Smith) Sauley, the former a native of Switzerland and the latter of Indiana, where they were married. Mr. Sauley died in Madison, where he was a well known carpenter and contractor, and his wife later came to Indianapolis, where she passed the remainder of her life. He was a member of the Lutheran and she of the Baptist Church, as was also her father, Barney Smith, who came from Kentucky to Indiana in an early day, becoming a successful farmer and distiller of Jefferson county, where he died. His children were as follows: Cynthia, mother of Mrs. Freeman; Elizabeth; Viana; Millie; Sarah; Mary; Nancy; and Henry. Mr. and Mrs. Sauley became the parents of six children, namely: John, a resident of Madison; Daniel, deceased; Elizabeth, Mrs. Turpin; Anna, Mrs. Freeman; Sarah, Mrs. Jordan; and Louisa, Mrs. Lombard. Mr. and Mrs. Freeman had two children: Louis W., who died at the age of two years; and William A., a skilled machinist, who is foreman in the shops of Dean Brothers, in Indianapolis.

NORBERT LANDGRAF, one of the leading merchant tailors of Indianapolis, was born in Maysville, Mason Co., Ky., April 7, 1858, son of Jacob and Bertha (Nathanson) Landgraf. The parents were both born in Germany, the father in Munich, Bavaria, March 31, 1831, and the mother near Hessen-Darmstadt, in 1829. They were married in New York, and located in Kentucky about 1856. The father was a merchant tailor, as were also his father and grandfather, and thus four generations of the family have been in the same line of business. The mother now makes her home in California; the father died in Terre Haute, Ind., in 1882. Their family consisted of two sons and five daughters, two daughters dying in infancy; Josephine, the eldest, is now Mrs. Stebbins, of Riverside, Cal.; Hattie, who married Will G. Elliott, of Richmond, Ind., is now a widow, residing in Riverside, Cal.; Lillie married George Frost, and also lives in Riverside; Norbert is mentioned below; George W., a resident of Indianapolis, who long held the responsible and profitable position of head cutter for the Kahn Tailoring Company, died June 8, 1901, leaving a widow and two daughters, who live in Indianapolis.

Norbert Landgraf received his education in the Indianapolis city schools, and began his business career when a child, selling papers on the street. He entered the German and English pay school, where he continued his studies some years, and then took a course at Kennedy's Academy, Lafayette, attending the night school at the same time. In 1868 he was a messenger boy, and continued at that work until 1872, when he was engaged as an errand boy in a merchant tailoring establishment. After this he was a salesman of dry goods and notions until 1876, when he took up his present business on a basis of trust and confidence in his friends and associates to furnish him the required patronage that would make it a success. His ability as a tailor had already been demonstrated. In 1877, out of a class of sixteen competitors, he was chosen head cutter and manager of a large business, a position he held for ten years. His own shop was established in the Y. M. C. A. building on Illinois street, whence he moved to North Pennsylvania street, and thence to Washington street, finally bringing up at his present location in the Grand Opera House building, at Nos. 119-121-123 North Pennsylvania street. He is on the fourth floor. He has about fifteen helpers and assistants, and is rated as one of the leading men in the merchant tailoring business in the capital city.

Mr. Landgraf was married April 11, 1882, at Vincennes, Ind., to Miss Jessie Beard, a native of Springville, Ind., though reared in Vincennes, where she graduated from the local high school; she is an intelligent lady, highly cultivated and very attractive. To this union has come one son, Ferdinand, born May 24, 1883, a graduate of the city high school, and now a student at Purdue University, where he is devoting himself to mechanical engineering.

Mr. Landgraf belongs to the B. P. O. E., the Deutsche Haus, the Commercial Travelers Association and the Columbia Club. In political matters he is independent, though with strong Republican sympathies. He attends the services of the First Baptist Church. His parents were Methodists, though at one time his father studied theology in preparation for the Catholic priesthood.

JOHN F. BARNHILL, M. D., of Indianapolis, has been in practice in that city since 1888, and from 1895 to the present has confined his attention to the study and treatment of diseases of the ear, nose and throat. Dr. Barnhill is an enthusiast in his particular branch of medical science. In the pursuit of exhaustive studies along these special lines he has become more and more impressed with their importance, so that of late he has not only been active as a practitioner, but also as an advocate of a more thorough and general knowledge of ear diseases among the profession. The Doctor has been identified with Indianapolis throughout his professional career, and though not a native of that city is a member of the fourth generation of his family resident there. His great-grandfather, grandfather and father all bore the name of Robert Barnhill; the first two were among the pioneers of Indianapolis, coming here in 1820.

Judge John H. Barnhill, of New Philadelphia, Ohio, wrote the following regarding the Barnhills in America:

"The Barnhill ancestry is ancient and Irish; the first knowledge of it that has reached me by legend or otherwise is away back about the time of the union of crowns of England and Ireland. * * * There was then in Dublin a young man whose name I think was John, yet my recollection of this is not clear, although my source of information is reliable, because it was written by his wife, as she certified in the paper, which I once saw at Pittsburg, Pa., which she had written at the remarkable age of 107 years, at Baltimore, to her grandson, who was in the General Land Office at Washington, D. C. It was a wonderful paper to emanate from one of that age. The paper stated that he was a man of manly worth, remotely of Scotch ancestry, a carpenter, joiner and ingenious inventor; that she was a lady of high station, as they called it, she being highly educated, as this letter clearly showed, when I first read it, because it was a literary wonder in style and execution. They were rebel patriots and abused Castlereughs and were denounced as such by the Union party. Her husband went to London, bought type and printing office, then came back, built a printing press of Irish oak, and wrote and published rebel articles. The Union government charged sedition and treason and confiscated their property. They hid the printing press, and her husband became a fugitive, and in the hold of a ship reached Baltimore, Md. John Barnhill soon sent money for his wife, their four sons and the printing press, and they came to this country to join him. This is her story of their oppression and sufferings, which she wrote and published in Baltimore and sent the paper to Dublin for circulation. A copy of that paper, pasted on silk, like her letter written at the age of 107 years, she sent to her grandson, John Barnhill, at Washington, D. C. In 1832 he came West on a bachelor vacation, died of cholera in Pittsburg at the house of William Barnhill, boiler and chain welder, largest manufacturer then in Pittsburg. He had all these papers when I saw them—a very interesting and complete family history to 1863. They were afterward destroyed by his second wife, who burned them to spite his sons—her stepchildren. So perished this Barnhill record from 1691 to 1863, in these grand old writings of our grand-grandmother."

The Judge was an interested student of the family history, and the following account of the direct ancestry of Dr. John F. Barnhill was obtained from memoranda gathered by him:

(I) John Barnhill and his wife had children as follows: John, who married and moved to North Carolina, his children moving to Kentucky; a son who moved to Loudoun county, Va., and who has descendants in Ohio and Tennessee; Joseph, who was the father of the William Barnhill, boiler maker, of Pittsburg, referred to in the foregoing; a son who remained in Maryland, and who was the father of the John Barnhill (born 1772, died 1832) who received the letter mentioned previously as written by his grandmother at the age of 107 years; and Hugh, who removed from Baltimore to Washington county, Pennsylvania.

(II) John Barnhill (2), son of John, married and moved to North Carolina, his children, Samuel and Robert, moving to Kentucky. Of these, Samuel had three sons, of whom little is known, there being record only of one, born in 1788, who died in 1888, at Kansas City, Mo. He had two sons: John who formerly lived in Kansas City, moving thence to Texas in 1889 or 1890; and John F. Barnhill M.D.

Dr. J. W., of Pleasant Ridge, Kentucky.

(III) Robert Barnhill, son of John (2), married Sarah Morrison, and they lived in Georgetown, Ky., Butler county, Ohio, and Indianapolis, Ind. Their children were as follows: Samuel, who had three sons; William; John, father of Rev. J. C. Barnhill, mentioned elsewhere in this work; Jane; one whose name is not given; Robert, grandfather of Dr. John F. Barnhill; Catherine; Mary; Hugh. Robert Barnhill, the father of this family, died a few years after his arrival at Indianapolis, but he is remembered as a man of fine mind and strong character, and educated for his day—recognized as an intelligent and responsible citizen. He was a most conscientious Christian, and so devout in his observance of the Sabbath that he even closed the front door of his house on that day. His reputation for kind-heartedness and generosity was equally good.

(IV) Robert Barnhill (2), son of Robert, was a native of Kentucky, and came to Indianapolis with his father in 1820, in which year he purchased government lands here, and helped to erect the first cabin in the future capital of Indiana. He bought a tract of land now in the heart of the city. He married Jane Stoops, through which union their descendants trace relationship with President Roosevelt, and they had a family of eight children. He lived in and about Indianapolis, dying at the age of ninety-two years.

(V) Robert Barnhill (3), son of Robert (2), and father of Dr. John F. Barnhill, was born in Indianapolis. He was a farmer by occupation. His wife, Angeline (Shirts), was a native of Noblesville, Ind., and her parents were among the first settlers at that place. They had eight children, namely: Henry, George, Nannie, Melissa, John F., James, Sarah and Charles.

(VI) John F. Barnhill was born at Flora, Ill., Jan. 2, 1865. He was reared in Indiana, received his early education at the public schools, later attended the Central Normal College and finally graduated from the Union high school of Indiana, during the presidency of Prof. A. Rosenberger, a noted Quaker instructor. He then taught public school for six years before commencing special preparation for his chosen profession. He began the study of medicine with Dr. H. S. Herr, of Cleveland, Ohio, afterward continuing under Dr. Joseph Eastman, of Indianapolis, in whose hospital he remained three years, during that time assisting in many operations. In 1888 he graduated from the Central College of Physicians and Surgeons, won the faculty gold medal for the highest average scholarship, and the same year passed the competitive examination for internship at the Indianapolis City Hospital, securing a choice of the places. His first year as a physician was spent in the Indianapolis City Dispensary, after which he located in Irvington, the college section of Indianapolis, where he remained for eight years. During that period he acquired a large private and consultation practice, but in 1895 he decided to abandon the practice of general medicine in order to give proper attention to the branches in which he had become specially interested. The subsequent year was spent in study in New York City and London—six months at the New York Polyclinic, the New York Eye and Ear Infirmary and the Manhattan Eye and Ear Infirmary, and six months at the Central London Ear, Nose and Throat Hospital. Returning to Indianapolis he practiced these specialties for three years, in 1899 going abroad again for further research. He took a course in Operative Ear Diseases under Dr. Jansen, of Berlin, in the winter of 1899-1900. Thence he went to Vienna, where he took a special course under Prof. Adam Politzer, receiving certificates for special work; at various times he also studied in London, under Drs. Lennox, Browne and Dundas Grant. He attended the work of other eminent specialists, but his investigations were carried on principally with those mentioned. Since his return to Indianapolis in 1900 he has been busily occupied as a practitioner, consultant, medical teacher and writer on medical subjects.

For three years Dr. Barnhill was a lecturer in the Central College of Physicians and Surgeons, was then for several years Professor of Physiology, and from 1898 to 1905 held the chair of Diseases of the Ear. He was also secretary of the college. In 1906 the State College of Physicians and Surgeons was organized and affiliated with Indiana University, and in this he accepted and still fills the chair of Otology, Rhinology and Laryngology. He is a member and vice-president (1903) of the Indianapolis Medical Society; a member of the Indiana State Medical Society; a member of the American Medical Association, for two years—1901 to 1903—secretary of the Section on Laryngology and Otology, and in 1903 was elected chairman of the same, acting as such at the Atlantic City meeting, 1904; a Fellow of the American Society of Otolaryngology and Rhinology and Laryngology; a fellow of the Academy of Ophthalmology and Oto-Laryngology, and of the Mississippi Valley Medical Association. Dr. Barnhill is the author of a complete text-book on Diseases of the Ear, as well as of many papers pertaining to the diseases of the ear, nose and throat. He is consultant in diseases of the ear, nose and throat at the various hospitals of Indianapolis, and has appeared before many county societies to lecture and exhibit specimens and drawings in order to further his plan of disseminating special knowledge of those organs among the members of the profession. His reputation and standing rest upon his work, which is recognized by those who have had an opportunity of observing his devotion and the practical value of his methods.

In February, 1889, Dr. Barnhill married Miss Celeste Terrell, of Lynchburg, Ohio. They have no children. Mrs. Barnhill was born in Ohio in 1864, daughter of Benjamin West Terrell (a relative of the famous artist, Benjamin West) and his wife Asenath Johnson, and is a descendant of three old and distinguished families, the Wests, Stanleys and Terrells of North Carolina and Virginia. Dr. Barnhill and his wife are members of the M. E. Church. The Doctor is a Republican in political sentiment, but not a politician in any degree, and has never sought or held a public position.

EDWIN D. YORK, an early settler of Indiana, a veteran of the Civil war, and who in his business life was identified with the American Express Company for more than forty years, is a well-known and most highly valued resident of Indianapolis.

Mr. York was born July 2, 1835, at Brookfield, Vt., was reared on a farm, and educated in the common schools. His parents, Samuel W. and Esther (Hyde) York, were both natives of Vermont, where they were married, and the former was a son of Gersham and Lois (Williams) York, of Vermont and Connecticut, respectively. The York family is of English descent, its founders coming to America in Colonial days. Gersham York fought through the Revolutionary war and afterward settled in Vermont, where he became a prominent farmer and died at his home when aged ninety-one years. His children were: Esther, Mrs. Stone; Lois, Mrs. Clark;

Lydia, Mrs. Davis; Anna, Mrs. Whitney; Miss Minerva; and Samuel W. Mrs. Lois (Williams) York was a descendant of an old and honored family of New England. Both she and husband were consistent members of the Universalist Church.

Samuel W. York was reared to the honest and laborious life of a farmer, and after his marriage he settled on a farm and continued in the peaceful pursuit of that calling all his life. A good man, a staunch Whig, an example of industry and integrity, and a very liberal supporter of the Universalist Church. His useful life was brought to an end by accident, in 1873, an unruly young horse being the cause. He was seventy-three years of age, having been born in 1800. His memory still lives as that of one of the most estimable men of his neighborhood. His wife, who died in 1867, was a daughter of Asahel Hyde, one of the reliable and conservative men of Massachusetts, a representative of that class which has made the Bay State so notable in history. His children were: David, who died in Massachusetts; Dolly, Mrs. Gould; Calvin, who was a mechanic; Esther, the mother of Edwin D. York; Asahel, a carriagemaker; Lucinda, who married; Alpheus, a merchant; and Sarah, Mrs. King. Asahel Hyde died at the age of eighty-one years and nine months, and his wife at the age of eighty-nine years.

Children as follows were born to Samuel W. and Esther (Hyde) York: Hiram, who died young; Henry, for many years an agent for the Fairbanks Scales Company, who resides in Harrisburg, one of her wealthy retired citizens; Lydia, who died unmarried in 1894; Edwin D.; Joseph, who died while in the service during the Civil war; George, who died at Morehead City, N. C., also in the service of his country; and Misses Lois and Maria.

Until he had reached his twenty-second year Edwin D. York remained under the paternal roof and then coming West in 1856 to Indianapolis. Later he went to Lafayette, two years afterward returning to Indianapolis, and in 1860 entering the employ of the American Express Company, as a member of the office force. Later he was made messenger on the railroad route between Indianapolis and St. Louis and was so employed when the company encouraged its men to enlist for service in the Civil war. Mr. York was enrolled in 1862, in Indianapolis, in the 20th Battery of Light Artillery, and assigned to the Army of the Cumberland. He entered upon his enlistment for three years as a private, was soon advanced to the rank of lieutenant, and at the close of the war wore the straps of a first lieutenant, earned by gallantry and those qualities which distinguish a brave and efficient officer. At Nashville, Tenn., he was wounded in the elbow of his right arm, and being unfitted for duty was sent to the hospital and then sent on leave to his home in Vermont. When recovered enough to return to duty he joined the regiment at Chattanooga and belonged to the army which engaged in the successful campaign against General Hood. He was at Chattanooga at the time of General Lee's surrender. He was mustered out and discharged finally in June, 1865.

Soon after Mr. York resumed work with the Express Company, and in July of that year was married, at Lafayette, where he lived until 1875, when he moved to Indianapolis, bought a desirable lot, and erected the comfortable residence in which he still resides. For more than forty years his best energies were given to the interests of the Express Company, and several years ago he was retired with a pension. His exposure during army life brought on complications which resulted in a stroke of paralysis, and his health at present is rather feeble.

The marriage of Mr. York was to Miss Anna M. Kline, who was born in 1844, in Concord, Ind., daughter of Samuel and Anna (Wolf) Kline, both natives of Virginia. The father of Mrs. Kline, Mr. Wolf, inherited a number of slaves in Virginia, but as he was opposed to slavery he gave them their freedom, and some of them, in their attachment, followed the family to Indiana and lived about their kind old master until they died. Mr. Wolf located at Romney, where he died in old age; he was always a fine-spirited man, of the old-fashioned type of Southern gentleman. Samuel Kline was a carpenter by trade and followed the same in Romney, Tippecanoe county, where he located in 1840, dying there in 1846. He was a most estimable man, a strong Whig, and one who won respect through his integrity of character. His wife survived him many years, dying in April, 1895. They were most worthy members of the Presbyterian Church. Four of their children died young, the survivors being: Fernando, who is a resident of Winamac, Ind.; and Anna M., the wife of Mr. York. The two children born to Mr. and Mrs. York are: Thaddeus, a stenographer; and Harry W., formerly an express messenger, and now engaged as a city salesman.

REUBEN J. BUTLER, of No. 619 Stevens street, Indianapolis, was born in Belmont county, Ohio, March 27, 1831, son of I. Z. and Mary (Starbuck) Butler, the latter also a native of Belmont county, while the former was born in Jefferson county, in 1806.

Azoph Butler, the grandfather of Reuben J., was born in Vermont, and was a soldier in the war of 1812, his death, which occurred in Ohio, resulting from a wound received in that conflict.

I. Z. Butler was long a resident of Ohio, and there his children grew to maturity, and there, too, his wife passed to her rest. He later removed to Louisville, where he died many years ago. Reuben J. Butler was one of ten children, two of whom died in childhood, and the others lived to mature years. Two are living at this writing: J. B. B., a resident of Pensacola, Fla.; and Reuben J. One sister, Mrs. Huldah Metton, of Indianapolis, died May 4, 1906.

Reuben J. Butler was reared in his native town in Ohio, where he learned the cooper's trade. In 1852 he was married to Elizabeth Sutton, who died in 1861, leaving five children, four of whom are living: Abraham, Reader, Mary and George.

Mr. Butler enlisted Aug. 15, 1861, in Company A, 12th Ohio Volunteer Infantry, serving in that regiment for a period of three years, doing his first military duties in West Virginia. Later Mr. Butler took part in the second battle of Bull Run under the command of Gen. Pope, and was also in the hard-fought battles of South Mountain and Antietam, under Gen. McClellan. His command was returned to West Virginia, and there Mr. Butler did a soldier's duty until May, 1864, when he passed through what was perhaps his most arduous duty on the battle line, being detailed to take part in Gen. Hunter's Raid on Lynchburg. Mr. Butler had re-enlisted Dec. 31, 1863, in Company C, 23d Ohio Volunteers, and his last services noted above were rendered with the 23d. After this Mr. Butler served in the Shenandoah Valley, where he was captured near Winchester, July 24, 1864. Taken to Libby Prison, he was paroled Sept. 2, 1864. Mr. Butler was stationed at College Green Barracks, Annapolis, Md., until his exchange, Jan. 1, 1864. His final discharge was given him July 26, 1865, at Cumberland, Maryland.

Coming back from the war Mr. Butler settled in Indiana, and for a number of years has lived in Indianapolis. He engaged in farming and other occupations, and is now practically retired.

Mr. Butler was married Sept. 28, 1865, to Miss Ann Maria, born and reared in Hancock county, daughter of Abraham and Elizabeth (Shearer) Haines. Mrs. Haines is a sister of Daniel Shearer, of Indianapolis, whose sketch appears elsewhere. To Mr. and Mrs. Butler have come nine children, seven of whom are living: Charles, Olivia, Edwin, Oscar, Carrie, Sylvester, and Harry. The two who died passed away in childhood.

The health of Mr. Butler was badly broken by his long experience in the army, and from its effect he has never fully recovered. He is a member of the Joseph R. Gordon Post, G. A. R. His record during the war was in every way creditable, and his standing as a citizen is high. In politics he is a Republican.

John Butler, his brother, enlisted with him in Company A, 12th Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and was badly wounded at South Mountain, dying soon after from the effects.

JOHN RUPP is one of the citizens of foreign birth who have been prominently identified with the development and progress of the fair capital city of Indiana. He settled there in the early days and is accounted one of the honored pioneers of the city, where he has been engaged in mercantile pursuits and gained success as the result of well directed effort and honorable methods. He has become the owner of valuable real estate in Indianapolis, where he has made his home for nearly half a century. Mr. Rupp came to America as a youth of seventeen, without money or influence, and equipped for the stern battle of life only with the enthusiasm of youth, honesty of purpose and a determination to succeed. Thus he has been essentially the architect of his own fortune, and his career is the more interesting and gratifying to consider, for it offers both lesson and incentive to the youth of the present and future generations.

Mr. Rupp was born in Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, Jan. 13, 1837, and his early educational discipline was received in the schools of his native village. His father, Jacob Rupp, passed his entire life in Hesse-Darmstadt, as did also the mother, who died when John Rupp was but five years old. At the age of twelve he was also deprived of a father's care and guidance, so that he has been dependent upon his own resources from early boyhood. He was youngest of a family of three children, the others being Margaret and Charles. Margaret married a man named Harmony, with whom she came to America, her brother, John Rupp, furnishing them the money with which to make the journey, and here she died, leaving three children. Charles came to America with John and located on a farm in Marion county, Ind., becoming one of the successful agriculturists and honored citizens of the county, where he died. The parents were consistent and worthy members of the Catholic Church and commanded uniform esteem in the Fatherland.

As has already been stated, John Rupp was doubly orphaned when he was but twelve years of age, and from that time to the present has been self-dependent. Soon after the death of his father he entered upon an apprenticeship at the trade of shoemaking, a portion of the expense being paid by the government, as was customary in such cases. The boy was unfortunate in being placed in charge of a severe and tyrannical taskmaster, at whose hands he suffered much for a period of two and one-half years, when he felt that he could no longer endure the conditions, and he departed without the knowledge or consent of his master, making his way to Frankfort on the Main, where he was employed around a liquor establishment for about six months. Scrupulously hoarding his small earnings, with a small amount received from his father's estate, he applied his means toward securing passage for America, in which venture he was joined by his brother Charles, both feeling that in the New World they might find better opportunities for advancement. The voyage was a long and weary one, but on May 5, 1854, the two young emigrants duly landed at Castle Garden. We may dimly conjecture what must have been their first impression when landing as strangers in a strange land, far from friends and native land, and without resources save as they worked out their own salvation. At the time of his arrival Mr. Rupp was twenty-five dollars in debt, having borrowed this amount from a friend, who thus kindly aided him in making his way to America. The two brothers soon started westward, making their way to Middlebury, Ohio, where John found employment in a woolen mill, his first duties being in the carding department, while later he learned to spin, applying himself diligently and faithfully, though he received only six dollars a month and board in recompense for his services. He continued to be thus employed for a period of eleven months, and then the situation became even more discouraging, for he received only thirty dollars, losing the balance due him. He then changed to another mill, where he remained for some time, receiving eleven dollars a month, and finally he went to Westerville, Ohio, where he obtained similar work at fifteen dollars a month, remaining there for seven months and being careful not to allow his earnings to get away from him. Thereafter he made his way to various towns in the old Buckeye State, going much of the time on foot, and in 1856 he made his advent in Indianapolis, where he secured employment in the woolen mill of Coofin & Merritt. As he was not an expert workman the firm assigned to him various duties not included in the specific work of the mill. Thus they gave him the work at one time of hauling cordwood, in which connection he utilized a two-wheeled dray drawn by a single horse, with this equipment delivering one hundred cords to the asylum for the blind. In the meantime he boarded with Mr. Merritt, one of his employers. Later he went to Stilesville, where he was employed in a woolen mill for a brief period, after which he again engaged with Coofin & Merritt, being this time assigned to work in the mill. He remained in the employ of this firm for a period of eight years, and during the war of the Rebellion applied himself with exceeding diligence, the demand for woolen goods being very insistent. Thus he was able to earn from eighteen to twenty dollars a week, having become a skilled workman in this line of industry. His habits of economy and correct living remained unchanged as prosperity began to smile upon him, and, having taken to himself a wife in 1861, he put his money to good use by purchasing a lot and erecting thereon a small house. Later, as the Civil war was in progress, this portion of the city was utilized as a camping place for the soldiers, and as the recruits increased in numbers Mr. Rupp's modest home became surrounded by tents and shanties erected for the use of the troops. Eventually his property was fenced in the camp enclosure, so that at times he encountered no little difficulty in effecting an entrance to his home, the sentinels refusing to let him pass. The conditions were such that he finally rented his house and lot to the government, but when he called upon the quartermaster for his rent at the time it was due he found it impossible to secure the money, and after he had made numerous requests for the same the officers became indignant and threatened to put him in the guard-house if he re-appeared. He heeded this strenuous advice and after a time received his pay, this being a cause of much gratification to him, as he had about decided that he was out both house and rent. In 1863 he purchased another lot, upon which he erected a somewhat larger house, and in 1865 he effected the purchase of the land upon which stands his present attractive home. Here he has had his place of abode during all the intervening years. The lot is a corner location at No. 401 Kentucky avenue, and here he originally erected a frame house, where he engaged in the grocery business on a small scale, though he ran quite heavily in debt in starting the enterprise. However, the same self-reliance which led him to leave the Fatherland and start out on his own responsibility stood him well in hand, and his courage never faltered, while he worked early and late, never sparing himself and doing all in his power to win success. That his efforts were not in vain is evident from the independent position which is his to-day. He continued buying lots and building houses and made money rapidly, his real estate investments being conducted with marked sagacity, and it should be noted that he has averaged the purchase of a lot and the erection of a house for every year of his residence in Indianapolis—a fact which shows that he has contributed in no small degree to the development and material advancement of the city.

During the panic of 1872 Mr. Rupp met with some reverses, as did business men in all sections of the Union, but he managed to hold his property and eventually to advance still further his successful real estate investments and improvements. Mr. Rupp purchased one ten-acre tract of land at a consideration of $8,000, with the expectation of platting the same into city lots as an addition to Indianapolis, but owing to a depreciation of values he never platted the land, which he still owns and which he expects soon to place upon the market in harmony with his original plans. In 1873 Mr. Rupp removed from his present home premises the frame house which he had originally erected thereon, and in its place erected a substantial brick block, two stories in height, where he continued his grocery business, which showed a constant expansion in scope under his able management, so that the enterprise proved a profitable one. He continued in active charge of the same until 1900, when he turned the business over to his son, who is ably maintaining the prestige gained by his father and who is recognized as an able and enterprising business man. Mr. Rupp is the owner of a large number of houses in Indianapolis, from which he receives good rental returns, and since his retirement from the grocery business he has given his attention to the management of his various real estate and financial interests, being known as one of the solid men of the city and one who has won his success by worthy means, for his honesty and integrity have ever been such as to retain for him uniform confidence and esteem.

In politics Mr. Rupp originally gave his support to the Democratic party, but when he felt that the party was wandering aside from correct principles on the financial question, in the advocacy of free silver, he identified himself with the Republican party, his views being in harmony with its fiscal policy. He has never aspired to office, having found the exactions of practical duty and business all that he could attend to. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and fraternally he is identified with the order of Druids and the Pioneer Society, while he also holds membership in the Indianapolis Target Shooting Society.

Mr. Rupp believes that the success he has attained has been due in no minor degree to the sympathy, co-operation and encouragement of his devoted wife, who has proved a true helpmate. In 1861 he was united in marriage to Miss Louisa Bauker, who was born in Germany, whence she came to America with her parents when a child, the family having emigrated hither in 1853 and located in Ohio, where her father died while she was still a young girl. She was the only child. After the death of her father her mother became the wife of Frank Cook, and in 1856 they removed from Ohio to Indianapolis, where they passed the remainder of their lives. Mr. and Mrs. Cook had two children, John and Mary.

The union of John and Louisa Rupp has been blessed with four children, of whom we offer a brief record, as follows: Louisa is the wife of William Hedges, who was a grocer in Indianapolis; Mary is the wife of Herman Gaeth, of Indianapolis; Theodore, who is unmarried, is engaged in the grocery business, as the successor of his father; and Frank is in Quincy, Ill., engaged in the manufacture of incubators with his father-in-law.

ANTHONY WATTERS, a veteran of the Civil war, in which he served long and well, was born in France Feb. 17, 1843, a son of Anthony and Catherine (Lutwig) Watters. The father of Anthony Watters, Sr., was a native of Switzerland, where he entered the army of Napoleon the Great. When his military experiences were ended he made his home in the southern part of France, where he followed farming and general teaming, and where he reared his children, a family of two sons and four daughters. The father died in France. The children were as follows: Joseph, Anthony, Nancy (Mrs. Nibrout), Barbara (Mrs. J. Miller), Catherine (Mrs. Mesmer), and Lucy (who died in the old country).

Anthony Watters, Sr., was reared in France, where he became a weaver, after serving three years in the French army. He was married in his native land to Catherine Lutwig, also a native of France, and for some years carried on weaving in connection with farming. In February, 1846, he first set foot on the soil of the United States at New Orleans, making his way directly to Cincinnati, where he did farm labor for a time. After making a journey to St. Louis and from there to Dubuque, Iowa, he went back to Cincinnati, and in 1847 removed to Dearborn county, Ind., where he leased a farm with the privilege of purchase. There he died of cholera July 2, 1850. He had become well pleased with his prospects, and was glad he could leave his family in a land of freedom and opportunity. His widow kept the family together until her marriage with F. Diver, after which they were obliged to shift for themselves. Mr. and Mrs. Diver lived in Decatur county, where she died at the age of seventy-two years. She was a hard-working and energetic woman. To her first marriage were born the following children: Anthony, whose career forms the theme of this writing; Lena, the wife of G. Smith; Catherine, who married G. Luthur; and John, who served two years in the Union army as a member of the 123d Indiana Volunteer Infantry, was a railroad man, and was accidentally killed in the Pan Handle yards at Indianapolis in May, 1892. By her marriage to Mr. Diver she had the following children: Frank, James and George, all of whom are railroad men.

Anthony Watters, Jr., passed his third birthday on the ocean en route for America, where he followed the family fortunes until after his mother's second marriage. Then he struck out into the world for himself, at the age of thirteen years, and until he was sixteen was employed as a farm hand. In 1859 he went to Cincinnati, where he learned the barber's trade.

Mr. Watters, true to the martial blood of his race, enlisted in the Union army on Aug. 6, 1861, as a member of Company K, 26th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, under Col. William N. Whitley. From St. Louis the regiment was sent to reinforce Mulligan, at Lexington. Through an unfortunate mistake in the night they encountered another detachment of the Union forces, and each, thinking the other was the enemy, fired at close range. Many were killed and wounded before the mistake was discovered, Major Warner being among them. The command then proceeded as far as Arrow Rock, where they buried their dead and learned of Mulligan's surrender. They fell back, and at Sedalia joined the command of General Fremont, with which they proceeded to Springfield, having some sharp skirmishing by the way with the Rebels under General Price. Soon after General Fremont gave way to General Hunter, and the discouraged army fell back to Sedalia, where winter quarters were established. From this point a detail was sent into Bates county, where they captured a Rebel general and 1,500 men. The 26th Indiana had winter quarters at Otterville, and in the spring of 1862 returned to Sedalia, from which point a forward movement of the army was made in June to Rolla and Springfield, where the 26th was sent in pursuit of Generals Marmaduke and Homes. At Newtontia they had a sharp conflict with the Confederates, who retired as they advanced, and again fought them at Huntsville. There the 26th captured and shot nine guerrillas. At Prairie Grove they encountered Rebel forces again, and there Mr. Watters received a wound in the left temple which uncoupled his jaw, throwing him into the army hospital at Fayetteville, where he remained for three months before he could report for duty. His eye was seriously affected, and his health badly impaired. Indeed, he has never been a well man since. His command was at Van Buren, Ark., when he rejoined it. In the spring of 1863 he went to St. Genevieve, and from there to Vicksburg, where his regiment became a part of General Grant's beleaguering army. After the fall of that Rebel stronghold the 26th went to Port Hudson, and from there to New Orleans. Coming North, most of this regiment was captured at Morganza Bend, La., but Mr. Watters and a few others escaped, and reporting at New Orleans were sent to Brownsville, Texas. They captured Point Isabel, and remained at Brownsville until March, 1864. There the entire command reenlisted. The men were furloughed in May, 1864, and after pleasant home visiting gathered at Cairo, and were sent by river to New Orleans. At Thibodaux, La., the regiment was divided, and Mr. Watters accompanied that portion sent to Donelson, where he spent the winter. During this time he came very near losing his eyesight, spending the time from November to March in the hospital. Mr. Watters was in the assault on Mobile, and the capture of Spanish Fort and Fort Blakeslee. He was with a detachment marching to Montgomery, Ala., when news of the surrender of Lee was received. For some months he was engaged in peacefully guarding government stores at Columbus, Miss., which were disposed of by public auction. In January, 1866, he was mustered out at Vicksburg, and received an honorable discharge at Indianapolis Jan. 25, 1866. In consideration of his broken health he now receives a small pension from the government.

Mr. Watters returned home and joined his wife, whom he had married while home on a furlough. He made his living at the barber's trade and such other work as he could find to do. After several removals and a brief location in Missouri, they located on a small farm in Ripley county, Ind., where they farmed ten years, at the end of that time leaving the farm and removing to New Albany, where Mr. Watters followed his trade for some time. At North Vernon he had his home and barber shop for a time, and in July, 1900, came to Indianapolis, where he is still engaged at his trade.

Mr. Watters married Alice Ehler, who was born at Cincinnati Feb. 19, 1846, daughter of John and Lavina (Bellows) Ehler. Her father was born in Rising Sun, Ind., her mother in Pennsylvania, and they were married in Cincinnati, where Mr. Ehler was engaged as a boat builder. During the Civil war he was employed by the government in building gunboats and transports. Leaving his family in Dearborn county, Ind., he went to Cairo, where he worked for the government. His wife outlived him and died in Beaver county, Pa., Dec. 19, 1869. Their children were: James, now of Pennsylvania, who served four years as a member of the 5th Indiana Volunteer Infantry; Alice, Mrs. Watters; Joseph; and William, who is deceased.

Mr. and Mrs. Waters have had fifteen children, fourteen of whom are now living: Lavina, who died at the age of six years; Catherine, the wife of George Wutmire; John, of North Vernon; William, of Danville, Ill.; Anna, now Mrs. C. Murphy; Rosa and Clara, both unmarried; Frank, of Chicago; Minnie, unmarried; Addie, Mrs. C. Maley; Louis G., who has served as a soldier in the Philippines; Lizzie, unmarried; Edward, a barber in Indianapolis; Emma, at home; and Maggie, at school. The family belong to the Catholic Church. Mr. Watters belongs to McKeehan Post, No. 36, G. A. R., and is very popular with his comrades of the old war times.

BENNAJAH U. WEESNER, a prominent and successful contractor, builder and practical architect of Indianapolis, was born in Morgan county, Ind., near Monrovia, Oct. 20, 1841, son of Micajah and Jenima E. (Tomlinson) Weesner.

William Weesner, the grandfather of Bennajah U., was a native of North Carolina, and came of German descent. He was a cripple, but he conducted a saddlery business and a farm, and for several years operated a tannery.

An able financier, and a thorough business man, he left a good property for his children. He was one of the very early settlers in Morgan county, Ind., where he died at the age of ninety-one years. There were twelve children in his family.

Micajah Weesner was born in 1817 in Chatham county, N. C., and was reared a farmer boy, but after reaching early manhood he worked in a tannery for some years. His later years have been spent on a farm. His home was in North Carolina until he became of age, when he came to Morgan county, Ind., and there he has passed most of his life.

Until 1899 he was engaged in farming and since that time has lived retired, having now reached a ripe old age. Mr. Weesner married Jenima E. Tomlinson a native of Bartholomew county, Ind., who died in 1895. Both Mr. and Mrs. Weesner were born and reared in the faith of the Society of Friends. Three of the four children born to them are now living: Bennajah U.; Anna M., who first married Clark D. Thomas, to whom she bore five children, and later became the wife of Linley T. Craven, by whom she had two children; and Almeda, the wife of Frank Tompkin, of Valley Mills, Indiana.

The maternal grandfather of Mr. Weesner was James C. Tomlinson, a native of North Carolina, of English descent. Born and reared a Friend, his life was peaceable and honorable. He came to Indiana at an early day, and hewed out a farm for himself from the green woods of Hendricks county, where he died at the age of ninety-two years. In his family were twelve children. Though he held no office, he was a man of ability and note in the community, writing many deeds and legal documents.

Bennajah U. Weesner received his early schooling in the old-fashioned subscription schools. When he was fourteen years old he took up the carpenter's trade, and two years later was contracting and building on his own account, earning money enough to put him through the high school. Ever since that time he has been a contractor, though he has also been engaged in farming. He lived in Morgan county until he was twenty-six years of age, when he removed to Iowa. Locating in Dallas county, he followed his trade and ran a farm. After a residence of eleven years in Iowa he lived twelve years in Kansas and thence returned to Indiana, in 1890, coming to Indianapolis to care for his parents. Here he has since continued to live. He owns a good home in the city. He now resides at No. 5728 Rawles avenue, Irvington Place.

Mr. Weesner was married Oct. 5, 1865, to Alice Pierce, a daughter of Levi and Eliza (Gregar) Pierce, and by this union he became the father of five children: (1) Walter died in infancy. (2) Lizzie married Frank D. Hoffman, lives at Ragan, Neb., and has two children, Charlie and Mildred. (3) Charlie lives in Whitman county, Wash., where he is a wheat grower on an extensive scale; though a natural mechanic, he is making farming his life business. He married Cora Phillips, and has one son and two daughters, Orville, Verdi and Fern Alice. (4) Otie died when young. (5) Willie died in infancy. Mrs. Alice Weesner died in 1883. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church (her church membership being in Beloit, Kans.) and a woman of fine character.

Mr. Weesner married for his second wife, Oct. 17, 1886, Kate F. Hammond, and to this union has come one child, W. Jay. Mr. and Mrs. Weesner are members of Grace Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, of which he is one of the trustees. He is a member of the Masons, and the Odd Fellows, in the latter organization belonging to both lodge and encampment. In politics he is a Republican.

During his residence in Iowa Mr. Weesner filled the offices of town trustee, road commissioner, clerk of the school board, and town clerk. In Kansas he held various places of trust and responsibility, and wherever he has been his honesty, ability and candor have commanded respect and confidence.

REV. RICE V. HUNTER, D. D., for several years pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis, was born in Cumberland, Guernsey Co., Ohio, June 22, 1851, son of John S. and Mary L. (Barton) Hunter.

James Hunter, the grandfather of Rev. Dr. Hunter, was a native of Ohio, and was of Scotch-Irish descent. He was known as Colonel Hunter, and served as a soldier in the Mexican war. Mr. Hunter was engaged as a farmer at Cumberland, Ohio, where he died at the age of sixty-six years. In his family were eight children. His father was a native of Ireland, and coming to this country first settled in Pennsylvania, later moving to Ohio and making his home at Cumberland, on what was known for more than a hundred years as Hunter's Ridge.

John S. Hunter was born in Ohio and was a miller and grain dealer at Cumberland for some years, when he sold out and moved to Bellefontaine, Ohio. There he spent the remainder of his life, engaged in farming, and died in 1888, at the age of sixty-two years. His widow survived until 1894, dying at the age of sixty-six years. She was a native of western Pennsylvania. Both Mr. and Mrs. Hunter were Presbyterians, and he was an elder of the church for a quarter of a century. They were parents of three sons and five daughters: Rev. Rice V.; Constance L., wife of Rev. John Edwards, of San Jose, Cal.; Ella, wife of James E. Milroy, a farmer of Huntsville, Ohio; Jeannette R., wife of Lee Wilson, a druggist, of Fillmore, Ill.; Anna Theresa, of Tucson, Ariz., where she is a teacher in charge of a seminary; George Chester, a farmer, of Alliance, Ohio; Arthur, a farmer, of Belle Center, Ohio; and Martha, who is teaching with her sister.

Robert Barton, the maternal grandfather of Rev. Dr. Hunter, settled in Ohio when a young man. Coming from Scotch-Irish ancestry, he possessed the characteristic habits of his race, and became prosperous, making a success of milling at Cumberland, where he lived to be eighty-two years of age. In his family there were eight children.

Rice V. Hunter lived at Cumberland until he was twelve years of age, and was then taken by his parents to a farm near Bellefontaine, Ohio, where he was reared to manhood. His education was begun in the district school, continued in the school called Geneva College, and completed in the Wooster (Ohio) University, from which he was graduated in 1877. For some two years he had charge of the Waveland Collegiate Institute in Montgomery county, Ind., and then, to prepare for the ministry, entered the Western Theological Seminary, from which he was graduated in 1882. His first pastoral charge, upon which he entered very shortly after graduating, was over the churches at Philo and Homer, Ill., and after being there a year and a half he was called to the Seventh Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis. This pulpit he occupied for eight years, and for four years was pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church at Terre Haute. During his last year there he filled the position of superintendent of the Winona (Ind.) Assembly and Summer School at Winona Lake, resigning from the Terre Haute Church on that account. This same year he received the honorary title of D. D. from Hanover College. In 1896 he was called back to the Seventh Church, resuming his hold upon the work in the city in even larger measure, and it is not too much to say that he was widely recognized as both eloquent and scholarly, and that his deep devotion to his sacred calling gave him great influence in the city of Indianapolis. He remained here until January, 1902, when he removed to Buffalo, N. Y., to become pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, where he is yet stationed.

Rev. Rice V. Hunter was married, June 2, 1882, to Stella, daughter of Prof. H. S. Kritz, who held a professor's chair for twenty-five years in Wabash College; her mother was Mary Brush. To Dr. and Mrs. Hunter have come three children: Grace, Raymond Vernon and Lawrence Doyno.

Mr. Hunter is an independent Republican in political sentiment. He served as superintendent of the Indiana Anti-Saloon League, for two years was president of the Indiana Christian Endeavor Union, and was chairman of the International Christian Endeavor Committee on the closing of the gates of the World's Fair on Sunday. At the present time he is a trustee of Hanover College. This is but a brief and imperfect recapitulation of a useful and busy life, and the story of a sincere and industrious worker for "Christ and the Church."

JOHN W. WOODS. An honored soldier of the greatest civil war known in the annals of history, and a representative of one of the sterling pioneer families of Indiana, this well known citizen is peculiarly deserving of consideration. He is a native son of Marion county, Ind., born May 25, 1838, son of John and Nancy (Thompson) Woods, both of whom were born in Kentucky, where their marriage was solemnized. The father was a son of Isaac Woods, and the latter's father was a native of England, whence, in company with a brother, he emigrated to America in the Colonial epoch, one settling in Virginia and the other in Florida. Their father was a man of wealth and influence in England, where he owned an entire parish, besides city property, and from this large estate, which has never been settled, the American heirs have thus far received nothing.

Isaac Woods was an early settler in Kentucky, where he became a successful and prominent farmer and where his death occurred when he was well advanced in years. A number of his descendants still reside in Owen county, Ky. The children of Isaac Woods of whom we have record, were Abner, Jesse, Samuel and John, and it is probable there were others, concerning whom the subject of this sketch has no definite information.

In his youth John Woods learned the carpenter's trade, to which he devoted his attention after coming to Indiana, where he died in 1838, the year in which his son John W. was born. His wife was a daughter of John Thompson, who was a prominent farmer of Kentucky, where he died. Mr. Thompson and his wife were consistent members of the Baptist Church. Their children were as follows: Mitchell, Lett, Reaves, John W., Nancy (mother of John W. Woods), Jesse, Patsy (Mrs. K. Noe), Naomi (Mrs. J. Hobart), and Jane (Mrs. Noe). John and Nancy (Thompson) Woods became the parents of two children, Sarah and John W. The former became the wife of Isaac Clark, of whom specific mention is made elsewhere. The mother had been previously married to Jesse Woods, brother of her second husband, and of this union was born one daughter, Jessie, wife of Samuel Weeks. After the death of her second husband Mrs. Woods became the wife of Simon Peters, a wagonmaker, of Indianapolis, and they became the parents of three children: Missouri, Mrs. Greenwood; Mary, Mrs. Dr. Cameron; and Thomas, now deceased, who was a brickmaker by vocation. The mother entered into eternal rest in 1849, at the age of forty-five years. She was a devout member of the Baptist Church.

John W. Woods was but two weeks old at the time of his father's death, and he remained with his mother until he was about eleven years of age. He then found a home with a farmer, with whom he remained until he had attained the age of seventeen, his scholastic privileges meantime having been limited to a desultory attendance upon the district schools. He then passed one year in the home of his sister, after which he went to Kentucky in company with his uncles, Reaves Thompson and John Wade, the latter of whom eventually returned to Indiana. While in Kentucky Mr. Woods learned the carpenter's trade under the direction of his cousin, James Noe, and to this vocation he devoted his attention during his residence in that State. About 1861 he returned to Indiana, where he soon afterward tendered his services in support of the Union, enlisting, for "three years or during the war," in Company H, 13th Ind. V. I., in which he was forthwith made first corporal of his company. The regiment, under command of Col. Jerry Sullivan, was attached to the Army of the Potomac and left Indianapolis for Virginia, the first battle in which it participated being that of Rich Mountain, where Mr. Woods received a severe injury in the left groin by falling on a rock; the result was a severe rupture, from which he has never recovered. He continued with his regiment for some time afterward, but eventually received a furlough and returned to his home, where his recuperation was slow and tedious. When partially recovered he was commissioned second lieutenant in a company of the Home Guards, which he drilled every day, continuing thus until May, 1863, when he re-enlisted, having in the meanwhile received an honorable discharge. On again entering the service he became a private in Company I, 26th Ind. V. I., joining his regiment at Pilot Knob. It was commanded by Col. J. D. Clark and formed a portion of General Herndon's division. The command started on the march to St. Genevieve, having frequent skirmishes, and then proceeded on the Vicksburg campaign, taking part in the forty-one days' siege of that city and later capturing Yazoo City and Port Hudson, whence they proceeded to Milliken's Bend, where they engaged with the enemy, and thence marched seven miles to Sterling's plantation, where another fight occurred. There a part of the 26th Indiana and 19th Iowa Regiments engaged with General Greene's force of 8,000, and though the two Union regiments had but six hundred men they continued the fight for two hours. They were eventually taken prisoners, Sept. 29, 1863, and taken to Camp Ford, at Tyler, Texas, and an exchange was not effected until July 22, following. The prisoners subsisted on a ration of one pint of meal each per day, and after seven months had been thus passed in duress Mr. Woods and five others plotted an escape. They appointed a place of meeting and succeeded in slipping away, traveling a distance of 110 miles and living on such meager fare as they could secure by foraging. Finally farmers put bloodhounds on their trail and they were recaptured and sent back to Marshall, Texas, where they were imprisoned in the courthouse. In an adjoining room were a number of conscript Confederate prisoners, with whom the Union men soon entered into a controversy which eventuated in a genuine riot, the six Federal prisoners entering into a hand-to-hand fight with the forty other prisoners. The riot was finally quelled and Mr. Woods and his companions were then taken to a camp ten miles distant, where they were placed in charge of twelve Confederate soldiers. They were well treated by the man in command, and after three weeks they were returned, by forced march, to the prison at Tyler, whence all the prisoners were later marched to Shreveport, La., and retained a month in that place. Mr. Woods and a comrade again attempted to escape, but in attempting to cross the Red river fell into the stream and were again captured, being returned to Shreveport the next day. The two comrades were placed in a veritable dungeon, which was alive with vermin, but a few days later they broke out and joined the other prisoners, and shortly afterward all were returned to Tyler, where an exchange was finally effected. There were originally about 4,500 prisoners, but the death rate was high, often reaching twenty a day. After his exchange Mr. Woods went to New Orleans, where he received twelve months' pay, and then went to Fort Donelson, where he passed three months in recruiting service and in manning the siege guns. After the regiment was filled it returned to New Orleans, where it embarked on a boat for Lake Pontchartrain, having a fight with the enemy at Spanish Fort. Thirteen days later the regiment joined General Steele and participated in the battle of Fort Blakeslee, thence proceeding to Selma, Ala., where it took part in the engagement, and then continued on to Macon, Ga., where it remained some time, the captain of Mr. Woods' company having been detailed as provost marshal, while Mr. Woods acted as jailer for four months. The command was then ordered to Montgomery, Ala., and while on the way the news of Lee's surrender was received. The regiment remained some time in Montgomery, gathering conscript goods, cotton, etc., and then returned to Vicksburg, where the men were mustered out, proceeding thence to Indianapolis, where Mr. Woods received his second honorable discharge. He endured his full share of the vicissitudes and hardships of war and made the record of a loyal and gallant soldier. He received his discharge in January, 1866, and then resumed the work of his trade, later being identified with the construction of railroad bridges and eventually assuming the position of foreman of a corps of men engaged in the building of county bridges. In this position he continued until the spring of 1902, when he was appointed guard at the city workhouse, in which incumbency he remained until retiring on account of disability.

In politics Mr. Woods is a Republican, and fraternally he is identified with George H. Thomas Post, No. 17, G. A. R., and with Camp No. 80, of the Union Veteran Legion. He was formerly a member of Gordon Post, G. A. R., which he served as commander, as he did later of Phil H. Sheridan Post, of whose auxiliary relief corps his wife was senior vice; she was a charter member thereof, and their daughter, Mrs. Metivier, is past secretary of the same corps.

In January, 1867, Mr. Woods married Miss Nancy F. Helms, who was born in Marion county, Ind., a daughter of William and Fannie Helms, the former of whom was an honored pioneer and prominent farmer of the county, whither he came from Virginia. Mr. Helms was a soldier in the war of 1812. His children were as follows: Harriet, Mrs. H. Adams; Amanda, Mrs. Hickman; Mary, Mrs. J. Adams; Eliza, Mrs. W. Toon; Eddis, Mrs. J. Rice; Nancy, wife of Mr. Woods; William; Charles; and Albert. Mr. and Mrs. Woods became the parents of five children, namely: Arminnie, Mrs. E. R. Metivier; Sarah F., Mrs. H. F. Hare; Albert O., of Indianapolis; Emma E., who is married to Charles Hare; and William, who died in childhood. Mrs. Woods died in 1881, a devoted member of the Baptist Church. In 1883 Mr. Woods married Mrs. Clara Jordan, widow of John Jordan, to whom she bore one son, Harry, while of her second union one son was also born, Walter E., who is at present a city fireman. At the time of her death, which occurred in 1887, Mrs. Woods was senior vice-president of J. R. Gordon Corps, W. R. C. She was a member of the Methodist Church. In 1891 Mr. Woods consummated a third marriage, being then united to Mrs. Amanda S. Owen, widow of David Owen, and daughter of Henry F. Clymer, of Clay City, Ind., who was a member of the 21st Indiana Heavy Artillery in the Civil war and still survives. Mr. Clymer married Catherine Cook, and they had children as follows: Amanda S., wife of John W. Woods; and John, of Brazil, Ind. Mr. and Mrs. Woods have had no children. Both are zealous members of the United Brethren Church.

Mr. Woods is the grandfather of three grandsons, Roy Rusk, Joe Jordan and Frank Hare, and six granddaughters, Goldia Rusk, Hazel, Helen and Gertrude Woods, and Marie and Hyacinth Hare.

ALEXANDER G. GREEN, whose home is at No. 410 North Meridian street, Indianapolis, was born at New Albany, Ind., March 30, 1844. His parents, John Jacob and Barbara (Tobias) Green, were both born abroad, the father in Wurtemberg, Germany, and the mother in Paris, France. His grandfather, Jacob Green, was born in Germany and there passed his entire life, dying at an advanced age. He was the father of seven children.

John Jacob Green came to America in 1811, and after his marriage located in Mooresville, Floyd Co., Ind., in the very early days of Indiana settlement. He took up government land on which he made his home for many years, though he was at one time the owner of vessels plying between Liverpool and Cuba and the United States. With two of his brothers he owned sugar plantations in Cuba to which they attended, though he was a frequent visitor to and intimately acquainted with the entire island. His death occurred in Floyd county about 1876, when he had reached the age of seventy-four years. He was a justice of the peace at Mooresville, and was generally known as 'Squire Green. In 1852 he lost his first wife, who died from an attack of cholera at the early age of forty years. In early life she was a Catholic and Mr. Green was a Lutheran, but in their maturer years they attached themselves to the Methodist Church. They were the parents of three sons and five daughters, six of whom are now living: Charles, of New Albany, Ind.; George, of Jeffersonville, Ind.; Alexander G.; Anna, the wife of William Hadfield, of Louisville, Ky.; Mary, the wife of Charles Shan, of New Albany, Ind.; and Sophia, the wife of James P. Sharp, of Chattanooga, Tenn. For his second wife 'Squire Green married Mrs. Anna Catharine Kellar, by whom he had one child, Jacob, who now lives on the old homestead. By her first husband Mrs. Green had two children, one of whom, Lewis Kellar, is now living at Louisville, Kentucky.

Peter Tobias, the father of Barbara, was a native of France, and was an early settler in Floyd county, where he followed farming and where he died at the age of eighty years. His family consisted of three children.

Alexander G. Green spent the first fourteen years of his life on the Floyd county farm, where he attended the district school, and enjoyed such educational opportunities as were afforded the farm lads of his day. When he was eighteen years old he enlisted in 1862 in Company B, 81st Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and served three years as a corporal. On the way from Chickamauga to Chattanooga he lost the use of his right eye, which was injured by the branch of a tree, and on the battlefield of Atlanta he received a sunstroke from the effects of which he has never fully recovered. In the following battles Mr. Green played the part of a manful and loyal soldier: Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Nashville, Franklin, Resaca, Lookout Mountain, and many other less important though fiercely contested conflicts.

When he returned from the war Mr. Green took up the blacksmith's trade at Jeffersonville, and for eight years was employed in the Ohio Falls Car Works. At the end of that time he came to Indianapolis to take a position in the blacksmith shops of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, where he worked for some five years, until he started a shop of his own in North Indianapolis. After carrying this on for some three years he gave it up on account of poor health. He is a Republican, and for the last two years he has been employed in University Park, by the city. He receives a pension in recognition of his services in the Civil war.

Mr. Green was married in 1869 to Mrs. Susan Elizabeth Cooper, widow of Dr. Cooper, and daughter of David and Katherine LaRue. To this union have come two children, Jessie and Edna F. Jessie married Harry Von Kellar, and they live in New York and have a family of three children, Lucile, Alice and Harry. Edna F. is attending the high school in Indianapolis. By her first husband Mrs. Green had one daughter, Cora E., who married Preston Woodbury, and it the mother of one son, Grayson C. Mrs. Green belongs to the Plymouth Congregational Church. Mr. Green is a member of George H. Chapman Post, G. A. R., and the Union Veteran League.

DAVID W. BROUSE, late of Indianapolis, whither his parents came at an early day, was born in this city Aug. 29, 1836, a son of Andrew and Mary A. (Wilkins) Brouse.

Adam Brouse, grandfather of David W., brought his family to Highland county, Ohio, to escape the blight of slavery, and there he took high standing as a man of integrity and a farmer of industry and character. In 1828 he followed the wave of western settlement still farther toward the frontier, and made his home in Indianapolis, where he passed his remaining years in retirement. He is remembered as a plain, honest man, ambitious only to earn a living and leave a good name and example to those who should come after him. Among the earliest workers for the Methodist Church in the city, his life was in accordance with his religious faith, and he lived as a man and a Christian should live. Both he and his wife, Sarah, died in Indianapolis, Mr. Brouse reaching the age of eighty-nine years. Their children were as follows: Andrew, the father of David W. Brouse; John A., a prominent Methodist clergyman, well known throughout the State; William, who died when a young man; Eleanor, who became Mrs. Wilkins, and died at the age of eighty-two years; Mary, Mrs. Williams, who died in Indianapolis; and Elizabeth, Mrs. Cherry, also deceased.

Andrew Brouse was born in Virginia, and while still a lad accompanied his parents in their removal to Highland county, Ohio, where he attained manhood and was married. Having learned the carpenter's trade, he followed it for many years. In 1828 he went with his parents to Indianapolis, where he found a good field for his labors. As his sons grew up he taught them this honorable and useful calling, and after a time they all formed the firm of A. Brouse & Sons, contractors and builders, in which Mr. Brouse continued as an active member until 1875. That year he retired from active labors, afterward living quietly in Indianapolis until his death, in 1888, when he was eighty-five years of age. Mr. Brouse was a man of medium size and pleasant address, and though somewhat conservative he was charitable in his disposition and a good neighbor and friend. In the Methodist Church he was a hard-working member, long being associated with Roberts Chapel, now known as Roberts Park Church; he was Sunday-school superintendent for many years, and long served as trustee, and his hand and his heart were ever open to the needs of this organization. Mrs. Brouse passed to her rest in 1876. She was a lady of much character, and in every way a fit associate for her husband, a devoted member of the Methodist Church and one who stood well with all the good people of the city. Early in life Andrew Brouse was a Democrat, but in 1856 he united with the newly formed Republican party. In the early history of the county he served as deputy real estate appraiser.

Mr. Brouse was married in Ohio to Mary A. Wilkins, like himself a native of Virginia, and to them were born the following children: Henry W., who was born Oct. 24, 1824, who lived in California, and died Oct. 23, 1906, aged eighty-two years; Sarah I., who married a Mr. Lockwood, a farmer in Marion county; David W.; and Thomas W., for years a prominent and successful business man, now living retired in Indianapolis.

David W. Brouse was born in Indianapolis, where he was reared and educated, and in due time he became a carpenter under his father's instruction, joining with the firm of A. Brouse & Sons. This was a noted firm in the old days, and did much construction work in Indianapolis. Mr. Brouse well remembered Indianapolis when it was confined to its original plats and all beyond North, South, East and West streets was timber land, broken by a few farms. Dog fennel was plenty. The streets abounded in mud holes, and there were many stumps from the original clearings. There were no sidewalks, and journeying about town was difficult and often dangerous. The marks of newness were on everything then, but the entire city was transformed and redeemed in his time.

Mr. Brouse served for years as a member of the old volunteer fire department, and when John Morgan swept through the southern part of the State, in 1863, he enlisted in the 132d Indiana Volunteer Infantry, though his military services were confined to the term of ten days, as the danger had then passed. In 1867 he entered the employ of the firm of Tutewiler & Brothers, prominent stove men in the city at that time, remaining with them until 1871, in which year he was made township assessor, and succeeded himself three times. For some years he worked at his trade following the expiration of his official career, and in 1885 became assistant to Mr. Blanchard in his undertaking business, in which position he continued during the remainder of his active life. A strong Republican, he was never an aspirant for any official position, having clearly been called by the people to such positions in the public service as he held. He died Dec. 27, 1905, at the age of sixty-nine years, four months.

Mr. Brouse was married, June 7, 1859, to Miss Lucy E. Jenkins, a daughter of A. W. and Sarah (Barbee) Jenkins, early settlers of Indianapolis, where Mrs. Brouse was born March 3, 1838. As her mother died when she was only two years old she was reared by her grandparents, the Barbees. Her father was a pioneer foundryman in Indianapolis, later engaged in mercantile pursuits, and for some twenty years was assistant and bookkeeper for Aaron Clem. He lived to be eighty-two years of age, and was long a devoted member of the Methodist Church. His children were: Jane, wife of Judge Napoleon B. Taylor; Lucy E., Mrs. Brouse; Col. W. S. Jenkins, of St. Louis; and George, who died in Indianapolis, leaving a wife and two children.

To Mr. and Mrs. Brouse came three children: William A., born Dec. 26, 1860, is now a resident of Kansas; Mamie G. has been twice married, her first husband, F. M. Reeder, leaving her at his death with two children, George M. and Frank B. Reeder, and she is now the wife of M. K. Alexander; Hattie E. is the wife of John D. Day, of Indianapolis. All the family are members of the Methodist Church, and are leading honorable and useful lives.

FRED TRUCKSESS, an old and prominent citizen of Indianapolis, noted for his industry, integrity and manliness of character, was born in that city, at the corner of South street and Capitol avenue, in 1848, son of John and Lucinda (Cool) Trucksess.

The great-grandparents of Mr. Trucksess were born in Paris, France. They were Huguenots, and were compelled to leave their native land on account of religious persecutions, making a home in Wittenberg, Germany, which for many years was the seat of the family. There Jacob Trucksess, grandfather of Fred, was born, reared and married, and there most of his children were born. Jacob Trucksess emigrated to the United States and settled on a farm near Eaton, Ohio, about 1832. There he became prominent and successful, and after a long and useful career passed away in peace and honor. His children were as follows: Frederick, a resident of Indianapolis for many years; Dorothy, Mrs. Young; Mary, who became Mrs. Ashing; John, the father of Fred Trucksess; Catherine, Mrs. J. Wilson, of Tuscola, Ill.; Sabina; Christ, a farmer; and William, a blacksmith. Jacob Trucksess and his wife were Protestants.

John Trucksess, the father of Fred, was born and reared in Wittenberg, Germany, where he learned the blacksmith's trade; he also became a miller. Accompanying his parents to this country, and to their home in Ohio, he very soon afterward made his way to Indianapolis, arriving here in 1835, and engaging at once in blacksmithing on Kentucky avenue and Washington street, following that occupation for many years. After this he ran a mill at Plainfield, making his home on Kentucky avenue, where he owned a farm, and here he died in 1867. In his early days Mr. Trucksess raised corn and other vegetables where now the city is solidly built.

Mr. Trucksess was a member of the Baptist Church, while his wife was a Presbyterian. In politics he was a leading and influential Democrat, and during his residence in Indianapolis took an important part in the politics of the "Bloody 5th Ward." When resolute men were needed for any emergency he was always called upon, always proving equal to the occasion. At the time of the "Big Riot" he was one of the bodyguard for President Johnson, and received a bullet wound in the nose near the left eye. At this time he was arrested but never punished. His eye was saved. Large and strong, and enjoying the reputation of being the strongest man in Marion county at one time, he was utterly fearless, but he was clever and social, and his friends were numbered by the score. He was widely known for his integrity and industry.

Mrs. Trucksess survived until 1888. The Cools were among the pioneers of Indianapolis, settling there at a time when the surrounding country was still filled with bands of roving Indians. Mrs. Trucksess often related to her children stories of the pioneer days and accounts of the deprivations which attended pioneer life. The Cools were farming people and mainly associated with the Presbyterian Church. Mrs. Trucksess had two brothers and one sister: William, John, and Patty (who died young).

John and Lucinda Trucksess had the following family: (1) Theodore, a blacksmith, died in Landersdale, in August, 1901. (2) Mary first married P. Morrison and later Joe Reed, and had children by both marriages. (3) Fred is mentioned below. (4) Anna married Clinton Idler, who ran passenger trains for two years before taking charge of the Vandalia shops at Indianapolis, of which he was general foreman for over forty years, from Jan 1, 1857. He is now living retired at No. 2234 North Illinois street. (5) Talbut, a railway engineer, has been with the Vandalia twenty-four years. (6) Clara married Mr. P. Ostmiller, a railroad engineer. (7) Emma and (8) Lilla are both unmarried.

Fred Trucksess was born and reared in Indianapolis, where he has lived all his life with the exception of three years, which he spent in St. Louis. He began his active career as a teamster, and was soon employed in that capacity by Mr. Goddard, with whom he remained twenty-four years. In 1893 he became night watchman for Coffin & Fletcher, at their pork packing house, and still fills this position, being among the most respected and trusted employes of that extensive establishment. In his lifetime he has witnessed the transformation of Indianapolis from a dilapidated country village to its present proud position as the leading city of the country in respect to improvements, walks, streets, and modern conveniences. The family traditions of honesty, honor and industry have been maintained unsullied by him. Conservative and prudent, he has wisely invested his earnings, and now owns a commodious and well furnished residence and some fine rental property, and is a liberal investor in the leading building and loan associations of the city. Genial in disposition, he has a host of friends, and holds their confidence and the esteem of his community to a marked degree.

Mr. Trucksess is a strong and leading Republican, and gives freely both of his time and means for the success of his party. For twelve years he has been committeeman for the Fifteenth ward, and his influence is deemed essential to any candidacy. Never has he sought official honors, but he has richly merited anything he might ask.

In 1875 Mr. Trucksess was married to Miss Elizabeth Reichart, who was born in Indianapolis July 3, 1849. She is an intelligent and cultivated woman, and has proved a most excellent helpmate to her husband. Her parents, Abraham and Margaret (Hutson) Reichart, were both natives of Ohio, where they were married when Margaret Hutson was only seventeen years old. She was born in Ross county Feb. 20, 1822, a daughter of William and Elizabeth (Justin) Hutson, the former a native of Scotland, the latter of Maryland. For many years Mr. Hutson was a seafaring man, and he married Elizabeth Justin at Baltimore. They moved to Ohio, where he became a prominent farmer and stockman, and where he died at a good old age. Elizabeth Justin was a daughter of William Justin, who also came to Ohio, where success attended his efforts as a farmer, so that he became before his death the proprietor of three good farms. His children were: Elizabeth, who became the grandmother of Mrs. Trucksess; and Noah, who settled near Lafayette and became wealthy. The children of William and Elizabeth Hutson were: Kennell, Elijah, John, and Margaret (the mother of Mrs. Trucksess).

Abraham Reichart married in Ohio, and presently removed to Indiana, spending two years at Noblesville, where he was employed in cutting saw logs and clearing land. After that he came on to Indianapolis, and was employed by Nicholas McCarty, as a farm superintendent, that gentleman being engaged in extensive agricultural operations. Mr. Reichart remained with him seven years, and then renting a farm worked it for himself, and also operated a threshing machine. He was careful and economical, industrious and upright, and presently became forehanded. His death occurred in 1852. Mr. Reichart was a sincere and devout member of the Methodist Church, to which he was a liberal contributor, and he served as class-leader and exhorter. A kind husband and indulgent, loving father, he was in every respect a Christian gentleman above reproach or question. His children were: Jane, who died unmarried; James A., who died at the age of seventeen years; Sarah E., who passed away at the age of fourteen years; Elizabeth, who is the wife of Fred Trucksess; Isabelle, who died at the age of sixteen years; Mary, who married Peter Leser; and Abraham, an engineer at the starch works.

After the death of her husband Mrs. Reichart kept her children together, and buying an acre of ground fronting on West Morris street, from General Drake, built a house there for herself and family. As the city expanded she platted her land, sold two lots, and had buildings erected on other lots, which she rented. She contracted a second marriage with John Everhard, a native of Germany, who came to this country when nineteen years old. He was a carpenter, and followed that occupation throughout life, his death occurring Nov. 2, 1900. By this marriage were born the following children: John, who is employed at a drop forge; George, who works in a starch factory; William, who died at the age of nineteen years; and Moses, unmarried, who lives at the old home. Mrs. Everhard was wonderfully well preserved until her death, which occurred July 17, 1906, of heart failure, when she was eighty-four years old. She was a consecrated member of the Methodist Church, a devoted, patient, faithful wife, a kind and loving mother, and a friend beloved by many. Too much cannot be said in her praise, and she was deeply mourned by children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren. She spent fifty-two years at her homestead, No. 503 Morris street, and her little cottage, now occupied by her youngest son, looks very lonely now, but it is still "home, sweet home" to all the family.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Trucksess have not had any children of their own, but they have taken into their home her niece, to whom they have given a good education and every advantage possible. Mrs. Trucksess is a member of the Presbyterian Church. In fraternal connection Mr. Trucksess belongs to the Red Men.

MAJOR NATHAN A. SECREST, who lives at No. 1521 Woodlawn avenue, Indianapolis, was born at Parkersburg, Ind., Nov. 11, 1839, son of Charles Secrest, who was a native of Kentucky and came into this State when only sixteen years of age. He was the youngest of twelve children, who came to Indianapolis, the parents remaining in Kentucky.

Charles Secrest married Anna Atchison, who was Southern born, and a member of one of the oldest families of South Carolina. Mr. Secrest was a noted contractor and builder, and followed that line of business for many years. In 1845 he settled with his family in Indianapolis, where he remained to the close of his days, dying at the age of eighty years. Mrs. Secrest died several years before her husband. He was a well known and much esteemed citizen. In politics he was a Republican, and in religion he was a devout member of the Christian Church; he was a radical temperance man. Of a numerous family born to him and his wife only three are living: Major Nathan A. and two sisters, Elizabeth, the widow of Andrew Cox, and a resident of Indianapolis, and Alice, the widow of George W. Snyder.

Major Secrest attained his manhood in Indianapolis, where he attended the public schools. In August, 1862, he enlisted in Company K, 70th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, which is known as the Ben. Harrison Regiment, and in this command he served a year. Returning home he helped to organize the 28th United States Colored Troops, of which he was made adjutant, with the rank of captain. Later he was promoted to major. He took part in the siege of Petersburg, and his was the second regiment to march into the city of Richmond after the evacuation.

Since the war Major Secrest has been engaged in the stock business. He belongs to Gordon Post, G. A. R., is a Republican in politics, and a man of fine character and marked ability, enjoying the confidence and esteem of a host of friends. His marriage to Miss Caroline Russell, a sister of Gen. Charles Russell, occurred in Louisville, Ky., and they have one surviving son, Bates H. Secrest; they have lost four sons; Frank, Nathan, Charles and Russell.

WENDEL GARDNER, who passed away April 1, 1905, resided in his late home, at No. 701 North California street, Indianapolis, from 1855 until his death, having been one of the first to settle in this part of the city.

Mr. Gardner was born in York county, Pa., Oct. 17, 1824, son of Peter and Mary (Kaler) Gardner, both of whom were natives of Pennsylvania. He was of German descent, and his maternal grandfather was born on the sea, while the family were crossing from Germany to America, the mother dying at his birth, and being buried in the ocean. The husband, who was the great grandfather of Wendel Gardner, landed on the shores of America with six motherless children. So far as he knew, Mr. Gardner was the last descendant of this original Kaler family.

Wendel Gardner was one of a family of four children, the others being: A daughter that died in childhood; Jacob, the eldest of the family, who died in Pennsylvania; and John, the youngest of the family, who died in Iowa. Wendel Gardner was reared in Pennsylvania, where he became a carpenter. In 1849 he left his native State, and arrived in Indianapolis on the 15th day of May, that year. He ate his first meal here at the old "Little's Hotel," and had but fifty cents left after paying for his dinner. All were strangers about him, but he quickly secured work at his trade in the employ of Andrew Loudon, for a dollar and a quarter a day, working for him until Jan. 1, 1850. Mr. Loudon was so pleased with the young man that he assisted him in securing a place on the construction of the Masonic Temple, where he received much larger wages. In the fall of 1851 he secured a position in the planing-mill, where he remained until he retired from active labor, in 1895. His death resulted from a stroke of paralysis.

Mr. Gardner was married in Indianapolis, May 15, 1850, to Miss Sarah A. Hersa, who was born in Dauphin county, Pa., and of the two children born to this union but one is living, Mary E., who married Otto Belzer, and has one son, Emmett C. Belzer, who is in Chicago, Ill. Charles, son of Wendel, died at the age of twenty-seven years.

Mr. Gardner was always an active and industrious man, and his habits were of the most exemplary character. He retained the confidence and respect of his friends and acquaintances through his long and busy life in this city. His widow and daughter still reside at the old home.

ADAM H. HELM, a stonemason by trade, came of an influential old Protestant family of Germany. He was born in the kingdom of Hanover, and under the influence of the progressive institutions of his native land had excellent rearing. When a youth he began learning the trade of stonemason, for which from the start he evinced much inherent ability, and as a young man he followed that occupation for some years in his own country. A conscientious and competent workman, he found no difficulty in securing work and commanded the maximum wages for his labor. During this period he married Mary A. Balsmire, of Germany, who was a descendant of a fine old Protestant family, and of this union there were five children, all of whom evinced much push and energy, and coming to America there found good homes for themselves. Adam is now a retired contractor. Henry is mentioned below. John, a tailor by trade, came to this country in 1841, and when the Mexican war broke out enlisted and went to the front; later he was engaged in the grocery business in Indianapolis, and he died in Cincinnati in 1900, meeting his death through an accident. Catherine married a Mr. Blogster and resides in Indianapolis. Caroline is the wife of J. Ray, of Cincinnati.

After marriage Mr. Helm took up his residence in the kingdom of Hanover, where he was engaged in the pursuit of his trade. By hard work and frugal habits he managed to provide a good home for himself and family, and gave each of his children a good start in life. As some of them had already come to this country, in 1847 he with the rest of his family set out for the United States, where they soon afterward joined his son Adam in Cincinnati. Here he at once found a large demand for his trade, and for several years he was highly prosperous, commanding good wages. In 1854, induced by his sons Adam and Henry, who had moved to Indianapolis, he settled in this city, where he afterward made his home. For some years he continued his work as a stonemason, but finally, with approaching age, he engaged in lighter kinds of work, doing odd pieces that chance opened up for him. He lived to the age of seventy-six years, dying in 1862. His wife passed away in 1858, at the age of sixty-four years.

Mr. Helm was a typical middle-class German, industrious and conscientious. Good workmanship was his aim, and the consciousness of having completed a well laid cellar wall or an artistically constructed building gave him more real pleasure than a pocket full of solid cash. Reared in the Protestant faith, both he and his wife were consistent and highly respected members of the Lutheran Church.

HENRY HELM was born Jan. 14, 1824, in Hanover, Germany, and grew to manhood under the beneficent influences of a well regulated, industrious German community. Attending the public schools of his vicinity until he was fourteen years old, by close attention to his studies, and a keen interest in his work, he laid the foundation of a solid education, and acquired habits of self-reliance and perseverance, which have marked his later years. By assisting his father he also early learned the trade of a stonemason, for which he evinced from the first marked natural ability, and in which he became in time very proficient. For some time during his early manhood he followed his trade in Germany, and in 1847 came with his parents to America and settled in Cincinnati, where, with his brother Adam, he at once found an excellent opening in his line. As a journeyman he had steady work and good wages, and he assisted in the erection of many large and prominent buildings. After about seven years, however, in 1854, confident of the growing importance of Indianapolis he came to that city, where he has since made his residence. From the start he found plenty of work in his line, and proving a highly efficient workman, as well as a good business man, he soon rose to the position of contractor. As such he assisted in the erection of many of the most prominent buildings of the city, including the Odd Fellows Temple, many of the finest residences, and important business blocks. Retaining the confidence of the public, and a steadily increasing patronage, he continued his business in the city until 1893, when, having performed his share of hard work, and having laid by a comfortable sum for old age, he retired from active work. He is a splendid business man, and his only reverses have been caused by his having made large loans to needy but incompetent friends. For many years he made his residence on East Washington street, in a commodious house which he and his brother-in-law erected there. Later, selling this property, in 1866 he erected his present home on East Washington street, a thoroughly modern, two-story brick and stone residence. For some years he owned stock in the Atlas Engine Works of the city, and he had the contract for the stone work of their building.

Mr. Helm married Gertrude Suhra in 1848. She was born in Hanover, Germany, of worthy parents, both of whom died in Germany. She died in Cincinnati in 1851. There were two children by this marriage: Mary A., who married a Mr. Aufderheide, and died in 1902, leaving five children; and Henry, now a resident of Montana, who is a man of prominence and has traveled much. In 1854 Mr. Helm married Caroline Kokomiller. By this second marriage ten children were born, two of whom died in infancy; William is a clerk for a firm in Chicago; Nellie married a Mr. Harder; Matilda married George J. Yoke, of Indianapolis, and died in 1906; Charles and Walter (a good business man, and who served in the Spanish-American war and was stationed at Porto Rico), are both residents of New York; Gertrude; Ralph, an ironworker, died in 1904; and Frank, a resident of Seattle, Wash., has traveled extensively both in America and abroad.

Mr. Helm combines with his breadth of intellect and a large capacity for work many of the highest moral attributes, among which generosity, if anything, predominates. Of the German Orphans' Home of Indianapolis, a large and highly beneficial charitable institution, he was one of the prominent promoters, and assisted in the selection of the large and beautiful grounds, and in the construction of the building. Having so long been identified with the building up of his city he is one of the most widely known and highly respected old settlers of the place. He has long been a leading member of Zion Lutheran Church, on West Ohio street. His first wife died in that faith, to which his second wife also adhered. Well informed upon all questions, he has ever evinced a keen interest in local affairs, and in politics he affiliates with the Democrats.

Henry Kokomiller, father of Mrs. Caroline Helm, was born in Hanover, Germany, and there passed many years of his life. Hoping to better his prospects after some years of business activity he came to the United States, and procured a tract of wild land in Auglaize county, Ohio, where he settled and began making improvements. He had erected comfortable buildings and made a good start when death, in 1838, cut short his activities. While in Germany he married Louisa Sherer, of the kingdom of Hanover, who died in this country in 1835. Of this union there were the following children, most of them quite young when the parents died: Henrietta, the eldest, who found homes for herself and her brothers and sisters in Cincinnati, married C. Bussie, a stonemason and contractor; she died in Indianapolis. Henry died of the cholera in Cincinnati, in 1848. Fred, who became a sailor and afterward served through the Civil war, settled in Indianapolis and died there. Caroline, Mrs. Helm, died in 1892. The parents were good Christians, being consistent members of the Lutheran Church.

CHARLES H. RIHL, of No. 339 Lincoln street, Indianapolis, has been a resident of this city since 1854, though as early as 1838 he passed through the town, which then gave little promise of its future development. Mr. Rihl was born in Philadelphia, Dec. 29, 1814, son of Henry and Sarah (Stokes) Rihl. The family came remotely from Holland. The father of Henry Rihl came from that country in Colonial times, and bore arms for the Colonies during the Revolution.

Henry Rihl was born and reared in Philadelphia, and in his early manhood was a pilot on Delaware Bay. He rose to the command of a merchant-vessel which ran between Philadelphia and Canton, China. His death occurred while at sea, his son Charles H. being but a small lad at the time. His widow survived him many years, and devoted herself to the welfare of her five children, Charles H. being her only son, and he with his sister, Mrs. Martha A. Reynolds, of Milford, N. J., are the only survivors.

Charles H. Rihl was reared in Philadelphia, where he became an expert brick layer, and in 1836, at the age of twenty-one, he went to New York, to assist in the rebuilding of that city after the famous fire of 1835. There he did his first work as a journeyman, having just completed his term of apprenticeship. He remained in New York until September of that year, when he went to Mobile, Ala., by ship, and there worked at his trade, as he did also in Montgomery, later returning to Mobile, whence he went to New Orleans, where he took ship and returned to New York in the spring of 1837. In New York Mr. Rihl met a young acquaintance, and the two determined to go to the West together. They made the journey by the Morris and the Lehigh canals to Pottsville, Pa., from there crossing the mountains to Pittsburg, being about two weeks on the way to that city. This was during the panic of 1837, and but little was doing. Finally the young friends separated, Mr. Rihl taking a place as a deck hand on a steamer plying between Pittsburg and Louisville. During the fall he was employed at his trade in Pittsburg. When cold weather came on, he shipped on a steamer called the "Tiber" and went to New Orleans. In 1838 he made several trips up and down the river, and then located in Cincinnati, where he lived for sixteen years. In 1852 he came to Indianapolis, and laid the first brick on the old "Bates House." This was the year of the presidential election, and Mr. Rihl hastened back to Cincinnati to vote for Gen. Scott, but reached the city too late to cast his vote. In 1854 he came to Indianapolis as a permanent resident.

Mr. Rihl was married May 2, 1841, to Miss Clarissa Riordan, who was born in Philadelphia in 1822, youngest of the three children (and now the only one living) of John Smith Riordan, who fought in the United States man-of-war, the "Peacock," in its celebrated conflict with the English in the War of 1812. In later years he became captain of a merchant vessel, and was lost with the vessel and all the crew save one, off the coast of Porto Rico. This was when Mrs. Rihl was but a child. His father was a resident of Frederick, Md., where he had a large cooper shop. His two sons were reared and educated for the Catholic priesthood, but after they had attained mature years both declined to enter the priesthood and left home. Mr. and Mrs. Rihl have lived together for over sixty years, and have had seven children, six daughters and one son, of whom five are now living: Mrs. Ella F. Newton, born in 1842; Mrs. Kate P. Kennedy, born in 1846; Harry S., born in 1848; Martha E., born in 1858, a teacher living at home; Mrs. Effie Sponsal, born in 1864; Emma, who died at the age of twenty-six years; and Clarissa, who died in infancy.

Mr. Rihl cast his first vote in 1840 for Gen. Harrison, and in 1844 he voted for Henry Clay, in 1848 for Gen. Taylor, in 1856 for Fillmore. Since that time he has voted the Democratic ticket. He is remarkably well preserved, as is also his wife. They bear themselves vigorously despite their advanced age, and are the center of much sincere admiration and devoted affection on the part of friends and relatives. Mr. Rihl retains in his memory many interesting incidents of the early days, and relates them in a most charming and interesting manner.

GUSTAVE ETTINGER (deceased), one of the early settlers of Indianapolis, was born March 9, 1836, at Markgroningen, Germany, and was reared and educated in his native place. His parents, Henry and Rickey (Elsiser) Ettinger, were both natives of Germany.

Henry Ettinger was a man of literary acquirements and was employed in the government offices. His father, Henry Ettinger, served with the great Napoleon and under him marched into Moscow, but lived to return and settle in his native country. Henry (2) also died in his native land, and it was in 1846 that Gustave came to America with his mother, who settled in New York City and died there. In 1854 Gustave, leaving his mother, came to Indianapolis, where he was first employed as a farm hand, but later entered into the employ of Dr. Bobbs. With him he remained until 1861, when he enlisted for service in the army, for three years or during the war. Mr. Ettinger entered Company A, 13th Ind. V. I., under Colonel Sullivan and Capt. Cyrus J. Dodd. This was the first Indiana regiment started for the seat of war, and it was consigned to the Army of the Potomac and joined the forces of General McClellan at the foot of Rich Mountain, W. Va. On the day following this regiment took part in the battle at Beverly, moving then to Cheat Mountain Pass, and taking part in the numerous skirmishes under Gen. J. J. Reynolds.

Mr. Ettinger was in the battle at Cheat Mountain and Elkwater and was with the regiment as it moved down to oppose the forces of General Lee. It was while on a scouting expedition that he received a wound which shattered his right arm so seriously that amputation was necessary. The agonies endured by this brave soldier during his temporary sojourn in the field hospital and even later, when removed to Winchester, Va., are things which a younger generation should never forget, and which entitle him to the esteem of his fellow citizens throughout life. Mr. Ettinger was honorably discharged Jan. 16, 1862, and returned to Indianapolis. As soon as sufficiently recovered, he was employed as a watchman at the arsenal, later entering into a saloon and boarding-house business on South Meridian street. In 1868 he secured a position with a railroad company as telegraph switchman west of White River, now the property of the Big Four, which position he capably filled for over thirty years, during all of which time he was found at his post, good soldier that he was, from six o'clock in the morning until six in the evening, with the exception of very few days. After his marriage he bought property and settled in his late home on Kentucky avenue, and he also owned a couple of valuable rental properties.

On Nov. 29, 1864, Mr. Ettinger was married to Miss Elizabeth Mikle, who was born Jan. 25, 1846, in Indianapolis, daughter of Charles and Barbara (Kuhn) Mikle, the former of whom was born in Germany June 3, 1819, and the latter Oct. 31, 1824. They came to America with their parents and were married at Cincinnati in June, 1843, and moved to Dearborn county, Ind., where one son was born in 1846. Mr. Mikle moved about that time to Indianapolis and conducted a meat market, and in 1850 he removed to Greencastle, where he carried on the same business until his death, Nov. 5, 1862, at the age of forty-three years. His widow also died there, Sept. 15, 1884, aged sixty-three years. Mr. Kuhn also moved to Dearborn county, Ind., where he was one of the wealthy and prominent farmers, and was also a leading member of the Lutheran Church. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Kuhn were: Philip, Daniel, Jacob, John, Adam, Elizabeth, and Barbara (the mother of Mrs. Ettinger). The family to which Charles Mikle belonged consisted of these members: John P., one of the early brewers of Indianapolis; Charles, the father of Mrs. Ettinger, and John. The children born to Charles Mickle and wife were: Philip J., of Greencastle; Elizabeth, the wife of Mr. Ettinger; Marie Louise, Mrs. C. Taylor; Catherine F., Mrs. Rockaway; Charles W., a plumber in business in Indianapolis; Albert, who died Feb. 19, 1888; and Edward D., a plumber and steamfitter. Both parents were worthy members of the Lutheran Church.

A most intelligent family of six children was born to Mr. and Mrs. Ettinger, namely: Emma, who is Mrs. H. Herrlich; Molly, unmarried; Ella, who married Fred Heal, contracting plasterer and decorator; Charles, unmarried; and John and Harry, both of whom are married. In religion this family are Spiritualists.

While Mr. Ettinger was a Democrat, he was not an active worker and never aspired to hold office. He was a plain, honest man, whose ambition was to make a comfortable living so that he could look well to the welfare of his family and to provide for the days of his old age. His army record reflected credit upon him and he was known for his life of industry and integrity. He and his wife were not long separated, Mr. Ettinger passing away Nov. 26, 1904, and Mrs. Ettinger April 16, 1905.

ALFRED JENKINS, a wood and coal dealer at No. 1737 English avenue, Indianapolis, was born in Henry county, Ind., May 7, 1832, son of Rebs and Mary (Freeman) Jenkins, both of whom were born and reared in Virginia. They were pioneers in Henry county, and two of their four sons are now living, Alfred and John, both of Indianapolis.

John Jenkins, the grandfather of Alfred, was born in Virginia, of English stock, and was a farmer all his life. In the war of 1812 he bore arms, and he was among the very early pioneers of Indiana, dying near Richmond, Wayne county, when nearly ninety years old. His family comprised three sons and two daughters.

Rebs Jenkins was a carpenter and contractor, and for many years had his home in Henry county. Later in life he moved to Anderson, where he engaged in railroad construction on the Cincinnati, Richmond & Fort Wayne railroad, and there he died when he was about fifty-five years old. His widow survived many years, dying in 1882, at the age of sixty-eight. His faith was that of the Dunkards; she was a Quaker. She was married a second time, her husband being William Haliday, who is now also deceased.

Nathan Freeman, maternal grandfather of Alfred Jenkins, was born in England, but early made his home in Virginia, where he followed farming. He also fought in the war of 1812. His last years were spent in North Carolina, where he died at the age of 102 years. His was a numerous offspring.

Alfred Jenkins grew to manhood in Henry county, where he made his home many years. His first schooling was obtained in an old-fashioned subscription school, held in a log cabin, with puncheon floors and greased paper for windows. Reared on the farm in Henry county, and the owner of two good farms himself, he yet preferred to follow millwrighting for many years in his earlier manhood. After the Civil war he lived in Knightstown some years, working at his trade. For four years he lived in Hancock county, and in 1885 came to Indianapolis, where he was taken into the employ of Nordyke, Marmon & Co., with whom he remained for sixteen years, when he started out in a planing-mill for himself. This was destroyed by fire four months after it passed into his possession. In 1898 he engaged in the coal and wood business which he continues today.

Mr. Jenkins was married July 25, 1852, to Miss Acrilla Maggard, a daughter of John and Maurice Maggard, and to this union came three sons and four daughters: (1) John R., was killed by the explosion of a boiler when he was twenty-eight years old. He was married and had one child. (2) Mary E. is deceased. (3) Joseph worked for Nordyke, Marmon & Co. for twenty-six years, left the firm and went to railroad superintending. (4) Lydia Ora married William Kneller, and has her home in Indianapolis. (5) Katie married John Oswiler, whose home is near Kokomo, Ind., and they have one child. (6) Orin is a veneer sawyer with the Indiana Lumber & Veneer Company. He married a Miss Keeley. (7) Martha died in childhood.

Mrs. Acrilla Jenkins died in February, 1872, at the age of fifty-two years. She was a Methodist, and a woman of fine character and beautiful spirit. Mr. Jenkins was married in January, 1898, to Mrs. Mary E. Hunt. Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins are both members of the Methodist Church, in which he has long been class-leader, uniting with the Broadway Methodist Church. Mr. Jenkins belongs to Capitol City Lodge, No. 312, F. & A. M., and to the chapter as well. He is also connected with the Odd Fellows.

Mr. Jenkins enlisted in the Union army in 1862, becoming a member of Company G, 84th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and served until March 4, 1863, when he was discharged on account of a wound received at the battle of Guyon, W. Va., the night of Jan. 3, 1863, incapacitating him for further service.

JOSEPH W. SELVAGE, who carries on an extensive business in real estate, fire insurance and mortgage loans, at No. 130 East Market street, Indianapolis, was born in Zionsville, Ind., Feb. 6, 1870, a son of John F. and Jane E. (Kennelly) Selvage. The father was born in Connecticut and the mother in Michigan. They had a family of six sons and four daughters, and five of their children are now living: William J., Anna M. (wife of Edward F. Miller), Charles B., Edward L. and Joseph W., all of Indianapolis. John F. Selvage at one time owned a steamboat on the Ohio river. He came to Indiana in 1865, making his home in Zionsville, where he was engaged in the manufacture of staves until 1873, in which year he was killed in the factory. He was aged forty-seven years at the time of his death. His widow still survives and has her home in Indianapolis. Both she and her husband belonged to the Methodist Church. Mr. Selvage was a thirty-third degree Scottish Rite Mason.

John Selvage, the grandfather of Joseph W., was a native of Pennsylvania, and came of Welsh ancestry. When he died he was well advanced in years. Harmon Kennelly, the maternal grandfather of Mr. Selvage, was a native of Connecticut, and a pioneer on the frontier of Michigan. He took part in some of the Indian wars and died at the age of thirty-eight. His widow died some two years later at the age of thirty-six, leaving five children.

Joseph W. Selvage was reared in Indianapolis, where he attended the public schools. In the earlier days of his manhood he was employed as book-keeper at the Atlas Engine Works, a position he held for nine years. For some eleven years he has been engaged in his present business in which he has been very successful and has won many friends and clients and has a line of choice patronage. He is also president of the Wagner-Davis Glass Co., of Indianapolis.

Mr. Selvage was married Sept. 12, 1895, to Grace L., a daughter of John L. and Sarah L. (Taylor) Kring. To them have come two sons and one daughter, Francis John, Harold Taylor and Helen Grace Selvage. Mr. and Mrs. Selvage are members of the Broadway Methodist Church. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, a Mason, and a member of the Commercial and Marion Clubs. In political matters he is a Republican and is recognized as one of the bright and brainy young men of the city. He and his wife have their home at No. 2320 Broadway, Indianapolis.

GEORGE GOTH, of No. 846 Elm street, Indianapolis, was born in Ripley county, Ind., Aug. 7, 1846, a son of Valentine and Alvinie Goth, both natives of Germany, who came to this country in 1846, but a few months before the birth of their son, George, locating on a farm in Ripley county, Ind. In 1881 they removed to Dillsboro, Dearborn Co., Ind., where they made their home with a daughter for the remainder of their lives. The father died at the age of seventy-five years, and the mother long survived his loss, dying at the age of ninety-five years, in May, 1900. They were the parents of nine children. Two died in infancy, and six came to this country with their parents. At this writing, five are living: John, Elizabeth, Mary, Jacob and George. Valentine died at the age of sixty-four years. Jacob and George were Union soldiers during the Civil war. Jacob, who now resides at Danville, Illinois, served in the 32d Indiana Volunteer Infantry. Peter died at the age of seventy-eight years.

George Goth was reared on the home farm, and enlisted July 9, 1863, in Company B, 7th Indiana Cavalry. A short time after the closing of the war Companies B and F of this regiment were consolidated at Homestead, Texas, in July, 1865, and Mr. Goth was discharged at Austin, Texas, Feb. 18, 1866. He displayed soldierly qualities in a high degree in the many important battles and conflicts in which he was engaged, notably at Okalona; Guntown, Port Gibson, Grand Gulf, Verona, Egypt, Hatchie's River, Hurricane Creek, Oxford, LaMavos, all in Mississippi; at Independence, Big Blue, and Little Osage, in Missouri; Raleigh, Bolivar, and Mine Creek, in Tennessee, and at Bastrop, La. He was wounded at the battle of Guntown, where he received a severe flesh wound in the leg below the right knee.

Mr. Goth was married Sept. 26, 1867, to Miss Kate C., born in 1849, a daughter of John and Johanna Reichardt, natives of Germany, who came to this country before their marriage. They were long residents of Marietta, Ohio, but removed to Indianapolis in 1881, where the father died at the age of seventy-six years. His widow is still living in this city. Mrs. Goth is the eldest of their nine children.

Mr. and Mrs. Goth have a pleasant home on Elm street, where they are fond of receiving their many friends, and know well how to dispense a generous hospitality. Mr. Goth is an honored member of the Joseph R. Gordon Post, No. 281, G. A. R. In politics he is a Republican. He and his good wife belong to the Methodist Church. Mrs. Goth was organist of the Second German Methodist Episcopal Church from 1879 to 1898. She has been treasurer of the Home and Foreign Missionary Society for eighteen years; was president of the Aid Society one year, and treasurer seven years. She is a member of Joseph R. Gordon Corps, No. 281, W. R. C., in which she was secretary one year, treasurer four years, and president two years. She had one brother and two nephews in the Philippine war. In times of war and peril Mr. Goth was a loyal, gallant and intelligent soldier, and in times of peace and prosperity is an honored, useful and highly respected citizen.

HEZEKIAH LOCKWOOD TRUEBLOOD, a tool maker in the E. C. Atkins & Co.'s mammoth plant, where are manufactured all kinds of saws and saw tools, is one of the substantial citizens of this section of the State, and belongs to that class of citizens who are loyal to duty in whatever walk of life they are to be found. Mr. Trueblood was born in Elizabeth City, N. C., Dec. 17, 1834, son of Malachi and Sarah Trueblood, both of English descent. In 1836 his parents emigrated to Indiana, and settled in Columbus, Madison county, where the son grew to manhood. He acquired his education in the district schools of his home town, and on leaving his books he took up the saw and hammer, thoroughly mastering the carpenter's trade. In 1859 when the gold fever broke out in the West, Mr. Trueblood and four of his friends, Fred and George Heater, of Columbus, John Stevens, of Noblesville, Ind., and Jackson Birkhart, of Indianapolis, got together and decided to try their fortunes. They procured all the necessities for camping, and started in the early part of April from Columbus, Ind., for Pike's Peak. The party traveled the whole way on foot, joining a continuous string of wagons. When they reached Fort Kearney they saw a herd of buffalo, which they estimated to cover over 100 miles in length with a quarter of a mile depth. After seventy-five days of hard traveling, they arrived at their destination, then a small village called Cherryville, which is now the well known Denver. Had they known the value the land would have attained to-day and kept what they had an option on, they would have been millionaires, but as it was they just managed to dig out enough to pay expenses back home.

In the very beginning of the Civil war his name was given as one willing to risk all for his country, but the Indiana quota was full, and it was not until 1865 that he was mustered into service, being assigned to Company I, 154th Regiment, under Capt. Jacob Schoffstall and Col. Frank Wilcox. His regiment was sent into Virginia and near Winchester was on guard duty until no longer required, and in November of that year the enlisted men were mustered out near Winchester, Virginia.

Mr. Trueblood at once resumed his work as a carpenter, and he continued at this until 1880, in which year he was elected justice of the peace, an office he filled with great ability for four years. When his term expired he came to Indianapolis, and found employment with E. C. Atkins & Co., with whom he still remains—a long period of twenty-two years. He has made himself one of the most reliable men in the place. In 1897 he invented a combination saw tool, which was patented in May, 1898, and which is in constant daily use in E. C. Atkins & Co.'s large establishment. Many of the improvements that have taken place in methods and work in the last twenty years have been attributed to Mr. Trueblood.

On April 16, 1855, Mr. Trueblood was united in marriage with Sarah Ellen Tibbitt, daughter of Seth and Mary (Talbot) Tibbitt. For over fifty years Mrs. Trueblood has been a faithful wife and mother, and much of the success of her husband is attributed to her unflinching sympathy and interest. Three children came to brighten their home: Mrs. Mary Emma Fitzgerald, of Indianapolis; Mrs. George E. Kean, of Chicago; and Samuel Tibbitt Trueblood, of Los Angeles, Cal., who married Alice Winters, of Indianapolis. Mr. Trueblood is a pioneer member of Ononga Tribe, No. 50, I. O. R. M., of Anderson, Ind., one of the largest tribes in the State; and he also belongs to George H. Chapman Post, No. 209, G. A. R. Mr. and Mrs. Trueblood now reside at No. 1624 Yandes street, Indianapolis.

A. THOMSON, now residing at his pleasant residence on West Washington street, Indianapolis, is one of the most competent engineers in the employ of the I. B. & W. R. R. Co. (now the Big Four), having filled that position on a passenger train over that road for thirty years. A successful business man as well, he is now one of the well-to-do citizens of his place. His high intellectual endowments and large capacity for work, traits that have thus brought him to the front, he has undoubtedly inherited from his good Scotch ancestors.

The Thomson family from which he claims descent is one of the very old families of Scotland, and it numbers among its members men prominent in all walks of life, especially in the literary and religious fields. James Thomson, one of this same family, born in 1700, was a noted poet and play-writer, whom the government of Wales pensioned in acknowledgment of his genius.

William Thomson, father of A. Thomson, has achieved his success mainly as an agriculturist. Born in Scotland, son of Alexander Thomson, of that country, he has there for the most part made his residence through life. Reared in a cultivated community, he there received practical training for the duties of life. Both education and environment decided him upon reaching manhood to engage in agriculture, and settling upon a farm in the shire of Banff, he there followed his pursuit with marked success for many years. As fast as he made money he branched out in his industry, and being a wise financial manager, as well as practical farmer, he amassed in time considerable wealth. After many years of fruitful industry, he finally retired from active life, and moved to the city of Macduff, where he now resides.

During his young manhood Mr. Thomson married Margaret Taylor, of Scotland, whose family has had representatives in the same locality for two or three hundred years. Her parents, Alexander Taylor and his wife, were prosperous farming people, who passed together seventy-six years of their long and fruitful lives, he dying at the age of ninety-five years, and she at the age of ninety-seven. To Mr. and Mrs. Thomson have been born three children: A., who is mentioned below; William, who now resides in Emporia, Kans.; and James, who died at the age of thirteen years.

Mr. Thomson is a man of influence, and is well-known and highly respected in the city where he is now living in retirement, being one of the freeholders of that place. Possessed of an indomitable will, plenty of foresight, and much force of character, he has crowned with success every business enterprise. He is a man of high ideals, and of marked integrity of character, and both he and his wife belong to the Presbyterian Church.

A. Thomson was born in Banffshire, Scotland, Dec. 21, 1841, and there on his father's well-conducted farm grew to manhood. In the excellent schools of his locality he laid the foundation of a solid education, which he has since supplemented by reading and contact with the world. Remaining under the paternal roof until he was twenty-three years old, he assisted his father for some time in the management of the farm, and later hired out with a railroad company, and began tending and firing engines, thus acquiring knowledge of an industry of growing importance. In 1865 hoping to better his prospects in a new country, he left home and friends and came to Canada, where, ready to take advantage of the first opening, he went to work as a farm hand. Later he found a more desirable position in the oil regions of his vicinity, and assisted in sinking wells for some time. The year 1867 found him working as a farm hand, again, now in Champaign, Ill., but not for any length of time. Here he soon found an opening in the trade which he had started learning in Scotland, engineering, and for some time he continued this occupation in a mill in that locality. Then, in November, 1869, he secured a position in his line with the I. B. & W. R. R. Co. (now part of the Big Four), with which he has since been employed. After thirteen months as fireman, in 1870, he was promoted to engineer of a freight train, and then on Jan. 20, 1873, he was made engineer on a passenger train, where he has since continued. From the start he has been a careful student of engineering, taking pains to keep thoroughly abreast of the advancement in that science, and he has been especially successful in his practical application of his knowledge. Sound judgment and especial attention to details have been his guiding stars, and have assisted him in avoiding wrecks, and accidents of all kinds. The only disasters that have befallen his trains have come through spreading rails, or some other agency over which he had no oversight. He has never, however, been injured in an accident, nor has any one under his care. Throughout his thirty-five years' service for the same company he has been considered one of the most trustworthy and competent employes in his line. Though he has given the main strength of his manhood to the trade which he has so long and successfully followed, he has at the same time been engaged now and then in real estate speculation, has made well on investments in that line, and, besides his handsome two-story brick residence on West Washington street, he now owns other property in Indianapolis, which he rents to advantage.

On June 16, 1886, Mr. Thomson married Irene Fatout, who was born in Indianapolis, March 3, 1855, and of this union there have been three children: Mary M., born May 25, 1888; William D., July 31, 1891, and Eunice, Sept. 1, 1893.

Mr. Thomson is one of those men predestined by nature for a successful career. Courage coupled with foresight, energy with perseverance, and a fertile intellect with fidelity to his work are among his inherent traits. Confident of his worth, he commands the respect of all who know him; and he has many friends in Indianapolis, where he has long made his residence, being a member in good standing of the A. F. & A. M.; the K. T.; and the B. of L. E. Both he and his wife belong to the Presbyterian Church. He is well-informed upon all the leading questions of the day; and in politics he affiliates with the Republicans.

David B. Fatout, father of Mrs. Thomson, was the son of Moses Fatout, a prominent pioneer of Marion county, Indiana. Reared to farm work, the younger Mr. Fatout followed that occupation for the most part throughout his early manhood. Later he settled in Indianapolis and there engaged in the contracting business, winning for himself an established place in that line. He died in 1891. During his early manhood he married Mary Hosbrook, an early settler of Ohio. She died in 1885. Of this union there were four children: Bates, who is now a civil engineer; Irene (Mrs.

Thomson), who is mentioned above; Daniel, a prominent contractor, and road builder; and Eunice, who married a Mr. Brundrett, and resides in Indianapolis. The father of these was a man of influence, who filled offices of trust and responsibility, acting as assessor of Center township for some time. In his political faith he was a strong Republican.

WILLIAM H. PEACOCK. Few men have been more prominently identified with the early history of railroading in our country, or have passed through more thrilling experiences in that line than has this patriarch of locomotive engineering, now residing at the pleasant residence of his son-in-law on East Tenth street, Indianapolis. Though now in his eighty-seventh year he is still at his post of duty, being employed in the shops of the Big Four Company.

Mr. Peacock comes of good English-Irish stock. His grandfather, Thomas Peacock, Sr., was a man of prominence and ability. Born in England, he there, in a refined and cultivated community, received good rearing. Of a military turn of mind, at an early date he entered the English Army, where he proved himself a soldier of no ordinary ability. After some preliminary service he was stationed in Ireland, in the interest of the English government; and there he remained throughout the rest of his active life. A thoroughly trustworthy and competent soldier, he fully merited the faith imposed in him. He passed his last days in Ireland, and there at an advanced age he died. By his marriage there were several children, all of whom he reared in Ireland. Of these, two sons came to America: William H.; and Thomas, who is mentioned below.

Thomas Peacock, Jr., father of the William H., whose name heads this sketch, was a weaver by trade, and was a man of brilliant attainments, who prominently identified himself with the early manufacturing interests of our country. Born in England, he was but a small boy when his parents settled in Ireland, and there he received his rearing and practical training for life's activities. Attracted by the many busy looms of his country, he early gave his time and attention to weaving, and possessed of inherent ability in that line, as well as the gift of applying himself to his tasks, he soon mastered the craft. Embarking upon life as a weaver, he followed that industry for several years in Ireland, meeting with very good success. Hoping, however, to better his prospects, he later came to America. Here he found no difficulty in pushing his enterprise, and soon found a good business opening in Baltimore, where he settled, and began following his business. While here the War of 1812 broke out, and with a newly born loyalty to his adopted country, he enlisted and rendered valiant service. After the war he branched out in business very extensively, opened a large manufacturing establishment, and, employing a large force of men, carried on a highly successful industry for some years. Finally, however, through the dishonesty of his bookkeeper, he met with business reverses, and at his death left but little to show for his many years of fruitful activity. His war experience undermined his health, and in 1825 he died.

Some time after his arrival in the United States Mr. Peacock married Ellen McGlamore, who was born in Ireland, and when a child started with her parents to America. Under the fostering care of a wise and intelligent mother, she received careful rearing. She lived to an advanced age and died some time in the seventies. Her father died on the voyage to America. Her mother, a good Roman Catholic, carefully superintended the rearing and education of the children of the family, who numbered five in all. A son died on the voyage to America, and was buried with his father at sea. The oldest daughter married a Mr. McFadden, and they had one daughter, who married a Mr. Jordan, a sea captain, and became the mother of William Jordan, who is now a Catholic Priest, in the city of Baltimore, Maryland. Margaret, who is now deceased, never married and the same is true of Catherine. Ellen (Mrs. Peacock) is mentioned above. To Mr. and Mrs. Peacock were born six children: (1) James, who was reared in Baltimore, settled in Texas in his early manhood, and there under Sam Houston, fought in the Mexican War, and assisted in the capture of Santa Ana. After the war he settled in San Antonio, Texas, where he eventually became one of the solid business men and large property owners of the place. There he also married and reared his children. During the Civil war he enlisted in the Federal army, and came to Memphis, Tennessee, since which time he has been lost trace of. (2) Mary, who never married, is now deceased. (3) Stephen, a patternmaker, died in 1839. (4) William H. is mentioned below. (5) Thomas, who was a clerk, died in Baltimore in 1895.

(6) John, a railroad mechanic, also died in that city in 1890. Mr. Peacock was a strong man, both physically and intellectually, and possessed many charming social attributes, which attracted to him hosts of admiring friends. Cultivated, broad minded, and endowed with the highest order of intellect he commanded respect in all circles, especially in the business world, where he cast his lot in life. He was a man of high moral principles, was reared in the Protestant faith, but later in life worshiped with his wife in the Roman Catholic Church. He confined his activities mainly to the sphere of business; and in political matters evinced but little interest.

William H. Peacock was reared in an atmosphere of business, and subjected to the strict discipline of apprentice life. Born in Little Falls, New Jersey, June 17, 1820, he was but two years old when his parents last settled in Baltimore, and but five when his father died. In spite of the strenuous effort to keep her family together the mother found it advisable to give her children trades; and as young William evinced a decided bent toward mechanics, when he was sixteen years old she bound him out for five years to the firm of George Gillingham and Ross Winans, probably the largest manufacturers of railroad supplies in the country at that time. This concern owned the Mount Clare Machine Works, employed between six hundred and seven hundred men and boys, and furnished locomotives and other rolling stock, in fact all railroad goods to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and many similar large concerns. Each year they made new improvements in their goods, and it was this company that patented the eight wheel car. Here perseveringly applying himself to his work young William, gradually mastered the details of the machinist's trade and became especially skilled in the construction and handling of locomotives. After five years steady work he was considered one of the most proficient young machinists in the shops. During this same period, ambitious to make the most of himself, he passed each evening, after a hard day's work, in attendance upon night schools, and thus acquired a good common-school education. In 1839, at the age of nineteen, he was given charge of an engine running over the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, a primitive affair, made of two-inch by seven-eighths of an inch strap iron rails, laid end to end on granite slabs, perforated with wooden plugs, into which the rail spikes were driven. His crude engine, with a perforated tin lantern, lighted by a candle for a head light, necessitated the stirring up of the furnace fire to send a shower of sparks up the chimney, in order sufficiently to warn approaching night trains of danger. The whole outfit moved with such deliberation stops were scarcely noticeable, and the train crew often moved ahead to respike rails, where the plugs had worked loose. Under such conditions Mr. Peacock, for several years served as engineer on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and then, in 1846, he hired out with the Baldwin Company, pioneer manufacturers of railroad goods in Philadelphia, who needed a competent and experienced machinist to set up their engines and start their goods over the west. A short test proved Mr. Peacock was the man for the place, and many a locomotive and new car, shipped to Pittsburg by canal, and from there floated down the Ohio on flat boats, the young engineer ran over new roads in Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana, until each had been disposed of to the company contemplating the purchase. For many years he continued this line of business, not only for the Baldwin Company, but at different times for other large concerns; and he was one of the most successful men of his day in starting in operation and disposing of railroad goods. In Ohio alone he placed and started in operation no less than seventeen locomotives, and it was he who set up all the first engines started on the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Line. With the opening up of the Indianapolis & Cincinnati Railroad, he there accepted a regular position as engineer, and attending to his business with his usual fidelity and ability he continued there for about eight years. His record as a trustworthy and competent engineer by this time could scarcely be surpassed, and as a man for the emergency, in 1863, he was employed by the government—after having previously set up two of its new engines on the M. & O. Line—to act as engineer on trains being pushed through Southern battle fields. Nothing but a cool head and the greatest skill in engineering could have enabled him to pass through some of his thrilling encounters. Among other hard places was that at the last battle of Corinth, where, caught with a train load of provisions between two fires with bush whackers everywhere, he spied a pile of ties on the track before him. To hesitate was death; so, choosing the lesser danger, he called down the three guards, stationed on the tender, pulled open the throttle, while everybody lay low, and, trusting to the cow catcher to clear the track, ran the gauntlet heroically, amid a volley of bullets, and to everybody's astonishment escaped unharmed. On a similar occasion he narrowly escaped a club fired by one of the southern gentry at his cab, the fireman receiving a glancing blow from the same missile in his stead. After the war Mr. Peacock continued railroad engineering, taking a position first on the Madison & Indianapolis Line, later on the St. Louis & Bellefontaine, now a part of the Big Four system, and finally on the J. M. & I., filling each place with his usual efficiency. In 1876, while making a run on the last named road, he met with injuries, which caused him eventually to retire from the road. Then accepting a position as machinist in the Big Four shops in Indianapolis, he has continued there ever since. Though now over eighty-six he is still remarkably strong and vigorous. During his long service he has filled some of the most responsible places in the sphere of railroad engineering in our country. He has been remarkably free from accidents, his severest one having occurred in 1865, while in charge of a new engine on the J. M. & I. R. R. Here the explosion of a boiler gave him severe cuts on the neck and face and bad burns on his arms, which necessitated his laying off for recovery for about six months.

Mr. Peacock has been married twice, first at Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1847, to Sophia Bronner, who with their son, died of cholera some time later in that city. He afterward married Mary Harry, who was born in Ohio, only daughter of Samuel Harry, a carriage and wagon manufacturer, who settled in Xenia, Ohio, in the early days, and became widely known in that section, serving for some years as high sheriff of Greene county. He died at Xenia, in 1867, a noble Christian gentleman, long prominent in the Presbyterian Church. By his second marriage Mr. Peacock has five children: Ella and Mary, who have never married; Sarah, who married James M. Leach, who was reared to farm work, and is now a machinist in the Big Four shops at Brightwood; Samuel Harry, a pressman on the Indianapolis Star; and William Fowler, a clerk in the employ of the Big Four Railroad Company in Indianapolis.

Mr. Peacock has been an eye witness of the many improvements in railroading from the earliest days to the present. He has seen the flat, iron bars laid on stringers; and the primitive little grasshopper and engine consisting of an upright boiler, on platform and wheels, changed to the perfected locomotive of the present day. Having always kept apace of new inventions and advanced methods in railroading, he is now one of the best informed men upon the subject in his profession. He has been alive to all the interesting occurrences in his sphere of business, and there are two circumstances which he relates with especial pleasure: It was his train on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad that started President Polk's message from Washington for circulation far and near; and he carried Lincoln from Indianapolis to Cincinnati on his way to his inauguration. A man of strong convictions on all questions, in politics he at first affiliated with the Democrats, but during the Civil war with the Republicans and now votes independently. Reared in the Roman Catholic faith, he has always adhered to the teachings of that Church. His wife belonged to the Presbyterian Church. Fraternally he is a member of the I. A. of M.

AMERICUS FISK. A native son of Indiana, a representative of one of its sterling pioneer families, and one who honored the Commonwealth through his valiant services as a loyal soldier in the war of the Rebellion, this worthy citizen of Indianapolis well merits consideration.

Mr. Fisk was born June 4, 1842, on a farm in Hancock county, son of George W. and Elizabeth (McKenzie) Fisk, and grandson of John Fisk, a native of Italy, whence he came to America in the Colonial epoch, locating in Maine. During the Revolution he dealt extensively in live stock, running the blockade and supplying cattle for the soldiers of the Continental armies. He was captured by the British, who confiscated all his cattle and vessels and held him a prisoner until the close of the war, the government eventually reimbursing him in part for his losses. From Maine he removed to Kentucky, which was then on the very frontier of civilization, becoming one of its pioneers, and there also he was engaged in stock dealing, accumulating a good estate and being successful. At one time he owned valuable property in what is now the city of Cincinnati, where he gave a homestead to one of his daughters, Hannah, who still owns the property and resides in that city, now over eighty years of age. John Fisk died in Kentucky. He was the father of a large family, of whom we have record of John, William, Frank, Alexander, George W., Mrs. Ann Blue, Mrs. Martha Rainer, Mrs. Lewis, Mrs. Hannah Paine (of Cincinnati), and four others whose names the subject of this sketch can not recall.

George W. Fisk was a child at the time of his parents' removal from his native state, Maine, to Kentucky, and he was reared under the discipline of the frontier, receiving such educational advantages as were to be had in an isolated and new section of the country. He was married in Kentucky to Elizabeth McKenzie, a native of that State, and about 1833 came with his wife and their one child to Indiana, taking up a tract of government land in Hancock county. The entire 160 acres was heavily timbered, but he developed a good farm, which continued to be his home until 1871, when he divided the homestead among his children, all but the eldest of whom were born there. Removing to Kansas, he there purchased a farm to the cultivation of which he gave his attention for a number of years, then disposing of the same and taking up his residence in Madison, that State, where he lived retired until his death, in 1886, at a venerable age. It may be here stated that the late James Fisk, the well known New York financier, was of the same family. George W. Fisk was a man of genial and kindly nature and was ever ready to aid his neighbors during the early pioneer days in Indiana, when such co-operation was appreciated and practically essential. He endured the usual hardships and deprivations of pioneer life, but won success by his industry and good management, while to him was accorded the utmost confidence and respect of all who knew him. In politics he was originally a Whig and later a Republican, and he gave three of his sons to his country's cause when the integrity of the nation was menaced by armed rebellion. His first wife, the mother of Americus Fisk, was a daughter of Richard McKenzie, who was of Scottish descent and was a prominent planter, slaveholder and tobacco manufacturer of Kentucky. Mr. McKenzie reared three children, James, Patsy (Mrs. Owens), and Elizabeth (Mrs. Fisk).

George W. and Elizabeth Fisk had nine children, as follows: Angeline, wife of A. W. Huntington; Granville, a Union soldier during the Civil war, now a farmer in Arkansas; Pratha, the wife of A. Millner; Susana, wife of J. McLaren; Americus; Othneal, a Union soldier, now residing in Hutchinson, Kans.; William P., a farmer of Hancock county, Ind.; Sarah E., wife of S. Ridman; and George W., who was a member of the regular army, now a farmer in South Dakota. The devoted wife and mother, who was a consistent member of the M. E. Church, died in 1850, and Mr. Fisk subsequently married Mrs. Sophia Curry, who bore him one son, Joseph, now a resident of Greenfield, this State.

Americus Fisk remained at the parental home, receiving his education in the local schools and assisting in the work of the farm, until the fall of 1861, when he responded to the call of higher duty and tendered his services in defense of the Union. He became a private in Company A, 57th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, for a term of three years, and before the expiration of his first term re-enlisted, thus serving as a gallant and loyal soldier for nearly five years, covering practically the entire period of the war. His regiment was first assigned to the Army of the Tennessee, with which it participated in much arduous service, taking part in a number of severe battles and many skirmishes. Thus Mr. Fisk was in active service in the battles of Pittsburg Landing, Corinth and Iuka, whence the command marched to Louisville, Ky., and on to Mumfordsville, Perryville and Murfreesboro, taking part in the capture of Chattanooga and the famed battles of Chickamauga and Missionary Ridge. It thereafter marched with Sherman to Knoxville, Tenn., and finally to Strawberry Plains, where the winter was passed. Here Mr. Fisk re-enlisted, but secured a furlough of thirty days, which he passed at home, after which he rejoined his regiment at Chattanooga. Thence he started forth on the Georgia campaign, taking part in the fight at Stony Face Mountain, and proceeding to Dalton and on through the great Atlanta campaign, after which the command continued the march through to Blue Springs, Tenn., where the tidings of Lee's surrender were received. The regiment then proceeded to Nashville, where was held a review of General Thomas' command, after which General Granger took the command which was ordered to Texas, where it continued in service until 1865, when it returned to Indianapolis. There Mr. Fisk was mustered out and received his honorable discharge. He suffered three slight wounds while in the service and was three times captured, effecting his escape on two of the occasions and being paroled on the third. He has never recovered from the effects of his army service, suffering from chronic ailments induced by the hardships of the various campaigns.

After his discharge Mr. Fisk returned to the homestead farm, continuing to devote his attention to farming until 1871, when he came to Indianapolis, where he was employed in teaming for one year. For the next twenty years he was here identified with the manufacturing of brick, when advancing age and the disability resulting from his military service necessitated his seeking less arduous occupation. Thereafter he conducted a market gardening business until 1901, when he retired from active labor. Mr. Fisk has an attractive home on Churchman avenue, and also owns other property in the city. In politics he is a Republican, and fraternally he is a valued member of George H. Thomas Post, G. A. R., of his home city.

In 1867 Mr. Fisk was united in marriage to Miss Malinda Fletcher, who was born in Indianapolis, one of the twelve children of John Fletcher, the others being as follows: Milton, William, Harvey, Polk, Lutitia (Mrs. William Morris), Harvey, Bishop, Walker, Phoebe (Mrs. H. Clifford), Calvin and Charles.

Mrs. Fisk, who was a devoted member of the M. E. Church, died March 2, 1877, leaving the following children: Wallace, a mechanic of Indianapolis; William H., also of Indianapolis; Edward, who likewise is a mechanic; Elizabeth, Mrs. Vance; and Ida, wife of Clarence Stanley. All are married and have families, Mr. Fisk having ten grandchildren. Margaret Fisk lives with her grandparents, her mother, Nellie, wife of Harry Fisk, being deceased.

Mr. Fisk married for his second wife Mrs. Angeline Stuck, widow of John Stuck, and daughter of William Fletcher, a native of Ohio, and an early settler of Indianapolis, where Mrs. Fisk was born Feb. 12, 1842. Her father was totally blind for forty years and his death occurred in this city in January, 1899. Mrs. Fisk has one brother, Bishop, who is a resident of Indianapolis. By her first marriage she had one child, John W. Stuck, who is now in the far west, and one son has also been born of her marriage to Mrs. Fisk, George W., named in honor of his paternal grandfather. George W. Fisk is married and has one child, Angie Elizabeth.

ALANSON HEDGE, of Indianapolis, is a pioneer railroad employe, now in the service of the Big Four Railroad Company. He has had a wide and varied experience—serving, at different times, as fireman, brakeman and conductor, and is thoroughly conversant with the different methods of railroading from the most primitive stages to the highly developed scientific devices of the present day. Throughout his career he has ever shown himself a most competent and faithful workman, and has remained with his present company for fully thirty-three years, being in train service for twenty-four years during this period.

Mr. Hedge comes of good English stock. His grandfather, Asa Hedge was of English descent, was one of the early settlers of New England, and there for the most part resided throughout his active career. When the Revolutionary war broke out he enlisted and served his country valiantly for some time. After the war he settled upon a farm in Massachusetts, where he engaged in agriculture very successfully for many years. Proving himself a practical and well-to-do farmer, he won a leading place among the agriculturists of his section. After many years of fruitful labor he died in that State. He had three children: Samuel, Daniel, and Nathan.

Samuel Hedge, father of Alanson, was a man of great force of character and energy, and figured prominently, in the early days, in the development of the agricultural resources of Jennings county, Ind. Born in Massachusetts, he there grew to manhood on his father's farm, receiving excellent training in agriculture. He availed himself of every opportunity of acquiring book knowledge, and became well informed upon all practical and general subjects. He passed some years of his early life in Boston, and early had practical business training. While in that city he married Susan Prentice of that place, and of this union there were six children, all of whom moved with their parents to Indiana: Harrison, who is now a farmer; Emaline, who married A. Chandler; Susan, who married P. Ross; Elizabeth, who married a Mr. Wilson; Nelson, who settled in California, and started the first stage route out of San Francisco; and Alanson, who is mentioned below.

After marriage Mr. Hedge settled upon a farm in the State of New York, where he began his agricultural work in earnest. He had made a good start, and was branching out in his business when the war of 1812 broke out and he enlisted to fight for his country. After the war he returned to his farm and carried on his agricultural pursuits on a larger scale than ever, and continuing to prosper he remained there for many years. Eventually, however, hoping to better his own prospects and open up good opportunities for his children, in 1836 he moved to Indiana, and purchasing a large tract of wild land near Vernon, Jennings county, settled there and began making improvements. Taking up his work with energy and determination, he transformed the wild tracts into thriving grain fields and productive gardens. He erected good buildings, gradually increased his live stock, as well as his farming implements, and in time had one of the valuable farms of his locality. There he labored for many years, and passed his last days, dying at the advanced age of ninety-three years. His wife passed away many years prior to his death.

Mr. Hedge was a typical pioneer, large-hearted and generous, as well as capable, and being exceedingly hospitable he attracted to himself friends from far and near. He was broad-minded and well informed upon all the questions of the day. In political matters he affiliated with the Whigs, and later with the Republicans. He was a man of high ideals, progressive in thought, and a consistent member of the Universalist Church. As a good soldier he was remembered by his country, and he deservedly drew a pension.

Alanson Hedge was born in Steuben county, N. Y., Aug. 6, 1829, and on his father's well conducted farm there passed the early years of his life. Later he moved with his parents to Indiana, where he took a strong hand in opening up that section of the country to settlers. Availing himself of every opportunity of pursuing his studies in the public schools of his various localities, he gained his early education, which he has since supplemented with reading and contact with the world. In 1849, when about twenty years old, he went to Madison, Ind., where he soon secured a position as brakeman on a freight train over the Madison & Indianapolis railroad, then under the management of Superintendent Jack Bruff. Efficient and conscientious service won him rapid promotion, and after a short period he began firing an engine over the same line. When he began his work flat iron bars laid on stringers were still in vogue for tracks; the locomotives were light affairs, weighing not over twenty-three tons, and were without headlights and pilots. After some time, however, improved equipments came into use, and with the introduction of the "T" rail preparatory to fast running he fired the engine for the first train that doubled the road between Madison and Indianapolis, performing a feat which had been laughed to scorn by an incredulous public. After five years, in 1854, he left the Madison & Indianapolis railroad and accepted a more desirable position as passenger conductor on the old Bee Line road, making his headquarters at Galion, Ohio. Strictness in carrying out orders and a courteous bearing toward passengers soon won him the confidence of employers and the general public and for ten years he remained in this position. For the next few years he led a varied career, acting first as conductor on the Cincinnati & Indianapolis railroad, from 1864 to 1866, and on the Pan Handle from Indianapolis to Columbus until 1869, when he accepted a place as carrying passenger conductor on the I. B. & W. road. This position was in every respect a most desirable one, and giving very general satisfaction to both his employers and the public generally he remained there for twenty-four years, retiring in 1893, when he felt the need of a less strenuous life. He has since been kept on the payroll, now serving in the lighter work of flagman at crossings. Mr. Hedge has experienced many of the hardships of railroading, and has been in many wrecks, especially in the early days, when it was an every day occurrence for trains to run off the tracks. In some of these he has been badly mangled. He has been a prudent business man, always saving some of his earnings for a rainy day, and he has from time to time invested in city property. He now owns a pleasant home in Indianapolis, where he has long made his abode.

In 1856 Mr. Hedge married Samantha Anthony, who was born at Muncie, Ind., Aug. 1, 1829. Of this union there have been two children: Ella, who married James Newport, a carriage painter, of Indianapolis; and Cora, who married Miles Clark, a machinist, of Indianapolis. Both have attractive homes in the city.

Mr. Hedge is a man of intelligence, and possesses a large fund of practical knowledge, having throughout his career been fully alive to all the progressive movements in his special field of activity. He has given the main strength of his manhood to his work and has won the lasting regard of his employers. A man of high ideals, and marked integrity of character, he wins friends for himself at every step in life. He and his family are consistent members of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and fraternally he affiliates with the A. F. & A. M. In politics he has always been a firm Republican.

Judge Joseph Anthony, father of Mrs. Hedge, figured prominently in the early political affairs of Indiana. For many years of his early life he resided in Ohio. When a young man he came to Indiana with his brother Samuel and they purchased large tracts of land and started what is now the thriving city of Muncie. His force of character and his high intellectual endowments made him a most successful political candidate, and he filled many posts of honor, including the offices of auditor (for many years) and judge of the Circuit court (for six years). He was a most successful campaign speaker, and as a staunch Democrat his word carried weight in his section of the country. He was a man of marked integrity of character and keen sense of honor. He lived to an advanced age, dying in Muncie, where he had long made his home. His wife was a worthy member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Their children were: Samantha, who is mentioned above; Clinton, now a successful farmer; Joseph; and Mary, who married S. Buser.

WILKISON M. TOUT. This well-known pioneer of Indianapolis was brought to this city in 1847, when a boy of about fourteen years, with his father's family, and has ever since been a resident of the capitol city. He was born at Danville, Hendricks Co., Ind., June 10, 1833, the son of Isaac W. and Elizabeth (Foster) Tout, early and well known pioneers of the State. The father was a brick-mason, and from him Wilkison M. learned that trade, which he followed for many years.

Mr. Tout married, Sept. 22, 1855, Sarah Morris, daughter of Samuel and Eleanor (Forbes) Morris, who were early settlers of Indianapolis, coming here in 1836. Samuel Morris was born in Salisbury, Md., in 1803, the son of William Morris, a lifelong resident of that State. Samuel when an infant lost his mother and he was her only child. The father, William, subsequently married, and to the second marriage were born several children. Samuel was reared in Maryland and there acquired the trade of ship carpenter. He married Eleanor Forbes, also a native of Maryland and the daughter of Captain Forbes, a well known resident of that State. In 1836 Samuel Morris moved from Maryland to Indianapolis, where he was engaged in the construction of some of the most important public buildings of the day, including the old State house and the present old bridge across White river. He was not a strong man physically and after his removal to Indianapolis his health gradually declined. He died of consumption April 11, 1847, at the early age of forty-four years. Yet in the years of his residence at Indianapolis he proved a most worthy citizen and was held in high esteem. In disposition he was affectionate, and he is held in loving remembrance by his children. He and his wife were members of the Second Presbyterian Church, during the celebrated pastorate of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and it was that eminent divine who preached the funeral sermon of Mr. Morris. The wife and mother survived her husband, passing away in 1854. Seven children were born to Samuel and Eleanor (Forbes) Morris, two sons and five daughters, but two of whom survive: Sarah, the wife of Mr. Tout, born in Somerset county, Md., in 1834; and Mrs. Catherine Stoops, a resident of Indianapolis; Levin J., who died in 1856, aged twenty-seven years; Mrs. Mary A. H. Bramkarup, who died in 1857, aged twenty-three years; William J., who died in 1892, aged fifty-five years; Elizabeth, who died in 1874, aged thirty-five years; and Josephine M., who married Richard Graham and died March 19, 1900. The only child of Mr. and Mrs. Tout, Wilbur, died at the age of two years. Mr. and Mrs. Tout reside at No. 1137 North Meridian street, Indianapolis, and are among the few and honored residents of the city, whose lives at the metropolis of Indiana extend back to the first half of the past century.

JUDGE THOMAS C. WHALLON, Judge of the City Court of Indianapolis, Ind., was born Aug. 12, 1876, at Liberty, Union Co., Indiana.

The Judge's father, Rev. Edward P. Whallon, D. D., is one of the leading members of the clergy of the Presbyterian Church. His mother, Margaret E. (Kitchel) Whallon, was also born in Indiana. She was the mother of five children: Philip S., deceased; Thomas C.; Walter L., of Altoona, Pa.; Albert K., of Wyoming, Ohio; and Arthur J., of the same place.

Dr. Whallon is a power in the Presbyterian body. For the past fifteen years he has been the editor of the Herald and Presbyterian, at Cincinnati, and he is well known in Indianapolis, for several years being at the East Washington Street Church and the Fourth Church. He is a man of extensive learning, a graduate of Hanover College, class of 1868, and both as preacher and editor has made a magnificent record. Prior to assuming the editorship of the Herald and Presbyterian Dr. Whallon owned The Church at Work, which he conducted as the State organ of the Presbyterian Church in Indiana. At the time he assumed his present position this journal was merged into the Herald and Presbyterian.

The Whallon family is of Scotch-Irish extraction. The paternal grandfather of Judge Whallon was Rev. Thomas Whallon, a native of Ohio, born near Cincinnati. He also was a Presbyterian divine, and he was one of the pioneer preachers of his church in the early days in Indiana. He was a graduate of Miami University. His ministerial charges were at Hamilton, Ohio; Richmond, Tipton, Rensselaer, Lexington and Vevay, Ind. His death took place at Oak Park, Ill., in 1891, at the age of seventy-eight years. During the Civil war he was at the front, serving as chaplain in the 101st Regiment, Indiana Volunteer Infantry. Mr. Whallon married Harriet S. Bickle, who still survives, the mother of four daughters and one son. She was a sister of the late Judge William A. Bickle, of Richmond, Ind., and was born in Virginia, her father bringing his family to Centerville, Ind., by wagon, when that was the only mode of transportation. The Bickle family is of Huguenot origin.

Jacob Kitchel, Judge Whallon's grandfather on the maternal side, is a native of Ohio, and still survives, being now a resident of Liberty, Ind. He is a farmer by occupation, and still owns and operates a large farm in Union county. He was an early settler in this State. Mr. Kitchel married (first) Rebecca E. Bennett, and three daughters were born to them. Mrs. Kitchel was a sister of Gen. Thomas Bennett, of the Union army, from Indiana, who was a member of Congress, Territorial governor of Idaho, mayor of Richmond, Ind., and a close and intimate friend of the late Governor Morton.

Thomas C. Whelan

For his second wife Mr. Kitchel married Caroline Allen, and three sons were born to this union. One of Mr. Kitchel's ancestors was the famous Puritan, Robert Kitchel, friend and associate of Oliver Cromwell, one of the founders of New Haven, Conn., in 1639, and later one of the founders of Newark, New Jersey.

Judge Thomas C. Whallon lived at Liberty, Union county, until two years old, and at Vincennes, Ind., that historic city of song and story, which has been immortalized by one of Indiana's gifted romancers, until he was twelve years of age, and then came to Indianapolis, which has been his permanent place of residence ever since. His primary education was obtained in the public schools, and he later attended the Shortridge high school, after which he became a student at Hanover College, where he was graduated in 1898, with the degree of A. B. In 1901 he secured the degree of A. M. In the meantime he attended the Indianapolis Law School, where in 1900 he was given his degree of LL. B., although he was admitted to the Bar in 1899 and practiced through his Senior year. On Oct. 10, 1901, he was appointed deputy city attorney and held the office until March 23, 1903, resigning it to accept the appointment of judge of the city court, tendered him by Governor Durbin for an unexpired term. Three days later he was nominated by the Republican city convention to succeed himself, and was elected Oct. 13, 1903, he being the only candidate on the whole ticket, exclusive of the councilmanic ticket, elected. On June 30, 1905, he was unanimously indorsed by the Republican party to succeed himself, and on Nov. 7, 1905, was re-elected by a handsome majority for a four years' term beginning Jan. 1, 1906, upon which he has now entered.

Judge Whallon was married Sept. 3, 1902, to Mrs. Alice (Fleming) Evans, daughter of John C. Fleming and Harriet (Schaeffer) Fleming, both of whom were born in Frederick county, Md., and one son has been born to this union, Thomas C., Jr. Both Judge and Mrs. Whallon are members of the Second Presbyterian Church, in which Mrs. Whallon is the solo contralto, possessing a voice of wonderful sweetness and volume. Judge Whallon takes an active interest in church work, being a member of one of the principal boards of the church.

Fraternally and socially the Judge has many connections. He is a member of Mystic Tie Lodge, No. 398, F. & A. M.; Keystone Chapter, No. 6, R. A. M.; Raper Commandery, No. 1, K. T.; the A. A. Scottish Rite, Consistory of the Valley of Indianapolis; Murat Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine; Lodge No. 56, K. of P.; Lodge No. 13, B. P. O. Elks; the Phi Delta Theta college fraternity; Indiana Society, Sons of the American Revolution; the Columbia and Marion Clubs; and other organizations. His right to membership in the Sons of the American Revolution comes from the fact that five of his ancestors, on both sides of his family, were officers in the Revolutionary war.

Judge Whallon is also interested in a number of business enterprises and political organizations, in fact is one of the busiest citizens of Indianapolis, as was previously intimated. He resides at No. 1544 East 10th street.

JOSEPH H. SHEPPARD, justice of the peace, whose office is at 8½ North Delaware street, Indianapolis, was born in Fayette county, Ind., March 3, 1853, son of William W. and Mary J. (Blossingham) Sheppard. The father was born in New Jersey, as was also the grandfather, who was a pioneer in Indiana. After a time he moved to Iowa, where he died in old age. He had a small family. The Sheppards are of English ancestry.

William J. Sheppard was a harness-maker all his active life, until his retirement, in 1895. In an early day he came to Indiana and settled at Connersville, where he lived for some years. For eighteen years he was in business at Bentonville, and in 1871 he came to Indianapolis, where he was in business until 1895. He and his wife are Methodists. Three sons and four daughters were born to them, and five of their children are now living: Ann, the widow of Ezra D. Thatcher, of Indianapolis; Squire Joseph H.; Elmer E.; Helen L., the wife of John Ewbank, of Campbellsville, Ky.; and Melvina, the wife of Colby Blakeman, of Indianapolis.

Mrs. William J. Sheppard was born in Virginia. Her father was a native of England, and came to this country as a missionary preacher. His home was in Virginia, where he owned a farm and gristmill, and there he died when well advanced in years. He had a numerous offspring.

Squire Sheppard was reared at Benton-ville, Fayette Co., Ind., where he learned his father's trade, which he followed for some years. Later in life he came to Indianapolis, and for twelve years was employed in the rolling-mills. His education was begun in the common schools, and broadened by contact with and observation of the world. In 1886 he was elected constable and served two years, but was defeated for re-election. Under President Harrison he received an appointment at Washington, D. C., in the railway mail equipment department, which he held for four years, returning to Indianapolis at the end of that time. For some years he was an acting constable, and in 1899 was elected justice of the peace, an office which he is still filling with ability and satisfaction to the public.

Squire Sheppard was married, in 1878, to Miss Anna, daughter of John Rorax, and they had three children, Charles A., Grace and Jessie. Charles A. was killed as the result of falling from a wagon when he was seven years old. Jessie died in infancy. Grace is the widow of Frank Pickens, and was the mother of one child, who is deceased; she now lives with her father. Mrs. Anna Sheppard died in 1888. She was a member of the Methodist Church. On May 30, 1904, Squire Sheppard married for his second wife Mrs. Ella K. Berry, widow of John Berry, and daughter of William Colter, of Lebanon, Ind. She had three children by her former marriage. Mr. Sheppard belongs to the Knights of Pythias, the Red Men, the Elks, and the Masonic fraternity. In politics he is a Republican. He has his home at No. 1531 Prospect street.

JACOB W. HOLLENBECK, well known as superintendent of the city yards, Indianapolis, represents one of the old pioneer families of Indiana. His grandfather, Jacob Hollenbeck, settled with his family in Scott county as early as 1817, being one of the earliest settlers in that region. He was born in Albany, N. Y., and belonged to one of the early Dutch families of that State. When he came to Scott county he brought with him a wife and ten children, six sons and four daughters. There he died in 1844. Personally he was a man of fine character, a sturdy and typical pioneer, honest, industrious and upright, embodying in himself the most marked characteristics of his Holland ancestry. His widow survived many years, and was cared for during her last days in the home of her son Henry. Of the ten children, all lived to maturity, married and reared families of their own. By this time probably all are deceased.

Henry Hollenbeck, the father of Jacob W., born in New York in 1804, was the fifth son and the seventh child of his parents. He lived on the old farm until his death, about 1855. He married Margaret McFadden, a native of Kentucky, and a daughter of James McFadden, who lived in Kentucky all his life. To this union were born five children—four sons and one daughter. Three of the sons, including Jacob W., wore the Union blue in the war of the Rebellion: James Perry, the oldest son, served in the 82d Indiana Infantry, and was killed at the battle of Chickamauga; Jacob W. is mentioned further on; Henry F., who enlisted in the 93rd Indiana Volunteer Infantry, lives in Lexington, Scott Co., Ind.; Enoch R., the youngest son, lives in Oregon; America A., the daughter, is now Mrs. A. R. Baty, of Denver, Colo. The mother of this family died in 1888, at the age of eighty-eight.

Jacob W. Hollenbeck was born March 1, 1828, on the old family homestead in Scott county, where he was educated and reared to manhood. In 1854 he was married to Eliza A. Nichols, a granddaughter of William Nichols, one of the oldest pioneers of that county, and a daughter of Amos Nichols.

Mr. Hollenbeck attended the first inauguration of President Lincoln at Washington, and enlisted the same summer in Company H, 22d Indiana Volunteer Infantry, helping to raise the company and being mustered in as its first sergeant. He took part in the battle of Pea Ridge, and then marched with the regiment to Cape Girardeau, a distance of nearly three hundred miles, in nine days. From that point the command went by steamer to Pittsburg Landing, arriving there some three weeks after the great fight at that point. The regiment assisted in the siege of Corinth, and was then attached to Buell's army at Louisville, Ky. Mr. Hollenbeck had participated in the battle of Perryville, when the state of his health became such that he was transferred to the Veteran Reserve corps and sent to Elmira, N. Y., where he continued until the close of his term of service. Returning home he located at Seymour, Ind., where he remained until his removal to Indianapolis, in 1875, and here he has had his home to the present time. During the first administration of President Cleveland he was appointed a gauger in the revenue service, a position which he held for four years. The city yard on East Market street was under his control for several years, and he proved himself a thoroughly capable and reliable official.

Mr. and Mrs. Hollenbeck have children as follows: Thomas W.; Ann Eliza, wife of J. N. Navin; Jacob Grant; and Effie May, the widow of Daniel F. Creemer. Mr. and Mrs. Hollenbeck lost their first three children by that dread disease, scarlet fever. Their home is at No. 2817 North Illinois street.

Mr. Hollenbeck is a member of Major Robert Anderson Post, G. A. R. He was reared a Democrat, and voted for Franklin Pierce in 1852, but four years later cast his vote for John C. Fremont, the Republican candidate for President. He continued to vote the Republican ticket until after General Garfield's time, but has since resumed his early relations with the Democratic party. The effects of his army life are still with him, and he suffers much from rheumatism. But he possesses an excellent memory, and has many interesting recollections of the early days. He has lived in Indiana seventy-nine years, and is a citizen whose industrious and useful life, honest spirit and upright ways have helped to make the State rich and powerful.

GEORGE W. REID. The genealogy of the Reid family, one of the oldest in the city of Indianapolis, cannot fail to prove of interest in this connection. There the honored father of Mr. George W. Reid, the present representative in Indianapolis, was born in the early days when the now beautiful capital city was a mere straggling village, and as a native son of Indianapolis, and one who has sustained the high standard of an honored name, we are gratified in being able to here enter a brief review of his personal and ancestral history. George W. Reid was born May 7, 1862, in his father's home on Prospect street on a part of the "Old Reid Farm," and in the shadow of the old family homestead, built almost a century ago, and the birthplace of his father. He is a son of Erasmus S. and Adaline (Williams) Reid, both of whom were born in Indianapolis. The father was a son of Archibald C. and Lavina (Ferguson) Reid, the former of whom was born in Charleston, S. C. The family is of Scotch extraction, four brothers of the name having emigrated from Scotland in the Colonial days to New York and Massachusetts, where two remained, while the other two established homes in South Carolina, and from the one who settled in the vicinity of Charleston George W. Reid is descended. It is a matter of record that one or more of the original ancestors were patriot soldiers in the war of the Revolution, serving with distinction, George Reid, a namesake, becoming a colonel in the Revolution.

Archibald Reid, Sr., great-grandfather of our subject, became one of the early settlers of Indiana, in 1814, locating near Connorsville, Fayette county, where he entered claim to a tract of government land, all of which was then a primitive wild. There he reclaimed a good farm, with the aid of his sons, eight of whom had accompanied him to this State, together with four daughters. He became one of the prosperous and influential men of the county and both he and his wife died in Connorsville. Both were devout Presbyterians. Their children were as follows: Ephraim, Zilla (Mrs. Tiner), Archibald, Patsy (Mrs. Harland), William, Jacob, Adah (Mrs. Williams), James, George, Willis, Frances (wife of Dr. Sample) and Earl.

Archibald C. Reid, grandfather of George W. Reid, accompanied his parents on their removal to Indiana, where he was reared to manhood amid the scenes of pioneer life. The State at that time was still under Territorial government. In Butler county, Ohio, he married Lavina Ferguson, daughter of William Ferguson, who was born in Kentucky and was numbered among the pioneers of Butler county, Ohio, where he died. He was a successful and honored farmer. Mrs. Reid accompanied her husband to his home in Connorsville, whence, in 1821, they removed to Marion county, where Mr. Reid entered a tract of land of over 200 acres, southeast of the village of Indianapolis, which had but recently been designated as the capital of the new State. Through the land which he selected runs a creek, to which he gave the name of Pleasant run, the title it still bears. The city limits now, however, extend far beyond the old homestead, the land having been sold and platted and being now solidly built up as an urban district. When the grandfather located here his land was covered with a heavy growth of timber, and he was obliged to make a clearing before proceeding with the erection of his primitive log house, not a tree having previously been felled on the premises. He here improved a fine farm, building later what was the first, but one, brick house in the county, the brick for which was hand-made, on the farm. This continued to be his home until his death, Feb. 23, 1836. His widow survived many years and passed away in 1873. Both were consistent members of the Baptist Church and prominent in the establishment and maintenance of the same in the capital city in early days. Mr. Reid was a man of fine mentality, broad-minded and public-spirited, and he contributed in large measure to the material and civic development of this section of the State and of the capital city, while his energy and business ability enabled him to attain a worthy success. He was a stalwart Democrat and filled offices of public trust and responsibility, including that of representative in the Legislature, while he at all times commanded the confidence and esteem of his fellow-men. The first "auditor" of Indianapolis was Joseph Reid, a member of this family. James Reid, a brother of Archibald Reid, was one of the early cabinet-makers of this city, when only a log cabin town. Of four children born to him, one survives, Dr. James G. Reid, a prominent dentist of Chicago, Illinois.

Archibald and Lavina Reid became the parents of the following named children, all of whom married and settled in Indianapolis, with the exception of one son, James, who died at the age of eighteen years, unmarried: Ervin, the eldest son, passed away in the early fifties, and besides his widow of ninety years, of six children born two daughters now survive—Mrs. William Hagerhorst, of Indianapolis, and Mrs. Frederick Kaupke, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Eliza, Mrs. Robert Tucker, died in 1848, and of four children born, one survives, Dr. Albert Tucker, of Noblesville, Ind., a successful physician in that region for years. John Wesley, who became especially identified with the early growth of the city, died in 1873, and of his three children, Frank and two daughters, the last named survive, Mrs. Lewis Thomas and Mrs. Charles Boaz, both residing in this city. Mary, who became the wife of George Drum, had four children, one daughter surviving, Mrs. Charles Roush, of Indianapolis. Earl, who died in 1887, was well known in Indianapolis as a prominent worker in the Democratic party, as well as a boot and shoe merchant for years in the city; of three children born to him he is survived by a daughter, Mrs. Elmer R. Mauzy, and a son, Robert Earl Reid, both of San Francisco, Cal., the latter engaged in the wholesale boot and shoe business in that city as a member of the firm of Mauzy & Reid. Julia became the wife of Dr. J. T. Belles, and of five children born, one daughter survives, Mrs. Maurice MacMillan, of London, England, wife of the publisher of that name. The youngest, Erasmus S., was the father of our subject, George W. Reid. After the death of the father the mother remained for a number of years at the large farm and the old homestead, which she eventually divided among her children.

Erasmus S. Reid remained with his widowed mother until manhood. He was about fourteen years old when he began an apprenticeship at the printing business. After a number of years he engaged in the grocery trade, and still later he was associated with his brother Earl in conducting a boot and shoe store at No. 28 East Washington street, continuing a number of years in this enterprise, which became known as one of the successful business houses of the city. After closing out this business he devoted his attention to real estate to a greater or less extent, passing the remainder of his life in semi-retirement in his home, on his portion of the old farm, where he had erected a comfortable residence, surrounded by large grounds, and which is still in the possession of the family. It is now one of the best residence districts of the city, on Prospect street. There this honored citizen died Feb. 25, 1891, and his memory is held in lasting esteem by all who knew him, for he was signally true and sincere in all the relations of life. His religious views were in harmony with the tenets of the Baptist Church, in which he was reared, but he never became formally identified with the same. In politics he gave a staunch allegiance to the Democratic party, though he never sought nor desired official preferment. His cherished and devoted wife was born in Indianapolis, Nov. 8, 1834, a daughter of John and Ada Williams, the former a native of Kentucky and the latter of South Carolina. It is established beyond peradventure that John Williams was a lineal descendant of Roger Williams, the great historical character, and two uncles of our subject's mother were Revolutionary soldiers and were killed in the battle of Cowpens. Mrs. Erasmus S. Reid, the mother of our subject, is still living. She is a devoted member of the Baptist Church and has a wide circle of friends in the city, where she passed practically her entire life. She has two children, George W. and Maud A., the latter the wife of David O. Paige, who was born and reared in New Hampshire, and who later became a prominent manufacturer of Detroit, Mich. Mrs. Paige has shown distinctive literary ability, and has taken a prominent part in the best social life of the beautiful city where she now resides.

George W. Reid was reared in Indianapolis, of whose magnificent development and progress he has been a witness, and in whose welfare he has ever maintained a lively interest. He received the advantages of the public schools with a course in the high school. Here he has consecutively maintained his home and has been identified with various lines of business activity, while at the present time he is incumbent of the position of mail carrier in his home city, where he is well known and distinctively popular. He is a member of the Letter Carriers' Association and the K. of P.

In 1899 Mr. Reid was united in marriage to Miss Julia R. Byers, who was born near West Baden, the well known health resort, in Orange county, Indiana.

The old Reid homestead of almost a hundred years ago, still stands on the banks of Pleasant run, the little stream named by Archibald C. Reid in the long ago; the little creek, which was once forded at any point is now spanned by several large, strong bridges, and through time has gradually washed its way nearer and nearer the old homestead, encroaching on the broad sloping lawn and the remnant of the famous apple orchard, planted in 1821, and where to-day one or two of the remaining old trees bud and blossom, as if in defiance of the closing of a century of growth.

GEORGE Q. BRUCE, a rising young attorney of Indianapolis, with office at Nos. 89-90 Lombard building, was born in Center township, Marion Co., Ind., May 31, 1872, son of James A. and Margaret (Thomson) Bruce. He is a grandson of George Bruce, who was born in Butler county, Ohio, in 1802, and for years bought and drove cattle to Philadelphia. At an early day he made his home in Indianapolis, where he died when eighty-two years of age. Two sons were born to him. He was a prominent Mason, and at one time had vast real estate interests.

James A. Bruce was born at what is known as the Bruce homestead, which is now within the city limits of Indianapolis, being at the corner of Twenty-fourth street and Park avenue. He grew to manhood in Center township, Marion county, and obtained his education in the Northwestern Christian University, from which he was graduated with credit. For some years he was a teacher, and then developed a large business as a florist in connection with his farming interests, having extensive greenhouses, and making rapid gains in the enterprise. When he retired he devoted himself to his large real estate holdings until his death, in 1892, at the age of fifty-three years. His widow still survives. They were not connected with any church. Mrs. Bruce is a native of Cincinnati. Two sons and five daughters were born to Mr. and Mrs. Bruce, five of this family now surviving: Mary F.; George Q.; Dr. Charles L., a physician in western Kansas; Margaret T., and Vitae M.

Quintin Thomson, the maternal grandfather of George Q. Bruce, was born in Scotland, and after coming to this country was for some years engaged in the lumber business at Cincinnati, after which he was interested in the fishing business at Put-in-Bay island for a time. In 1860 he came to Indianapolis and here established a bakery at the corner of Meridian and Washington streets, which he carried on during the war. After that had come to an end he moved to Kansas, where he bought a cattle ranch, and died there when over seventy years of age. In his family were four children.

George Q. Bruce was reared in Indianapolis, attended the city schools, and graduated from DePauw University. His professional studies were pursued at the Indiana Law School from which he was graduated in 1897, in which year he was admitted to the Bar. His professional life has so far been confined to this city, and he has here won golden opinions by his ability, industry and wide familiarity with the great calling to which he has devoted his energies and ambitions.

Mr. Bruce was married Nov. 10, 1897, to Miss Sara I., daughter of William and Augusta Abbott, of Washington county, Ohio. Mrs. Bruce is a member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church.

Mr. Bruce is a staunch Republican, though in no sense an office seeker. He gives himself to his profession, and finds the law a jealous mistress. He, his family and sisters live with his mother at the home, No. 2228 College avenue.

WILLIAM J. GLOSSBRENNER was for nearly four decades connected with the United States Railway Mail Service—a period of service that began shortly after his honorable discharge as a volunteer defender of his country's honor, and the length of which alone speaks highly of his ability, fidelity and integrity. He was born in Washington county, Ind., June 23, 1840, son of John and Tiletha (McClentick) Glossbrenner. His great-grandfather was a native of Hagerstown, Maryland.

John Glossbrenner was born in Lancaster county, Pa., and in early manhood settled in Jeffersonville, Clark Co., Ind., where he still lives, having celebrated the ninetieth anniversary of his birth on May 4, 1906.

William J. Glossbrenner received his education in Jeffersonville, Ind., and on leaving school entered the grocery business, at which he was successfully engaged when the Civil war interrupted all his plans. He was one of the first to volunteer, on April 23, 1861, becoming a member of Company A, 12th Ind. V. I., and he was mustered out May, 1862, by reason of the expiration of his term of enlistment, in Washington, D. C. He then proceeded to Nashville, where for three months he was in the quartermaster's department. At the end of that time he returned to Indiana and re-enlisted, this time in the 20th Indiana Battery, Light Artillery, and served until the end of the war, being finally mustered out in the middle of June, 1865. He participated in several important engagements, and had many narrow escapes.

When Mr. Glossbrenner returned to Indiana, at the close of the war, he again entered the mercantile world, at first engaging in the hat and men's furnishing business for a while, and later again taking up the work of a grocer. In September, 1869, he entered the United States Mail Service, at Jeffersonville, Ind., and for thirty-one years was on the road between Indianapolis and Louisville. For this responsible position he was recommended by the well-known United States Senator Oliver P. Morton, the "war governor" of Indiana, and his career justified the high praise he was given by Hon. Mr. Morton at the time. From 1900 he held the position of railway mail clerk, with office at the Union Railway station. He was regarded as one of the few who could well be called United States Mail Service veterans. His death occurred June 28, 1906.

On Oct. 15, 1868, Mr. Glossbrenner was united in marriage with Jane R. Cox, of Waukesboro, Bartholomew Co., Ind. Of the seven children born of this union, six—three boys and three girls—are still living: Alfred Morton (vice-president of Levey Bros. & Co., Indianapolis), Harry Wishard, William Jacob, Jr., Maud Alene, Eliza Estelle, and Mary Jane.

ALBERT A. HILL, M. D., a bright and progressive young physician of Indianapolis, was born near Whitestown, Boone Co., Ind., Nov. 19, 1869, son of Jacob J. and Minnie Hill, both natives of Germany, who, however, were married in Boston, Mass. The father is a machinist by occupation, and is a man of character and worth. Eleven of the thirteen children of Jacob J. Hill and wife are living, and of this family Dr. Hill is the sixth member.

Albert A. Hill received his academic education mostly in the public schools, and began the study of medicine when he was twenty-one. His education entirely represents his own energy and perseverance, as he left home when he was twelve years old, and has worked out his own destiny. The money which he needed to acquire an education for his life work he earned by manual labor, teaching school, canvassing and by various other means. Usually he was able to pay his tuition, but he expected to earn enough to pay his living expenses as the weeks passed. His first medical work was done at Fulte Medical College, a homoeopathic school at Cincinnati, where he completed a three years' course at the age of twenty-four years. After this he entered The Philadelphia Polyclinic College, a "regular" institution, from which he was graduated in 1896. His next move was to take a post-graduate course of one year in polyclinics at Bellevue Hospital in New York. With this thorough professional training he began practice in Indianapolis in 1897, and his success has been pronounced from the start. When he began here he was quite seriously in debt, not only for the obligations he had incurred in acquiring his professional training, but for the support of his aged parents, and the purchasing of a home for them. Since coming here he has cleared off much of this debt, and is in fine financial condition. He has every reason to congratulate himself for the success that has attended his earnest efforts and conscientious endeavor to stand among the first in his noble profession. The community has been quick to realize his worth as a practitioner of the healing art and his character as a man. He is lecturer in the Eclectic Medical College of Indiana on Minor Surgery. Dr. Hill is a general practitioner, with a preference for work along surgical lines. He is a member of the American Medical Association of Physicians and Surgeons.

Dr. Hill has numerous fraternal associations, and is a popular member of the K. P., being medical examiner of the Endowment Rank of that order. He is medical examiner of the Knights and Ladies of Columbia, the M. W. of A., and belongs to the Benevolent Order of Colonials. He is a member of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, Modern Woodmen, Improved Order of Red Men, German Haus and Marion Club. Dr. Hill belongs to the First Presbyterian Church of Indianapolis. In politics he is independent. In 1901 he purchased a fine farm of 180 acres twelve miles south of Indianapolis, valued at $12,000. This is well improved and has forty acres of timber, a good house and barn, and all the modern improvements and conveniences, and is in the hands of a tenant.

J. GEORGE HOERETH, one of the early settlers at Indianapolis, where for many years he was a prominent contractor and builder, was born Oct. 20, 1827, in Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany. His parents, Philip and Clara (Kline) Hoereth, both belonged to prominent families of their locality. Their children were: Adam, who came to America in 1833 and died in 1901, aged eighty-four years (he was a carpenter by trade); Marguerite L., of Germany, where-Christina, Catharina, Mary, Conrad and Dorothea all remained, the only members of the family to come to America being Adam, the eldest, and John George, the seventh.

John George Hoereth attended school at his native place until the age of fourteen. He learned the carpenter's trade with his father and did journeyman work until he was twenty-one years old, when he came to America, landing at New York City in 1849. Joining his brother Adam in Madison, Ind., he continued with him two years, when he came to Indianapolis. Those were the days when seventy-five cents a day was the average paid, but Mr. Hoereth, being an extra good mechanic, was able to command $10.50 a week. By diligent saving he was at last able to begin business on his own account, and continued thus for forty years, the city containing many fine buildings and residences which show his skill. He accumulated means rapidly in those days, when the city was building so fast, but he lost heavily through loaning to friends and going security for them. This only taught him to be less charitable and obliging, and he soon was again on the path to prosperity. In 1893 he retired from active life, and spent his last days in his pleasant home on North East street, surrounded with all the comforts of life.

In 1853 Mr. Hoereth married Miss Wilhelmina Topp, who was born Jan. 11, 1834, at Blomberg, Lippe-Deimold, Germany, daughter of Carl and Fredericka (Riechenmeier) Topp, both of the same place. Mr. Topp was a gardener and florist. He emigrated with his family to America in 1848, landing at New Orleans, whence by way of the river and public conveyance the family reached Indianapolis. He soon bought six acres of land on North Illinois street, which was then in the suburbs, while now the city limits extend miles beyond. Here he established his gardens and greenhouses and continued until his death, in 1851. Doubtless had his life been prolonged he would soon have been able to leave his family in comfortable circumstances. His wife survived him thirty-five years, dying in 1887, aged eighty-five. Their children were: Charles; Frederika, Mrs. John Hepp; Wilhelmina; Caroline, deceased, Mrs. Schneider; Clara, who died, aged twenty-one; Sophia, Mrs. Clark; Charlotte, Mrs. Kotteman; and August, deceased. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Hoereth were: Matilda, Mrs. Fred Weber; Lotta, Mrs. C. Bott; Dorothy, Mrs. O. Schirmer; Minnie, Mrs. O. Peirce; Anna, Mrs. T. Green; and George, who died in 1893, leaving no family.

The death of Mr. Hoereth took place April 28, 1903, and this city lost thereby one of her best and most respected citizens. He was noted as a man of integrity, and through life had been kind and charitable, always ready to help the needy, even when it caused loss to himself. In his later years he affiliated with the Republican party, but he never would consent to hold office. He was a most worthy member of the old German Methodist Church, to which he was a liberal contributor and where he was known for his Christian character. He belonged also to the Harugari German society. He is survived by his estimable wife and a number of children, who are among the most highly respected residents of the city.

ALBERT CLOAK, whose home is at No. 1701 Woodlawn avenue, Indianapolis, has been a resident of this State since 1856.

George Cloak, Sr., great-grandfather of Albert, was a native of England, and was the first of the Cloak family to establish himself on this side the broad ocean. He lived to be one hundred and six years old, and was a very strong man.

George Cloak, son of the emigrant George, was born in Smyrna, Maryland, where he spent his entire life. He and his wife were the parents of four sons and a daughter, the latter dying in infancy. The sons, all now deceased, were: George, Daniel, Ebin and William.

Daniel Cloak, son of George and father of Albert, was born in Smyrna, Maryland, in 1819. He married Maria Louise Ireland, a native of Philadelphia, Pa., where she grew to womanhood, and was married. Hezekiah Ireland, her grandfather, left his native country, England, and came to this land about the time of the breaking out of the American Revolution, and a brother of his served in the patriotic army during the Revolutionary war, and was killed at the battle of the Brandywine. Hezekiah Ireland was twice married, and became the father of twenty-two children. He once owned the site of Atlantic City, the famous resort on the Atlantic coast. His son, Japhet Ireland, was the father of two daughters, Mary Ann and Maria Louise, both born in Philadelphia. Japhet Ireland's wife was one of the eleven children of Christopher Robach (was born in Lancaster, Pa.) and his wife, Margaret Kershaw (of Fairfax, Va.), who removed to Philadelphia, where Mrs. Robach died. Mr. Robach lost his life at sea in 1828, and was buried on the eastern shore off North Carolina. Daniel and Maria Louisa (Ireland) Cloak became the parents of three children: Margaretta, born Aug. 29, 1843, in Philadelphia; Albert, born April 30, 1846; and Victoria, born Dec. 14, 1848, in Wilmington, Del., who died Nov. 6, 1870, in Philadelphia. The mother died in Terre Haute, Ind., Oct. 17, 1877, and was buried in Lafayette Cemetery, Philadelphia; the father died at Centerville, Md., June 6, 1882. The family came to Indiana in 1856, making their home at Terre Haute.

Albert Cloak was but a child when brought by his parents to Indiana. He enlisted June 2, 1862, in Company B, 54th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, being mustered in the three months' service. At that time he was but sixteen years of age, and when his term of enlistment was completed, re-enlisted for three months in Company D, 133d Indiana Volunteer Infantry. On Feb. 1, 1865, he was enlisted for the third time in the Union service, becoming a member of Company H, 149th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and he was discharged on the 27th of the following September, several months after the close of the war. Mr. Cloak was a faithful soldier and saw much service. In the organization to which he belonged he, with others of his regiment, was captured by a part of the command of General Morgan, but was soon exchanged. Mr. Cloak learned the trade of a mechanic, and for many years has been connected with the railroad service. On Dec. 12, 1865, he entered the employ of the St. L., A., & T. H. Railway Co., now known as the St. Louis Division of the Big Four, and Dec. 12, 1906, completed forty-one years of service with that company.

Miss Margaretta Cloak came to Indianapolis in 1880, and she and her brother reside at their pleasant home on Woodlawn avenue. She is a lady of culture, and possesses intellectual abilities of a high order.

She and her brother come of an honorable American ancestry, and by their own lives have proved themselves worthy representatives of the name they bear.

DEWIT C. IDLER, a retired mechanic of Indianapolis, who for over forty years served as foreman of the Vandalia Railroad shops, has been a successful business man as well, and now owns considerable valuable city property. He was born at Catawissa, Columbia Co., Pa., son of William and Elizabeth (Albright) Idler.

William Idler achieved his success in life as a paper manufacturer. Born in Germany, he there received careful rearing. Availing himself of every opportunity of acquiring knowledge, he early laid the foundation of a good, practical business education. Ambitious for a wider field of activity than the overcrowded sections of his own country afforded, as a young man he broke home ties and came to the United States. At Catawissa, Pa., he at once opened a paper mill and began working up trade. Turning out good material and directing his affairs wisely, he soon established his business on a very solid foundation. Continuing to prosper, he conducted the enterprise for many years, winning for himself the confidence of business men in his section. With advancing years, in 1840, deciding to lead a less strenuous life, he closed out his business and moved to Plymouth, Ohio. There he busied himself with odd pieces of work throughout the rest of his active life, and in that place he died in 1848.

Mr. Idler married, in Pennsylvania, Elizabeth Albright, who was born in that State. Surviving her husband, she passed her last days at the home of her son, Dewitt C., in Indianapolis, dying there in 1854. By this union there were ten children: Jacob married and reared several children; he died in Pennsylvania. John, who settled upon a farm in Indiana, died near Washington, in that State. Polly was married to R. Brewer. Catherine married a Mr. Furnwald. William married and had several children who grew to maturity; he died in Kentucky. Sophia was married to a Mr. Yetter. Susan married R. Brewer. Samuel, a railroad engineer, married and had several children; he was killed in the railroad service at Madison, Ind. Dewitt C. is mentioned below. Elizabeth C. married a Mr. Griscomb, and they had five children; he died in Pennsylvania, and she in Hamilton, Ohio.

Mr. Idler's large capacity for work, fidelity in perfecting each task and squareness in dealings were the promoters of his success in life. His achievements and his integrity won him the esteem of all who knew him, and the Lutheran Church counted him and his wife among its leading members.

Dewitt C. Idler passed his early life in Catawissa, Pa., and Plymouth, Ohio. In the public schools of these different localities he procured a good rudimentary education, developing a decided taste for mathematics and the sciences. As a further preparation for life's activities, at the age of eighteen years he went to Sandusky, Ohio, and there apprenticed himself to a machinist. Inherent ability and close application to the work enabled him in a short time to master thoroughly the details of the trade, and in 1849 he secured a position as locomotive engineer. Giving excellent satisfaction, he continued thus for about four years. Then, in 1853, he came to Indianapolis and took a similar position with the Vandalia Railroad Co., being engaged mainly in running passenger trains. Fidelity to his work and marked accommodation won him the confidence of his employers from the start, and in 1857 he was made foreman of the company's shops at Indianapolis. Possessed of thorough knowledge of machinery, and being skilled in directing affairs, he soon fully verified the confidence reposed in him, and retaining his established reputation he continued there until 1898, when he retired from active work. Progressive in methods, practical in application, sober, industrious, and clear-headed, he proved himself one of the most efficient foremen ever employed by the company. He always commanded good wages, and as fast as he saved money he invested it so as to yield a large income, and he now owns considerable property in Indianapolis, which he rents to advantage. He is now leading a leisurely life, enjoying the fruits of his many years of hard work.

Mr. Idler was married in Indianapolis, in 1857, to Martha Schofield, who came of a prominent pioneer family of Indiana, and though left an orphan at an early age received careful rearing. She was a noble Christian woman and a consistent member of the Methodist Church. She died in May, 1879. On May 12, 1880, Mr. Idler married Mrs. Anna E. Haneisen, widow of Fred Haneisen, who was born in Germany, and became a well-known insurance man of Indianapolis, where she married him. She was born in Indianapolis, Jan. 3, 1850. By his first marriage Mr. Idler had one son, Charles, now a railroad man of Pittsburg, Pa. He was born Oct. 12, 1864, married Clara Howe, of Indianapolis, and, after her death, married in Ohio. He has two children, one by the first marriage, and one by the second. Dewitt C. Idler has had one daughter by his second marriage, Grace Ada, who was born April 11, 1888.

Mr. Idler is a man who, by his decision and force of character, commands the respect and confidence of men in all stations in life, especially among his profession, where his word has long carried weight. He is well informed upon all subjects, and in political matters he affiliates with the Republicans. In fraternal circles he stands high and has long been a member of the I. O. O. F., having joined that order in Sandusky, Ohio, in 1848. In religious sentiment he is a Methodist, and his wife a Presbyterian.

Mrs. Idler's great-great-grandfather Trucksess, born in Paris, France, was a prominent Huguenot there, and for his strong opposition to Catholics was banished. Settling in Wurtemberg, Germany, he there reared his children and passed the rest of his life, dying there. By his marriage there was a son Jacob, who continued this line of descent.

Jacob Trucksess, grandfather of Mrs. Idler, passed many years of his life in Wurtemberg, Germany. About 1833 he came to the United States and settled upon a farm, near Eaton, Ohio, where he passed the rest of his life. Making a success of his industry, he became in time a man of means. By his marriage there were eight children: Frederick, who became a prominent merchant and business man of Indianapolis; Dorothy, who married a Mr. Young; Mary, Mrs. Ashinger; John, who is mentioned below; Catherine, who married J. Wilson; Sabina; Crist, who became a farmer; and William, a blacksmith.

John Trucksess, father of Mrs. Idler, born in Wurtemberg, Germany, there learned the blacksmith's trade, and also became familiar with milling. He came to America with his parents and soon afterward opened a blacksmith shop on Kentucky avenue, Indianapolis, which he conducted with success for the most part throughout the rest of his native career. He also for a few years engaged in the milling business at Plainfield. He made well out of his business and accumulated some property. He died at his home on Kentucky avenue in 1867. He married Lucinda Cool, a descendant of a prominent pioneer family of Marion county, Ind., who was one of a family of eight children: William; John; Polly, now deceased, who never married; Lucinda, mother of Mrs. Idler; Nancy; Betsy; Sallie, and Frederick. Mrs. Trucksess died in 1888. To her and her husband were born eight children: Theodore, a blacksmith, died in Landersdale, in August, 1901; Mary married P. Morrison; Fred resides in Indianapolis; Anna E., is mentioned above; Tolbert has been an engineer on the Vandalia Railroad for twenty-four years; Clara married P. Austermiller; Emma and Lilla have never married.

Mr. Trucksess was a leading Democrat of the old "Bloody Fifth" ward, and he served as a member of Andy Johnson's bodyguard when the latter made his tour of the country. During the riot he was wounded near his left eye. He was also arrested for being connected with the affair, but was honorably acquitted. He was a man of integrity, and a consistent member of the Baptist Church; his wife belonged to the Presbyterian Church.

REV. HENRY C. CANTER, a minister of the Christian Church in Indianapolis, who has his home at No. 724 West Vermont street, was born in Knox county, Ky., Sept. 5, 1842, son of Henry N. Canter, a native of Tennessee.

Henry N. Canter was reared in his native State of Tennessee, where he married, and then removed to Kentucky. Enlisting as a volunteer in the Mexican war, he died of disease in Mexico in 1847, leaving four sons and one daughter; all of the sons served in the Civil war. His widow removed with her children to Howard county, Indiana, in 1851, and was remarried nine years after the death of her first husband to John B. Rice. To her second marriage were born two children, one son and one daughter. Mrs. Rice died in 1876. The four sons of the first union are still living, and those besides Henry C. are as follows: (1) Lewis, a member of the 10th Indiana and later of the 46th Regiment, is now a resident of Polk county, Ark. (2) Levi, now a resident of London, Ky., served in the 46th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and is totally blind from the effects of his experiences in the army. Both he and Lewis were captured up the Red River. (3) George W., who served in the 72nd Indiana Volunteer Infantry, resides in Knoxville, Tenn. The daughter, Elizabeth Jane, born after Henry N. Canter went to Mexico, is now Mrs. Bard, of Kokomo, Indiana.

Henry C. Canter enlisted on April 15, 1861, in company with his brother Lewis, both becoming members of Company A, 10th Indiana Volunteer Infantry. On his way to answer the first call for troops he learned of the bombardment of Sumter. His first term was for three months' service, and he was one of the very first to be mustered in as a soldier in defense of the Union. In this organization he served for three and a half months, his field of operations being in West Virginia. He took part in the active operations of the army in that region under General McClellan, and participated in the battle of Rich Mountain, the first battle of any importance in the early days of the war. Mr. Canter's second enlistment, on March 10, 1862, was as a member of Company A, 46th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, in which he served for about sixteen months, in the Southwest. In connection with this regiment he took part in many important events, including the battles at Fort Pillow, Memphis, and St. Charles. He was disabled at Helena, where he was put on detached duty in the post office. His discharge came July 16, 1863, as a result of his disability, but not willing to remain at home while the war was going on Mr. Canter entered the service a third time, becoming a member of the 25th Battery, Indiana Volunteers, with which organization he continued until it was mustered out, July 20, 1865. In the Army of the Cumberland he rendered his last service. He was at the battle of Nashville when the Confederates under General Hood were baffled and beaten back by General Thomas.

Mr. Canter returned to Howard county, Ind., after the war, and for some time was engaged in farming. In September, 1870, he entered the service of the Christian ministry, and since that time has faithfully labored in the work of the gospel. In the winter of 1871 he was called to the pastorate of the church located on Turkey creek, in Knox county, Ky. There he continued for about a year, and was in pastoral labor in Knox and Laurel counties for about three years, spending not a little of his time in traveling and organizing new churches, and reviving the weak and discouraged ones, as an evangelist. At the end of that time he returned to Indiana to make his home, and has spent some fourteen years as an evangelist and mission worker in Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas and Arkansas. Since August, 1900, he has made his home in Indianapolis, engaged both in preaching and at manual labor. His ability as a preacher of the gospel is greater than ever, notwithstanding his advancing age and his thirty-six years of service in the ministry, but having a large family he feels under obligation to remain at home and labor for their support, although his heart is in the work of leading souls to Christ. He has attracted wide attention and much interest by his work as a lecturer on the Book of Revelations, to which theme he has given much study, and on which he discourses learnedly and instructively. His ability, candor and close preparation of his sermons render him an interesting and instructive speaker.

Mr. Canter was married, in Kokomo, Ind., Aug. 10, 1865, to Miss Elizabeth Watson, who died in 1875. His second marriage took place in Knox county, Ky., to Amanda Brogan, who died June 6, 1878. His present wife was Rachel McNitt. To his first union was born one son, Wilford Garfield, of Flora, Carroll Co., Ind. By his present wife he has had eight children, all but one still living: Carl Clyde, Narra Pearl, Edna Iva, Loren Leon, Walter Winson, and Ralph Raymond and Floyd Ferrel, twins. Edward Ivan, deceased, was a twin of Edna Iva.

The Canter family has certainly a remarkable history in the wars of the country. The father died in the Mexican war, and his four sons followed the flag in the war for the Union. All four were more or less disabled, and are in receipt of pensions from the United States for their gallant and meritorious services in time of danger. Rev. Henry C. Canter had his feet frozen, and lost the toes of his left foot.

WILLIAM FRANKLIN MOLT, M. D., a physician of Indianapolis, was born Oct. 18, 1875, in Fairfield, Ill., where he was reared and educated. He is a son of George and Lucretia (Butcher) Molt, the father a native of Germany, the mother of Illinois. George and Lucretia Molt have had the following children: Jerry G., William F., M. D., Minnie and Myrtle.

Dr. Molt was educated in Hayward College, from which he was graduated in 1893, and the same year he entered the Physio-Medical College of Indiana, where he graduated in medicine. In 1900 he took a post-graduate course in the New York Post-Graduate School, in 1902 took a post-graduate course in Chicago, and in 1904 in Philadelphia. Immediately after his graduation he took a six-months' course in the National College of Electro-Therapeutics, now of Philadelphia.

Dr. Molt is unmarried. He belongs to the K. of P., the A. F. & A. M., and the O. R. M. He is a Republican in political sentiment. In religious matters he is associated with the Christian Church, of which he is a member.

WILHELM COOK (deceased) was one of the venerable and honored citizens of Indianapolis, of which he might well be termed a pioneer. He had been for many years prominently identified with the business interests and material development of the capital city and stood as a sterling representative of the sturdy German type which has for many years proved so valuable a factor in our national development.

Mr. Cook was born at Cammar, principality of Schaumburg-Lippe, Germany, Oct. 31, 1817. As a boy he attended the excellent schools of his native land, and when he was fourteen years of age he accompanied his father on a fishing expedition in the North sea, so that his youth was not devoid of adventures. His parents, Herman and Ellen (Blaas) Cook, were both born in Schaumburg-Lippe, being of stanch old stock and people of sterling character, who commanded the respect of all who knew them. They were devoted members of the Lutheran Church. They passed their entire lives in the Fatherland. Herman Cook was the eldest of three sons, and the youngest son was Charles, who was forced into Napoleon's army, with which he set forth on the march to Moscow; like many another unfortunate conscript, he never returned, the time and manner of his death being unknown to his family.

Herman Cook was reared on the parental farm and as a youth he entered upon an apprenticeship at the butcher's trade, to which he devoted his attention during the winter seasons, while for a number of years he gave his attention to fishing during the season, meeting with due success in this line of enterprise. By industry and good management he accumulated a competency for his declining years, passing away at the age of sixty-eight, while his wife, who was the younger of two daughters of a prosperous farmer, lived to the venerable age of ninety-two years. Their children were as follows: Charles passed his life on the old homestead in Germany; Anthony, who came to America with his brother Wilhelm in 1838, remained a few years, and then returned to Germany, but in 1850 again came to the United States, locating in the city of Fort Wayne, Ind., where he accumulated a fortune and where he died at the age of seventy-two; Frederick came to America in 1850, located in Indianapolis, remained until 1867, and returned to the Fatherland, where he died in 1869 (he left three sons in the United States); Herman passed his entire life in Germany, but his family came to America in 1865 and settled in Indianapolis; Christian was the first of the family to emigrate to the new world, having come to Indianapolis in 1837, and having been here joined by Wilhelm the following year, while later he removed to Fort Wayne, becoming a prominent and influential citizen of that place, where he remained until his death, at the age of seventy-two; Wilhelm is the subject of this review; Christina became the wife of Christian Basey, a carpenter by trade, and in 1865 they came to America, locating in Indianapolis, where they passed the residue of their lives; Louis was drowned at sea.

Wilhelm Cook remained in the loved Fatherland until he had attained the age of twenty, when he set forth to try his fortunes in America, landing in the city of Baltimore, June 18, 1838, after a voyage of forty-two days. Thence he proceeded to Philadelphia and to the neighboring village of Germantown, where he embarked on a canal boat for Pittsburg. A terrific storm ensued, and the great rainfall caused a break in the banks of the canal, so that the boat was finally left stranded on the ground, the passengers being without sufficient food for six days, at a point distant from any town. But finally the canal company procured wagons and transported the passengers over the mountains, this plan being resorted to three times subsequently before there was sufficient water to float a boat to Pittsburg. From that point Mr. Cook came down the Ohio river by steamboat to Cincinnati and thence made the journey with a wagon to Indianapolis, arriving on the 18th of July, 1838. Here he joined his brother, with whom he became engaged in the work of canal construction. The capital city at the time was but a small village. The weather that summer was exceedingly hot and all vegetation was dried up, so that practically no vegetables were to be obtained, and subsistence was furnished principally by pork and bread, making the year a very hard one for all residents of the locality. Mr. Cook was identified with the canal work here about two years and then removed to a point near Alexandria, where he continued in the same line of labor for an equal period, at the expiration of which he returned to Indianapolis, where he received his pay. He then went to Fort Wayne, where he found employment on the construction work of the Wabash canal, being located at Fort Defiance, Ohio, for two years, and thence returning to Fort Wayne, where he and his brother became associated with others in the building of a canal-boat, of which Wilhelm Cook became captain. The vessel was used for the transportation of freight between Delphi, Ind., and Toledo, Ohio, and during a period of eight years he operated principally in connection with one warehouse, while within this period a second boat was built and his brother Christian became captain of the same, which was operated on the same route. In those days money was very scarce and wages nominal, but by industry and good management Mr. Cook made his venture successful, saving his earnings and applying them to the best advantage and thus securing a start on the road to prosperity. In 1854 he disposed of his interests in the canal-boats and returned to Indianapolis, which had at that time a population of about eight thousand, with slightly improved streets and few metropolitan advantages, giving little promise of becoming a great city. No special change was noted until the time of the Civil war, when the city started its era of material development, while the forward movement that has made this one of the most attractive and prosperous cities of the Union has ever since continued.

On coming to Indianapolis Mr. Cook associated himself with his brother-in-law, Fred Ostermeyer, in establishing a retail grocery at the corner of East and Washington streets. This partnership continued five years, Mr. Ostermeyer selling out his interest to E. Henry Koller, with whom Mr. Cook was associated two years. Then Mr. Koller sold his interest to Frederick Cook, with whom Wilhelm Cook was in partnership two and a half years, when Frederick disposed of his interest to Charles Dammeyer, son-in-law of Wilhelm Cook. That association lasted until January, 1883, at which time Mr. Cook retired from active business life. During the early part of his location at the old stand Mr. Dammeyer had bought adjoining property. In 1872 extensive improvements were made on the building, the same being raised to three stories, and it was there Mr. Cook continued in the grocery business until 1883—a long period, during which he built up an extensive trade and gained the unqualified confidence and esteem of the community. Honesty, unceasing industry, application and well-directed efforts were the causes of his success, and he became known as a conservative and substantial business man and as one whose integrity was beyond question. Thus this honored pioneer merchant was not only held in the highest respect in the city where he so long made his home, but he also accumulated a valuable estate—a just reward for his years of toil and endeavor.

In the early years of his business life in Indianapolis Mr. Cook purchased two lots on South Liberty street, giving one of the same to his brother Frederick, and each erected a residence thereon. There Wilhelm Cook made his home for some years, when he purchased an attractive site on south New Jersey street, and erected a commodious and attractive residence, the same being his home at the time of his death. He also bought property on south East street which became valuable for factory purposes, and he disposed of the same at a good figure; and owned other valuable realty in the city, including residence properties, which he rented. He retired from business at the age of sixty-five years and in the golden evening of his life enjoyed well-earned repose and comfort, being a man whose success had been worthily achieved, and that through his own efforts. When he came to Indianapolis he was sixteen dollars in debt, and this was paid from his initial earnings, after which he earnestly started to gain an independent position. His success was gratifying to note and the story of his life is one that bears both lesson and incentive. While pushing forward his own business he was ever known as a public-spirited citizen and contributed his quota to the development and progress of the beautiful city of his home.

Mr. Cook always remained true to the faith in which he was reared, being a devoted and consistent member of the Lutheran Church. The old church, at the corner of East and Georgia streets, in which he worshipped for so many years, was burned to the ground in April, 1882, prior to which he had been for thirty-seven years a trustee and treasurer and cashier of the same, faithfully discharging his duties and taking an active part in all departments of the church work. After the destruction of the original edifice the church people decided to change localities upon the erection of a new building. In 1884 the society bought lots on the corner of McCarty and South New Jersey streets, where they erected a beautiful church, at a cost of $30,000, Mr. Cook having been one of the prime movers in the project and a liberal contributor to the building fund. It was largely through his efforts and plans that the work was carried along to the dedication. He was one of the organizers and for twenty-five years treasurer of the German Lutheran cemetery. In politics Mr. Cook was independent and never sought official preferment, except that he served one term as councilman. His death, which occurred Feb. 21, 1904, at the age of eighty-six years, was mourned in many circles.

On Oct. 23, 1843, Mr. Cook was united in marriage to Miss Lenora Ostermeyer, of Indianapolis, who was born in 1821 in Prussia, near the German line and near the locality where he was reared, both families being members of the same church. In 1843 she came to America with her father and other members of the family, and they located on a farm near Indianapolis, where the parents passed the remainder of their lives. Their children were as follows: Charles, a farmer of Hancock county, died there; Lenora became the wife of Wilhelm Cook; Sophia is the wife of Ernst Henry Koller; Fred was a prominent wholesale grocer of Indianapolis and filled important county offices; Louisa was first married to a Mr. Miller, after his death to Mr. Nagel and after his death to Mr. Dietz; Christina married Christian Waterman; Henry is a carpenter.

Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Cook Otto died at the age of nine years. C. F. William Cook is bookkeeper and a member of the firm of Holliday & Wyon Company, Indianapolis; he resides at No. 2020 North Capitol avenue. Sophia died at the age of seven. Christina became the wife of Charles Dammeyer. Charlotte married Charles Cook. Louisa married Henry Monroe. Ella is the wife of Charles Behrendt. Sophia (2) married William Poppe. Mary married Henry Brandt.

For his second wife Wilhelm Cook married Mrs. Charlotte Vehling. There were no children by that union.

JOHN H. INGILING, a representative business man and honored citizen of the attractive village of Bridgeport, Marion Co., Ind., is there engaged in the general merchandise business, and has gained marked prestige through progressive methods and fair dealing.

Mr. Ingiling is a native of Greene county, Ohio, born June 20, 1852. In 1854 his parents came to Indiana, settling near Bridgeport, Wayne township, where he grew up, receiving his educational training in the public schools of this locality. His parents, Thomas W. and Sarah (Hughes) Ingiling, were born in New Jersey, where they were married. The father was a son of Jacob and Rachel (Taylor) Ingling, likewise natives of New Jersey, and grandson of Tent and Mary Ingling, who were born in France, whence they emigrated to America in the Colonial days, taking up their abode in New Jersey. The Taylor family is of English extraction and was also early established in New Jersey. Tent Ingling was a skilled mechanic and his versatility was such that he found employment in various lines of mechanical industry. His children were as follows: Tent, Jr., John, Thomas, Jacob, Sarah (Mrs. Inman), Nancy (Mrs. White) and Mrs. Frazier. Jacob Ingling passed his entire life in New Jersey, devoting his attention principally to farming. Of his children we have brief record: Jacob, whose whereabouts is not known; Lydia, Mrs. D. English; Rachel, Mrs. Haley; and Thomas W. After the death of the mother of these children, Jacob Ingling, Sr., married Jane Green, and they had one son, George, of Ohio.

Thomas W. Ingling was born in Burlington county, N. J., June 4, 1819, grew up on a farm, and had a common school education. He was three years of age when his mother died, and he was reared in the home of relatives until his father's second marriage, when he again entered the paternal home. His father was shortly afterwards drowned and the home was again broken up. Thomas was practically thrown upon the world and left dependent upon the kindness of others, and after being precariously cared for for a time, he finally found a good home with a man named English, with whom he remained on a farm until he had attained the age of twenty years. After his marriage he continued farming in New Jersey until after his eldest child was born, and then moved to Ohio, where he farmed five years. Thence he went to Illinois, where he remained a short time, returning to Ohio, where he remained until 1854. In that year he came to Indiana and settled on a rented farm near Bridgeport where he remained until 1867. He was a natural mechanic and a good artisan in wood and iron, but preferred farming. In 1867 he engaged in the general merchandise business in Bridgeport, continuing this enterprise for twenty-one years and meeting with excellent success. In connection with this he conducted a meat market, and became one of the prominent and honored business men of the county, with no shadow upon his reputation as a citizen and a man. He also owned twenty acres of ground which was conducted under his supervision. In 1892 he withdrew from active business, being succeeded by his son, John H., and he passed away in Bridgeport, in August, 1904. Honored as one of the sterling patriarchs and pioneers of the county, Thomas W. Ingling was the architect of his own fortunes, depending on his own resources from his childhood, and it is gratifying to note that he was able to enjoy, in the golden evening of his life, the just rewards of his earnest toil and endeavor. His first presidential vote was cast in 1840, for William Henry Harrison, and later he voted the Democratic ticket for a number of years, but he eventually transferred his allegiance to the Republican party, which received his staunch support up to his death. He served in minor offices of local trust, but was never an office-seeker.

Thomas W. Ingling married (first) Sarah Hughes, a daughter of Thomas Hughes, who was born on shipboard while his parents were en route from England to America. The family settled in New Jersey in the Colonial epoch and his father remained loyal to the crown during the Revolution. Thomas Hughes was a brickmason and contractor and builder and did much high-grade work throughout New Jersey, where his death occurred. His children were as follows: David, who died in New Jersey; Eliza, Mrs. James Hughes; John, who died in his native State; Hannah, Mrs. Haines; Priscilla, who died unmarried; and Sarah, mother of John H. Ingling. Thomas and Sarah (Hughes) Ingling became the parents of seven children, namely: Apollo S., who was the only one born in New Jersey, served four years in the Civil war and is now a retired farmer of Bridgeport; Jacob, born in Ohio, is now a farmer and railroad agent in Illinois; Anna died at the age of sixteen years; John H. is the subject of this review; George died at the age of 21; Adaline is the wife of Lee Stair, of Illinois; and Sarah is the wife of E. Albertson, who is engaged in the nursery business near Bridgeport. The devoted wife and mother entered into eternal rest in January, 1897. She was a zealous member of the M. E. church and a woman of noble attributes of character. In February, 1898, Thomas W. Ingling married (second) Mrs. Malinda A. Turner, who had been married twice, first to F. Reed and after his death to J. J. Turner. She has no children. Her maiden name was Cravens and her parents came to Indiana from North Carolina.

John H. Ingling remained under the parental roof until he had attained his legal majority, having in the meanwhile received an excellent common-school education and also learned the telegrapher's art. Upon leaving home he secured a position as telegrapher and extra agent in the Bridgeport office of the Vandalia railroad, continuing thus for nearly eight years. He also assisted his father in the store, and in 1892 purchased the latter's mercantile business and succeeded his honored father, whose prestige he has ably maintained. He continued at the old stand until 1898, when he removed to his present commodious and eligible quarters. He had served as deputy postmaster under his father and later he was himself appointed postmaster, serving a few years. Mr. Ingling had been in business for himself as a general merchant for a number of years, but he sold out and engaged in the wholesale stove business in Indianapolis, at the end of eighteen months selling out to the Indianapolis Stove Company. He then removed to Plainfield, where he became associated with Ad Ballard in the grocery and implement business, under the firm name of Ballard & Ingling, later buying his partner's interest and conducting the enterprise individually until 1898, when he purchased the Bradford stock of general merchandise in Bridgeport and thereafter conducted both stores for a time. Eventually disposing of his interests in Plainfield, he has since given his entire attention to his large business in Bridgeport, where he carries a large and select stock of general merchandise and implements of all kinds, and where he is known as a progressive and upright business man, commanding uniform confidence and esteem. In politics he is a staunch Republican and fraternally he is identified with the Knights of Pythias.

In 1884 Mr. Ingling was united in marriage to Miss Alice Cappelck, who was born in this county, in 1862, a daughter of Robert and Abigail (Ballard) Cappelck, her father being a prominent pioneer farmer of Marion county, where the Ballard family were also early settlers, both being identified with the Society of Friends, of which Mrs. Ingling is a birthright member. Mrs. Abigail Cappelck had four brothers, John, Joseph, Isaac and Robert. She became the mother of two children: Addie, wife of Hadley Reeve, of Friendswood, Ind.; and Alice, Mrs. Ingling.

Mr. and Mrs. Ingling have four children: George, who is an assistant in his father's store; and Laura, Lee and Wilma, who remain in the parental home.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BUSHONG. Pioneer days in Indiana afforded scant opportunities for education and culture. Consequently those who were superior to the early conditions and became forceful men and women in life's arena deserve special praise. The environment of Benjamin Franklin Bushong, subject of this sketch, was extremely unpromising and honor is due him for the marked development which an outline of his career reveals to have been his attainment. He was born on Duck Creek, Hamilton Co., Ind., Oct. 25, 1841, son of Jonathan Bushong, a native of the Shenandoah Valley, Va., born near New Market, that State. The Bushong family is of German and French extraction. Jonathan, the father of our subject, was one of six brothers, and became a typical and successful backwoodsman in the growing West. He was reared in his native State, and there married Mary M. Corder. In 1823 they emigrated to Hamilton county, Ind., when it was an unbroken wilderness. He erected the first log cabin and cleared up a farm in the wilderness. Indians were numerous and wild game abounded. Jonathan was an expert shot, and hunted deer and smaller animals very successfully. His table never lacked for game, which constituted the chief meat of the earliest families. He was a man of deep religious convictions and became the first preacher in that part of the State, as a member of the United Brethren denomination. He was an industrious farmer, and doubtless it was the privations and exposures of this life that shortened his years. He died in 1844, when his son Benjamin F., subject of this sketch, was but two and one half years old. The wife and mother subsequently married again. Fourteen children were born to Jonathan and Mary M. Bushong, and of these eight grew to maturity, two daughters and six sons, of whom two are now living. Four of the sons became preachers, three of the Methodist and one of the United Brethren faith. The survivors are Rev. John A. Bushong, a United Brethren minister of Indianapolis, who, in 1906, was still active in his church work though seventy-eight years of age; and Benjamin Franklin. Those who passed away were: Mrs. Cathrion Stone, of Lincoln, Neb., who died in 1899; Rev. Joseph, of the Protestant Methodist Church; Rev. James W., of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Henry J., a physician at Anderson, Ind., for many years; M. C., who died a soldier on the battlefield of Murfreesboro, Tenn., during the Civil war; and Mrs. Caroline McKinney.

Because of the death of his father Benjamin Franklin Bushong was bound out at the age of four years to Richard Philips, a Kentuckian by birth and a farmer in Montgomery county, Ind. Here in the back woods far from educational and even religious opportunities our subject was reared. Not until he was eighteen years of age did he see the inside of a church or school house. When he was eighteen Mr. Philips died, and for that reason, the bond that held Benjamin F., was transferred to the latter's brother, Henry J., who, then being unmarried, re-transferred it to his brother-in-law Mr. McKinney, with whom our subject then went to live. While there he received his first and only schooling, consisting of about eleven months, at the age of eighteen and nineteen years. When he married, at the age of thirty-two years, Benjamin F. Bushong could not read intelligibly, his education coming to him later in life. Mr. Bushong remained at this latter home for about two years; meanwhile his stepfather died and the care of his mother devolved upon him. About two years later he was severely injured at a grain warehouse while at work. His left leg and foot were crushed, while he was engaged in loading cars with grain. This accident confined him to the house for about eighteen months. Upon his recovery Mr. Bushong engaged for about six years in the selling of fruit trees and then for a year he clerked in a grocery store.

In 1873 Mr. Bushong married Miss Mary Kay. The one child born to them died when but four days old. Since his marriage the chief occupation of Mr. Bushong has been farming and gardening. In 1885 he began religious work as a local preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, filling pulpits at various places until 1899, and in revival services winning many converts. Mr. Bushong many years ago was led to believe from his interpretation of certain passages of scripture in the possible communication with the spirits of those who have passed away. In 1899 he became fully convinced of this fact, and since then has given the subject much attention and investigation. He now lectures on the subject and is a medium for spiritual communications. He is a psychic healer of remarkable power. On Oct. 1, 1904, he began the study of anatomy, and has become thoroughly familiar with the structure of the human body. He has been able to effect the cure of chronic diseases without recourse to medicine. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias and has passed all the chairs of that order.

LUTHER MEHRING, residing at No. 1544 South Meridian street, Indianapolis, comes of a prominent German family numbering among its members men who have come to the front both in the agricultural and professional spheres of life. Nearly all of them have been stanch Lutherans, and zealous advocates of foreign missions.

Frederick Mehring, grandfather of Luther, passed many years of his life in Germany. As a young man he chose farming for his occupation, which for the most part he followed throughout his active career. At an early day, hoping to better his prospects, he came to the United States, and eventually settled upon a farm in Carroll county, Md. Here in the steady pursuit of his occupation he amassed considerable property, and rose to a leading place among agriculturists. He passed his last days in Maryland, and died there. He was married twice, and by his first union there were eight children, all of whom were reared in Maryland: Jacob, a farmer of Westminster; John, a farmer, who died in Maryland; George, mentioned below; Lydia, Mrs. Valentine; Elizabeth, Mrs. Harner; Anna, wife of William Koontz; Mrs. Miller; and Mrs. Hiner. By the second union there were five children, all of whom settled at Vermilion Station, Ind. Frederick was the oldest. One daughter married Rev. Mr. Stone, a Lutheran minister.

George Mehring, father of Luther, a prominent Maryland farmer and miller, also an earnest promoter of religious and educational institutions, was a man of affluence, whose word upon all subjects carried weight in his community. Born in Maryland, he was reared upon his father's well conducted farm in Carroll county, and by the thorough performance of each home task procured practical knowledge of agriculture and some valuable business experience. Both environment and inclination decided him, upon reaching manhood, to follow agriculture for his livelihood, and settling upon a farm in Carroll county he there took up his work. From a small beginning he gradually branched out in his enterprise, until he engaged in nearly all branches of general agriculture adapted to his locality. As fast as he made money he improved his property and added to his farm equipment until he eventually had one of the most attractive and valuable pieces of property in his locality. In addition to farming he after some years, engaged in business, starting a grist mill on Big Pipe creek. Square in his dealings and turning out excellent work, he won a large patronage, and for a great many years continued his enterprise, materially increasing his income. In time he became one of the solidly prosperous men of the county.

During his young manhood Mr. Mehring married Elizabeth Marshall, who was of Scotch-Irish extraction, and a descendant of an old and prominent Maryland family. Nine children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Mehring, all of whom obtained good educations and one of the daughters engaged in teaching. Anna and Lizzie died young. Joan, who is now about seventy years old, has never married and resides at the old homestead. Marshall who died some years ago, left a family of five children. Frederick, who now owns the old homestead, has never married and resides there with his sister. Julia died at the age of ten years. Luther is mentioned below. Mary died young. Margaret has never married.

Mr. George Mehring was a large framed, strongly built man, admirably fitted for hard manual labor. In character he was large-hearted, public-spirited, and ever ready to lend a helping hand in any worthy enterprise. Especially interested in the advancement of education, he erected at his own expense a comfortable and well equipped school building, where for years the children of his vicinity assembled. He was one of the pillars of the Lutheran Church, giving liberally to its support, and assisting in the promulgation of its doctrines. He was a man who cared nothing whatever for public notoriety, but never being afraid to assert himself in the cause of truth and righteousness, he was a power for good in his community. In politics he at first affiliated with the Whigs and later with the Republicans. He died in 1860, his wife some time prior to that date.

Luther Mehring was born in Maryland, July 25, 1843, and passed his early life upon his father's farm in Carroll county. In the public schools of his locality he had a thorough training in the rudiments, which was supplemented with a course in a business college at Baltimore, from which he graduated as a bookkeeper. Returning to his father's farm, he there took up the active duties of life on the paternal estate. Beginning later with the purchase of a small drove of cattle, which he sold to advantage to farmers in his locality, he next in the same way tried his luck with a drove of sheep, and continued to speculate in stock for a time, carrying on a profitable business in this line, and then engaging in butchering and in the sale of meat. After three years at that business he opened a feed store in Baltimore, which he conducted for some time. Reports of excellent business openings in the Middle West now decided him to locate in Dayton, Ohio, and there he turned his attention to the shipping of fertilizing material, finding a good market for his stuff in the East. After a year and a half of this business he was obliged to return to Baltimore, but he came back to Indiana, and after a short period of work in the same line in Richmond, Ind., in 1873, he found an entirely new field for this enterprise in Indianapolis, where he settled and has since made his home. He at once opened a large shipping business in his line, requiring several teams to collect bones and other fertilizing materials. Encouraged by his successes, the following year, he erected a small factory on the Sellers farm five miles from Indianapolis, which was later destroyed by fire. There for many years he carried on a rendering business, and with the exception of slight reverses by fire has kept steadily upon the rising plane of life.

Soon after his arrival in Indianapolis, Mr. Mehring purchased two acres of desirable land on South Meridian street, where he erected several substantial residences, which he still owns, his holdings including several good residence properties in the city.

On October 27, 1878, Mr. Mehring married, in Ohio, Miss Mary M. Murphy, who was born near Yellow Springs, Ohio, Nov. 20, 1849, and of this union there has been one son, Orville Edmund, a promising young lawyer. He was born Sept. 2, 1879, graduated from the high school and from Butler College, where he distinguished himself both as an athlete and as a debater; and he now has an office in partnership with Emsley Johnson, in the Law Building.

Mr. Luther Mehring has always been square in his dealings, and is an energetic and hard-working man. In politics he is a strong Prohibitionist. He ran for councilman of his ward, and councilman at large. Reared as a Lutheran, he has strictly adhered to the teachings of that church. Mrs. Mehring is a member of the Methodist Church, a conscientious Christian. She is a woman of considerable business ability.

William Murphy, father of Mrs. Mehring, was, at different times engaged as a farmer, blacksmith, banker and lumberman. He was born in Ohio, and there passed many years of his life. After some preliminary business experience he settled in Versailles, Ohio, where he opened a lumber yard and conducted a lucrative business for some years. He also assisted in establishing a bank there, of which he long served as president. He finally, however, met with business reverses. He first married Mary Sipe, who died in 1862, the mother of thirteen children: Catherine, who married H. Reck; Leander, who settled in the West; Sarah, who married Isaac Reck; Simon, who served through the Civil war, and retired with two honorable discharges; Angeline, who married David Smelker; John, a Civil war veteran, who has been at different times a school teacher, farmer and tile manufacturer, and has his residence in Versailles, Ohio; William, formerly a grain dealer of Ohio, but now a farmer in Canada; Mary M., wife of our subject; Ellen, who was married to E. Hill; Esther, married to W. Sutor; Elizabeth, married to David Freeman, and later to John English; Susan, wife of F. Spencer; and Joseph, a lumber dealer, who resides at Urbana, Ohio. No children were born to Mr. Murphy's second marriage. Both he and his wife were consistent members of the Christian (Newlight) Church.

LOUIS MAAS, a soldier of the Civil war and a prominent business man of Indianapolis, was born at Minden, Westphalia, Prussia, March 21, 1837, and is a son of Louis and Maria (Behrend) Maas, natives of Prussia. They were married in Westphalia, where the father conducted a large cabinet-making business, and as he was an expert he was very successful. Later he had charge of the railroad shops, and there remained until 1848, becoming very influential; but as he was a man who took a deep interest in political affairs, he finally decided to leave his native land for one where more freedom was allowed. Landing in New York, he made his way to Louisville, Ky., settling in that city in 1851, and worked at his trade. From the time he located in the United States he was opposed to slavery and gave his hearty support to the Abolition movement. In his native land he had served three years in the army, and when the Civil war burst upon the land of his adoption he gave his services, enlisting in Company I, 5th Regiment, Kentucky Volunteers. He died in the Louisville hospital, after serving about two years. In appearance he was a man of commanding presence, possessing a strong constitution and good general health. He believed in maintaining right principles, no matter what the cost, and although he was obliged to sell his large holdings in Prussia when he emigrated he did so cheerfully rather than give up what he believed was a proper view of existing conditions, and began work at his trade once more. So expert was he that had it not been for the war and his early death he might have become one of the wealthy men of Louisville. His wife died in Louisville in 1858. Her father was an officer at a military hospital in Germany, where he was born and where he died. The following children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Louis Maas, Sr.: Louis; August, who died young; Mary, who died young; and George, a business man of Louisville.

Louis Maas, Jr., was born in Prussia, as before stated, and came with the family to the United States, being then fourteen years of age. Soon after the settlement of the family in Louisville he began to learn the trade of cigarmaker, and was a journeyman when in 1858 he went to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he worked at his trade until 1860. At that date he removed to Franklin, Ind., and there followed that calling until 1861, when his patriotism was aroused and he enlisted in Captain Oiler's company, but the quota being complete he did not join that company, later being placed with Captain Dobbs, 12th I. V. I. But again the ranks were full, and he was finally given a place in Captain Foster's company, Company A, 11th I. V. I., in lieu of a man who wanted to leave. Captain Foster was soon after promoted, and the new captain who did not approve of the substitution, insisted upon the ambitious young man being discharged. Nothing daunted, he finally joined the 1st Indiana Battery and was mustered in Aug. 10, 1861. He remained with that command, doing hard service and proving himself a brave and gallant soldier. He was consigned to the South Western Department, and was first sent to St. Louis, where the regiment spent the winter. In the following spring they were sent to Warrensburg and engaged with General Price's men, taking a number of prisoners. From there the regiment was sent to Springfield, Mo., engaged in several sharp skirmishes, participated in the battle of Pea Ridge, crossed the Ozark river, and arrived at Helena, Ark. Thence they were sent to Milliken's Bend and saw some heavy skirmishing, after which they crossed the Mississippi river and had a hard fight at Fort Gibson, where the Union army was successful. This was the turning point in the Vicksburg campaign. From Fort Gibson his detachment went to Raymond, where there was a skirmish, and then to Jackson, Miss. He was also in the battle of Champion Hills, at Edwards Station, Big Black river (where there was a hotly contested battle), and took part in the entire Vicksburg campaign. The regiment was then returned to Jackson, where there was another engagement, and there Mr. Maas was wounded, a shell taking off his right leg close to the body. He was placed in the field hospital, where his wound was dressed, but in a week was removed to Vicksburg, and two weeks later placed on a hospital boat and taken to Jefferson Barracks hospital, at St. Louis. There he remained until well enough to return home, when he received an honorable discharge Dec. 12, 1863, and went back to Indiana, settling in Indianapolis, where he has lived ever since. From the time of his enlistment until he was wounded Mr. Maas was in active service, and never complained or shrank from what he believed to be his highest duty. His entire company was composed of Germans, the captain, now deceased, being of the same nationality and bearing the name of Klaus.

Upon establishing himself in Indianapolis Mr. Maas worked at his trade, and in 1872 was able to open a cigar factory as well as a store, the latter being located on East Washington street. Until 1888 he successfully conducted both establishments, but at that time he sold his interests, and purchasing a well located lot put up the substantial residence where he still makes his home, living partially retired from business. In political matters he is a Republican, although for a time he was a member of the Reform party and was its candidate for the office of recorder. Later he became convinced that in national matters the Republican principles more nearly expressed his own views, although he holds to voting for the best man in local affairs. He is a member of George H. Thomas Post, G. A. R., of the I. O. O. F., the Social Turners, and of the German House.

On July 1, 1865, Mr. Maas married Miss Frederika Wuest, who was born in Germany in 1844, a daughter of Christian Wuest, of the same place. She came to America with a sister in 1860, and settled in Indianapolis. Her mother died in Germany, but her father joined his children in the New World, and followed the calling of a gardener, dying in 1873. He was highly respected by all who knew him. The following children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Maas: George, who is a lumber merchant; Charles, a manufacturer of cigars; Emma, at home; Frank, a cement contractor; Albert, a druggist of Indianapolis; and Louis, a clerk. George Maas married Miss Bertha Metzger, a daughter of Alexander Metzger, for many years prominently identified with the real estate business of the city, and they have had two children, Hugo and Wilhelmina. Frank Maas married Miss Jessie Gosney. Louis Maas, Jr. (2), married Miss Chloe Rector, of an old Indiana family from the vicinity of Lake Maxinkuckee.

JOHN W. GLADDEN, of Bridgeport, Marion Co., Ind., was born near that town, March 1, 1828, and was reared to the honorable and toilsome life of a farmer. A descendant of one of the first families of Indiana, he worthily sustains an honorable name, and through a long and active career has retained the confidence and respect of the community to a marked degree. His father, William Gladden, Jr., was a native of Pennsylvania, and his mother, Eve Negley, of Ohio.

William Gladden, Sr., father of William Gladden, came of Irish parentage, coming to Pennsylvania where William Gladden Jr. was born but later removing to Maryland. On the outbreak of the War of 1812, he insisted upon entering the American army, and made all his arrangements to that effect, but his son, William, Jr., declared the father too old for that service, and went to the war himself, where he attained not a little distinction. William Gladden, Sr., was a prominent farmer in Frederick county, Md., where he was known as a strict Presbyterian, and a man of integrity and honor. His children were as follows: Jane, who became Mrs. Watt, and is now deceased; William, Jr., the father of John W. Gladden; Elizabeth, who became Mrs. Heap; Jacob, who spent his life on the old homestead; Mary; Hannah B., now dead, who was Mrs. Strobridge; John, who settled in Indiana, and is deceased; and Nancy, who died unmarried.

William Gladden, Jr., was born Feb. 7, 1796, and was reared in Maryland, remaining under the parental roof until he was eighteen years old, when he entered the American army at the beginning of the War of 1812. He followed the flag as long as the conflict continued, and then returned home. After he was of full age, he came west as far as Ohio, where he taught school for three years in Butler county. In 1820 he came into Indiana, where he entered land and made the beginnings of a fine farm of 240 acres, to which he later added 160 acres, all being about nine miles west of Indianapolis. In 1823 he was married in Butler county, Ohio, and soon thereafter settled on the land just noted, where he developed a fine farm, and became one of the prominent farmers in the State. His death occurred Jan. 19, 1884, when he was aged eighty-eight years. His personal characteristics were those of a broad-minded, progressive and intelligent man, and he had a justifiable pride in adjusting troubles between his neighbors. In politics he was a Whig and Republican, and was never a candidate for any position. Kind and charitable to the poor, he was a good neighbor and a kind friend, commanding the confidence and esteem of the community to a marked degree. His wife, Eve Negley, was born in Kentucky, May 17, 1807, and she survived her husband about thirteen hours. Both died at the old homestead, where they had lived for sixty-one years, and both were buried in one grave. For more than sixty years they had been consistent and devoted members of the Methodist church at Shiloh.

Mr. Eve Gladden was the daughter of Peter and Elizabeth (Pembroke) Negley. Her parents were both German born, and their first home in this country was in Kentucky, and afterward they lived in Butler county, Ohio. Later they joined a pioneer party, and entered a large tract of land on Fall Creek, near Millersville, in this county, where he improved a large farm, and stood well as a farmer and a citizen. He died at an advanced age and was highly regarded in this section of Marion county. In politics he was a Whig, and was a worthy member of the Methodist Church. In his family were the following children: John; George; Catherine, Mrs. Reed; Sally, Mrs. McIntosh; Elizabeth, who first married a Whiting (by whom she had two children), and has since been six times married; Eve, who became Mrs. Gladden; Margaret, who died unmarried; David, a physician, as was his brother, Jacob. All are now dead. William and Eve Gladden were the parents of the following children: Jacob, who died young; William N., now a fruit grower in California; John W., whose name introduces this article; James W., who died in 1868, leaving a wife and children; Alfred H., a member of a lumber firm in the city; Elizabeth J., who died single; Olive H., now Mrs. I. Cox; Mary, who died at the age of sixteen years; George L.; and David F., who died unmarried. Of these William N., John W., Alfred H. and George L. are all that are living.

John W. Gladden remained under the parental roof until his majority, when he married and engaged in farming. From his father he received forty acres, and buying forty more, began with a very good place. There he remained six years, when he sold out, and buying 160 acres, made it his home for a year. Then he again sold out to buy a farm consisting of 120 acres. To this he added, and at one time owned 181 acres. This place was situated in the edge of Hendricks county, and there for thirty-six years he carried on very successfully large and profitable farming operations, and was engaged for eight years in dairying. Mr. Gladden retired from active life in 1894, and now has his home in Bridgeport, where he bought a handsome and commodious residence, and where he and his excellent wife are enjoying the last years of a useful and well-spent life. His has been a career of hard work, unwearied industry, unwavering integrity, and crowned with very substantial success.

Mr. Gladden was married in 1849, to Miss Mary M. McCalmont, born in Marion county, Ind., Oct. 26, 1827, daughter of Wilson and Lydia (Fancett) McCalmont, one of the earliest pioneer families of the State. Both her father and her mother came to this State with their respective parents, and here they were married, making their home a mile and a half northwest of Bridgeport. Her father was a son of Alexander McCalmont, a native of Ohio, of Scotch-Irish descent. In early life he was a tailor, but turned to farming, in which he was very successful, and occupied an enviable standing as a tiller of the soil. His children were as follows: Wilson, the father of Mrs. Gladden; William; Joseph; Margaret, who became Mrs. J. Smith; Alexander; Nancy, who married S. Hardin; Martha, who became Mrs. D. Fancett; and Robert. They were Presbyterians in religious faith.

Lydia Fancett McCalmont, the mother of Mrs. Gladden, was a daughter of John and Eve (Fry) Fancett, both natives of Virginia, and early settlers of Ohio. About 1823 they came to Indiana. John Fancett was born in Virginia, and came into Ohio with his parents in the time of the Indian wars. The Indians killed his mother and an infant at her breast, and took him captive. For many years he remained with the Indians, and became so attached to their wild life, that his friends were able only with the utmost difficulty, to induce him to return to civilization. Finally they gave him a white colt, which he was to own. After a time he became reconciled to his own people, and later married. He received no education, but was intelligent and shrewd. His marriage was contracted in Ohio, though he soon became a resident of Indiana, where he became a prominent and successful farmer, and a useful citizen. When he died, he was eighty-six, and his widow lived to be ninety-one. They were both faithful and devoted members of the Methodist Church. They had the following children: Joseph, a farmer; Cynthia, who became Mrs. Tryer; David, a farmer; Cydalena, who married Aaron Homan; Lydia, the mother of Mrs. Gladden.

Mrs. Gladden is a member of the following family: Ama, wife of George Johnson; Mary M., Mrs. Gladden; David F., a farmer; Cynthia A., who married J. W. Gladden; Jane, who died young; Elizabeth, the wife of D. Bice; Irene; Debbie E.; Albert; Lydia; Franklin; Fletcher; Horace; and Charity.

Mr. and Mrs. John W. Gladden have had the following children: Jane M., the wife of H. Spray; Alice, the wife of Lewis Mills; Margaret, the wife of David D. Mills; William, a farmer and grocer, who married Rose Bailey; Jane, deceased, who died leaving two children; Alice, who died leaving one son living. Mr. and Mrs. Gladden are conspicuous members of the Methodist Church, where their Christian character and genuine worth command the respect and esteem of all their associates.

The mother of Mrs. Gladden, who was born March 7, 1808, lived to the age of ninety-six years, and retained her health and abilities to a remarkable degree. She spent much of her last days in reading her Bible, and employed leisure moments in piecing quilts, with as much readiness as women thirty years younger. She was the last survivor of the charter members of the Shiloh Methodist Church, which was organized in 1828.

WILLIAM KING, a well-known citizen of Indianapolis, is a man of versatile powers and many achievements. As a soldier, agriculturist, school teacher, post office official, and contractor and builder, he has made a thorough success of life, and is now carrying on a very prosperous business in the last named line. He comes of a family of ability and prominence.

John King, his grandfather, was of German descent, and a farmer by occupation. He passed his early life in Pennsylvania, but upon reaching manhood went to Kentucky, and there married a Miss Able. Of this union there were five children: James, who is mentioned below; Elizabeth, who married William Ball; William; Ann, who married George Spraker; and Samuel T., who settled at Raymond, Miss., and there ran the Raymond Gazette for over thirty years, a paper advocating the abolition of slavery. Though a slave owner himself, he was a kind one, and gave his help all the privileges of hired servants. He died in Raymond, a town which he himself had founded.

After marriage John King settled upon a Kentucky farm, where he engaged in agriculture very successfully throughout the rest of his business life. A wise, industrious and practical farmer, in the steady pursuit of business he won for himself a very solid prosperity. A strong Abolitionist, he never employed slaves; and, giving most of his time to his business, he refrained from office holding. He was a man of marked integrity, firm in his religious convictions and a consistent member of the Presbyterian Church.

James King, father of William, became one of the pioneers of Jackson county, Ind. He passed many years of his early life upon the well conducted farm of his father in Kentucky, and there received excellent rearing, considering the undeveloped condition of the State at that time. He attended the schools of his vicinity regularly, and being possessed of a bright, active intellect, and studious habits, acquired a thorough education. As a further preparation for life's activities he entered the shop of James Ball, and there by close attention to business soon learned the blacksmith's trade. About this time he married, in Kentucky, Margaret Ball, daughter of James Ball, who is mentioned below. Mrs. King died in 1880, at the advanced age of eighty years. To her and her husband were born six children: Jacob and John both located in Minnesota, and there died. George died in Indiana. James died in his native county. William is mentioned below. Rachel married W. D. Johnson, by whom she had four children, and, after his death, James Bay, by whom she had three; she is now a widow and resides at Broad Ripple. After marriage Mr. King moved to Jackson county, Ind., where he settled upon an excellent tract of new land, which had been entered by his father-in-law, James Ball, in 1834. Here by persistent activity and wise management he soon made many improvements, and gradually opened up large tracts to cultivation. Making a specialty of stock raising, he became in time one of the prominent stock men of the county. He enlarged his farm by land purchases until he in time owned about one thousand acres, much of which he divided among his children. In addition to farming he opened a blacksmith's shop on his place, and there followed his trade to some extent. Continuing upon the rising plane of life he in time became one of the wealthiest farmers in the county. A large framed man, six feet and one inch in height, vigorous and healthy, he was a hard worker throughout his life, especially in his younger days, and he lived to enjoy the fruits of his well directed activities. His death occurred in 1864, in his sixty-seventh year.

Mr. King was for years one of the leading men of Jackson county. Well-informed upon all questions, broad-minded and far-seeing, and possessed of the best business judgment, he filled at different times to the entire satisfaction of his community the offices of justice of peace, township trustee and county commissioner. As a man of firm temperance principles, and a consistent church member, belonging to the Missionary Baptist Church, he was exceedingly active in everything pertaining to the moral welfare of the community. In politics he at first affiliated with the Whigs, and later with the Republicans.

William King inherited his father's capacity for large achievements. Born in Jackson county, Ind., June 16, 1837, he gained his education in the common schools of his neighborhood, and in the White River Academy, at Brownstown, evincing a decided taste for intellectual pursuits. By assisting his father upon the home farm he obtained practical knowledge of many branches of agriculture, and as an additional preparation for life's activities he also learned the carpenter's trade. To farming, however, he first gave his attention, carrying on that industry upon the family homestead until 1859. Then, settling upon a farm of his own in Jackson county, he continued agriculture for himself until the opening of the Civil war. Fired with a thrill of patriotism, with the assistance of a friend he organized and drilled a company of home guards, and later, in 1861, assisted in raising Company B, for the 82d Regiment, Indiana Volunteer Infantry, in which he enlisted, going into camp at Madison, Ind. Going to Louisville, Ky., under General Burbridge, he was soon assigned to the 1st Division of the 4th Army Corps, commanded by Buell, and started on the march through Kentucky after Bragg. From the battle of Perryville, he marched by way of Crab Orchard, Lebanon, and Gallatin, Tenn., to Nashville, doing his full share of the fighting. Chattanooga was another of his battlefields, and after being transferred to the 14th Army Corps he fought at Chickamauga. He passed some time in the Army of the Cumberland, and performed active service at the battle of Missionary Ridge, and for some time he was stationed at Atlanta. On one of the long marches Mr. King received a slight wound upon the ankle, without, however, the fracture of any bones. While at Chattanooga he contracted typhoid fever, and after a period of treatment in the field hospital was sent home, and on account of disablement from his ankle wound, which had been much aggravated by the fever, he secured an honorable discharge. Soon after his recovery, upon the invasion of Indiana by John Morgan, Mr. King again took up arms in defense of his country, only for a short time, however. Then, in 1864, in spite of his crippled limb, he was drafted and assigned to the 31st Indiana, under Colonel Smith, then stationed at Pulaski, Tenn. Here he acted as drillmaster for a short period, and then, under General Thomas, started after General Hood, marching on to Nashville. While on the way Mr. King again fell ill, and was in the hospital at Nashville during the battle at that place. Later he was sent to Indianapolis, where he was assigned to the Veteran Reserve Corps, which was on duty at the State House barracks, where, May 15, 1865, he received his second honorable discharge.

After the war Mr. King returned to his farm in Jackson county, and there continued agriculture very successfully for some time, improving his property and adding to its area until it finally embraced about eight hundred acres. A progressive, practical farmer, he occupied a leading place among agriculturists for many years. During this period he also increased his income by teaching school, and, being an excellent disciplinarian, gifted in imparting knowledge, he continued his services in this line for twenty terms. As his health made it necessary to discontinue farming, after some years' trading in oil barrel staves in Jackson and Scott counties, at Crothersville and Austin, he moved to Henryville, Clark Co., Ind., where for eight years he continued his professional work, giving excellent satisfaction to both board and patrons. In 1883, finding a better opening for business in Indianapolis, Mr. King moved to the city and worked at the building business here for six years. Then, in 1889, after passing very creditably the civil service examination, he received an appointment to a clerkship in the post office, a position which he filled very acceptably for some time. Suffering, however, from trouble with his limb, he finally asked for an indefinite leave of absence. After a period passed in recuperation he eventually returned to his duties in the post office and there filled at different times several important positions, until his resignation, in July, 1902. He has since given his time to contract building, and is now working up a good industry in that line.

In 1859 Mr. King married Nancy Love, a daughter of Madison Love, of North Carolina, who, about 1840, settled upon a tract of new land in Jackson county, Ind., where he became a leading farmer and citizen. Mr. Love married in Fleming county, Ky., Mary Johnson, who was born in Kentucky, and came of a prominent family, some members of which settled in Jackson county, Ind. To Mr. and Mrs. Love were born several children: Atha, who married V. Carter; Nancy, Mrs. King; Sarah, who married L. Foster; Martha, the wife of H. W. Harling; Fannie, the wife of Alexander Marling; John, who resides at Seymour; and Harvey, who is a prominent farmer. Of these, Nancy (Mrs. King) died Sept. 2, 1897. On June 30, 1900, Mr. King was remarried to M. F. Hamilton, who was born in Jefferson county, Ind., daughter of James Hamilton, of that county; he was a cabinet-maker by trade, and settled in Indianapolis in 1887. Mr. Hamilton married Susan A. Cabbage, a native of Pennsylvania, and they had six children: Arminta, who married a Mr. Fullilove, of this city; Sarah, Mrs. Lane; Susan C., who has never married; William C., who died in Louisville, Ky.; Roland, who died in this city, and M. F., who is Mrs. King. The parents were consistent members of the Baptist Church.

By his first marriage Mr. King had eleven children, ten of whom are living: James A., who is now a contractor and builder at Broad Ripple; Anna, who married H. C. Poindexter; Amanda J., a teacher for many years, who married a Mr. Purcell; William Grant, who is an expert accountant; Attie, who married James I. Hymer; Arthur, who is an expert accountant; Ransom, who is engaged in the stair building business; Francis, who has never married; and Katie and Mamie, twins, who have never married. No children were born of the second union.

Mr. King is keenly interested in politics, well informed upon all questions of the day, and eminently qualified for office holding. While in Henryville he served as justice of the peace for four years, discharging his duties with fidelity and ability. An uncompromising Republican, he always puts forth his efforts for the success of that party. In religious work he is also active and is a consistent member of the Missionary Baptist Church, to which his first wife belonged. Fraternaly he affiliates with George H. Thomas Post, G. A. R.

James Ball, maternal grandfather of William King, and a man of large enterprise, was born in New Jersey of good Irish stock. He embarked upon life as a blacksmith, and as such continued for some time. At an early date he moved to Nelson county, Ky., in company with other pioneers, who built a boat and floated down to the Ohio River Falls, landing at the spot where Louisville now stands. Proceeding at once to Nelson county, they took up land and made good homes for themselves. Mr. Ball came into possession of some excellent farming land in that vicinity, and there, about six miles from Bardstown, opened what was known as the Six Mile House, where he entertained some of the most noted men of the State at times. He also started a blacksmith shop, which he managed with success for many years. In addition to his Kentucky enterprises, and with the view of bettering the conditions of his children, he went to Jackson county, Ind., and there took up large tracts of land, which he later divided among his children. He was an excellent business man and amassed considerable property. He passed his last days in Kentucky, dying there.

During his young manhood Mr. Ball married, in New Jersey, Rachel Calver, who was born in that State, and of this union there were eight children: Margaret, who was the mother of Mrs. King; William, who settled in Indiana; Daniel, deceased, who was prominent as a Baptist evangelist; James, who settled in Kentucky; George and John, who also settled in that State; Nancy, who married F. King and settled in Indiana; and Parmelia, who settled in Kentucky.

J. F. GILBREATH, a well-known resident of Indianapolis, a descendant of an honorable old family of North Carolina and a survivor of the Civil war, was born in Guilford county, N. C., Sept. 18, 1846, son of Jesse and Sarah (Mendenhall) Gilbreath, both natives of North Carolina, where they were married. He was educated in the common schools and was reared as a farmer. He is a grandson of Thomas and Mary (McCullough) Gilbreath, of North Carolina, the former of whom was a son of Robert Gilbreath. His wife was a native of Ireland. They came to America at an early day and settled near Greensboro, N. C., and in the early days of the militia he served at the general musters.

Jesse Gilbreath, father of J. F., was born in 1808 in North Carolina, where he married a second time and where all his children were born. By trade he was a wagonmaker. In 1851 he moved to Greensboro, Henry Co., Ind., and there engaged in work at his trade and also engaged in farming. He made a comfortable living but was too charitable to ever acquire a large estate. When in North Carolina he was a popular captain of militia, but after coming to Indiana made no public record, attending strictly to his business. In two things he had the most settled convictions, politics and religion; he was a staunch Whig and Republican, and a sincere and consistent Wesleyan Methodist, although in his later years he accompanied his second wife to the Quaker meeting. His life was one of integrity and without reproach. In 1876 he went on a visit to his son at Indianapolis and died of pneumonia while there. The first wife of Jesse Gilbreath was Hester A. Willouby, who was born in Maryland. They were married in North Carolina, removing in 1834 to Georgia, where she died in September, 1835. Mr. Gilbreath with his three children then went back to North Carolina. His children were: Thomas W., born in 1831, who came to Indiana in 1851, and died in 1861; John S., of Indianapolis; and Mrs. Mary M. White, of Shirley, Ind. Mrs. Gilbreath was a Wesleyan Methodist. Jesse Gilbreath married (second) Sarah Mendenhall, a widow, born June 19, 1808, daughter of Joseph and Mary Buchanan, the former of English descent. By trade Joseph Buchanan was a carpenter and farmer, a man most highly esteemed. He died at his home in North Carolina in 1845, a member of the Society of Friends. He and his wife Mary had children: Sarah, mother of J. F. Gilbreath; Shephard, who died in Indiana in 1866; Mrs. Mary Bowman; Reuben Burcham, who died in Missouri; Mrs. Lydia Knight; Mrs. Elizabeth Smith; and William Burcham, who came to Indiana in 1853, and served in the war of the Rebellion. Five children were born to Jesse and Sarah (Mendenhall) Gilbreath, namely: Emily J., Mrs. H. Rose; Mrs. Caroline Hardin; Mrs. Lydia Forbes; Robert, of Charlotteville, Ind.; and J. F., of this sketch. The mother died in 1879. She always adhered to the Quaker faith, a good and pious woman.

In 1851 the brothers, Thomas W. and John S. Gilbreath, made up their minds to go to Indiana, and as they had no other means of transportation, they walked the whole distance of 550 miles, accomplishing it in thirteen days, making the trip with a very limited capital, and through many difficulties; they joined an uncle in Fayette county. John S. was then eighteen years of age, and he soon found employment as a farm hand. He worked hard and saved enough money to return to North Carolina with a team and wagon, and moved the family to Indiana in that same year.

J. F. Gilbreath was five years old when they moved to Indiana, and he remained under the parental roof and assisted his father in the farming, until 1862, when he enlisted in the army for three years, although but sixteen years of age. He became a member of Company G, 16th Ind. V. I., under Col. Hackleman, and was mustered in at Indianapolis and consigned to the Western department, going to Richmond, Ky. Here, on Aug. 30, 1862, he was wounded by an explosion of a shell, the wound taking effect in his breast. While he was in the field hospital, Gen. Kirby Smith's force surrounded it and made many prisoners. Soon after, Mr. Gilbreath was paroled and was sent to the parole camp at Indianapolis where he remained until he was recovered and exchanged. Later Mr. Gilbreath participated in the siege of Vicksburg and went thence to Jackson, New Orleans, up the Red River and to Pleasant Hill and Mansfield, where the regiment was defeated after a hard fight in which they lost all their supplies and many were taken prisoners. Although Mr. Gilbreath received a scalp wound he escaped and continued with his command until it fell back to New Orleans, being under fire all the way, and while there the war closed with the surrender of General Lee, April 9, 1865. He was honorably discharged at New Orleans, La., having taken part in thirty-one engagements and suffered almost every hardship incident to the life of a soldier. He receives a small pension but has never been fully restored to health.

After recovering from the effects of army life, Mr. Gilbreath, in 1866, engaged in railroad work as brakeman on the Panhandle road and later made a trip to Kansas. In 1869 he returned and entered the employ of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, as brakeman, and later was promoted to conductor, and was given a run into Chicago which he held for twelve years. He then went with the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad, as conductor, and was located in Nickerson, Kans., where he remained until 1888, when his wife and child both died and he returned to Indianapolis with his son Victor. He then went on the road to represent and to establish agencies for a roadcart factory and later went as brakeman with the Indianapolis & Vincennes Railroad, during which time he had his hand injured and suffered the loss of part of two fingers. This caused him to give up work on the road for a time, during which he engaged in a real estate business. He then went back to railroading and served seven years on the Belt line and then abandoned it forever. In 1902 he received an appointment in the city engineer's office and later was transferred to the Board of Health, but is now general foreman of repairs. Mr. Gilbreath has had a long and varied career, but he has the satisfaction of knowing that on every occasion he has discharged every duty faithfully and well and enjoys the warm friendship and respect of his comrades wherever he has been located. In politics he is a strong Republican, is a member of the order of Railway Conductors, belongs to the Union Veteran Legion, and during his life in the West, was a member of the Grand Army.

Mr. Gilbreath was married (first) in May, 1874, at Newcastle, Ind., to Miss Tidia Welch, daughter of John Welch, a native of North Carolina, who traveled a circuit for many years as a Methodist preacher, removed to Indiana, and died in 1895 at the home of his daughter Jeanne in Kansas City, Mo. He was buried at Newcastle. The children of this most worthy man were: Tidia; William; Nicholas; Mrs. Jeanne Briggs; John; and Mrs. Kate Montory. The children born to Mr. Gilbreath and wife were: Victor G., now living in Seattle, Wash.; and Bonnie K., who died in Kansas aged four years. Mrs. Gilbreath died there in 1888. She was a Christian woman and a consistent member of the Methodist Church. Mr. Gilbreath married (second), at Knightstown, Mrs. Lillie M. Stuart, and their children were: Horace Stuart, who married Bessie Ione Neal in October, 1905, has one daughter, Dorothy May Stuart; and Maude Stuart, who married Vern E. Whittaker in December, 1902, had one son Claude H., who died in July, 1906. Mrs. Gilbreath was a daughter of Shepherd and Rhoda (Cook) Bowman, the former of North Carolina and the latter of Indiana. Rhoda (Cook) Bowman was a daughter of John and Julia Cook, both natives of Ohio, who were pioneers in Indiana. They were Hicksite Quakers of most consistent Christian life. Shepherd Bowman was a son of Jesse Bowman of North Carolina, a carpenter by occupation and a pioneer of Indiana. In religious belief he was an orthodox Quaker. He still resides at Knightstown and is well known in Indianapolis where he has done much building and contracting. His children are: Lillie, Mrs.

J. F. Gilbreath; Julia A., Mrs. Morton Crider; William of Richmond; and Clyde of Indianapolis. The children of his second marriage were Clifford of Columbus, Ohio, and Fred, of Knightstown. Mrs. Gilbreath is a Friend in religious faith. Mr. Gilbreath is a member of the order of Railway Conductors, of which organization he has been a popular member for thirty-three years.

ROBERT RENTSCH, a popular and successful grocer at No. 1124 North Senate avenue, Indianapolis, where he has built up a very select family trade, was born in Werther, Westphalen, Germany, Nov. 21, 1851. His parents, Henry and Charlotte (Zumwinkel) Rentsch, were native-born Germans. They had a family of ten children, six sons and four daughters, six now living: Ferdinand, of Werther, Germany; Julius and Henry, both of Werther; Robert, of Indianapolis; Johanna, widow of Fred Stecker, of Bielefeld, Westphalen; and Emma, wife of Fritz Thiekoetter, of Bielefeld, Germany. The father was a baker by trade, and had a confectionery and bakery at Werther. He died in 1885, at the age of seventy-six years; the mother, who still survives, lives at Werther, now over eighty-four years of age. Both were reared as members of the Lutheran Church, and they have always been loyal to their ancestral faith.

Robert Rentsch was educated in the substantial and practical German fashion in his native land, and when seventeen years of age came to the United States. Though not able to speak English, he had a determined soul, and was bound to succeed. His first work was found with the wholesale grocery firm of Severin, Schnull & Co., with which house he remained until the summer of 1901, a period of thirty-three years, which bespeaks much for his steady character and reliable work. In 1901 he set up in the retail grocery business for himself, on North Senate avenue, and has won a good patronage.

Mr. Rentsch was married, Aug. 14, 1873, to Miss Emma Hahn, a daughter of Detlev and Henrietta (Stoever) Hahn, and to this union have come four children: Henry, Adolph, Augusta, and Louisa. Henry, who is unmarried, is manager of a gold mine in Africa. Adolph is in the store with his father. He and his two sisters are at home. Mr. and Mrs. Rentsch are Lutherans in their religious faith, and are highly respected in the city of Indianapolis, where they have a wide circle of friends who recognize and cherish their many good qualities and sound worth of character. Mr. Rentsch is a member of two prominent German singing societies of Indianapolis, "The German House" and "The Mannerchor." As noted above, he came to this country unable to speak a word of English. To-day he has a fluent command of the language, and is well informed on all current questions.

JOHN N. FALL, a retired farmer of Lebanon, Boone county, is one of the very oldest inhabitants of that region. He was born in Indiana when it was still a territory, his birth occurring Sept. 15, 1814, in what is now Union county, a mile and a half from Silver creek. His parents were John William and Anna Catherine (Gift) Fall, natives of North Carolina.

John W. Fall removed from his native State to Ohio first, and lived there in Preble county till about 1812, when he and his wife moved to Indiana and entered land in what is now Union county. He took eighty acres of land, his brother entering another eighty acres adjoining, but the latter fell back and was re-entered by John W. Fall and his father-in-law, Nicholas Gift. The former made the required improvements on the entire 160 acres, and then in 1814 returned to Preble county. There he also entered land on which he made his home for seventeen years. At the end of that period he again went to Indiana, and buying 250 acres from old "Tommy Hughes," within a mile and a half from his old place, lived there several years. The farm was located just above Brownsville, at the east fork of the Whitewater. About 1837 John W. Fall moved to Boone county and bought several farms, among them one of 280 acres situated below Colfax and sixty acres on Wolf creek, making his home in Center township, where he passed the remainder of his life. In the war of 1812 Mr. Fall was drafted for service, but hired a substitute. He and his wife had three sons and one daughter, all now deceased except John N. The father died at the age of eighty-five years, two months, fifteen days, and his wife a little over a year afterward, passing away at the age of seventy-eight in the home of her daughter, Elizabeth Maroney, in Clinton township.

The paternal grandfather was Christian Fall, a native of North Carolina, of German descent. His occupation was farming. He was probably a soldier in the war of 1812, as was also his son George. Twice married, he had in all twenty-three children, and he and his second wife both lived to a good old age.

The maternal grandfather of John N. Fall was Nicholas Gift, likewise of German ancestry, and born in North Carolina. A lifelong farmer, he moved first to Preble county, Ohio, where he settled on a farm near Winchester, land which he entered from the government. He died in that same county, when about sixty-five years old. His wife lived to the extreme age of ninety-six, and was able to do her ordinary work up to an hour before her death. They had several sons and daughters.

John N. Fall was scarcely more than an infant when his father returned from Indiana to Ohio, and the boy grew up in Preble county. He attended the subscription schools and to secure even that education was obliged to walk three miles to school barefooted. When he was about seventeen the family returned to Union county, Ind., and the young man made his home there until 1837, engaged in farming. In 1835 he entered land in Boone county, and two years later removed thither permanently, making the trip there on horseback. This land, entered at the land office in Crawfordsville, was situated in what is now Washington township, two miles and a half from Lebanon. Mr. Fall soon sold it, and bought another eighty acres in the same locality, from which he removed the timber, and where he and his wife began their housekeeping. Soon another forty acres was added, and, as prosperity followed, Mr. Fall added other lands till he owned at one time 1,300 acres, 900 of them east of Sidney, in Fremont county, Iowa. For several years the family made their home on a 220-acre farm in Jefferson township, then lived four years in Lebanon, the next twenty-six years on a farm north of Lebanon, and then for thirteen years on a small but attractive place of five acres, situated north of the city, near the corporation line.

In the spring of 1838 John N. Fall was married to Miss Lydia Davis, a young lady whom he had met some years before, when she was only a little girl of eleven, but who then had attracted him and whom he had resolved to marry. When the young couple began their housekeeping in Boone county, it was in the simplest fashion, in a cabin made of hewed logs, and with the greater part of their furniture of home construction. The bedstead was made of hickory poles fastened into the wall and with clapboards and cords in place of springs. In pronounced contrast is Mr. Fall's present home, a handsome one built in 1903, on his father's old farm, which he still owns and which he has greatly improved. To John N. and Lydia Fall came a family of eleven children, eight of whom grew to maturity and married: (1) William, a physician, in Advance, married Miss Sarah Downing, and has one son and four daughters. (2) Emaline married Samuel Utter, of Lebanon, and has two children, Clifton and

Rebecca married William A. Gray, of Boone county, and they have one child living, Audie, the wife of a Mr. Batz. (4) Mary became Mrs. Monroe Hazelrig. (5) Carrie married Steele Bryan, formerly a school teacher, and afterward a freight agent and then a druggist. They had one son, Clarence, who died when nineteen years old. Mr. Fall makes his home with this daughter. (6) Alice married Charles Downing, of Lafayette. (7) Charlie is a physician and druggist in Colorado Springs, Colo. (8) Park O., who died May 24, 1895, married Miss Henrietta Sanders, and had three children, Adah, Lawrence and Clarence. The mother of these children died at the age of fifty-nine, in 1878, when the family were living on the five-acre place north of Lebanon. She was a devoted wife and mother and her loss was deeply mourned.

John N. Fall is an ardent Democrat in his politics, and has always taken part in local affairs. He was elected supervisor of Center township for six successive terms, but the sixth time refused to serve. For the last few years he has lived retired, but still holds his place in the esteem and respect of his old-time friends and neighbors.

PETER STUCK, during his lifetime a successful farmer of Perry township, Marion Co., Ind., residing on Section 6, was born in that township Feb. 15, 1830, son of Daniel and Sarah E. (DeMott) Stuck. The parents were natives of Kentucky.

The Stuck family is of German descent, and the records show that the grandfather of our subject, also named Peter, died in Marion county, Ind., at an advanced age, the father of a large family. He served in the war of 1812. The maternal grandfather, Peter DeMott, also had a large family, and died when an old man in Kentucky, where he had resided all his life.

Daniel and Sarah E. (DeMott) Stuck were married in Kentucky, and came to Indiana in 1829, locating on a farm in the northern part of Perry township, Marion county, where they partially reared their family. He died on the Bluff road, three miles from Indianapolis, in middle life. The family born to Daniel and Sarah E. Stuck consisted of eleven children, eight sons and three daughters, three of whom are still living: Mary, wife of David Meyers, of Rolling Prairie, Ind.; Martha Jane, wife of Preston Hankins, of Southport, Ind., and William H. Stuck, of Indianapolis, Indiana.

In the life history of Peter Stuck is given an example of devotion to family ties seldom met with. One in a family of eleven children, from early childhood, his lot was a trying one, for he was obliged to work very hard upon the farm, assisting his parents. When he was only fifteen years of age his father died, and Peter assumed new burdens, his great idea being to relieve his mother and help his brothers and sisters. Several of his brothers were sadly afflicted. William was crippled and unable to walk, being obliged to crawl. Although Peter himself was unable to attend school, he sent William, and through his encouragement and advice the boy learned the shoemaker's trade, by means of which he has supported himself for many years, being now a prosperous man, with a family, residing in Indianapolis. Another brother was blind, and although he lived to be sixty-four years of age he never ate a single mouthful of solid food, subsisting entirely upon milk and coffee; for him also, Peter tenderly cared, as well as for his mother, who was sixty-seven or sixty-eight years of age at the time of her demise. This brave young man also helped his mother to bring up the other children, who fortunately were in good health, and in spite of these heavy burdens, through his industry and thrift, gave his own large family advantages he never enjoyed and accumulated a comfortable fortune for himself and his wife during their declining years.

In order to better carry out his plans for taking care of the family Peter Stuck rented land, then leased it, and by 1861 had earned sufficient money to purchase it. Upon this farm he resided until his death. It originally consisted of 127 acres, to which he added eighty acres, owning in all 207 acres, all of which is now in a fine state of cultivation.

When he first rented this property it was covered with thick woods, all of which he cleared off, turning the virgin forest into the fields of rich farm land which yield such abundant harvests.

In 1854 Mr. Stuck married Miss Catherine Elston, daughter of David and Sarah (Admire) Elston, and one child was born of this union, a daughter, Sarah. Mrs. Stuck died a year after her marriage, and in 1862 Mr. Stuck married Miss Mary Milburn, a lady of sterling traits of character, who seconded her husband in all his good works and proved herself a true, Christian woman and devoted wife and mother. Nine children were born of this union, six sons and three daughters: Rosa, who married Charles Scott, lives in Indianapolis, and they have three children, Nellie, Roy and Raymond; Alice married Wilbur Eubanks, resides in Marion county, and has four children, Ora, Ethel, Elsie and Florence; Calvin, who lives on the old home place, married Susan Kegley, and they have had two children, Harry and Orval, both deceased; Lee, who lives in Greenwood, married Daisy Tingle; Peter, a farmer of Perry township, married Ella Frazier, and they have three children, Hazel, Irvin and Edna; Edward, living in Perry township, married Cora Wycoff, and they have one child, Howard; Frank, a resident of Indianapolis, married Grace Adams; David, a farmer of Perry township, married Stella Kegley; Cora lives in Indianapolis with her sister, Mrs. Charles Scott. Mr. and Mrs. Stuck both passed away in 1904. Mrs. Stuck on March 8th, and Mr. Stuck on Nov. 5th. The farm of 207 acres was divided among their nine children, Calvin receiving the old home place, with sixteen acres; Lee, eighteen acres; Edward, twenty-three acres; Peter, twenty-five acres; Frank, twenty acres; David, twenty-three acres; Rosa, twenty-five and one-half acres; Alice, twenty-five and two-fifths acres; and Cora, thirty-one acres. Calvin, Peter, David and Alice live on their land.

In politics Mr. Stuck was a Republican, and he served as road commissioner for some terms, a number of years ago, discharging his duties as a public official in the same efficient, conscientious manner that he had always done those of a private nature. His fraternal affiliations were with the order of Odd Fellows, in which lodge he was very popular.

In few communities are there to be found people possessing the many excellent qualities of Peter Stuck and his wife, and their noble example cannot but have a good effect upon those who knew them. Conscientiously discharging their duties to all the members of their families; ever proving kind and helpful neighbors, with an encouraging word for all, they occupied a place of highest esteem in the regard and affection of a host of friends as well as in the love of their children and other relatives.

HARLAND RICHARDSON, a prominent and substantial farmer of Marion county, Ind., residing upon his well cultivated and finely improved farm in Perry township, was born in Section 7, where he still lives, on Oct. 27, 1835. His parents were Thomas H. and Catherine (Harris) Richardson, the former born in Washington county, Pa., and the latter in the State of Maryland.

The Richardson family is of English ancestry. The paternal grandfather of Harland Richardson was a prosperous and respected farmer in Pennsylvania, where he was born and where he died, leaving a family of eight children. On the maternal side, Mr. Richardson's grandfather was Josiah Harris, a native of Maryland. In his early manhood he was a Revolutionary soldier. He established a fishery on the Potomac river, opposite Mount Vernon, but in later years moved to Kentucky with the pioneer settlers there, became a slave owner, and died in that State, leaving numerous descendants.

Thomas H. Richardson, the father of Harland, settled in Marion county as early as 1825, on Government land, 160 acres of which his wife had entered. Later they disposed of half of it, but their son re-purchased it, now owning the old estate. In his early days Thomas H. Richardson was employed as a teamster between Baltimore and Philadelphia, but later engaged in farming, in Indiana, where he died in April, 1860, aged seventy years. His wife survived until Dec. 29, 1864. She was a consistent member of the Christian Church. Their surviving children are: Nancy, widow of Peter Vandever, of Indianapolis, and Harland Richardson.

Harland Richardson was born and reared on the farm in Perry township which he now owns. His education was acquired in the subscription schools of his neighborhood. In September, 1854, he went to Kansas, landing in that State with but ten cents in his pocket, but his energy soon found employment and he was one of the builders of Fort Riley, then on the distant frontier. The government paid well, and when he returned to his home, in 1857, it was with $635 in gold, $5 in silver, and a $7 suit of clothes. Mr. Richardson used his money in 1860, in buying back forty acres which had been sold from the old farm, and after the close of the Civil war he purchased the other forty acres. Mr. Richardson now owns 113 acres of the original section, his inheritance being twenty-six acres, and he bought a one-third interest in forty acres. Later he sold seven acres, but also bought forty more acres in the same section, afterward purchasing forty-seven acres in Sections 10 and 11, in the same township. This does not include all of Mr. Richardson's realty holdings, as he owns forty more acres in Perry township, 100 acres in Lawrence township, and a well-placed lot in Crown Hill cemetery.

Few young men displayed more loyal attachment to country than Harland Richardson in the days when the nation called upon her sons for help. On July 5, 1861, he enlisted, becoming a private in Company F, 19th Ind. V. I., and served in that regiment until Feb. 9, 1864, enlisting again, on the 9th of the following March, and remaining in the service until the close of the war. For gallantry and meritorious action he was promoted first to be sergeant, and on May 1, 1863, was commissioned second lieutenant. In less than a year, in April, 1864, he was promoted to first lieutenant. His first commission was mailed him on the 1st of May, reaching the regiment of which he was a member on June 30th. However, ill fortune met him on the battlefield of Gettysburg, the next day, and he never was able to rejoin his regiment. Captured at that time, he was sent to Libby prison, in which foul den he was kept confined for ten months, and then was sent to Macon, Ga., thence to Charleston and on to Columbia, where he was paroled Dec. 9, 1864, having been a prisoner for seventeen months and nine days, all that time being denied a change of clothing. Mr. Richardson was in the commissary department in the early days of the war, and after being promoted was assigned to duty as second lieutenant, taking part in the battle of Chancellorsville, escaping only to be captured shortly after, at Gettysburg. He did not receive the belated commission until 1888, on account of some mistake being made in the muster roll, while he was in prison, and with it received $953, officer's pay; he is now the recipient of a monthly pension. No old soldier can tell more graphically the tales of those months of dreadful imprisonment than can Mr. Richardson, and he participated in many pitiable occurrences and knew of many more. One he relates substantially as follows: With six others he had been taken prisoner and one day received a note from a boy prisoner, while in the dungeons of Belle Isle, pitifully begging him for a little tea or anything else which would make the life there endurable, supposing that Mr. Richardson, as an officer, would be accorded privileges and better fare. Such was not the case, and the only response Mr. Richardson could make to this probably dying request was to send everything he had, which was a $20 bill in Confederate money.

On Oct. 7, 1866, Mr. Richardson was married to Mary E. Garside, daughter of Joshua and Hannah (Whitehead) Garside, who were natives of England. They came to America soon after their marriage and settled in Cincinnati, where they lived for many years. They had a family of eight children, the survivors being: Sarah, widow of Benjamin Shafer, of Indianapolis; Isabella, the wife of G. W. Crouch, of Indianapolis; Esther, widow of Levi S. Hand, of Indianapolis; and Mary Emma, wife of Harland Richardson. Mr. Garside died August 16, 1857, aged forty-seven years, ten months, his widow surviving until May 30, 1895, reaching the age of eighty-three years, three months. They belonged to the Episcopal Church, and after Mr. Garside died his widow joined the Methodist Church. By trade he was a painter. Some years prior to his death Mr. and Mrs. Garside were induced to make a trip to England in order to secure a portion of an old estate, but they not only did not get it, but the litigation cost them their savings.

Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Richardson, William B., Charles and Edward the last-named dying at the age of six months. William B. lives on one of his father's farms in Perry township, and Charles, who married Maude Purvyance, lives on the home farm. Mr. Richardson was reared in the Democratic faith, but did not vote for Greeley. In 1896 he cast his vote for Palmer and Buckner, and in 1900 for John G. Wooley, the candidate of the Prohibition party. His life is not bound by any religious creed, although he favors the Methodist Church, of which his estimable wife is a member. His fraternal associations are with Southport Lodge, I. O. O. F.; the Masons, which he joined in 1860, and George H. Thomas Post, G. A. R. As a reliable, upright citizen, he enjoys universal esteem.

JOHN STETZEL, a pioneer barber of Indianapolis, is still in business in that place, now conducting one of the first class shops there. In the efficient management of this establishment he has won the confidence of business men, and is now looked upon as one of the substantial citizens of the place. Born in the Grand Duchy of Baden, Germany, Oct. 12, 1828, he is the son of John, Sr., and Mary (Richards) Stetzel.

John Stetzel, Sr., came of an old and prominent family of Baden, many members of whom were ardent Reformists. He learned the tailor's trade, and upon reaching manhood followed it with profit throughout active life. He was a consistent member of the Reformed Church. During his early manhood Mr. Stetzel married Mary Richards, daughter of George Richards and granddaughter of an Englishman of that name, who as a young man came to Baden, where he married a woman of that country and there made his home. George Richards was born in Baden, and upon reaching manhood followed the trade of a tailor. He married in Baden and there resided for many years. His wife died in that country. Late in life, in 1835, with his children, Mrs. Stetzel, then a widow with children; and George, a tailor by trade, he came to Hagerstown, Wayne Co., Ind., making the way from Quebec, Canada, by lake to Cleveland, and by canal boat to Cincinnati, Ohio. In Hagerstown, Ind., he followed his trade for some time, but finally retired to a farm, which he purchased near by, where he passed his last days and died. Mrs. Stetzel, after the death of her husband, made her home for many years with her father. After twelve years' widowhood, however, she married John Fisk, a Pennsylvania Dutch farmer, and they settled in Wayne county, Ind., where both passed their last days, and died. By her first marriage there were three children: Mary, who died at Cincinnati, Ohio, at the age of fifteen years; Barbara, who married Dr. Hass, of Dayton, Ohio; and John, who is mentioned below. By the second union there were two children: Mary, who married C. Farris; and David, who died from the effects of a wound received in the service of his country, in the Civil war.

John Stetzel had the misfortune to lose his father soon after birth. Under the fostering care of his mother and his Grandfather Richards he passed the first seven years of his life in Baden, Germany, and then, in 1835, came with his protectors to America and settled in Wayne county, Ind., where he passed some of his early youth in assisting his stepfather upon the farm. After a short period of this work, however, when about fourteen years old, he entered a barber's shop, in Cincinnati, where he passed three years as an apprentice. After mastering his trade he was given a regular position in the same shop, and here he remained for twelve years, commanding very good wages and winning patronage for his employers by his efficient services. Prospects of a good business opening in his line in the little village of Indianapolis decided him to try his luck in that place. Log cabin residences, meagre little stores, frequented by idlers and plodding farmers, streets gashed with mud-holes, or impeded by tree stumps, impossible sidewalks, and bridgeless streams, were some of the features that impressed him upon his arrival there, in 1852. For a short time he worked as a journeyman, and then purchased an interest in the shop of a patron and they conducted what was known as the "Bates House" shop. They continued there until the close of the Civil war, when they closed out the business. After a varied period as a journeyman, he and a partner by the name of Leo Lorano (who was of Spanish and Cherokee parentage), a remarkably good man and a Free Mason, opened a shop on Pennsylvania street, which they conducted with success for two years. Then, desirous of a change, they transferred their business to Terre Haute. After some time, however, Mr. Stetzel dissolved his partnership, and returned to Indianapolis, where, after several business changes, in 1883, he purchased a lot on East Ohio street, and erected a shop of his own. He had no difficulty in working up a custom, and, improving his establishment from time to time, he has there since continued. His shop is now one of the most reliable ones in the city, and has a large, high-class patronage. In the early days he erected a pleasant residence on North street, but later he sold the property and built the more pretentious home on East Ohio street, where he now resides. He also owns another pleasant house there, which he rents to good advantage.

Many years ago Mr. Stetzel married Mary E. Wible, who was born in Switzerland, in January, 1840, and in the early days came with her parents to Louisville, Ky. Of this union there have been two children: Arthur L., a baker by trade, is married and has one child; and Walter T., a clerk, is married and has four children. Mr. Stetzel is one of the honored pioneers of Indianapolis, thoroughly well known, and everywhere most highly respected. Reared as Lutherans, both he and his wife are consistent members of that Church. Politically, he at first affiliated with the Whigs, and later with the Republicans. He possesses a large fund of general information, is courteous and dignified in his bearing, and is much respected.

Mr. Wible, father of Mrs. Stetzel, a man of prominence and high cultivation, was born in Switzerland. There, upon reaching manhood, he married a woman of that country, who after many years, died in Louisville, Ky. Of this union there were six children: Edward, a barber, died at Danville, Ind.; William, a farmer, is also deceased; Charles, deceased, served in the United States army, and later in the Civil war, and died in Libby prison; and Adolph, a baker, in the employ of Parrott & Taggart of Indianapolis, served during the Civil war in the 9th Indiana Cavalry; Minnie married a Mr. Busch; and Mary E. (Mrs. Stetzel) is mentioned above. After some years Mr. Wible came to America and located at Louisville, Kentucky. A man of marked ability, he filled many important public offices in his native land, and acted for some time as judge of the courts. Socially he and his wife mingled in the best circles. After the death of his wife, he returned to Switzerland to settle an estate, and there, shortly afterward, he died.

JACOB SWARTZ MUSTARD (deceased), a prominent farmer of Washington township, Marion county, Ind., and a resident therein from his youth until his death in 1904, was a man of more than ordinary ability and good judgment. He was a native of Washington county, Pa., born Jan. 6, 1821, his parents being James and Dorothy (Swartz) Mustard; they were also born in the county named, and were the parents of four daughters and two sons, only one of whom is now living—Mary, the widow of Benjamin F. Rees, of Saint Louisville, Ohio. In 1834, the father, who was a farmer, located in Washington township, Marion Co., Ind., where he died in 1841, at the age of about forty-five years. His wife preceded him in 1827, at the early age of thirty-one years. Both parents were identified with the Presbyterian Church. James Mustard was a man far above the average as to intelligence and force of character. He was earnestly and actively interested in whatever pertained to the real progress of the community, being a leader in school matters and everything relating to the moral well-being and legal security of his fellow citizens. In his position as justice of the peace, which for several years he held by gubernatorial appointment, he was no small factor in the maintenance of law and order.

James Mustard was married a second time, his wife being Mrs. Elizabeth (Craig) Goble, and there were born of this union five sons, the four living being as follows: William, of Washington township; Joseph D., a resident of California; James, whose home is in Broad Ripple, Ind.; and Cephas, living at Thurman, Iowa. Hiram died in the West on the plains of Oregon.

The paternal grandfather of Jacob S. Mustard, James Mustard by name, was born in the North of Ireland of Scotch parents, but his wife, Elizabeth Cummings, was a girl from Virginia—a native of Sleepy Creek, Hampshire county. The grandfather emigrated to America before the Revolution, being accompanied by his mother, three sisters and a brother, Henry. The last named joined the Patriots at Baltimore and was lost at sea. James Mustard located in York county, Pa., thence migrated to Virginia, and eventually settled in Washington county, Pa., where, the father of a numerous family, he died at the age of eighty-seven years. The maternal grandfather of Jacob S. Mustard, whose name was Jacob Swartz, was a native of Pennsylvania, son of Philip Swartz, who was born in Germany. He was a prosperous farmer, the father of a large family, and died in his native State.

When his father located in Washington township, Jacob Swartz Mustard was in his fourteenth year. He reached manhood in Marion county, attending an academy in Greene county, Pa., and teaching two terms of school in Washington township. He was of an enterprising turn, and in 1844, being then twenty-three years of age, constructed a boat with another young man and started from Broad Ripple, Marion county, for New Orleans, the trip being taken for the purpose of seeing the country and to take produce to the southern market. The voyage was down the White river—along which were three dams which had to be jumped at high water, the Wabash, the Ohio and the Mississippi, and was safely and successfully accomplished. When Mr. Mustard returned he resumed farming in Washington township, after the death of his father most of the family burdens falling upon him. With his interest in the family patrimony he bought other land, and in 1853 attended the public sales at Council Bluffs, Iowa, at which he purchased a tract which was his home for three years, when he returned to Marion and bought the interests of the other heirs in the home place, and was the owner at one time (with other investments which he had made in the county) of more than 400 acres of land. All but about 100 acres of this land has since been sold. Mr. Mustard lived on his homestead until 1902, when he removed to Broad Ripple, where he died Aug. 28, 1904. At one time he had sold the farm, but six years later was glad to repurchase it; it is still owned by his wife, and is considered one of the best pieces of property in Marion county.

On Nov. 8, 1846, Mr. Mustard was married to Cassandra Coil, a daughter of Jacob and Barbara (Colip) Coil. Mary and James are the two children born of this union—the former, Mrs. Charles Johnson, living near Eureka, Greenwood Co., Kans., and the mother of ten children; and the latter a resident of Thurman, Kans., married Martha Speece, and is the father of three children. Mr. Mustard was throughout his life one of the most highly esteemed of the citizens among whom his lot was cast. He was not only an honor to the primary art of agriculture, which modern methods have transformed into a science, but an early educator, and a sturdy pioneer, who assisted to lay the present foundation of the State's material prosperity. For several years he served as school director, but in politics assumed an independent position. In religious belief he was a Methodist, as is his widow who survives him.

Mrs. Jacob S. Mustard was born on the old homestead of her father, which she now owns, near Broad Ripple, Washington township, Marion Co., Ind., on June 30, 1828. Her parents, Jacob and Barbara (Colip) Coil, although of German descent, were both natives of Pendleton Co., Va. There they were married in 1810, and in the following year located on a place near Washington Court House, Fayette Co., Ohio. In 1823 they settled in Washington township, where the wife died July 17, 1828, and the husband in November, 1837, at the age of sixty-nine years. Mr. Coil was a son of Jacob, a German farmer and soldier of the Revolution, who was killed in battle. Mrs. Coil, born Nov. 8, 1791, was a daughter of Rev. John Colip and Sabina (Conrad) Colip. The former emigrated to America as a young musician of the Hessian troops, but being deceived by the British he remained in the country to become a good, useful and prominent American. He was a man of superior and serious mind and after settling and marrying in Franklin county, Va., he was ordained as a Presbyterian minister. In 1829 he entered land in Washington township, Marion county, as well as in Hamilton county, settling in what was called Strawtown, on White river. There his family was reared, and there both he and his wife died of old age—the father having reached the age of eighty-six.

WILLIAM F. TEVEBAUGH. A native son of Indiana and a representative of one of its honored pioneer families, the subject of this sketch gave added distinction and prestige to the name through his valiant service in the war of the Rebellion, and as a worthy citizen of the capital city of the State we may most consistently enter in this work a brief review of his ancestral and personal history.

Mr. Tevebaugh was born on a farm in Knox county, Ind., March 18, 1841, and his early life, in its environments, duties and privileges, was such as was common to the farmer lads of the locality and period. He is a son of John and Cynthia (Richards) Tevebaugh, the former of whom was likewise a native of Knox county, while the latter was born in Tennessee. Solomon Tevebaugh, grandfather of William F., was born in Cape Colony, South Africa, of sturdy Holland-Dutch descent, and he came to America as a young man, being among those earnest and strong-hearted pioneers who settled in Indiana in its primitive days and laid the foundations for a great and prosperous State, disputing dominion with the Indians and enduring all the privations and strenuous labors which were the common lot of the early settlers. He located south-east of the historic old town of Vincennes, in Knox county, and as he had considerable means available he was enabled to provide himself with somewhat better conveniences than the average settler, erecting a double log house, which was provided with port-holes on each side, so that defense could be made in case of attack by the Indians. He also equipped the windows of his house with iron shutters, making his home a veritable fortress. When the land was placed on the market by the government he entered large tracts and became the owner of a valuable landed estate in Knox county, developing much of the property and becoming one of the most prominent and influential farmers of that section, while his public spirit and marked executive ability were shown in divers directions. He aided materially in promoting emigration to this State, in securing surveys of lands, and was indeed one of the honored founders of a great commonwealth, his home having been hospitably open to all newcomers until such time as they secured land and made ready their own homes, while his honor and integrity in all the relations of life gained him unequivocal confidence and esteem. When he located in Knox county, Vincennes was but a small village in the forest, being practically but the headquarters of a Catholic mission, as history fully records, and there he became an intimate friend and adviser of Gen. William H. Harrison at the time the latter was there stationed as Territorial governor. Thus it may be seen that the subject of this sketch is, indeed, a member of one of the earliest pioneer families of Indiana, where the name has ever stood for the highest type of citizenship. Solomon Tevebaugh not only aided in the material development of the State but also in the civic and moral progress, having been a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, while for many years the pioneers assembled at his home for worship before the erection of church buildings, and there also the itinerant, circuit-riding clergyman ever found a hearty welcome and hospitable entertainment. Eventually a camp-ground was established on his land and there the annual camp-meetings of the church were held. He was married in South Africa, shortly after this event emigrating to America, and the children were all born in Knox county, where the parents remained until well advanced in years, passing their declining days in the home of their son Riley, in Illinois. Their children were as follows: John, father of William F.; Polly, who became Mrs. Stuckey; Betsey, the wife of William Graham; George, who was a clergyman of the M.

E. Church; Solomon, Jr., who was a farmer and hunter, as was also Riley. All of this family are now deceased.

John Tevebaugh was reared on the old pioneer homestead in Knox county and contributed his quota to the arduous work of clearing the land and placing it under cultivation. He was born Sept. 9, 1808, and his death occurred Jan. 10, 1869. In his youthful days Indians were still numerous in Knox and adjoining counties and were a constant menace to life and property, making frequent raids and running off much live stock belonging to the settlers, and he acted as guard of property while still a boy and later was prominent in quelling the aborigines, having been an active participant in the Black Hawk war, in which he served under Gen. William H. Harrison, with whom he became intimately acquainted. He also knew personally other prominent men of the early days, including Gov. James D. Williams, while his strong intellectuality, powers of observation and remarkable memory made him an authority in regard to pioneer history. He remained on the homestead until he had attained maturity and eventually reclaimed and improved a farm of his own in his native county, being successful in his efforts and gaining precedence as one of the substantial and representative men of that section of the State. He not only carried on general farming, but also showed his enterprising spirit by engaging in the raising of live stock, while at the home was manufactured the woolen and linen cloth used for clothing and domestic purposes. He was a leading member of the Methodist Church, in which he was a licensed exhorter and a faithful Christian worker, having served as class-leader for many years and having been the incumbent of other official positions in the church, of which he was a veritable pillar. In politics he was originally a Whig, later gave his support to the Know-Nothing party, and finally was a stalwart adherent of the Republican party. While never an aspirant for public position he was true to all the duties of citizenship and served in various township offices of trust and responsibility, his honor and integrity being proverbial.

Mr. Tevebaugh's first wife died about 1846. She was a daughter of James Richards, who emigrated from Tennessee to Indiana in the early pioneer epoch, becoming one of the prominent and honored farmers of Knox county, where he passed the remainder of his life. His children were as follows: James; Locky, Mrs. Thorn; Cynthia, Mrs. Tevebaugh; and Minerva, Mrs. Banks. All were consistent members of the Methodist Church. John and Cynthia (Richards) Tevebaugh became the parents of six children, namely: Elizabeth, Mrs. G. Goldman; John W., who served during the Civil war as a member of the 33d Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and died July 20, 1901; William F., the immediate subject of this review; Mary, wife of Solomon Collins; Isaiah, who served as a member of the 4th Indiana Cavalry, now a resident of Mt. Carmel, Ill.; and Cynthia, who first married Joseph Collins, became after his death the wife of a Mr. Prather, who also died, and later married a Mr. Fisher, whom she survives. After the death of the mother of these children the father consummated a second marriage, being united to Mrs. Polly Collins, widow of Hiram Collins, and they became the parents of two children, Jacob and Sarah. Mrs. Polly Tevebaugh died some time late in the fifties.

William F. Tevebaugh grew up under the sturdy and invigorating discipline of the old homestead farm, in whose work he assisted until there came a call to higher duty, when the integrity of the nation was threatened by armed rebellion. On Oct. 1, 1861, he tendered his services in defense of the Union, going to Vincennes, where he enlisted, becoming a private in a company which was soon afterward attached to the 3d Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry, as Company M. The regiment was assigned to the Army of the Cumberland and later to the Army of the Tennessee. Under command of General Kilpatrick they proceeded to Hopkinsville, and thereafter saw much hard service under the command of that general, taking part in many hotly contested battles and innumerable skirmishes. The first battle in which Mr. Tevebaugh participated was that of Shiloh, and thereafter his regiment acted as escort for Gen. Thomas L. Crittenden for twelve months; the last battle in which it participated was at Raleigh, N. C. Within his term of service Mr. Tevebaugh was with Sherman on the memorable march to the sea, taking part in the Atlanta campaign, and later proceeding on the long and weary march through the Carolinas, after which he was on duty in the vicinity of the national capital, though his command did not enter the city. On the second day's march to the sea Mr. Tevebaugh was one of four men who daringly charged a battery of two guns, capturing the same, and escaping without special injury. He endured his full share of the hardships of the war. Upon the expiration of his first term he received his honorable discharge and forthwith veteranized, re-enlisting, at Edgefield, Tenn., for three years or "during the war," and continuing at the post of duty as a member of the same company and regiment. He never responded to the sick call and no demand for his service was ever unanswered, so that his record is one of which he may well be proud. He was never seriously wounded and never captured. At the time of Lee's surrender his command was on the border of the State of North Carolina, whence it proceeded to Lexington, that State, remaining there until mustered out in July, 1865. The regiment then went to Louisville, Ky., where Mr. Tevebaugh received his honorable discharge, having served for three years and nine months.

After the close of the war Mr. Tevebaugh returned to Knox county, Ind., where he secured employment on the farm of ex-Gov. J. D. Williams, while later he operated a flatboat on the Ohio river, and still later engaged in the grocery business. While at home on a furlough, in March, 1864, he had married, and in 1866 he established his home in Vincennes, where he began an apprenticeship at the carpenter's trade, which he there continued to follow as a vocation until July, 1874. The following September he came to Indianapolis, where he worked at his trade until 1876, when he became assistant engineer and carpenter at the asylum for the deaf. In 1883 he entered the employ of the Bee Line Railroad Company in the capacity of fireman, later becoming connected with the Monon Railroad, as bridge builder, and subsequently as foreman at various water stations. He remained with this road for eleven years, and the following three years was engaged in repair work on the Big Four railroad. Since that time he has lived partially retired, having a commodious and attractive home which he purchased in 1874, eligibly located on Leota street, Indianapolis. Here he devotes his attention to shoemaking and other lines of mechanical work, having marked ability in mechanical lines and having put the same to practical use in divers ways, so that he has been able to amply fortify himself to enjoy in comfort the evening of his life, while he enjoys the respect and good-will of all who know him. In politics Mr. Tevebaugh is a staunch Republican, and fraternally he is an honored and valued member of George H. Chapman Post, No. 209, G. A. R., while his wife is prominently identified with the Woman's Relief Corps auxiliary to the same, being past president of the same. Both are devoted members of Grace M. E. Church, in whose work they take an active interest.

On March 6, 1864, Mr. Tevebaugh was united in marriage to Miss Effie E. Osborn, who was born in Petersburg, Pike Co., Ind., Jan. 31, 1845, daughter of Elias and Maria (Mount) Osborn, the former a native of Syracuse, N. Y., and the latter of Virginia, whence she accompanied her parents on their removal to Indiana. Elias Osborn was a son of Eber and Sarah (Dutcher) Osborn, the former of whom was a son of Thomas and Sarah (Gould) Osborn, his mother being a sister of the father of the late Jay Gould. Maria (Mount) Osborn was born in Virginia in 1808, daughter of James and A. (Weathers) Mount. Her father, who was a prominent planter and slave holder in Virginia, came to Indiana in 1818, settling in Pike county, where he passed the remainder of his life. He was for many years a government employee. His children were as follows: James; Nancy, Mrs. Fields; Mary, who married a brother of her elder sister's husband; and Maria, who became the wife of Elias Osborn. The brothers and sisters of Elias Osborn were as follows: Eber, Thomas, Elizabeth (Mrs. Finn), and Sarah (Mrs. James Mount).

Elias Osborn was reared to manhood in the State of New York, whence he came to Indiana as a pioneer of 1816, becoming one of the enterprising, public-spirited and influential men of his day. He was well educated and had a personality that well equipped him for leadership in thought and action. In the pioneer days he operated flat-boats in the transportation of produce to the Southern markets, while in later years he became county clerk of Pike county and was otherwise engaged in official duties for many years, also dealing quite extensively in real estate. He was for many years incumbent of the office of justice of the peace and was a man whose counsel was frequently sought and highly valued. In 1875 his residence took fire, and in attempting to save valuable papers he inhaled smoke and heat to such an extent as to cause his death shortly afterward, on Dec. 20, 1875. He was an active participant in the war of 1812, in recognition of which service he received a pension. He was a religious man, and his wife was a consistent member of the M. E. church. Her death occurred in 1886. They had eight children, namely: Elizabeth, who was born in 1832, died at the age of twenty-five years; Thomas, born in July, 1835, died at the age of fifty-two; Sarah, born July 4, 1837, is Mrs. Herrell, of Petersburg; Mary, born Dec. 31, 1840, is the wife of S. Stuckey, of Monroe City, Ind.; Effie E., born Jan. 31, 1845, is the wife of William F. Tevebaugh; Elias, born in February, 1847, died Jan. 15, 1896; Nancy, born Aug. 26, 1849, is the wife of Gip Baker, of Terre Haute; and David S., born March 17, 1852, is a well-known business man of Petersburg.

Mr. and Mrs. Tevebaugh have two children: Edgar H., born Oct. 4, 1867, is now in the employ of the Merchants' Despatch Transportation Company, and is stationed at East St. Louis, Ill.; and Harry W., born Nov. 10, 1869, is in the employ of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, with headquarters at Indianapolis. Both sons are married, the elder having four children, and the younger one child.

SAMUEL SHOWALTER. Among the retired citizens of Indianapolis are a few whose lives are splendidly typical of the growth of Indiana, who came to the State in their boyhood days, and whose earliest education was the stern problems of existence in a pioneer land, the conditions of life then prevailing differing so radically from those of the present day that they are scarcely comprehensible, save to those who have actually experienced them. But those harsh conditions of life developed a type of hardy manhood and womanhood that has not since been repeated under the more favorable succeeding environment.

Samuel Showalter was born in Franklin county, Va., Oct. 27, 1821, the son of Abraham and Frances (McCormick) Showalter, the mother being a native of Virginia.

Abraham Showalter was born in Pennsylvania in 1768. He was of German ancestry, and when a young man removed to Virginia and there married. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and in 1826 removed with his large family to Henry county, Ind., where he became one of the earliest settlers, clearing up a farm in the wilderness and there he died Feb. 8, 1859, at an extreme old age. The wife and mother lived to the age of eighty years. Abraham Showalter was a life-long farmer, a most industrious and highly esteemed citizen, and a worthy representative of the old pioneers of Indiana, now rapidly passing away. Of the fourteen children of Abraham and Frances Showalter thirteen grew to maturity, and of these all but one had families. Of this once numerous family Samuel Showalter is the only survivor.

Mr. Showalter was a child of but five years when he came with his parents from Virginia to Indiana. He well remembers the wild appearance of the country, as it was seventy-five years ago, and he has lived to see it gradually emerge from an almost uninhabitable wilderness to a proud position in the sisterhood of States. He grew to manhood on the old homestead and assisted in clearing up his father's farm, and assisted also in the development of other farms in the neighborhood. At the age of eighteen he was given his time by his father, and then started in life for himself, devoting his energies largely to the clearing of land by the acre. One of the contracts he took was to clear five acres in the green woods, receiving for this arduous labor $8 per acre. Wages were low in those days and frequently he performed the hardest kind of labor for thirty-seven and one half cents per day.

Mr. Showalter married, in 1841, Aseneth Gilbert, daughter of Aaron and Jemima (Newby) Gilbert, pioneers of Wayne county, Ind., who migrated from Guilford county, N. C., in 1821. They were of the Quaker faith, and had a family of six daughters of whom Mrs. Showalter, and Mrs. Mary Miller of Grant county, Ind., her youngest sister, are the only survivors. Mrs. Showalter was born in North Carolina in 1819, and was only two years old when she came with her parents to Indiana. After marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Showalter engaged in farming in Henry county. In 1864 Mr. Showalter sold his farm and removed to Indianapolis. Here for ten years he engaged in the grocery business, since which time he has lived a retired life. He is a member of the Christian Church, his wife adhering to the Quaker faith of her ancestors. In politics Mr. Showalter is a Democrat. He cast his first presidential vote for James K. Polk in 1844. Mr. and Mrs. Showalter are passing their declining years in comparative health and comfort. Representing as they do, two of the pioneer families of Indiana, their later years are sweetened by the memories of the good old days, for though privation and toil was then the common lot, joy and contentment mingled with labor and scant means, and laid the foundation for the richer and deeper life that followed.

THOMAS THATCHER, who resides in Indianapolis, was born in Switzerland county, Ind., May 16, 1842, son of Daniel and Mary (Raills) Thatcher. Both father and mother belonged to pioneer families of Indiana, and late in life they moved to Tipton county, Ind., where they lived the rest of their lives.

Thomas Thatcher was the eldest of a family of fourteen children born to his parents, seven sons and seven daughters, of whom two daughters and three sons are living at the present time. Two of the sons served in the War for the Union, Thomas and William, who was in Company D, 93rd Ind. V. I., and died at Vicksburg during the war.

Thomas Thatcher was reared on a farm, and when a boy attended school in a pioneer log school-house. He was mustered into the United States service, July 14, 1861, as a member of Company K, 22nd Ind. V. I., Col. J. C. Davis commanding. Mr. Thatcher was at the front all the time, and missed but one (Perryville, Ky.) battle in which his regiment was engaged, when he was away on a leave of absence. He became a sergeant, passed through the Atlanta campaign, was in Sherman's march to the sea, and in many hard-fought engagements he played the part of a brave and manful soldier. He fought at Pea Ridge, Nolenville, Stone River, Liberty Gap, Missionary Ridge, Tunnel Hill, Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Rome, Dallas, Big Shanty, Kenesaw Mountain, Chattahoochie River, Peach Tree Creek, Atlanta, Red Oak, Jonesboro, Averysboro, and Bentonville. In the Grand Review at Washington he formed a part of the procession, and shared in the crowning honors of the war. At Pea Ridge he was slightly wounded by a grape shot; and at the battle of Peach Tree Creek he received a gunshot wound, being struck in the back of the head and was rendered unconscious, being reported as dead by the captain of his company, who saw him fall. Left on the battle field as dead, the Rebels also thought him dead, and stripped him of his clothing. However, he revived when the Union forces swept back to reclaim the ground from which they had been driven, and was rescued and cared for by troops under the command of Gen. Benjamin Harrison. Mr. Thatcher, declining to go to the hospital, remained with his regiment, but for some time he was excused from duty. At Jonesboro he was wounded by a bayonet thrust from a Confederate, and at Bentonville, N. C., about the last fight of the war, he was severely wounded by an exploding shell, his left arm and shoulder being torn and lacerated. He was discharged at Indianapolis, July 25, 1865, after a gallant and meritorious career of more than four years in the army, he having re-enlisted Feb. 1, 1864, at Knoxville, Tennessee.

Mr. Thatcher was married Oct. 19, 1865, to Mahala, a daughter of John J. and Barbara Miller. Mrs. Thatcher was born in Switzerland county, Ind., April 27, 1846, and her father, John Miller, was born in 1812, in Indiana, when it was a Territory. Mr. and Mrs. Miller spent their last years in Indianapolis. They had a family of seven children, all of whom are now living with the exception of Mrs. Mary Webb, who died at the age of fifty-three years. Mr. and Mrs. Thatcher have seven children, four sons and three daughters: Mrs. Mary B. Kirkpatrick, Wallace P., Mrs. Daisy D. Clark, John T., Caroline, Lewis H. and Edward E. Mrs. Thatcher is descended from a notable family. Her grandfather, William Miller, was a soldier in the War of 1812, and for his services in that war received a land grant from the government. With his warrant he located land in Missouri, where he was living at the time of the breaking out of the Civil war, and though over seventy years of age, he enlisted, and served for some time as a soldier of the Union army. There are but few instances of a man bearing arms in both the war of 1812 and the war of the Rebellion. Many of the Miller family attained to great age, John J. Miller, her father being eighty-six, and her mother eighty-five years old, at the time of their deaths.

In his early life Mr. Thatcher learned the carpenter's trade, and since the war has followed contracting and building so far as he has had the health and strength to work, his health being much shattered, his wounds becoming more troublesome as the years go by. Beside his many wounds, Mr. Thatcher was rendered partially deaf by an attack of measles, which occurred soon after he entered the army and previous to his going to the front, and he was confined to the hospital for some weeks.

Mr. Thatcher belongs to the I. O. O. F., and his honest and upright life gives credit to the order. In the army he was an excellent soldier, and in peace an honorable and useful citizen. In politics he is a Republican. Both he and his wife are devout members of the Methodist Church.

JESSE F. HAWKINS (deceased), a veteran soldier of the Civil war, and for some years a justice of the peace in Indianapolis, was born in Preble county, Ohio, Sept. 21, 1834.

Thomas Hawkins, his father, was a pioneer of Wayne county, Ind. In 1808, eight years before Indiana became a State, as a boy he played with Indian lads and was reared on the wild frontier. His father, Nathan Hawkins, was a native of North Carolina, and among the earliest of the pioneers of the Territory of Indiana. The family belonged to the Society of Friends, or Quakers. Thomas Hawkins went from Indiana to Ohio at the age of twenty-two, and three years later married Mary Faulkner, a native of Preble county, Ohio, and daughter of Jesse Faulkner, who was a native of England, and was brought to this country when a boy by his parents. Thomas Hawkins returned to Indiana and settled in Hamilton county in 1842, where he settled on a farm about fifteen miles north of Indianapolis. There he cleared a farm, and later settled near Noblesville. This was in the woods, and here he cleared up a second farm. In the summer of 1864, selling his farm he removed to Guthrie county, Iowa, where he made his home on a farm, and where he died at the age of sixty-seven years. In accordance with his Quaker principles he was mild in manner, non-combative, and lived up to strong religious principles. In every way he was a most estimable citizen. His wife died in Hamilton county, Ind., in 1855. So far as known he voted for but one president, and that was in 1856, when he voted for John C. Fremont. The circumstances under which he was induced to vote on that occasion were quite peculiar. His son, Jesse, offered his first vote at that time. It was challenged on the ground that he was not of age, and his father being sent for, his simple word was accepted, without his taking the usual oath. His son and others then urged and persuaded him to vote for Fremont as the non-extension-of-slavery candidate.

Thomas Hawkins was twice married. By his first wife he had nine children, five sons and four daughters, and to his second marriage was born one son. All the children, with the exception of a son and a daughter, are living at this time. Three of the boys served in the Union army during the war of the Rebellion, and their aggregate service was more than seven years. Of these Jesse Hawkins was the eldest. Elihu, the second, served in an Indiana regiment; and Abijah, who served a year with Elihu, was for four years in the regular army. He enlisted in Indianapolis, and went with his company to Tybee Island, where the regiment was attacked with cholera, and a great number lost. Mr. Hawkins was taken with the dread disease and was supposed to be dead. It was so reported and his body was laid on the sand for burial. A comrade thought he detected signs of life, the sick man was resuscitated, and now he is a business man of Noblesville, Ind. Elihu Hawkins also lives in Noblesville.

Squire Jesse F. Hawkins enlisted Feb. 24, 1864, in Company A, 148th Ind. V. I., and the most of his service was rendered in Tennessee, where he participated in several heavy engagements, distinguishing himself as a faithful soldier, and a loyal citizen of his country. During the last part of his army life he was attacked with scurvy, and has suffered from the effects of that disease even to the present time.

Mr. Hawkins has lived in Indianapolis since 1858. His general business has been farming and stock raising, in which he has been very successful. In the fall of 1898 he was elected justice of the peace. His first presidential vote was cast for John C. Fremont, and in 1860 he voted for Abraham Lincoln. He was a strong anti-slavery man, but turned his sympathies later toward the Prohibition party. In 1884 he voted for Grover Cleveland, and during the ensuing eight years voted the Prohibition ticket. In his religious proclivities he was a member of the Methodist Church.

Jesse F. Hawkins married, Oct. 1, 1860, Miss Minerva Wilson, a native of Indiana, and a daughter of Young M. Reed and Polly (McCreery) Wilson, and to them were born ten children. Mr. Hawkins died April 26, 1903, and is survived by his widow and seven children.

Young M. Reed Wilson, the father of Mrs. Hawkins, was a native of Tennessee, and was left an orphan in boyhood. He was bound out to a paternal uncle in Fayette county, Ind. When a young man he went to Hendricks county, where he worked by the month, until he had money enough to buy eighty acres of land. This he cleared up, and so greatly improved it that he was able to sell it at a good figure. Removing to Allisonville, he engaged in merchandising, and following this for a few years became quite well-to-do. He filled the position of assessor of his place, and then selling out his business he removed to Decatur township, Marion county, where he was elected justice of the peace. This office he held for sixteen consecutive years. About 1848 he was elected a representative to the lower house of the General Assembly of Indiana. By his industry and thrift he became the owner of 500 acres of land, and was widely known as a reliable and wealthy farmer. His wife, Polly McCreery, was a daughter of Daniel McCreery, and became the mother of eleven children.

LOUIS ADOLPH GREINER, V. S., of Nos. 18-20 South East street, Indianapolis, was born in Alsace-Lorraine, France, Dec. 7, 1854. He remained in his native land until his twelfth year, when he accompanied his parents to this country, and located with them at Buffalo, N. Y., where he grew to manhood, receiving his education in the city schools of Buffalo, and in the German Lutheran Seminary of that place. When he was twenty years of age he began the study of veterinary science at the Philadelphia Veterinary College, where he took a course. Since he was nineteen years of age Mr. Greiner has been engaged in the practice of his calling in partnership with his father, who was also a veterinary surgeon, well up in that calling, being a graduate of the Alford Veterinary College of Paris, and for many years the assistant of his brother, William Greiner, who was district veterinary surgeon of Alsace, department of Strasburg. Henry Herman, the grandfather of L. A. Greiner, was a veterinarian under Napoleon, and followed the fortunes of that great commander through all his various campaigns, being with him at Moscow. Five generations of the Greiner family have been represented in veterinary science and practice, and all have achieved success, some in the earlier generations occupying exalted positions in their European homes.

Louis A. Greiner practiced his profession in Buffalo from 1876 to 1881, when he came to Indianapolis to join his father, who had arrived here some two years previously, but who was later prostrated by illness. After his father's recovery Mr. Greiner opened the Indianapolis Infirmary, and from that day to this he has been recognized as the leading veterinary surgeon of the city.

Dr. Greiner established the Indiana Veterinary College in 1892, which he operated very successfully for nine years; graduating in that time seventy students who have established themselves successfully in business throughout the country. The institution was prosperous and growing in public favor, but by reason of impaired health and his extensive practice, Dr. Greiner felt impelled to dispose of his interest in the school. Associated with Dr. Greiner in his extensive business are Dr. Joseph Milton Greiner, two assistants and several laborers. Facilities for their work are complete. The latest devices are always here, and no expense is spared in rendering the appointments first class in every respect. Dr. Greiner has been the city veterinarian of Indianapolis for some years, and is now filling that position. He does all the veterinary work for the Consumers' Ice Company, Sterling R. Holt Ice & Cold Storage Company, the Sterling R. Holt Stock Farm at Baywood, the Indianapolis Street Railway Company, the Standard Oil Company, and other large and important concerns. His private practice is very large and lucrative. During the proper season he has in operation the Indiana School for Farriers, designed to teach in the most practical manner scientific shoeing for horses, particularly driving and racing animals.

Dr. Greiner was married, in 1874, in Buffalo, N. Y., to Miss Magdalena Pollock, who was born, reared, educated and married in the same city. Four of the six children born to this union are living: Georgina, married J. J. Ray, residing in this city, a prosperous builder and contractor of Indianapolis; Adolph, died in infancy; Dr. Joseph Milton; Leonora, is now Mrs. Nuerge, her husband being a contractor and builder in Indianapolis; Magdalena died in infancy; and Louis Adolph. Dr. Greiner is prominently identified with various social orders, the A. F. & A. M., the B. P. O. E., the K. of P., the I. O. H. F., and the Marion County (Dem.) Club, the German-American Democratic Club, and the German Orphans' Home Society. He is an affable and pleasant gentleman, endowed with superior skill and adaptability to his profession.

ADOLPH WALD, of No. 417 North Liberty street, Indianapolis, is a well known and highly esteemed German-American citizen. He was born near Berlin, Germany, Dec. 14, 1843, son of Emanuel Wald.

Emanuel Wald brought his family to America in 1855, and soon found recognition for his abilities as a teacher and preacher. On coming to this country the family located at Burlington, Wis., but in 1858 removed to Brownsville, Mo. There the influence of the coming strife of the Rebellion was already felt, and, as Mr. Wald favored the Union cause, conditions became so unpleasant that he decided to return to the North. He again took up his residence at Burlington, Wis., where he passed his remaining years, dying at the ripe old age of eighty-five years. Mr. Wald had been twice married, his first wife dying in his German home, and his second in Missouri. He was the father of seventeen children.

Adolph Wald and his brother Herman bore arms for the Union during the Great Rebellion. Herman, who served in a Missouri regiment, died in Burlington, Wis., in 1897. Adolph enlisted August 1, 1861, in Company B, Boonville Battalion, United States Reserve Corps. He was an accomplished musician, having given this art much attention from his childhood, and when he entered the army his services were in great demand, and he was present as a musician in the leading events in and around Boonville and Carthage until the Battalion was disbanded Dec. 18, 1861. Three days later, Mr. Wald and the most of the battalion enlisted in the 1st Missouri Volunteer Infantry. He served with this regiment as principal musician until it was mustered out at St. Louis, Jan. 14, 1865. Mr. Wald, however, did not return to civil life, and on Feb. 20, 1865, he became a member of the 13th Missouri Veteran Cavalry, being appointed its chief trumpeter; with this command he remained until it was mustered out Jan. 11, 1866, months after the closing of the War, as it was long engaged on the southwest frontiers, where it did various duties, until its discharge at Fort Leavenworth, Kans. Mr. Wald served as leader of the regimental band, and was so commissioned.

In 1876 Mr. Wald and his family became residents of Indianapolis, where he was prominent for many years as a musician and band leader, until deafness, which was the result of catarrh acquired in the army, compelled him to give up active musical labors. He is now engaged in the manufacture of cigars. He is a prominent and popular member of Major Anderson Post, G. A. R., at Indianapolis.

Mr. Wald was married at Boonville, Mo., Dec. 27, 1866, to Miss Barbara Herlinger, who came to the United States with her parents when but three years of age.

MARTIN V. RILEY, who resides at No. 745 Holmes avenue (Haughville), Indianapolis, is remembered among the older inhabitants of the city who were born in Marion county and are now living within its limits.

Daniel Riley, his father, was born in Ireland, where he was reared. Emigrating to the United States, he was for some years a resident of New York, afterward coming to Indiana, and settling as a pioneer in Marion county. His first wife died before he came to Indiana, and here he married Mrs. Margaret (Ford) Starkey, a native of Tennessee, and daughter of Captain Ford, a soldier of the Revolution. She lived for a time in Kentucky with her parents, her father living a pioneer's life in both Kentucky and Tennessee. In Kentucky Mrs. Riley had married Nathaniel Starkey, who died leaving his widow with five children. Her husband's people deciding to emigrate to Indiana, had the widowed daughter-in-law and her children accompany them. In Marion county she met and married Daniel Riley. To Daniel and Margaret (Ford) Riley were born in Marion county, April 16, 1837, twin boys, Martin Van Buren and Andrew Jackson, the latter of whom died in infancy. Daniel Riley did not long survive the birth of his twin sons and died so long ago, that his son Martin V. has no remembrance of his father. The mother passed away many years ago, and she is remembered by our subject as a kind and loving mother; and from the memory of talks with her he obtained most of the facts narrated herein.

Martin V. Riley has lived in Marion county all his life. Here he grew to manhood amid scenes of pioneer days, and his general occupation through life has been farming, though of late years he has lived retired. On attaining manhood, he married Lydia Starkey, a daughter of William Starkey, a pioneer settler of Marion county, who came to Indiana from Kentucky. Mr. Riley and his wife had eleven children, of whom five passed away in early childhood. Of those reaching mature years: Laura, married William Meyers; Jacob resides in Anderson, Ind.; Eliza became Mrs. Ballard; America married Philip Bon; Mrs. Lee Jenkins lives at Haughville; and Alice is unmarried. Mr. Riley was bereft by death of his wife in December, 1898, a great affliction to him, and he now makes his home with his daughter and her husband, Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins. He vividly remembers the early days when Indianapolis was but a village, and here he has lived a long and useful life, sustaining the respect and confidence of his neighbors to a marked degree.

REV. JOHN ALEXANDER BUSHONG, who resides in Indianapolis, represents one of the old and honored pioneer families of Indiana. His father, Jonathan Bushong, was a son of Henry Bushong, who married a woman of French descent.

Henry Bushong and his wife emigrated to America from Germany, just prior to the War of the Revolution. A brother of Henry came to this country about the same time, and these two are supposed to be the ancestors of all the Bushongs in the United States. They settled in the valley of the Shenandoah, in Virginia, and Henry Bushong became the father of the following children: Solomon early left Virginia, and made his home near Circleville, Ohio, where he passed all his remaining years, leaving at his death quite a numerous family. Henry, Jr., who located at Reading, Pa., where he operated a large distillery, was successful in business and he left a numerous family; his strength and bodily activity are still remembered as remarkable. Philip made his home in the eastern part of what is now West Virginia, where he spent his life, and became the father of a numerous family. Jonathan is mentioned below. Barbara Jane, who never married, died of consumption about middle life.

Jonathan Bushong was born in 1806, and was married in his native state to Mary M. Cordry, who was born and raised in Virginia. Her parents were born in Ireland, and came to this country before the Revolution, to make their home in the valley of the Potomac. Her father was a regular soldier in the War of the Revolution. After the close of the war he was engaged in the burning of charcoal as his occupation. In 1831, Jonathan Bushong and his wife emigrated to Indiana, and made their home near Washington, Wayne county. Here the family lived for about two years, and then made a home on government land in the northeast corner of Hamilton county. This was a tract of eighty acres, and here Mr. Bushong made extensive improvements, having a fine farm at the time of his death, Aug. 10, 1843. A most estimable citizen, he is remembered as a thoroughly honorable, honest and upright man. Reared in the principles of the German Reform Church, he never formally united with that body, though it always commanded his respect. In March, 1841, he was converted, and united with the Church known as the United Brethren in Christ, and his life was eminently Christian. In that body he officiated as a class leader, and was so engaged at the time of his death. After his death his widow married again but is now deceased.

Jonathan Bushong and wife were the parents of five sons and three daughters. One of the daughters died in early infancy. Of the others we have the following record: (1) Joseph L. was born in Virginia, and came to Indiana with his parents. He remained on the parental farm until the death of his father, and two years later he made the journey to New Orleans on a flat boat. After spending some three years in that city, he came back to his mother's home, and for some years was employed as a farm hand in that community, by various farmers. In 1853, he went to Iowa with a family named Zaring, with whom he was employed for about a year, when he married Lydia Ann, the eldest daughter of that family. For many years he had his home near Fremont, Iowa. In 1851 he was converted, and lived henceforth a good christian life, becoming a clergyman of the Free Methodist Church, and died in Hutchinson, Kas., many years ago. Of his five sons and twelve daughters, one son, James, and nine daughters are now living. (2) Rev. John A. is mentioned below. (3) James W., born in 1830, became a clergyman of the M. E. Church, at the age of twenty-two years. His education was secured at the Wesleyan University, at Delaware, Ohio, and his studies carried him through seven years. A fine linguist, he could read nine languages, and speak fluently seven of them. At the breaking out of the Civil War he enlisted in an Ohio regiment, was appointed a Chaplain, and became a member of Gen. O. O. Howard's staff. After the War he was put in charge of the Freedmen's Bureau, at Alexandria, Va. Later he was president of an eastern college, a position he successfully filled many years.

Being chosen by his Conference as a special worker, he was sent to reorganize and build up the church in Missouri. At Sedalia he had a very successful pastorate, and built a fine church. His next charge was at Little Rock, Ark., where he built a fine church building, and was pastor of a flourishing society for a number of years. At Fort Smith in the same state he also did fine work, building a fine church, and establishing the cause on a firm footing. From Fort Smith he was sent to one of the large congregations in Cincinnati, to which he ministered with zeal and enthusiasm for two years, when he was sent to Springfield as pastor of the church there. After this he came back to Cincinnati, taking the church at Walnut Hills, where he built a fine temple of worship, and had a very happy pastorate. At Portland, Oregon, he was equally successful, building a hundred thousand dollar church, and serving as pastor three years. At Astoria he held a two years' assignment, and was pastor at Seattle for a year, when he was recalled to Portland to conduct a protracted meeting. While engaged in this work he was stricken with paralysis while in the pulpit, dying three months later. He left a widow and three sons. (4) Catherine Bushong married a Mr. Stone, of Lincoln, Neb. (5) William Henry Bushong was converted in 1857, while in Iowa. During the Civil War he was a member of the 99th Ind. V. I., serving throughout the War. After the War he was married to Alice Hayes, at Centerville, Ind., and studied dentistry under his brother-in-law, becoming quite expert in that profession. His lease of life, however, was brief, as he died of disease contracted in the army. He left a widow and daughter, both of whom are now dead. (6) Caroline V. married William Odell, by whom she had five children, and after the death of Mr. Odell she married James McKinney, by whom she had a family of three children. Later in life she died of consumption. (7) Benjamin F. Bushong is mentioned elsewhere.

Rev. John Alexander Bushong was born near Staunton, Va., March 28, 1828. Coming with his parents to Indiana, in 1831, he received a fair education for those early days, mostly secured by home study and in the subscription school, which he attended about a year. He joined the United Brethren Church when he was fourteen years old, and was barefooted on that occasion, wearing a pair of tow linen trousers, and a flax linen shirt. For a time he was out of the spirit, but was reclaimed in his twentieth year, and united with the Methodist Church, as there was no United Brethren Church in his vicinity. Becoming an active worker in that church, he was given a local license, and for thirty-five years devoted himself to the upbuilding of that church. In 1887, Mr. Bushong united with the United Brethren Church, of which his wife had been a life-long member. Not long after he entered the United Brethren Conference, and was enrolled in the itinerant list, where he has been a faithful worker, and in which he is still engaged.

Mr. Bushong was married, in 1851, to Abigail Ruth Monroe, who died in 1876. Two and a half years later he married his present wife, Mrs. Martha H. Crouse, whose maiden name was Clark. By his first wife he was the father of eight children, five of whom are living: James A., Reuben H., Charles F., Mrs. Sarah Wagner and Mary M.

In 1862, Mr. Bushong enlisted in Company C, 96th Ind. V. L., serving until the close of the War, and was mustered out at Camp Brooks, Va. After the War had closed he was an officer of the guard at the General Hospital at Memphis, Tenn., making a creditable record as a good and faithful soldier.

Mr. Bushong is practically self-educated, and is a man of native ability. His reading has been wide and valuable, and he is well informed on matters pertaining to the public interests of the day. From youth he has been a Bible student, and has had marked success as an evangelist. His memory is remarkable and but few things which he has learned he has forgotten. His character and ability command the respect and confidence of the community.

WILLIAM W. HALL, of Indianapolis, whose home is at No. 231 West Fourteenth street, represents a pioneer family in Indiana. He himself as a soldier in the War for the Union, displayed a gallant and loyal nature, and proved himself a patriotic citizen. He was born in Rush county, Ind., Nov. 26, 1837, son of Franklin and Eliza (Sharp) Hall, both of whom were natives of Winchester, Va. Mr. Hall's paternal grandfather was a native of Scotland, and a relative of Andrew Carnegie, the millionaire philanthropist, and he was about four years old when he was brought to what is now Indianapolis.

Franklin Hall resided for a time in Kentucky, where he carried on the distillery business for many years, and was a slave owner. He taught school in the early days and his education was exceptionally good for the times. His farm was in Hamilton county, and was about eleven miles from where the court house now stands. He became the owner of considerable property in Indianapolis, and here he spent his last days. Here he died in April, 1888, his funeral ceremonies occurring on the first day of May. His wife died in 1852. Mr. Hall was a well-known pioneer, and was held in universal esteem. His education was considered exceptionally good in those early days. He was the father of a large family of children, of whom William was the oldest. The four children, one son and three daughters, born of his second marriage, and seven sons and two daughters of the first marriage were living at the time of this writing. Several of the children died in infancy or in childhood.

William W. Hall was about four years old when brought to what is now Indianapolis. He secured his education at the public school near the home farm, and in the Indianapolis schools. He finished his schooling at what was then Asbury College, but which has since become De Pauw University, entering that school in 1847, and remaining until 1850. Early in life he began teaching, and taught winter school until the breaking out of the Civil War. On April 23, 1861, he enlisted in Company F, 13th Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered out as first sergeant September 5, 1865. The first three years of his service were spent in the Company in which he enlisted. The first battle of any importance in which he participated was that at Rich Mountain, July 1, 1861. The regiment formed a part of the 10th Army Corps, and its field of service extended from Maryland to Florida. Mr. Hall was in the siege of Petersburg, and participated in many of the most serious and fiercely contested battles of the War. The experiences and hardships of the War were well resisted by him, and he returned to civil life with his health unbroken. This was something remarkable, considering the length of his service, and the number of campaigns in which he was engaged. Once he was shot through the left arm, and the same arm was severely injured in the front of Petersburg.

When Mr. Hall came back to Indiana he resumed teaching in the same school in which he was engaged at the breaking out of the War, and for several years continued in this work. His last years of teaching were mainly spent in the West Indianapolis schools. Becoming wearied of the work in the school room he sought and secured a position on the letter carrier force of Indianapolis, and it is worthy of note that he delivered to General Harrison all the latter's mail when a candidate for the Presidency. When that gentleman was elected he gave Mr. Hall a letter greatly complimenting him for the efficient manner in which he had discharged his official duties. Mr. Hall has been a life-long Democrat, and greatly prizes this communication from his former illustrious fellow townsman.

Mr. Hall was married Jan. 6, 1875, to Miss Sarah J. Luce, a native of Indianapolis, and a daughter of Alfred Luce, who was mortally wounded in the War for the Union. Mr. and Mrs. Hall have three children: Bessie, Josephine and Lida. Mr. Hall belongs to Chapman Post, G. A. R., and possesses the respect and confidence of his fellow members, as well as all with whom he is associated either in a business or a personal way.

GEORGE R. HUTTO, who has spent a number of years as custodian of various departments in the State House at Indianapolis, was born in Johnson county, Ind., March 9, 1841, son of Thomas and Lucinda (Stillwell) Hutto.

The paternal grandfather of George R. Hutto, was born in South Carolina, and came to Indiana at an early day, dying in Johnson county, when past middle life. Four of his sons lived to marry and became the heads of families; three of his daughters lived to an old age, and were the mothers of families. The maternal grandfather of Mr. Hutto was a veteran of the Revolutionary War, and early settled in Indiana, where he died, the father of five sons and two daughters.

Thomas Hutto, father of George R., was born in Kentucky, and his wife in Indiana. They had a family of four sons and three daughters, of whom Mary Ann is the wife of Benjamin Harrod, of Winfield, Kansas; George R. is mentioned below; John J. is a resident of Winfield, Kansas; and Sarah C., who married (first), George Hansel, and after his death, Dr. Campbell (also deceased), of Howard county, Ind., now lives in Kokomo, with her son, Charles Hansel.

Thomas Hutto, the father, was a merchant tailor, came to Indiana when quite young, and grew to manhood in Johnson county, where he married. Some years after that event he moved to Howard county, there settling, in 1847, on a farm six miles south of Kokomo, and there his death occurred in 1853 at the early age of forty-nine years. His wife died in Winfield, Kansas, May 4, 1900, at the age of seventy-two years. Both were members of the Christian Church.

George R. Hutto lived in Johnson county until he was about seven years of age, when he was taken by his parents to Howard county, where he grew to manhood. He was reared on a farm, and for a short time attended the district schools. When President Lincoln issued his first call for 75,000 soldiers, young Mr. Hutto volunteered the first morning after the call was received, becoming a member of Company D, 6th Ind. V. I., Capt. Thomas Harrison commanding. This was the first regiment to leave the State, and Mr. Hutto was in service four months, and when his term of enlistment had expired, became a member of the 57th Ind. V. I., with which he served not only throughout the War, but for eight months afterwards. He arrived home on New Year's Eve, 1866, a glad return after long years of hardship and danger. Mr. Hutto was a private and served in the battles of Lovejoy Station, where he was wounded in the left side and thought to be dead for a time; at Carrick's Ford, West Va., where was killed the first rebel general, Gen. Garnett; in the second day at Shiloh; at Perryville, Stone River, Missionary Ridge, all the battles of the Atlanta campaign, and at Franklin, and Nashville, Tenn., (where Hood was defeated) and in many other fierce and bloody struggles. He was mustered out at Placedo, Texas.

After the War Mr. Hutto resumed his agricultural labors, and had thirty-five acres of corn the year after his return home, being engaged in farming until 1869. The previous year he removed to Kokomo, where he bought cattle for a time, and was employed at the Northern Indiana State Prison at Michigan City for two years. For four months he was deputy city marshal, and for a year and eight months served as city marshal, filling out an unexpired term. After this he was elected marshal, and for eight years served on the police force of the city. For a time he followed various pursuits, and in October, 1897, came to Indianapolis, where he has been connected as custodian with several departments of the State House.

Mr. Hutto was married June 19, 1873, to Miss Hannah E., a daughter of James and Barbara (Rivers) Hunt, of North Carolina, and to this union were born five sons and three daughters: Lelie M., Willie (who died aged six years), Arthur, Earl, Verne, Maude, and two who died in infancy. Mr. and Mrs. Hutto are members of the Christian Church. He is a Master Mason in Naptha Lodge, No. 93, F. & A. M., and a comrade of T. J. Harrison Post, G. A. R., both of Kokomo. In politics he is a staunch Republican, as was his father, who in his time was a faithful Abolitionist, and a worker on the "Underground Railroad." Mr. Hutto has an attractive and commodious residence at No. 8 West Prairie street, Indianapolis.

HENRY WHITINGER, deceased, one of the older and much respected farmers of Nora, Marion Co., Ind., was born three-quarters of a mile east of that flourishing little place Feb. 27, 1833, son of Henry and Susanna (Ernest) Whiting. His grandfather, Jacob Whiting, was born in Pennsylvania, came west to Ohio, and about 1820 located in Indiana, where he entered government land. He was a thrifty farmer, owned a mill, and before he died in Marion county, Ind., at the age of eighty-five years, gave each of his numerous family a present of 160 acres of land.

Henry Whiting, father of Henry, was born in Ohio, was a farmer, and made his home in Marion county in 1820, locating in Washington township, where he entered government land, and where he died at the age of sixty-five years. His widow survived him many years, living to be eighty-four. Both were Baptists. Like her husband Mrs. Whiting was a native of Ohio. Her father was born in Rhode Island, was a veteran of the Revolutionary war, and died in Ohio well advanced in years. His was a large family. Mr. and Mrs. Henry Whiting had a family of seventeen children, thirteen sons and four daughters, of whom four are now living: Samuel, of Hamilton county, Ind.; Daniel, of Ontario, Wis.; Albert, of Hamilton county; and Eliza Jane, who married Henry Cruse, of Nora, Indiana.

With but brief exceptions Henry Whiting spent all his life in Washington township, Marion county. Reared a farmer, he attended the old-fashioned subscription schools, living at home until he was nearly grown. He went into Illinois while still a boy and worked for a time breaking prairie, and coming back to Marion county was for the ensuing four years in the employ of one farmer. After his marriage he rented land for several years, until he was able to buy, when he purchased an interest in his father's estate and became the proprietor of seventy-two acres. All his life was devoted to the cultivation of the soil.

Mr. Whiting was married Dec. 1, 1853, to Eliza Jane, daughter of Abner and Nancy (McDonald) Roberts, and to this union were born six children, four sons and two daughters: (1) Sample married Samantha Stoner, by whom he has had six children, and lives in California. (2) John D. is deceased. He and his wife, Lade Heaton, had one child, Ross, who is still living. (3) Albert lives in Story county, Iowa. He married a Donahue, and they had four children. (4) Charles, who lives in Broad Ripple, married and has had three children. (5) Nancy Ann married Charles Boswell, and both are deceased. One child, Frank, survives them. (6) Clara Ellen died when twelve years of age.

Mrs. Eliza Jane Whiting died in 1873. She was a Methodist in religious faith. Mr. Whiting's second wife, who died in August, 1895, was also a Methodist. On Jan. 12, 1898, he was married to Mrs. Esther Jane Hahn, widow of Joseph E. Hahn, and daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth (McClure) Culberson. Mrs. Whiting was married three times previously, her first husband having been James Mustard, to whom she was married when twenty-two years of age at Broad Ripple; her second husband was Lorenzo Van Scyoc, and her third Mr. Hahn. She never had any children of her own, but partly reared as many as twenty orphan children.

Joseph Culberson, Mrs. Whiting's father, was one of three brothers who came from England and settled in the same community, in Culberson's road, in Cumberland county, Pa. He moved from there to Bourbon county, Ky., where Mrs. Whiting was born, and when she was in her twelfth year she was brought by her parents to Indiana, the family locating a mile east of Broad Ripple, where the father died in his eighty-fourth year. The mother died in her sixty-fourth year. Mrs. Whiting, born Feb. 21, 1818, was one of a family of fourteen children, and was the last surviving member of that interesting family. The parents were Presbyterians, and she was reared in that faith, according to its strictest tenets, but of late years was identified with the Lutheran Church. Her people were all good Christian men and women, and Mrs. Whiting had profound faith in the Bible and in the doctrines of the church. She held the Christian religion close to her heart, and was highly regarded for the noble type of womanhood her career presented to the world.

Mr. Whiting was a Universalist in religious belief. He was a member of Broad Ripple Lodge, No. 548, I. O. O. F., and of George H. Thomas Post, G. A. R., at Indianapolis. He enlisted in August, 1861, in Company E, 39th Ind. V. I., and was in the service about two years, taking part in the great battle of Shiloh, and in a number of less important engagements. After the war he made his home continuously in Washington township.

DR. EPHRAIM W. HAMMON, of Indianapolis, physician and minister of the Christian Church, has attained more than local reputation as an unselfish and devoted worker for the higher life of the world and the good of his brother man.

Dr. Hammon was born in Darke county, Ohio, July 14, 1841, a son of Isaiah and Henrietta (Hale) Hammon, both of whom were natives of Virginia.

Isaiah Hammon was a tanner and a shoemaker, and during his early life carried on his father's tannery for some years. Then he took up shoemaking, which he followed until his death, which occurred at Kosciusko, Ind., on the day President Lincoln was assassinated. When he died he was fifty-six years of age. His widow passed away in 1879, her death resulting from a fall from a second-story building in Big Rapids, Mich., at the age of sixty-six. They were members of the Christian (Disciples) Church, and both at one time had been connected with the Newlight branch of that church. They came to Indiana in March, 1844, and locating in Wells county, lived there until 1855, when they removed into Kosciusko county. They were the parents of a family of eight daughters and four sons. Six members of their family are now living: Susanna, the wife of Isaac Connett, of Robinson, Ill.; Luvina, the wife of Zephaniah Rogers, of Pierceton, Ind.; Ambrose, of Pierceton; Dr. Ephraim W.; Catherine, the wife of M. C. Foulks, of Dunkirk, Ind.; and Mary Ann, the wife of Stephen Curry, of Big Rapids, Michigan.

Ambrose Hammon, the grandfather, was probably a native of Virginia, and came of Scotch-Irish descent. His death occurred in Russell county, Va., when he was between eighty and ninety years old. He owned a farm, was a distiller and tanner and had a number of slaves. He had several children, the last survivor being Susan, Mrs. Skeen, of Northern Virginia, near Catlettsburg.

James Hale, the maternal grandfather of Dr. Ephraim W., was one of twenty-four sons born to his father, though by different mothers. He was a long time resident of Virginia, where he died at the age of over one hundred years, shortly after the breaking out of the Civil war. His ancestry was Scotch-Irish.

Ephraim W. Hammon was reared in Wells county, Ind., where his education began in the old subscription school. When a young man he went to the public school with some of his children, with a view of improving himself as he could not when a boy. Afterward he took a course of lectures at Eureka College, and then was graduated from the three years' course at the Fort Wayne College of Medicine. After coming home from the army he entered the Christian University, but loss of voice compelled him to give up preaching for a time, when he took up the practice of medicine. For many years he has carried on his double professional career, both practising and preaching with distinguished success. He has held pastorates in Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and has traveled largely as an Evangelist. During his ministerial labors nearly four thousand people have been baptized by him. In early life he was identified with the Christian Connection or Newlights. While preparing, however, for a discussion with a Disciple minister, he became converted himself to that faith. He became an ardent champion of this belief, and in a discussion with Dr. Vincent Roberts, an expounder of his original doctrine, made many converts, and baptized numbers of the old faith. The first one was a lawyer, who was taking notes of the discussion, and who came forward at the close of the meeting and voluntarily asked for baptism. Mr. Hammon met in debate the Rev. Mr. Shaffer, a noted debater of the Methodist Church, and within seven days after its conclusion baptized thirty-five people, among whom was Mr. Shaffer's moderator. He also held a debate with Rev. S. H. Bashor, of the German Baptist Church, a man of national repute, and after that discussion Mr. Hammon baptized nine of the congregation of Rev. Mr.

Bashor. The debate is well remembered in that community.

At the breaking out of the Civil war Dr. Hammon enlisted under the first call for three years' men as a member of Company D, 22d Ind. Vol. Infantry. He was discharged in 1862 on account of ulceration of the right lung resulting from diphtheria. The only battle in which he participated was a slight skirmish in front of Lexington, Mo. Most of his time was spent on detached duty in caring for the sick and wounded in connection with the hospital service. He was steward and assistant surgeon.

After the war he entered at once and permanently upon the work of the ministry, and has also practiced medicine since 1876. For some years he lived at Montpelier, Ind., where he was recognized as one of the leading physicians of the community, and while he was there he built up the Christian Church which is still in existence.

Dr. Hammon was married Feb. 6, 1862, to Martha A. Morrison, daughter of Andrew and Elizabeth (Wright) Morrison. Her father was one of the pioneers of Wells county, Ind. Dr. and Mrs. Hammon have five sons and four daughters living: (1) Oliver M. is engaged in the high school at Union City, Ind., where he has taught for a number of years. He married Lucinda Hercules, by whom he had five children, Avella, Voyle, Earl, Inez, and Ada. Mrs. Lucinda Hammon died, and Mr. Hammon married for his second wife Mrs. Mina Bennett, by whom he has had one child, Della. (2) Rosa Belle, who is an accomplished elocutionist, married J. W. Crawford, and lives in Chicago. (3) Milton E. is foreman in the railroad shops at Wichita, Kans., in the employ of the 'Frisco Line. He is well known as a musician. He married Clara Gunn, and they have had two children, Trela and Paul. (4) Evan T. is the traveling manager of the Smith-Nixon Piano Company, of Louisville, Ky., and the author of a number of musical compositions. (5) Etta May is the wife of Rev. W. A. Coryea, a Christian minister of Gervais, Oregon, and they have four children, Alpha, Ralph, Lois and Carey. (6) Charles O. is a traveling newspaper man, and his home is in Indianapolis. He married Grace Crandall, of Newcastle, Ind. (7) James H. is an optician at Vincennes, Ind. His wife, Allie Stewart, came from Shoals, Ind. (8) Edith P. is a teacher of the piano. (9) Lenna L. attended the Indianapolis Business University. She has considerable reputation as an elocutionist.

The parents of Mrs. Hammon were both native to the soil of Ohio, and came into Indiana in 1838. Her father died in 1876, and her mother in 1900. He was a successful farmer. Of their family of six children, two sons (now deceased) served in the Civil war.

Dr. Hammon brought his family to Indianapolis in 1900, and until a few years ago served the Hillside Christian Church as pastor. On account of heart trouble he retired from the active work of the ministry. He owns a fine home at No. 1055 New York street, where he also maintains an office for the practice of medicine.

JAMES HUFFMAN, who died Sept. 29, 1905, was a venerable resident of Broad Ripple, Ind., where he had been a lifelong farmer. He was born in September, 1833, on the farm where he died, a son of Jonas and Polly Huffman.

Jonas Huffman and his wife were natives of Virginia, and were married in Butler county, Ohio. He was a cooper by trade. With his young wife he came to Indiana, walking the entire distance, carrying a gun with which he daily killed game for the evening meal. They made a home at Broad Ripple. Mr. Huffman attended a land sale at Brookville, and bought a farm before seeing it, taking the word of the land agent that it was a good and desirable piece of property. When he located on it he found it to be as represented—one of the finest tracts of land in the country. It is situated on the banks of the White river, at the eastern edge of Broad Ripple, and when he purchased it the land was covered with heavy timber. Afterward, with the help of some of his Ohio friends and relatives, he erected a log cabin in which he spent many years of his life. Here he afterward erected handsome buildings, and a beautiful summer resort is now located on the farm, visited daily by thousands of people during the heated season. Mr. Huffman died in 1860, at the age of over eighty years. His wife passed to her reward in the summer of 1856, when above sixty years of age. They were the parents of fourteen children. Mr. Huffman was a veteran of the war of 1812.

The paternal grandfather of James Huffman died in Kentucky at an old age, where he had reared a goodly family. The maternal grandfather of Mr. Huffman was married and lived in Ohio, where he died at an advanced age. His was a numerous family.

James Huffman was born, as stated, on the farm where he died, and which was always his home. Receiving a substantial start from his father, when that gentleman died he was able to buy out the other heirs. His farm comprised about 300 acres, and is pronounced one of the very finest places in the county.

Mr. Huffman was married May 20, 1863, to Miss Caroline Winkle, daughter of George and Nancy Winkle, and they had four sons and two daughters; Franklin; Willie, who died when about a year old; Mary Frances, who married Edward Howe; Charles, who died when sixteen months old; Arthur Edward, engaged in cultivating the old homestead; and Maggie Florence, at home. In politics Mr. Huffman was a Democrat.

Mrs. Huffman was born Sept. 24, 1842, and was six months old when her parents settled in Indianapolis, their home being just north of the city limits. With the exception of three years Mrs. Huffman has always lived in Marion county. Her father, who was of German descent, died in December, 1850, and her mother in April, 1853. The latter was of Scotch-Irish stock.

JOHN E. CHRISTIAN, a very successful and highly esteemed citizen of Indianapolis, engaged as a dealer in lumber and coal at the corner of Noble and Washington streets, was born in Stockton, Md., July 3, 1845, son of Joseph and Rachel (Thomas) Christian.

Joseph Christian, the father, was born in New Jersey, and his wife was born in Maryland. They had a family of four sons and one daughter, and two of their children are now living, William F. and John E., both of Indianapolis. Mr. Christian was a tailor by trade, and died in 1846 in Maryland, at the age of fifty-two years. The same year his wife passed to her rest, at the age of forty-four years. Both were members of the Methodist Church.

The paternal grandfather of John E. Christian was a native of New Jersey, of German descent, and was a Revolutionary soldier. He was the father of a large family. He died well advanced in years, and his wife died at the age of ninety-two. The maternal grandfather of John E. Christian was a native of Maryland, where he was a planter and slave owner. His family consisted of three children, and he died at an advanced age in his native State.

John E. Christian was reared to manhood in Worcester county, Md., and for about eight years was a sailor on the high seas. During 1862-63-64 he was in the government service under T. J. Bones. He took charge of a small vessel when eighteen years of age, and after navigating that vessel for three years sold it, and coming west settled at Indianapolis, where he has lived since 1868. For a year or so he worked at the carpenter's trade in company with his brother, W. F. His next engagement was with W. C. Bell & Co., and for four years he bought and shipped lumber for them. At the expiration of this period he engaged in a somewhat limited way in the lumber business for himself, buying logs, and sawing them for market. For a short time Mr. Christian was in partnership with John Piercy, but he soon bought him out, and sold an interest to Mr. Cooper, the firm becoming Cooper & Christian. They were partners for six years, when the retirement of Mr. Cooper was necessitated by his election to the position of State treasurer. Mr. Cooper sold out to Mr. Christian, and that gentleman carried on a good business alone until 1888. That year he formed a company in Arkansas known as the Indiana and Arkansas Lumber Company, which he continued six years. During his residence in Arkansas the company built a railroad and some two years after its completion Mr. Christian was caught between a locomotive and a car, and received such injuries that he was laid up for two years. At this he sold out his interest in the company, and returning to Indianapolis has continued the lumber business in this city to the present time. He is also interested in coal, and does a large business in that line.

Mr. Christian was married in July, 1876, to Miss Emma, a daughter of Presley and Eliza (Moore) Clark, farming people of near Zanesville, Ohio, where the mother died in 1889, the father surviving her and attaining an advanced age. Mr. Christian belongs to the Society of Elks, and in politics is a Democrat. He has never sought office. His home is at No. 237 East Pratt street, and he owns several residences in the city.

HENRY CRUSE, whose years, personal probity and industrious life alike commanded respect, was born in Butler county, Ohio, Feb. 6, 1812, a son of Henry and Susanna (Cress)

Cruse, both of whom were natives of North Carolina. Philip Cruse, the grandfather, was born in Germany, and coming to the United States settled in North Carolina, where he died at the age of 110 years. He had a large family of children, mostly sons. The maternal grandfather of Henry Cruse lived and died in North Carolina. He also had a numerous family.

Henry Cruse, son of Philip, was a farmer. In 1816 he came to Daviess county, Ind., in 1820 removing to Marion county, where he made his home for several years. After that he lived successively in Montgomery and Tazewell counties, Ill. When Peoria was Fort Clark he settled on the Mackinaw river, where he died in the sixty-fifth year of his age. His widow survived some years, and died in Indianapolis at the age of ninety-seven. She was a Presbyterian and he was a Lutheran. Henry Cruse, Sr., and his wife had a family of ten children, Henry being the last survivor.

Henry Cruse resided in Hamilton and Marion counties, Ind., from 1820. He early began the occupation which was his calling through active life, that of an honorable and industrious farmer. His education was secured in the old-fashioned district school. He served in the Black Hawk war in 1832, and slept on the ground in Chicago. He was married Oct. 29, 1834, to Miss Eliza Jane Whiting, who was born Feb. 4, 1817, a daughter of Henry and Susan (Ernest) Whiting, and they became the parents of eight sons and seven daughters, all but one of whom lived to marry and have families of their own. They also reared one grandchild, Charley Clow. The fifteen Cruse children were as follows: Susanna married Samuel Adams, and has her home in Hamilton county; Mary Jane married John Hinshaw, and has her home in Hamilton county; Margaret is the widow of James Moulton; Solomon married Nancy Jane Stultz, who is now deceased; Leah is the widow of Thomas Campbell, and is a resident of Argentine, Kans.; Martha has been dead many years; Absalom married Myra Vance, and lives in Clay county, Ill., near Farina; Henry married Sarah Heaton, and lives in Clay county, Ill.; Jacob married Sarah Pierce, and is a resident of Broad Ripple; Daniel married Lucinda Imler, and has her home near Zionsville, Ind.; Sarah died at the age of eleven months; Eliza is the wife of John Collier, and they live in Indianapolis; William married Sarah Sutton, who is now deceased, and he lives in Marion county; Peter married

Ellen Nuby, and lives on the old homestead in Hamilton county; Thomas married Delilah Sutton, and died in 1891.

Mr. Cruse was a Baptist, his wife also belonging to that Church, where they were much esteemed for their useful career, sincere piety and deep devotion to the Master. In politics he was a Republican, and when on the farm served several years as a supervisor.

Mr. Cruse's father lost much of his property by indorsing for friends, and young Henry worked many a day for twenty-five cents, bound and determined to get a start in the world. Presently he was able to buy a farm of eighty acres in Hamilton county, and later kept accumulating land until he owned 171 acres in Hamilton county, where he lived until he bought his late home in Nora, Marion county, and six acres of land. Here he lived until his death.

GEORGE W. HUNTER, a retired blacksmith of Lawrence, Ind., was born in Clermont county, Ohio, March 19, 1830, a son of James and Margery (Wilmington) Hunter. The parents were native to the soil of Pennsylvania, where Mr. Hunter's grandfather was also born. He was a farmer, reared a numerous family, and died at a ripe old age in Clermont county, Ohio. The maternal grandfather of Mr. Hunter was also a native of Pennsylvania, reared a large family, and died in Clermont county.

James and Margery Hunter had ten children, five sons, and of their family five are still living: George W.; Ebenezer, of Nee-nach, Cal.; Lucien D., of Lake City, Colo.; Ann Eliza, the wife of David Negley, of Lawrence township, Marion county; and Emma, who is the wife of Alexander Eskew, of Lawrence township.

James Hunter was a blacksmith, and coming to Marion county, Ind., 1838, entered 120 acres from the government. Nearly all his life he devoted himself to blacksmithing, leaving the farming to his sons. He died after the Civil war, at the age of sixty-two years. His wife survived him a number of years, and was in her seventy fifth year when she passed to her rest. Both were Methodists. For one term he was trustee of the town of Lawrence. Before the war he was a Democrat, but when the struggle drew to the battlefield he acted with the Republican party.

George W. Hunter was eight years old when his parents removed to Marion county, Ind., and here he lived for the ensuing ten years, when he returned to Ohio, and learned the blacksmith's trade, remaining in Union township, Clermont county, until about 1858. That year he came back to Marion county, and started a blacksmith shop in Lawrence, working at his trade until 1862, when he enlisted in Company H, 54th Indiana Volunteer Infantry. He was a private, and was discharged in 1863, on account of serious and dangerous sickness. He was in the first attack at the rear of Vicksburg, and was also at Arkansas Post and Young's Point, where he was discharged, having been sick all the time. It was thought he would not live to reach home, but he did, though unable to work for two years. When his strength had sufficiently returned he resumed his trade, carrying it on principally, however, with the aid of hired help. This was his occupation until 1882, when he retired from active business, passing his shop over to his son Charles.

Mr. Hunter was married May 15, 1852, to Miss Amanda Witham, a daughter of Gideon and Easter (Dutton) Witham. Two children came to bless this union, James and Easter, both of whom died in early childhood. Mrs. Amanda Hunter, now deceased, was a member of the Methodist Church.

Mr. Hunter later married Rosanna Barbaro, by whom he had four daughters and two sons, Mamie, Charlie, Elmer, Clara and Corda (twins) and Grace. Mamie married Ezariah Newhouse, of Brightwood, Ind., and they have two children, Roy and Lois. Charles G. is a blacksmith, and has taken his father's shop; he married Lillian White and is the father of three children, Raymond, Lorena and Harold. Elmer is a painter. Clara married G. Murphy, of Lawrence, and Corda is the wife of William Baker. They also live in Lawrence township.

Mr. and Mrs. Hunter belong to the Methodist Church, of which he is a trustee. He is a member of Lawrence Lodge, No. 375, I. O. O. F., having been initiated into Mt. Carmel Lodge, No. 90, in Ohio, more than fifty years ago. Mr. Hunter also belongs to James Beard Post, No. 433, G. A. R., of which he is a Past Commander, having been commander four years in succession. In political matters he is a Republican; he has never held political office. His home in Lawrence is neat and attractive, and he stands among the best citizens of the place.

JOSEPH H. HAYES, for a number of years chief janitor of the post office buildings in Indianapolis, was born near Elizabethtown, Hamilton Co., Ohio, Jan. 26, 1842, son of Otha and Eliza (Miller) Hayes. Both his parents were born in Indiana, where his grandparents settled in early pioneer times.

Joseph Hayes, his paternal grandfather, was a native of Pennsylvania, and settled in Dearborn county, Ind., as early as 1801. His death occurred in Lawrenceburg, Ind., when he was past eighty-seven. He was a farmer by occupation. His family consisted of four daughters and three sons. Job Miller, the maternal grandfather of Mr. Hayes, also settled in Dearborn county, Ind., among the very earliest pioneers, and there followed farming all his life. His family consisted of five daughters and two sons.

Otha Hayes was always a farmer. He was an early settler in Hamilton county, Ohio, where he died in 1889, at the age of eighty years. His wife, who survived him, continued to live in Elizabethtown, Ohio. Both belonged to the Methodist Church. In politics he was a Whig, and a Republican in later life. They were the parents of twelve children, two daughters and ten sons, eight members of this interesting family still living: Solomon, of Elizabethtown, Ohio; Calvin, of Topeka, Kans.; Joseph H.; Bailey, Thomas and Hulbert, all of Cincinnati, Ohio; Nancy, the wife of James Walker, of Harrison, Ohio; and Queen, the wife of Samuel Literal, of Harrison, Ohio.

Joseph H. Hayes was reared to manhood in Elizabethtown, Ohio, and his education was secured in the district schools. He was brought up to farming. He was quick to respond to the call for soldiers in the Civil war, on Sept. 11, 1861, enlisting in Company D, 5th Ohio Cavalry. During a service of three years with that command he made a creditable record, participating in the following battles: Shiloh, Cold Water, Hatcher's River, Davis Mills, Missionary Ridge, Resaca, Ringgold, Dallas, Kennesaw Mountain, Peach Tree Creek and Atlanta. By a special order, dated April 21, 1864, Mr. Hayes was detached as private orderly for Gen. James B. McPherson, and now has in his possession the original order to this effect. Mr. Hayes was wounded at Atlanta, July 22, 1864, and was with General McPherson when he was killed, receiving his own wound at the same time. He received his discharge at East Point, Ga., Sept. 11, 1864, three years to a day from the time he entered the service.

When Mr. Hayes returned home he resumed farming operations at Elizabethtown, where he remained for some twenty years. In 1884 he came to Indianapolis and established himself in the flour and feed business, in which he was engaged until 1899, the year he was appointed chief janitor of the post office buildings.

Joseph H. Hayes and Miss Isabel Hayes were united in wedlock May 25, 1865. She was a daughter of Abiah and Mary Hayes, and by her marriage became the mother of the following children: Abiah, who lives at home, unmarried; Otha, married and living in Indianapolis; Clara, who married Dewey Warren and is a resident of Indianapolis; Lucy, unmarried; and Nancy and Mary, deceased.

Mr. and Mrs. Hayes belong to the Blackford Street M. E. Church, which he has served as class-leader, steward and secretary of the official board. The Hayes home is at No. 514 West Court street, and is the center of many warm and devoted friendships. Mr. Hayes belongs to George H. Chapman Post, No. 209, G. A. R., and also to the fraternity of the Knights of Pythias. He is a Republican, and has served on election boards in Indianapolis for twenty years. For three years he was deputy township assessor, was assistant door-keeper of the Legislature in 1897, and on the recommendation of many prominent members of the Republican party was appointed to the position of chief janitor at the post-office buildings, by the United States marshal.

JOHN J. TRUCKSESS was born in Indianapolis, Jan. 31, 1842, the family living at that time on Washington street, two doors east of Illinois. His father, Frederick, was very favorably known here in the early history of Indianapolis.

Jacob Trucksess, his grandfather, was a native of Wittenberg, Germany, but the family was originally French, residing in Paris. Owing to the religious troubles the heads of the Trucksess family, who were strongly identified with the Huguenot faith, were banished from the native land, and sought refuge at Wittenberg. There was born Jacob Trucksess, and there he was reared and married. In 1833 he left his native land, and coming to America settled at Eaton, Ohio, where he became a prominent and successful farmer. His family consisted of the following members: Frederick; Dorothy, who became Mrs. Young; Mary, Mrs. Ashing; John, a blacksmith; Catherine, the wife of J. Wilson, of Tuscola, Ill.; Sabina; Chris., a farmer; and William, a blacksmith.

Frederick Trucksess was born in Wittenberg, Germany, came to this country with his parents, and lived with them for a time on their farm near Eaton. He then worked for a time in Cincinnati, and in 1835 he came to Indianapolis, becoming employed as a clerk with Mr. Nicoli, a pioneer merchant in the city. After being with him for some years, and carefully saving his money, Mr. Trucksess began business for himself, in a small way at first, but presently, meeting with large success, he built a brick business place on West Washington street (where was born his son John J.), where he conducted a very successful general store for a number of years. At that time Charles Myers was starting in business, keeping a small restaurant, and he bought most of his goods of Mr. Trucksess. The latter, removing from Washington street, rented his building, and started again on Indiana avenue. There he did general trading, selling dry goods, groceries, hardware, ran a bakery, exchanged for and bought produce, bought and handled wood in large quantities, and bought horses for market, being always ready to buy or sell anything to accommodate his city or country patrons. Thus he met with remarkable success, becoming widely known. In 1847 he sold out store and city property, the Washington street property, now easily worth $40,000, bringing him only $5,000. Taking his money, Mr. Trucksess located at Plainfield, where he erected a large gristmill, operated at first by water-power; but finding this not sufficient in dry time, he introduced steam. Very soon he had a large trade, and was doing well when the mill took fire and was burned to the ground. It was a sore blow, for all the capital Mr. Trucksess commanded was invested in this mill, which had become a total loss. About this time a friend of his went south with a drove of horses, and while returning was prostrated with cholera. Mr. Trucksess found him by the roadside apparently helpless, and bringing him to his own home cared for him until his death and then took him home and buried him. Mrs. Trucksess fell ill and died of the same disease. After her burial Mr. Trucksess was taken ill and died of the same sickness, his death occurring at Plainfield, July 7, 1854. One of the sons also succumbed to that dread disease.

In Indianapolis Frederick Trucksess married Christina Hess, a native of Prussia, where her father was also born. He early became a sailor, and for thirty years followed the sea. Finally, settling in Indiana, he became a successful farmer in Morgan county, where he died at his homestead. His children were as follows: Charles, William and Christ, all deceased; George, the last survivor of the family, a resident of Morgan county; Christina, Mrs. Trucksess; and Mrs. Morgan, deceased. The parents both lived to be eighty-four years of age.

Children as follows were born to Frederick Trucksess and his wife: John J., Mary, Mrs. Rinehart; and Catherine, unmarried, of Tuscola, Ill. The parents were both members of the German Methodist Church. The father was a member of the Masonic fraternity, and in politics a Democrat.

John J. Trucksess was born and reared in Indianapolis, where he has always lived with the exception of the short time spent at Plainfield. His memories go back to the days when this noble city was a mere village. When his parents died the family scattered. At that time he was only twelve years old. By gathering and selling hickory nuts he raised money enough to pay his fare to Eaton, Ohio, where he spent the succeeding winter with relatives and attended school. His savings from his wages as a farm hand the ensuing summer were used to bring him to Indianapolis, where he apprenticed himself to the blacksmith's trade. He worked at the trade in all five years, and then joined the army as a Union soldier in Company B, 132d Indiana Volunteer Infantry. The regiment was assigned to the Army of the Tennessee, and while it did some skirmishing was mostly engaged in railroad guarding in Tennessee and Alabama. After four months the command returned to Indianapolis, where it was honorably discharged and paid off.

Mr. Trucksess, who had previously done some clerking, found employment with a firm in the stove business, and continued thus for eight years. For thirteen years he ran a meat stall at the market house. He has used his opportunities to the best advantage, and his income is quite considerable at the present time. He owns some choice city property, and erected the comfortable brick house on West New York street, where he has had his home for over thirty years. He is a self-made man for though his father at one time was one of the wealthiest men in the city, most of his money was lost in the Plainfield mill fire and the son had to make his way alone. Mr. Trucksess is well informed about the growth and development of Indianapolis. A Republican, he has never aspired to office, but devoted himself to business.

Mr. Trucksess married Jemima Fifer, who was born in Johnson county, where her father settled at a very early day, coming from North Carolina. There substantial success attended his efforts, and he became numbered among the very solid men of Johnson county. His children were as follows: Jemima, Mrs. Trucksess; Maria, Mrs. Prather; Joseph, now of Chicago; and Sarah, Mrs. Haper, of Seymour.

Mr. and Mrs. Trucksess have had no children, but they have reared and educated a niece of Mrs. Trucksess, Miss Maggie Haper, who is now a competent business woman. Mrs. Trucksess, who was at one time a member of the Methodist Church, has since associated herself with the Christian Science movement. Mr. Trucksess is an active member of the G. A. R.

GEORGE H. BARNES has spent most of his active life in Indiana. He was born in New York State, Sept. 10, 1839, a son of Riley P. and Anna (Fuller) Barnes, both also natives of New York, where they were married, and comes of a family that has been represented in all the important wars of America; he himself was a soldier in the Civil war. He is a patriotic and broad-minded American citizen.

His grandfather, Abel Barnes, of Massachusetts, served in the war of the Revolution. Later in life he moved to New York, where he settled and spent the rest of his days, becoming a prominent farmer. His father came from Scotland, and settled in Massachusetts at a very early day. Abel Barnes had eleven sons and three daughters, those of whom we have record being: Amasa, Abel, Levi, Raphael, Simon and Riley.

Riley P. Barnes grew to manhood in New York, where he married and reared his family. In 1867 he removed to Marion county, Ind., settling near Southport, where he lived until after the death of his wife, when he came to Indianapolis to live with his son, George H. Here he died, and his remains were laid by the side of his wife in the cemetery at Southport. He married Anna Fuller, who was born and reared in New York, where all the rest of her family died. Two of her uncles served in the war of 1812, and one of her brothers was in the Mexican war. Mr. and Mrs. Riley P.

Barnes had two children: George H. and Mary M. The latter is the widow of D. Townsend, who moved to Indiana; she is now living in Chicago. Mr. Barnes was a devout member of the Baptist Church.

George H. Barnes began the struggle of life at a very early age, being only nine years old when he left home to make his own way in the world. Finding employment among the farmers, he worked as he could find tasks suited to his age and strength. When he was fifteen years of age he apprenticed himself to learn the carpenter's trade, at which he became a good workman. After the termination of his services as a soldier, in 1864, he located at Indianapolis, where his ability as a good worker was quickly recognized. He was called upon to do some fine work in the city, and for eleven years was engaged as a contractor and builder in Johnson county. Then he came back to Indianapolis, where he yet remains, doing work on his own account.

Mr. Barnes responded to the first call for troops in 1861, enlisting at Utica, N. Y., for three months' service, in Company E, 26th N. Y. V. I., attached to the Army of the Potomac. However, when the three months had expired for which the regiment enlisted it was not allowed to muster out, remaining in the service until over two years had passed. Finally the command was mustered out at Utica, and Mr. Barnes was honorably discharged. He participated in nine hotly contested battles, Cedar Mountain, Rappahannock Station, Thoroughfare Gap, Second Bull Run, Chantilly, South Mountain, Antietam, Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. Once he was captured, but was shortly paroled. He received several slight wounds, his hearing was badly impaired, and owing to exposure he contracted rheumatism, from which he never wholly recovered. He served as sergeant of his company, and made a creditable record, never allowing the family name to suffer in his career.

When his military service had terminated, Mr. Barnes went South, and was employed by the government at his trade in Tennessee and Georgia, where he spent the ensuing six months. In 1864 he came to Indianapolis, as noted above, and here he united with Chapman Post, No. 209, G. A. R., afterward transferring to Gordon Post, of which he has been Commander, filling that position with dignity and credit. From his first connection with the G. A. R. he has been continuously in official position, proving a most efficient and active member of that order. He is a strong union man and closely identified with the progress of organized labor, at the present time being connected with the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, a thriving organization.

Mr. Barnes' first marriage was to Elizabeth Hodges, of Kentucky, a daughter of Ambrose Hodges, who removed to Indiana, and during the war enlisted in the 5th Indiana Cavalry. For three years he served at the front, and after he was discharged made his home in Indianapolis, where he died. In this state he was engaged as a carpenter and gardener. A Democrat in early life, he became a Republican after the war. He was accidentally killed, being run over on the railroad.

To the first marriage of George H. Barnes was born one son, Will W., who was a soldier in the Philippines two and a half years and later stationed at Fort Douglas, Utah. After twenty-seven years of married life, Mr. Barnes' first wife died, and he married a soldier's widow, a native of Ohio, for his second wife. She died in July, 1897, leaving no children. Mr. Barnes was married Feb. 1, 1899, to Mrs. Marilla Montgomery, widow of Joseph Montgomery, who was a cooper by occupation. Of his five children only one is now living, Arthur M. Montgomery, for many years an employee of the Indianapolis Evening News. Mrs. Barnes was born in Warren county, Ohio, in 1839, daughter of John and Phoebe (Williams) Hawthorne, both of Ohio. Some of the Williams family served in the Revolutionary war. Mrs. Barnes' father died in Warren county, Ohio. He was born in Ireland, but was early brought to this country by his father, Frank Hawthorne. John Hawthorne took much interest in Masonry and was a leading member of the Presbyterian Church. His children were as follows: Wilson, who served in the war of the Rebellion as a member of the 72d Ohio Volunteer Infantry; Lavina, Mrs. Sweringen; Hannah, Mrs. McCarty; Angelina, who died unmarried; Marilla, Mrs. Barnes; and Minnie, unmarried.

Mr. and Mrs. Barnes have had no children. They are devoted members of the Methodist Church, being associated with the Roberts Park Church. She is a member of Corps No. 10, W. R. C.

JOHN J. WENNER has attained success through his own efforts and his life affords an illustration of what is possible of accomplishment on the part of one who will bend his energies to honest and earnest endeavor. Though he is of foreign birth Mr. Wenner has passed essentially his entire life in America, and to-day he is one of the honored citizens of Indiana's capital city, where he has long maintained his home.

Mr. Wenner was born on the river Main, in Wurzburg, Bavaria, Germany, April 8, 1833. He is son of John M. and Margaret (Grehe) Wenner, both natives of the province of Wurzburg, Bavaria, where also was born the grandfather. Michael Wenner, the great-grandfather, was born in Sweden, whence he removed to Bavaria when a young man and there passed the remainder of his life, many descendants being still found in that kingdom. He was heir to a large estate in Sweden, but his descendants were defrauded of the property after many years of litigation.

John M. Wenner was born in the year 1800 and was reared to maturity in his native province, where he learned the turner's trade. His brothers also followed mechanical pursuits, and two of them served in Napoleon's army. He worked as a journeyman in various parts of Europe, and incidentally met many persons who had been in the United States, thus becoming well informed in regard to this country. While still a young man he embarked from Bremen on a sailing vessel bound for America, but the vessel foundered after being out two weeks and was towed back to Bremen, where his passage money was refunded. He then resumed work at his trade and soon afterward was married, retaining his residence in the Fatherland until five of his children were born, and in the meanwhile established a good home. In 1836 he disposed of his property and in company with his family again embarked at Bremen for the voyage to America, sailing in the month of April and failing to reach his destination until the following November, when the family landed in the city of Baltimore. The vessel, having become disabled, drifted at the mercy of the waves for weeks and had been given up for lost. From Baltimore the family proceeded to Wheeling, W. Va., and thence by steamboat down the Ohio river to Cincinnati, this voyage likewise being long and tedious as well as expensive. Upon arriving in Cincinnati Mr. Wenner rented a house and then engaged in the work of his trade, having brought a lathe from Germany. About a year later he rented a farm, the following year changing to another rented farm, but while moving some stone he received an injury which rendered him incapacitated for the work in hand, and in 1842 he returned to Cincinnati, where he remained until his death, in 1847. He was an industrious and progressive man, of sterling character. As soon as he became disabled his devoted wife courageously assumed the added responsibility devolving upon her, and engaged in huckstering, through which enterprise, with the aid of her children, she was enabled to keep the family together, her husband having practically exhausted his finances in an attempt to be cured. Mrs. Wenner continued to make her home in Cincinnati for many years, and when her children had attained maturity and become independently established she removed to Waterville, Ohio, where she lived in the home of her son until her death, in 1892, at an advanced age. Both she and her husband were zealous members of the Lutheran Church. Her father was a prominent physician in Bavaria, as were also two of his three sons, all of whom came to America, one settling in Canada, one in the United States and the third in Mexico. John M. and Margaret Wenner became the parents of twelve children, of whom five were born in Germany, namely: Andrew, who died in infancy; George, who died at the age of nine years; Andrew (2), who died at the age of twenty-seven; John J., and Paul, a resident of Waterville, Ohio. Of the seven children born after the removal to America all died in infancy except Margaret, who lived to the age of eighteen years.

John J. Wenner remained with his widowed mother until he had attained the age of twenty-three years, aiding in the support and care of the family. His early educational privileges were rather limited, but in the public schools of Cincinnati he laid the foundation of that practical education gained by personal application and active association with men and affairs in later years. In 1856 he came to Indianapolis and secured employment in the finishing department of the furniture factory of Spiegel, Toms & Co., becoming a skilled workman and remaining with this concern a number of years. In 1863 he was appointed market master, serving two years, after which he returned to the employ of the company previously mentioned. In 1866 he was made foreman of the finishing department at Helwig's chair factory, where he remained three and one-half years, when a change of ownership occurred. Mr. Wenner was shortly afterward chosen by the city council to fill the office of wood and weigh master at the market house, in which capacity he rendered efficient service for two terms. In 1872 he purchased a farm in Warren township, where he remained until 1876, when, with the view of bettering his condition, he exchanged his place for a farm in Bartholomew county, Ind., but through a false abstract he was swindled out of all his property, losing all he had saved through his zealous labors and being left with an indebtedness of $1,000. His courage and honor did not flinch under these misfortunes, and he returned to Indianapolis with the firm determination of paying his debts and retrieving his resources. He secured employment first in the old Helwig factory and later in the Gilliland telephone factory, where he was employed five years, when the shops were removed to Chicago. By rigorous economy and good management Mr. Wenner had succeeded in paying his indebtedness and purchased six acres of land, at that time lying outside the city limits, on Pleasant run, and the growth of the city has been such that his home is now within the corporate limits and is a valuable piece of property. He erected a commodious frame dwelling and made other improvements upon this tract, set out shrubs and fine fruits, and has a fine garden, raising an abundance of fruits and vegetables. He has one of the attractive homes of this division of the city, and here he has lived retired since 1888, having thriftily made provision for his declining years. Mr. Wenner has ever been guided by those high principles of honor and integrity which may well shame those who defrauded him in his earlier days. In politics he is a stanch Republican, and he and his family are all worthy members of the German Methodist Church.

In 1857 Mr. Wenner married Miss Mary Pfifer, who was born in Germany, in 1836, and who came to America with her parents when ten years of age. She is a daughter of George and Christina (Hays) Pfifer, who, in 1846, settled in Washington county, Ohio, where Mr. Pfifer was engaged in farming until 1854, when he removed to Indianapolis, where both he and his wife passed the rest of their lives. Their children were as follows: Christina, became Mrs. Rice, and remained in Ohio, where her husband died; Hannah, of Indianapolis, became Mrs. Rithert, and her husband is deceased; Reggia is the wife of D. Curtis; Caroline is the wife of J. Rafert;

Anna is Mrs. Haresock; Mary is the wife of Mr. Wenner.

Mr. and Mrs. Wenner have had eight children, namely: Elenora is the wife of B. Stephenson, of California; William is a mechanic and resides in Indianapolis; Dora is engaged as a teacher in California; John A., is a railroad machinist in Los Angeles, that state; Anna is a trained nurse; Christina is the wife of H. Alexander; Florida resides in California; Minnesota remains at the parental home.

Mr. Wenner has been a particularly active worker in the German Methodist Church, in which he has served in many of the important offices, including those of trustee and class-leader, while he was one of the founders of that noble institution, the German Orphans' Home, in Indianapolis, having been one of its trustees and taken an active part in forwarding the interests of the work and the erection of the fine building; he had the supervision of the laying of the cornerstone.

CHRIST MORASKY, who resides at No. 326 Jefferson avenue, Indianapolis, is a native of the city of Berlin, Germany, born on Feb. 21, 1850. But he has passed the greater portion of his life in Indianapolis, whither he accompanied his parents as a lad of ten years. He is a son of Henry and Lou (Denkar) Morasky, both of whom were born in Germany, where they remained until 1860, when, with a view to improving his condition, the father emigrated with his family to America. Soon after his arrival he came to Indianapolis and found employment in the Bellefontaine freight house, where his fidelity and zealous efforts won him the confidence of his employers and resulted in his being trusted with more responsible duties. There he continued to labor for a long term of years, resigning only when the infirmities of advanced age made it necessary, and he thereafter lived retired until the close of his long and useful life, his death occurring in March, 1895. His wife passed away in 1877. Both were devoted members of the Lutheran Church, and for many years worshiped at the old Zion Church, on Ohio street. Henry Morasky was in military service for ten years prior to coming to America. His integrity was beyond question and he ever commanded the confidence and respect of all who knew him. In politics he gave his support to the Republican party, but he never sought notoriety of any sort, his interests being in his home, his family, his church and his practical duties. His children were as follows: Christ is the subject of this sketch; Charles, who was highly educated, was engaged as an expressman, when last heard from by our subject; Henry is engaged in the grocery business in Indianapolis.

Christ Morasky attended the public schools of Indianapolis, and after leaving school found a position as helper in and about the Union station. He was but sixteen years old when he secured employment as fireman on a pony engine, being thus employed for eight years, at the expiration of which he became engineer of a pony engine in the Pan-Handle railroad yards. In 1885 he became a hostler in the same yards, and has since been engaged as such, discharging his duties with marked fidelity and being well known in local railroad circles. He has the good-will and respect of all who know him. He has been identified with railroad work for about forty years, and his long service with the one company indicates that his efforts have been appreciated. He has labored zealously and has been economical, saving his earnings, and has a good home, enjoying the rewards of his toil and endeavor. In politics he gives his allegiance to the Republican party, and both he and his wife hold to the faith of the Lutheran Church.

In 1875 Mr. Morasky was united in marriage to Miss Mary Clapper, who was born in Hancock county, Ind., Oct. 10, 1852, daughter of Charles and Mary (Bomaster) Clapper, who were born in Germany, where their marriage was solemnized. Mr. Clapper came to America alone, returning to the Fatherland for his family, who accompanied him to Hancock county, where they were early settlers. He bought a tract of wild land and improved a good farm, becoming one of the prosperous and honored citizens of the county, and died on the old homestead in 1855. His widow assumed the management of the farm and there reared her children to lives of usefulness and honor, being a capable woman and loved for her sterling attributes of character. She remained at the old home until her death, in 1890, at the venerable age of eighty years. Both she and her husband were devoted members of the Lutheran Church. Their children were as follows: Henry, who resides on the old homestead; Fred, who died at the age of eighteen years; and Mary, Mrs. Morasky. Henry is well upholding the reputation sustained by his honored father and is one of the highly esteemed citizens of Hancock county; he is married and has ten children.

Mr. and Mrs. Morasky have had three children, namely: Mary, who was born June 9, 1876, is the wife of Charles Hergt, a grocer of Indianapolis; William, who was born Dec. 9, 1879, is a pressman in the employ of the Indianapolis Printing Company; George met an untimely death, having been killed by the street cars when sixteen years of age.

JAMES WEATHERS, now residing in Indianapolis, is well known as an inventor and a manufacturer of patent devices.

Mr. Weathers was born in Decatur county, Ind., April 23, 1833, a son of Barney and Tempa (Harlow) Weathers, both of whom were natives of Kentucky. The former was the only child of Barney Weathers, who was of Irish extraction and was numbered among the pioneers of Kentucky, where he was engaged in farming until his death. The grandmother of our subject subsequently became the wife of Robert McClary, and they removed to Brown county, Ind., where Mr. McClary purchased a farm on which he and his wife continued to reside until they died. They became the parents of six children, namely: Lucinda (Mrs. William Tharp), William, Louisa (Mrs. J. J. Ogle), Henrietta (Mrs. S. Pettigrew), Andy, and Rachel (who was the wife of Mr. Watts).

Barney Weathers, Jr., father of James Weathers, was reared to maturity in Kentucky, where he was married and where his two eldest children were born. In 1832 he came to Indiana and lived until the following year in Decatur county, after which he returned to Kentucky, where he resided for the ensuing fifteen years. In 1848 he again came to Indiana, and took up his residence at Greensburg, there spending the remainder of his life and dying in 1868, at the age of sixty years. While in Kentucky he was a prosperous farmer, but unfortunate investments caused him to lose practically all he had accumulated, so that he became dependent entirely upon his own efforts at the time when he finally came to Indiana. He was a man of inflexible integrity and ever held the respect of all who knew him. In politics he was a Democrat. His first wife, who died in 1858, at the age of fifty-four, was a daughter of Kit Harlow, who was born in Virginia, whence he removed to Kentucky in the early pioneer epoch and there passed the residue of his life. He had been a valiant soldier in the war of the Revolution. He had four children, Tempa (mother of our subject), Lucy (Mrs. John Harlo), Patsey (Mrs. W. Carl) and Bartlett. Barney and Tempa Weathers became the parents of nine children, namely: William, who died of cholera in Illinois, in 1851; Louisa, who married J. Rogers and after his death became the wife of J. Riley; James, subject of this sketch; John, who was a member of the 123d Indiana Volunteer Infantry during the Rebellion, and who now resides in Indianapolis; Elizabeth, the wife of J. Isgregg; Sarah, the wife of J. Sham; Nancy, wife of W. Divine; and two who died in childhood. After the death of his first wife, Mr. Weather married a Mrs. Tuttle, and they had two children, both of whom died young. The mother also died, after which Mr. Weathers consummated a third union, with Mrs. Margaret Scott, whose first husband died while serving as a soldier in the Civil war. Of this third marriage were born two children, one of whom died in childhood, while the other, Edward, still resides in Greensburg, where he was born.

James Weathers was born in Decatur county, but when he was only three months old his parents returned to Kentucky, his mother walking the greater portion of the distance (150 miles) and carrying him in her arms. There he was reared to the age of fifteen years, receiving little in the way of educational advantages and he then accompanied his parents on their removal to Greensburg, in his native county, where he learned the tanner's trade. He was thus engaged for two years and then began an apprenticeship at the blacksmith's trade, his mechanical ability being so marked that he became a skilled workman within the short period of nine months. He went to Paris, Ill., as a journeyman blacksmith, returning to Greensburg two years later and opening a shop of his own. He did a successful business in the way of general blacksmith work, wagon repairing, etc., and later included the manufacture of wagons, continuing this business until 1863, when he closed out and enlisted in Company B, 123d Indiana Volunteer Infantry, for three years, or "during the war." The regiment was commanded by Colonel McCristian and assigned to the Army of the Tennessee, with which it accompanied Sherman on the memorable march to the sea, taking part in the entire Atlanta campaign, after which the command divided, one portion proceeding in pursuit of Hood and the other, with which Mr. Weathers was connected, continuing the march to the seaboard, under command of General Thomas. After the division he was detailed as blacksmith, and served as such about ten months, being with the ambulance train. After his detail he again shouldered the musket and again was a participant in many fierce battles and skirmishes, always being found at the post of duty. He was never wounded or captured. Though ill at times he made no hospital record, but insisted on remaining with his regiment, and he continued in active service until Lee's surrender, at which time he was at Goldsboro, N. C., having been detailed with the 5th Illinois Battery. From there he was sent to Charlotte and thence to Lexington, N. C., where he was mustered out, after which he returned to Indianapolis, where he received his honorable discharge in September, 1865.

After his honorable military career was ended Mr. Weathers returned to Greensburg, where he rejoined his family and resumed the work of his trade, which he there continued until 1873, when failing health compelled him to withdraw from the business. In 1879 he came to Indianapolis, where he has since given his attention to inventing and manufacturing patents. He himself is the inventor of thirty-two devices, all of practical value, and many of which will continue to be used long after he has left the scenes of life's activities. Through his own study and application he has supplemented the meagre educational training of his youth and has contributed in no slight degree to the forwarding of mechanic industries, through his work and his inventions. He has been duly successful, ever honorable and straightforward in all relations of life, and is the owner of desirable city property.

In 1856 Mr. Weathers was united in marriage to Miss Sally Bright, who was born in Switzerland county, Ind., a daughter of Ebenezer Bright, an honored pioneer of the State, who died in Marshall county. Mrs. Sally Weathers, who died in 1892, was a devoted Spiritualist in her religious faith. She had no children. In 1893, Mr. Weathers married Miss Eliza Davis, who was born in Kentucky, where she was left an orphan when but five years of age. She was taken into the home of a Mr. Wadsworth, whose family she accompanied to Jefferson county, Ind., where she was reared to maturity after which she resided in Indianapolis, where her marriage was solemnized. No children have been born of the union. Mrs. Weathers has no definite knowledge concerning her family history and has no relatives living so far as she is aware. She has proved a devoted companion and helpmate to her husband, and is a consistent member of the Methodist Church. While residing in Greensburg, Mr. Weathers held membership in the Disciples Church. Fraternally he is identified with Chapman Post, G. A. R., and the I. O. O. F. in Indianapolis.

WILLIAM W. REVEL, of Indianapolis, for nearly a half a century a successful railroad engineer, and for nearly four decades in the employ of one company, has given intelligent and efficient service and has scarcely his peer in the corps of engineers. He was born at Lacolle, Canada, Feb. 22, 1835, of good English stock.

John Revel, his grandfather, passed many years of his life in Yorkshire, England. About 1820, hoping to better his prospects in life he came to Canada, and there purchased a tract of land, on which he settled and began making improvements. He passed the rest of his life in the development of the resources of this place, and here after many fruitful years of labor he died. By his marriage there were four children: William, who is mentioned below; Mary, who married a Mr. March; John, who died in Canada; and Sarah, who also married a March.

William Revel, father of William W., was born in Yorkshire, England, Aug. 8, 1808, and was but a small boy when his parents moved to Canada. He remained on the farm until he was twenty-one years old at which time he went to Clintonville, N. Y., where he set about learning the chain making trade. Close application to his work enabled him early to master the business, and after a short time he secured a regular position in a cable chain factory, continuing for many years. Steady work, good wages, and economy enabled him after some time to save enough money to invest in real estate, and going to Canada he purchased a good farm adjoining his father's where he settled and engaged in agriculture. He remained here throughout the rest of his active life, and died Nov. 17, 1867. While residing in New York State, Mr. Revel married Eleanor Wilser, who was born in that state, of an old and prominent family. Her father was a farmer by occupation. Late in life he moved to Canada, where he passed his last days and died. He was the father of five children: Abijah, a farmer; Eleanor (Mrs. Revel); Maria, Emily, and a son. The parents of these were good Methodists and in that faith reared their children. Mrs. Eleanor Revel died at the homestead of her husband July 13, 1852. Seven children were born to her and Mr. Revel: William W., Mary E., Sarah A., who married a Mr. Boice; John, who resides in Massachusetts; Ellen, who married a Mr. Boice, and Maria J., and Cynthia, who both died young. William Revel and his wife were consistent members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

William W. Revel passed his early life upon his father's Canadian farm, and attended the neighboring schools. When about nineteen years old he went to Dayton, Ohio, and there secured a position as fireman on the Dayton & Western Central R. R., now the Pan-Handle. Two years of efficient work here won him the confidence of his employers, and he was promoted to engineer. During the war he hauled soldiers, supplies, and ammunition on the old Bee line, and was considered one of the most accommodating men in the service, making himself in every way of service both to his employers and to the government. Some time after the close of the war, in 1869, he was transferred to what was then the I. & V. railroad, a position he has since filled regardless of the change in the road's name. He has at all times been alert to his responsibilities, and has been remarkably free from accidents. Neither deaths nor broken limbs to passengers have occurred from wrecks on his trains, during his long period of service. A good business man as well as engineer, he has shrewdly invested his savings, and now owns considerable valuable property in Indianapolis.

At Dayton, Ohio, Dec. 4, 1859, Mr. Revel married Amelia S. Raymond, who was born at Cincinnati, Ohio, daughter of David S. Raymond. She died at Indianapolis, Jan. 8, 1889, in the faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church. On May 20, 1891, Mr. Revel married Sarah J. Jacobs, widow of Charles Jacobs. No children came of Mr. Revel's first marriage. By the second marriage there have been two children: Helen G., born March 14, 1892; and William W., June 2, 1894. Mrs. Revel has one child from her first marriage, Mary J., whom Mr. Revel has reared and educated, and who is now the wife of P. Ferguson, and resides in Jeffersonville. Mr.

Revel has devoted himself almost exclusively to the interests of the company with which he has so long been connected, and has won their unbounded confidence. Fraternally he stands high, affiliating with the I. O. O. F.; the K. of H.; and the B. of L. E. Politically he is well informed, and usually casts his lot with Republicans, but reserves the right of voting for the best man. The Presbyterian Church counts him among its most worthy members.

William Smart, father of the present Mrs. Revel, a blacksmith by trade, passed his early life in Scotland. During his young manhood he came to this country and soon afterward secured a position as foreman in the Pennsylvania railroad blacksmith shops. Proving himself an efficient workman, skilled in directing affairs, he continued here for the most part throughout the rest of his active life. After the death of his wife he took up his residence with his daughter, Mrs. Revel, and at her residence he died in May, 1894. His wife died in 1888. By his marriage there were four children: Sarah Janet (Mrs. Revel); Mary E., who married E. Heaton; and two sons, who died young. Mr. Smart was a man of firm religious convictions, and both he and his wife belonged to the Presbyterian Church.

G. H. FRANK, of Indianapolis, engineer of a freight train, on the Pennsylvania railroad, is a man of wide experience, having been in the railroad service for over forty years, and filled positions on many important roads from the far East to the West. He was born at Norway, Oxford county, Maine, Sept. 22, 1845, and is of good Scotch extraction, both on the maternal and paternal sides. His grandfather Frank had four children: Levi, who is mentioned below; Myer, who walked across the United States from Maine to California, and has not been heard from for many years; and Lois, and Clara, who made their residence in Maine and there died.

Levi Frank, father of G. H., passed his early life for the most part in Maine, where he procured a fair education and received practical training for the active duties of life. As a young man he settled upon a farm and during this same period he also engaged in the lumber business in winter, thus greatly increasing his income. After some years, hoping to better his fortunes, he went to Indiana and remained for about a year in Richmond, preparatory to a more permanent location. At the end of this period, however, while returning to his family in Maine, he became ill and died. His children were: Francis L., a retired citizen of Bangor, Maine, who was in the railroad service for many years, being employed at different times as engineer on many of the Western lines, including the Kentucky Central (where he was associated with Jack Redman and the John Morgan, of Rebel fame) and later on the Grand Trunk line; Salome, who married S. Crockett, and after his death Nathan Buck, who was connected with the Milton Railway company, in Massachusetts; Amanda, who married D. Briggs, of Norway, and G. H. Mr. Frank combined with energy and good judgment skill in directing affairs. In religious sentiment he was a Universalist.

G. H. Frank grew to manhood upon his father's farm, and in the schools of Oxford county procured a good education. At the age of seventeen he went to Columbus, Ohio, where he began his railroad service. For about four and a half years he worked at firing engines, for eighteen months on the Little Miami R. R., for a year on the Eaton & Hamilton line and for two years on the Indiana Central, now a part of the Pennsylvania system. During this period he had availed himself of every opportunity of acquiring knowledge of engineering, and he was now given the running of a locomotive through the yards of the company at Indianapolis. Proving himself both careful and efficient, in 1867, he was promoted to engineer of a freight train for the same company, where he remained for eight years. At the end of this period he was assigned to a place at the round house, where he remained for some time. For the next few years he passed a varied career in railroading; running first on the old Junction railroad in the East; on the I. B. & W. line; and later on the I. & V. R. R., where he continued until the strike of 1873. Returning East he then accepted a position with the N. A. R. R., where he remained for two years, making his run from Bangor, Maine, to St. John, N. B. His next position was with the St. Louis & Iron Mountain R. R. where he remained for six months, and then he came to Indianapolis and took a position with the Pennsylvania R. R., with which he has since been employed. For the first few months he served as brakeman, and was then made engineer of a freight train, in which capacity he has since continued, giving most excellent satisfaction. His constant watchfulness has preserved him from any serious accidents, the only ones with which he has been connected being of a very slight nature, caused by open switches and similar contingencies.

In 1871 Mr. Frank married Lenora Martin, who was born at Carlisle, Ohio, Feb. 10, 1848, and of this union there have been five children: Stanley, who met his death by an accident at the age of seventeen years; Elwood, who is now working for the Lampson Store Service Co.; Blanche, and Goldie, at home; and Oscar, who is engaged in the jewelry business. Mr. Frank is a wide-awake, practical, man, who has kept abreast of every advancement in engineering and everything else pertaining to his profession. Fraternally he affiliates with the K. of P., Star Lodge, No. 7.

James Martin, grandfather of Mrs. Frank, a carpenter and contractor by trade, was born in 1784, and passed the greater part of his life in New York. When the War of 1812 broke out he enlisted and served his country valiantly. In 1857 he went West on a visit but returned to New Jersey a year later, where he died, in 1858. In New Jersey, Mr. Martin married Mercy Milhouse, who was born in Scotland, May 20, 1786. She died in 1850. By this union there were nine children: Daniel D.; Randolph; Mary A., who married Capt. Madden, of Jacksonville, Fla.; Ruth G., who married J. Elliott, of New York; Margaret, who married E. Sells, also of that city; Nathaniel, who is mentioned below; Mercy E., who married a Mr. Bailey, and resides in New York; Sarah M., who married a Mr. Elliott; and Johannah, who married Capt. West, and resides in Galveston, Tex. The father of these was a man of influence in his locality, who filled very acceptably many public offices. He was a consistent member of the Primitive Baptist Church.

Nathaniel Martin, father of Mrs. Frank, was born in New Jersey, and remained there until he was twenty-three years old, when he came to Ohio. A carpenter and contractor by trade, he followed his pursuit in Ohio, until 1849, when he settled at Edinburg, Ind., and there engaged in the same lines. In addition to carrying on his trades he also conducted a butcher shop, and ran a hotel in the place, making a marked success of each enterprise. In October, 1862, he enlisted for service in the Civil war, and went to the front as captain of the 52d Ind. V. I., of the Army of Tennessee. He participated in many hard battles, including Pittsburg Landing and Shiloh, at which last named place he was wounded by the explosion of a shell and received an honorable discharge. After his recovery he opened a restaurant in Memphis, Tenn., and there conducted a highly successful business for some time. While here, acting as custodian of a large amount of government money, he was the object of an attempted robbery. Courage and presence of mind, however, enabled him to shoot the thief, who proved to be a well-known acquaintance. About 1863 Mr. Martin returned to Ohio and remained at Carlisle Station a while, where his family had moved during his absence, and then he located in Piqua, Ohio, where he engaged in the butcher business and hotel keeping, running the "Leland Hotel" till 1872. Moving to Bradford he there conducted the "Bradford Hotel" for about a year, when on account of failing health, he was obliged to retire from active work. Going to Leesburg, Fla., he there remained for about four years, when in 1877 he died. Mr. Martin married in Ohio, Maria Schenck, of Pennsylvania, daughter of C. and Maria Schenck, of Pennsylvania German descent, the former a prosperous farmer, who died near Carlisle, Warren county, Ohio, in 1832. By his wife Maria, there were seven children: John R., who attained a remarkable age and lived at South Bend, Ind.; Maria; Jane who married a Mr. Roof; Sarah, who married William Dubois; Catherine, who married J. Hendrix, an early settler of Kewanna; Daniel, a resident of Holden, Missouri; and Tennis, a farmer, who died at Tylorsville, Ind. The parents of these were highly respected Christians, who belonged to the Presbyterian Church. When Mr. Martin went to Florida Mrs. Martin took up her residence with her daughter Mrs. Frank, in Indianapolis, where she afterward made her home. To her and Mr. Martin were born eleven children: Randolph, born in 1846, at the age of seventeen years enlisted in the service of the Civil war, but his father secured his release from the service at the battle of Shiloh, and the two went to Memphis, and later returned to Ohio; Lenora, became Mrs. Frank; Gilbert, died young; Mary, has never married; William, died of small pox at the age of seventeen years; Nathaniel, an engineer, now resides at Indianapolis; Elwood, is an engineer on the Pan Handle R. R.; Walter Q. G., an engineer in the employ of the Big Four Company, resides at Indianapolis; Charles, a carpet layer, is now deceased; Joseph, lives at his pleasant home on English avenue, Indianapolis, and Andrew, now in the employ of the Indianapolis Co., resides in Grant County. Mr. Martin was a social, genial man, who attracted to him many friends. He was a good Christian, being a consistent member of the Primitive Baptist Church. Fraternally he affiliated with the Red Men.

THOMAS Y. NOBLE, who is at present engaged in the manufacture of ice in Indianapolis, has achieved success in several walks of life, principally, however, as an engineer, having served in that capacity for fully twenty-five years on the I. B. & W. line, now a part of the Big Four System. Possessed of rare business ability, he is now one of the well-to-do citizens of Indianapolis.

His family is of Irish descent; and his grandfather, George Noble, made his residence in Pennsylvania for many years. There he embarked upon life as a farmer, but after some years moved to Kentucky, where he settled upon a tract of good farming land. He prospered in his new home, and remained there throughout the rest of his life. By his marriage there were six children: George, David, Enoch, Henry, William; and Thomas, who is mentioned below. Mr. Noble and wife were good Christians, one belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the other to the Presbyterian Church.

Thomas Noble, father of Thomas Y., an engineer by trade, was a man of ability and integrity of character. Born in Lexington, Ky., he grew to manhood on his father's farm, and early acquired the habits of attention and self-reliance, which characterized his later years. As a young man, looking for an opening in life, he came to Madison, Indiana, and soon secured a position on the railroad. For some time he worked in the yards, yard switching in those days being done with horses, and rapidly acquiring knowledge of the various branches of the business, he rose step by step to engineer. Efficient and conscientious in his work, he soon won for himself the confidence of the company and held the same position for many years. Eventually, however, finding a change of work necessary, he resigned his position and went into the saw-mill business. Though the field was a new one, he derived from it a good income, and continued it throughout the rest of his active life. He died at North Madison, in 1863. Soon after his arrival in Madison, Ind., Mr. Noble there married Nancy Duffy, who was born in Ohio, daughter of James Duffy, an Irish farmer, who, about 1818, moved by flat boat from Ohio to Indiana, and settled in Madison. In addition to farming he officiated as auctioneer for many years. By his marriage there were seven children: Nancy, who is mentioned above; Katie, who married I. Rollins; Maggie, the wife of Mr. Rector; Martha, who married a Mr. Tuttle; James; Alfred, and Alexander. Possessed of a keen sense of humor, Mr. Duffy was noted for his wit and his jokes; and he won for himself a wide circle of friends. He was a man of influence, and as a Democrat was active in local politics. In all good works he ever evinced a keen interest, and he belonged to the Methodist Episcopal Church. His daughter, Mrs. Noble, who is mentioned above, lived to the advanced age of ninety-three years, dying in August, 1901. There were eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Noble: Oliver, who served in the Civil war in the 6th Ind. V. I., and died in 1873; Thomas Y., James E., who also served in the Civil war; William, deceased; John M.; Jessie A.; Mary E., who married John Bloom, of Pittsburg, Pa.; and Amanda I., who married Robert Davis. Of these all with the exception of Thomas Y. are now deceased. Mr. Noble possessed the sturdy virtues of honesty, good fellowship, and industry. He was below the average in size, but was nevertheless constitutionally strong, and possessed a large capacity for work. For his generosity and charity as well as for many other virtues he was widely and favorably known. The Methodist Episcopal Church counted him among its most worthy members. Politically he affiliated with the Republicans.

Thomas Y. Noble was born in Jefferson county, Ind., Nov. 1, 1840, and when quite young went to live with his uncle, on whose farm he remained until he was seventeen years old. In the public schools of his locality he procured a good education. At the age of seventeen he secured a position as peanut boy on the old Madison Railroad, where his father had so long acted as engineer. With his route between Madison and Indianapolis, he supplied passengers with his wares for several years. Then, having won the favor of railroad hands, and acquired some knowledge of machinery, he secured a chance to fire an engine over the same route. Trustworthy and efficient, he was promoted to engineer in the course of two years; and serving either on freight or passenger trains, at the discretion of the Company, he continued here until 1861, meeting with success and commanding good wages. Then, in answer to a call for troops for the Civil war, he enlisted for three years in Company A., 6th Ind. V. I., under Capt. T. P. Baldwin, and Col. Crittenden, and went to the front, as a part of the Army of Tennessee, commanded by Gen. Rosecrans. He did his first hard fighting at Rolla Station, and after a few skirmishes, participated in the sieges at Bowling Green, Ky., Nashville, Tenn., and in many other hard engagements; he endured all the hardships and privations of that long bloody struggle, but more fortunate than many of his company, he escaped without a single wound, or once being taken prisoner. He was mustered out, receiving his pay and honorable discharge, in August, 1864. A few years prior to the war, he had taken up his residence in Indianapolis, and he now returned to that city, and soon afterward secured a position with his old employers to fire an engine on the Madison R. R. After two years he secured his old place as engineer, and as such continued for three years.

During this period, in 1868, Mr. Noble married Maria Hobbs, who was born at Columbus, Ind., in 1846, procured a liberal education, and for several years prior to her marriage, followed teaching very successfully. By this union there have been four children: Charles, a mechanical engineer at Marion, Ind.; Walter, a fireman on the Vandalia line, who married Mazie J. Ward, and has one daughter, Elizabeth Ruth, who was born in July, 1901; and Frank and Nellie, who died young.

After marriage Mr. Noble settled in Indianapolis, and there he has since made his home. The year following his marriage, in 1869, he found a very good opening on the new lines of railroads then in the process of construction, and for several years he worked at railroad building, first on the Indianapolis & Crawfordsville line, later on the Indianapolis and Danville line; and finally on the I. B. & W., now a part of the Big Four system. With the completion of the last named railroad, he took a position with the company, as engineer, and proving himself in every respect capable and trustworthy, he continued as such for fully twenty-five years. At all times thoroughly alive to his responsibility, he has been remarkably free from accidents, and, has,

in fact, had no wrecks worth mentioning. A few years ago, retiring from railroad work, he purchased a plant and began the manufacture of ice in Indianapolis. A large acquaintance with various lines of business has enabled him to push this enterprise, and he is now making an unqualified success of it, and has a large trade. During his years of railroading he has occasionally branched out in other business, and for some time he conducted a barber shop and cigar stand in Indianapolis, with much success. He has also engaged in the real estate business, buying up property, wherever he saw a chance of a gain, and he now owns two attractive residences in the city. Having prospered in his various enterprises, he is now one of the well-to-do citizens of the place. Mr. Noble is widely and favorably known, and fraternally he affiliates with the B. of L. E., and Chapman Post, G. A. R., of Indianapolis. His wife is a highly respected member of the Presbyterian Church.

JAMES HOBBS, father of Mrs. Noble, was born in Indiana. After some years he settled in Columbus, Ind., where he became one of the leading citizens. As an influential Democrat, active in campaign work, he filled many offices of trust and responsibility, for his party in that place. He died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Noble, and is buried in Columbus, Ind. His wife afterward lived at the home of Mrs. Noble, and there she died in 1888. Both she and her husband were consistent members of the Christian Church. Their children were Maria, who is mentioned above; and Laura, Mrs. Woodhull.

HENRY C. RANDALL, now residing at his attractive residence at No. 418 Blake street, Indianapolis, for over twenty-five years has served as locomotive engineer over the I. D. & W. R. R. He has had a wide and varied experience in his line, and is now one of the best informed, most competent, and careful engineers in the service of the company. Mr. Randall was born at Rouses Point, N. Y., May 20, 1853, and comes of a family of successful railroad employees, his father and five of his brothers having served as engineers, and his sister having married a man of the same profession.

Stephen R. Randall, father of Henry C., was reared in the State of Massachusetts, early acquiring the habits of industry and self-reliance, which prominently marked his character in later years. At an early age he went to sea, and after a number of years of faithful service, gave it up, and secured a position as fireman on the Vermont Central R. R., gradually working up to the place of engineer. After some years with this road, he accepted a similar position on the M. & L. S. R. R., where he gave excellent satisfaction. He later made several changes, being engaged at different times on the C., B. & Q. R. R., (with his residence at Galesburg, Ill.), and on the M. C. Having during this period won for himself an excellent reputation for coolheadedness and practical knowledge of all lines of locomotive engineering, at the opening of the Civil war he was engaged to run trains through the South, and throughout the struggle he continued in this line, proving himself entirely worthy of the confidence reposed in him. After the war, he returned to Illinois, and took a place as engineer on the C., B. & Q. R. R., making his run from Galesburg to Quincy. He was performing his duties with his usual care and ability, when, on one run, in 1867, his train met with a wreck, as a result of a missing rail—torn up by some miscreant—and here he lost his life. During his young manhood Mr. Randall married Susan E. Carlton, of Rutland, Vermont. She survived her husband several years, and died at Peoria, Ill. Of this union there were seven children: Stephen A., an engineer by profession, residing at Galesburg, Ill.; George, also an engineer, who was killed in May, 1900; Henry C.; James, a railroad man of Peoria, Ill., who was injured through his service; William, an engineer, who was killed at Springfield, Ill.; Edward, another engineer, who died of heart disease at the home of his brother, in Indianapolis; and Mary E., who married Ben Lewis, now a retired railroad man, residing at Kansas City, but formerly of Galesburg, Ill. Mr. Randall throughout his career, was a close student of engineering, and kept thoroughly abreast of the latest movements in that science, as well as all matters pertaining to railroading generally. A man of marked integrity of character, he commanded respect from all who knew him, and he was long a highly esteemed member of the Campbellite Church. Fraternally he was well known and affiliated with the B. of L. E., being a charter member of that order.

Henry C. Randall early moved with his parents to Michigan, where he remained for some years, and then settled in Illinois: In the public schools of the different localities, he procured his education, and boy like became interested in his father's work. To this he naturally turned his attention, and when but fifteen years old began firing an engine on the C., B. & Q. R. R., using, after the fashion of that day, wood for fuel, and with this road he continued until he was nineteen years old. A desire to see the world and to experience its various phases led him through a varied career for the next few years, during which period he fired engines at different times on the Burlington & Missouri River R. R.; the Burlington & South West; the Des Moines Valley R. R.; and later on the Wabash, making his run from Springfield, Ill. While serving on the last named road he was promoted to engineer, and proved a most successful one, later, at different times serving in the capacity on the T. P. & W. running from Peoria, Ill., on the R. & R. I.; the M. K. & T.; and on the I. B. & W., making his run from Urbana, Ill. After three successful years with the last named company, he in 1880, accepted a place as engineer, on the I. D. & W. R. R. Having had quite enough experience in roving, he now settled down to steady business and by his efficiency and fidelity to his work, won the entire confidence of his employers. Strict in carrying out orders, watchful, alert, he continued in favor, and has remained with the same company ever since, winning for himself an enviable reputation. Throughout his career his services have been greatly in demand, and in the early days old engineers used to vie with one another in trying to secure him as fireman for their trains. He possessed a genius for handling machinery, and was always quick in picking up the manipulation of new appliances, and he fired the first train on the C., B. & Q. R. R. that used the air brake. His advice has often been sought by those seeking to make improvements in railroading, and often turned to practical account. He is a good business man as well as engineer, and now owns a pleasant two-story frame house on Blake street, Indianapolis, where he has resided since 1879.

In 1879 Mr. Randall married Lillian M. Kyte, who was born at Chariton, Iowa, Oct. 14, 1857, and who was reared for the most part near Danville, Ind. Of this union there have been no children. Mr. Randall is a thoroughly up-to-date gentleman, somewhat of a man of the world. He is a thoroughly good fellow, well informed upon all subjects, and wins friends for himself at every step in life. Keenly interested in his profession, he treasures everything of value pertaining to it, and has among his collections a photograph of the first engine passing through the new Union station in Indianapolis. Socially he stands high and affiliates with the A. F. & A. M. and the K. of P., and is one of the oldest members of the B. of F. & L. E. His wife is a highly esteemed member of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, and socially she belongs to the Eastern Star.

James L. Kyte, father of Mrs. Randall, was originally of Kentucky, and there passed his early life. Later he moved to Indiana, where he settled upon a farm and engaged in all branches of general farming, and made a specialty of stock. He also bought and sold cattle, carrying on a profitable business in this line for many years. Some time ago he gave up active labor, and he now makes his home with his children in Indianapolis. After coming to Indiana he married in that state Margaret Ham, and of this union there have been seven children: Julia, who married a Mr. Haynes, a descendant of a prominent old family of Hendricks county; Lillian M., Amanda B., who married B. Johnson, and is now deceased; Hally, who married W. Harness, a Civil war veteran, now residing in Indianapolis; Carry, who died young; and Pearl, who married a Mr. McCowan. The mother of these is a worthy member of the Christian Church.

A. H. FETTY. This well-known saddle and harness maker of Indianapolis is a man of sterling worth, and comes of a fine old German Protestant family.

Carl Fetty, father of A. H., was born in Germany, son of Carl, Sr., and there continued his abode as had his ancestors for several generations. As a young man he entered a goldsmith's shop, and there by close application to work, readily mastered the details of the trade, and became a skilled workman. By his courteous reception of customers, and promptness in attending to his orders, he always attracted a large patronage. He died in the same locality where he had passed his life. Mr. Fetty was married twice, his second wife being Sophia Alman, who was born in Germany, of good old Protestant stock. By the first marriage there were six children, of whom two sons came to America, and settled in Indianapolis, where they died: Charles a machinist; and George, a successful tailor, cleaner, and dyer. By the second marriage there were five children: Fritz, who died at Cincinnati; Conrad, deceased; A. H., mentioned below; Henrietta, deceased, who married a Mr. P. Smith; and Simon, who died young. Mr. Fetty was a broad minded, capable business man, who amassed considerable property. His character was irreproachable and his sense of honor the keenest. He was widely known and attracted to him a large circle of warm friends.

A. H. Fetty was born in the North of Germany, Dec. 13, 1838. By attendance upon the well conducted schools of his locality he procured a liberal education, and in his father's shop early acquired considerable knowledge of business. At the age of sixteen he came to America, to win a place in life for himself. Finally settling in Indianapolis, he soon found work in the saddle and harness making establishment of Mr. Sulgrove, where he continued for some time. Later he entered a similar shop in Cincinnati, Ohio, where in time he became an expert workman. He returned to Indianapolis in 1860 and from there in 1861 enlisted in Company B, 11th Ind. V. I., under Col. Lew Wallace, and went to the front. After a short time he was transferred to a cavalry regiment, but, being thrown from his horse and disabled, he soon received an honorable discharge. Later, however, he re-enlisted, this time, in the 47th Ind. V. I., and again went to the front, this time as a part of the Army of Tennessee. His force was stationed at different times at Louisville, Bardstown, Ky; Munfordville; West Point, and crossed the river to Missouri, and to New Madrid, and he participated in many hot battles. While on Picket duty at Island No. 10, he gave the alarm at 2 A. M. on one occasion, which saved the command and supplies from capture by approaching Rebels. Later, while engaged in digging rifle pits at Riddles Point, in 1863 he fell and injured his back so seriously that after a month's hospital treatment he was sent to New Madrid, thence to Cairo, Ill., and finally home. Some time later, being entirely unfitted for further action, he received an honorable discharge. He was a brave and conscientious soldier, and was always to be found at his post of duty. After his recovery he went to Cincinnati, in 1863, and there found employment at his trade of harness and saddle making, and commanding good wages, remained there for about six years. Then, in 1869, he returned to Indianapolis and opened a grocery store, which he conducted with success for four years. The saddle and harness business proved to be the work for which he was best fitted, and now finding a most desirable opening in that line in Indianapolis, he turned his attention to that trade. He has since followed it for a regular business and, by giving close attention to his duties, and turning out high grade work, he has become well-to-do.

In 1863 Mr. Fetty married at Tipton, Ind., Carrie Short, who was born in Clermont county, Ohio, in November, 1834. Mrs. Fetty died in 1873, and in 1874 he married Mrs. Mary Wilson, daughter of Henry Huder, who was born in Germany, and who as a young man became a pioneer farmer of Indiana, where he reared a family of children, several of whom became prominent business men of Indianapolis. By his first marriage Mr. Fetty had three children: Arnold, who now holds a responsible position as stock keeper for a large wholesale house; John, a harness maker, who is doing well at his trade; and Henrietta, who died young. The second Mrs. Fetty had a daughter by her first marriage, Anna Wilson, who married a Mr. Burk. Mr. Fetty was reared by a good mother to a strict code of morals from which he never departed. He has always been generous with his earnings, giving liberally to the needy and in his earlier years assisted other members of his family to come to this country. Perseverance, integrity, and fidelity to his work are among his salient traits.

APOLLO S. INGLING, a member of a pioneer family of Indiana, a notary public at Bridgeport, was born in New Jersey, Oct. 3, 1842, and was reared and educated mostly in Marion county. His education has been mainly acquired by his own exertions.

Tent Ingling, great-grandfather of Apollo S., was a native of France, as was also his wife Mary. They came to this country, settling in New Jersey, and there died after a long and useful lives. Mr. Ingling was a natural mechanic, and worked at several different lines of mechanical labor. His children were: John, Tent (Jr.), Thomas, Jacob, Mrs. Sarah Inman, Mrs. Nancy White and Mrs. Frazier.

Jacob Ingling, son of Tent and Mary, was born and reared in New Jersey, in which State he passed a long life and died. His career was that of an honorable and upright farmer. He married Rachel Taylor, who was born in New Jersey, of an old family of English descent, and the children of this union were: Jacob, Jr., whose whereabouts are not known; Mrs. Lydia English; Mrs. Rachel Hadley; and Thomas W., father of Apollo S. For his second wife Jacob Ingling married Jane Green, who bore him one son, George, of Ohio.

Thomas W. Ingling, son of Jacob, was born in Burlington county, New Jersey, June 4, 1819. He grew to manhood and in his native State married Sarah Hughes, a native of New Jersey, who died in January, 1897, in the faith of the Methodist Church. Mr. Ingling married (second) Mrs. Malinda A. (Cravens) Turner, whose first husband was F. Reed, and her second, J. J. Turner. She was born in North Carolina, but had accompanied her parents to Butler county, Ohio, at an early day. For many years she had lived in this part of Indiana; her brothers and sisters were: Wesley (of North Carolina), Jesse, Jerry, W. Reese and Emaline (wife of a Mr. Hoffman). By his first marriage Thomas Ingling had children: Apollo S.; Jacob, a farmer and railroad agent in Illinois, who enlisted for service in the Civil war, and was sent home sick, but upon recovery re-enlisted; Anna, who died aged sixteen; John, a merchant at Bridgeport; Adeline, who married a Mr. Spear, and lives in Illinois; and Sarah, wife of a Mr. Alberson, a nursery man of Indiana. Mrs. Malinda Ingling is a member of the Baptist Church.

Thomas Ingling's mother died when he was only three years of age, and he lived with relatives until his father's second marriage, when he was called home. Shortly after his second marriage his father was accidentally drowned, and the young lad was again without a home, until he found a good home with a farmer named English. This was a good man, a friend of the young orphan, and kept him with him until he was twenty years of age. At that age he struck out for himself, and while he was possessed of considerable mechanical skill he preferred farming, and to it very largely gave his attention. In March, 1854, he came to Indiana, and located near Bridgeport on a rented farm. Until the present time he has made this section of the county his home. In a short time he bought a farm for himself, and devoted himself to farming and stock raising. In 1867 he went into a general store at Bridgeport, which he carried on successfully for twenty-one years, with very satisfactory results. At the same time he was also carrying on his farm, and conducting a meat market. In 1892 Mr. Ingling retired from the store, but still remains on the old homestead, and his son John has taken his place in mercantile affairs. Mr. Ingling has been very successful in his work, and has made his way to a most creditable position by unwearied industry and strong integrity. In 1840 he cast his first vote for William Henry Harrison. For some years he was a Democrat, but finally became a Republican, and has filled at different times several minor township offices.

Mrs. Sarah (Hughes) Ingling, first wife of Thomas, was a daughter of John Hughes, who was born on the high sea, while his parents were coming to the United States. They settled in New Jersey, where John was reared to manhood. His father was a Tory during the Revolution, but maintained the respect of the community despite their political variations. On reaching mature years John Hughes became a brick mason and contractor, and met with much success. His children were as follows: David, who died in New Jersey; Eliza; John, who died in New Jersey; Sarah, the mother of Apollo S. Ingling; Hannah, who married Mr. Hanes; Priscilla, who died single.

Apollo S. Ingling followed the successive removals of his parents to Ohio, then to Illinois, and returning, again to Ohio, finally locating near Bridgeport, where his life has since passed. Until he reached the age of eighteen years he remained under the parental roof. In 1861 he enlisted in Company B, 11th Ind. V. I., under Col. Lew Wallace. The regiment served under Gen. Grant, and began its historic career at Paducah, Fort Henry and Fort Donelson. It was later engaged at Shiloh, and in the campaign around Vicksburg. Moving down the Mississippi it was attached to the army under Gen. Banks, where it was furloughed for thirty days. When the leave of absence had expired the regiment was sent to the Shenandoah Valley, where it came under the command of Gen. Sheridan. It fought at Halls town, Winchester, Cedar Creek, and Fishers Hill, and was then assigned to garrison duty at Baltimore. While there Mr. Ingling was one of a band of forty soldiers who volunteered to rescue the crew of a sinking ship, the feat being successfully accomplished without the loss of a man. The regiment remained at Baltimore until the close of the Rebellion. Mr. Ingling passed through much hard service and experienced all the deprivations of the tented field, but was never wounded and never captured, though he had some narrow and thrilling escapes. He was mustered out at Baltimore, and returned to Indianapolis, where he was honorably discharged in August, 1865.

Mr. Ingling resumed farming, and in the fall of 1866 was married and settled down on the farm, where he remained until 1897. That year he retired to live in Bridgeport, where he is found today. In his active years he was a general farmer and stock raiser, being quite successful in all his enterprises and accumulating a handsome fortune. For some years he did quite a business for a fence company, and was long prominently identified with the activities of this section of the county. For six years he filled the office of justice of the peace, and is now notary public, doing the most of the legal business of Bridgeport and vicinity.

Mr. Ingling was married in 1866 to Miss Elizabeth Milhouse, who was born May 28, 1843, daughter of Thomas and Emily (Burnett) Milhouse, long residents of Indiana. Thomas Milhouse was born in North Carolina, and his wife in Indiana. Both families were members of the Society of Friends. The Milhouse children were as follows: John and David, farmers; Elizabeth, who became Mrs. Ingling; Mary A., who died young; and Dinah, who married Mr. Wilburn. Mr. and Mrs. Ingling had one child, Emma S., who was born Aug. 11, 1891. The wife and mother died May 16, 1892, in the faith of the Methodist Church, to which Mr. Ingling also belongs. He is a member of W. T. Sherman Post, No. 455, G. A. R., and is a highly respected and active member of the Order.

J. HENRY DOERR, engineer of a passenger train on the Big Four line, running from Indianapolis to Bellefontaine, Ohio, has won the entire confidence of his employers, and the respect and co-operation of other railroad hands, having been with the same company now for over thirty years. He is courageous, sound in judgment, and thoroughly up-to-date upon all questions concerning his professional work. Born in Hamilton county, Ohio, Jan. 13, 1855, he is a son of John and Elizabeth (Kress) Doerr.

John Doerr was born in Germany, in August, 1808, of an old Protestant family of high social status. Reared upon a farm he early acquired practical knowledge of all branches of agriculture, especially gardening. During the Rebellion of 1848, because of his strong opposition to the Emperor, he was forced to leave his native land, and accordingly with Gen. Seger, embarked for the United States. Locating in the vicinity of Cincinnati, he there followed farming very successfully for a number of years and then settled in Hamilton. At the end of a year he moved to Indiana, and there took employment in Meikel's Brewery, where he remained for a number of years. He next moved to the home of Gen. Tom Morris, where in addition to work about the farm he did market gardening for a number of years. Later, purchasing a tract of land, and erecting a new house, he moved there, and continued his gardening to better advantage. This he carried on successfully until 1871, when, desiring to retire from active work, he sold his home and purchased property on Yandes street, and here, on Dec. 15, 1872, he died. During his young manhood he married in Cincinnati, Elizabeth (Kress) Bennington, who was born in Germany, and there married Mr. Bennington, who died in that country. In 1840 she with her step-father Mr. Humbauch and family, came to the United States, and settled at Hamilton, Ohio, where he died. To Mr. and Mrs. Doerr were born four children: Charlotte, who married a Mr. Martin, and resides in Indianapolis; Lewis, a railroad employee, who was accidentally killed by a Bee line train, and who left four sons; J. Henry, mentioned below; and Catherine, who married M. Schreckengast, an engineer on the Big Four line. Mrs. Doerr had one child by her first marriage, John Bennington, who was born in Germany and came with his mother to the United States, but who is now deceased. Both John Doerr and his wife were consistent members of the Lutheran Church.

J. Henry Doerr came with his parents to Indianapolis when only a small child. He attended the public schools and assisted his father in marketing garden truck, until at the age of twelve years he went to work in the Spiegel Toms Factory, where, proving a willing and efficient employe he remained for about four years. In 1871 he began firing an engine in the Big Four yards. Conscientious and thorough work won him rapid promotion, and in a short time he began firing an engine on the road, and in December, 1873, he rose to the position of yard engineer. In 1873 he began running a freight train from Indianapolis to Union City. After a few years he took a similar position with the same company on a passenger train running from Indianapolis to Bellefontaine, Ohio. His only serious accident has come through the mistakes of a local resulting in a head end collision, in which his fireman was killed and he himself received fractures of the hip and injuries to his head, which caused him a six weeks' lay-off for recovery. On the whole, however, he has remained at his post steadily. A wise manager, from a mere wage earner in 1875, with but twenty dollars in cash ahead, he has by prudently saving his money and investing it, become possessed of considerable city property which he rents to advantage. Some years ago he also purchased an attractive two-story residence on Tenth street, where he has since made his home.

In 1875 Mr. Doerr married Anna Swekendorf, who was born in Randolph county, Ind., Sept. 1, 1857, and of this union there have been two children: Flora E., who married W. A. Ellis, who some years ago acted as lumber inspector, and who now has charge of C. & W. Kramer's lumber yards at Richmond, Ind.; and Clarence, who died in 1881, at the age of nine months. Mr. Doerr possesses a commanding presence, is decisive and practical. Upon all matters of the day he is thoroughly well-informed, and his word carries weight among his associates. True to his convictions he is independent in politics. Fraternally he stands high and affiliates with the K. of P., the A. O. of U. W., and the B. of L. E.

Henry Swekendorf, father of Mrs. Doerr, passed many years of his life in Pennsylvania. He was a carpenter by trade and followed that occupation for many years, and in addition he also engaged in the undertaking business there. About 1854 he moved to Indiana and settled at Winchester, where he continued his occupation with success. His only misfortunes came through his liberality in assisting others. He died at Winchester, in 1884. Mr. Swekendorf married Rebecca Summers, also of Pennsylvania, and she died in 1894. Of this union were born five children: Charles, a carpenter; Monroe, an engineer; Elijah, a cabinet maker; Anna (Mrs. J. H. Doerr), who is mentioned above; and Albert, a cabinet maker, now living in Chicago. The father of these was exceedingly active in religious work, and as a liberal member of the Evangelical Church, he erected at Winchester a beautiful church edifice, and he was one of the pillars of that denomination and often acted as superintendent of the Sunday-school.

JOHN R. SOURBEER, a thrifty business man of Indianapolis, comes of stanch old Pennsylvania stock, the name having been identified with the annals of the Keystone State from an early epoch in its history.

Mr. Sourbeer is a native of Lancaster county, Penn., born July 8, 1836, and was reared to the sturdy discipline of the farm, receiving such advantages as were afforded by the common schools of the place and period. His parents, Jacob and Hester (Schenck) Sourbeer, were born and reared in Pennsylvania. The original progenitors of the Sourbeer family in America were three brothers of the name who emigrated hither from Germany during the seventeenth century, all locating in Pennsylvania—one in Berks county, another in Adams county, and the third—from whom John R. Sourbeer is descended—established his home in Lancaster county. From these three brothers have descended a numerous progeny, and representatives of the name may now be found in nearly all sections of the Union.

Jacob Sourbeer passed his entire life in Lancaster county, where he died in 1862. He was a pilot on the Susquehanna river for many years, running rafts down the river from the great lumber regions to the market points. During the winter seasons he devoted his attention to shoemaking, while he also conducted a profitable business in operating shad fisheries, selling at wholesale. He was an industrious and able business man, sincere and honorable in all the relations of life, and ever retaining the respect and confidence of his fellowmen. He had a good home and was successful in his efforts, though he lost heavily through aiding friends who abused his confidence. He was originally a Whig and later a Republican in politics and held minor offices of local trust, though never a seeker for such preferment. He was a consistent member of the Lutheran Church. He met with an accident on the river and received injuries which hastened his death. His widow, with the assistance of her older sons, kept the family together. In 1867 she removed to Harrisburg, Pa., where she passed the remainder of her life, being tenderly cared for by her children in her declining days and entering into eternal rest in July, 1888. Of her ten children we have the following data: Harry and John R., twins, the former a prominent business man of Harrisburg, and the latter the immediate subject of this sketch; Frank, the owner of a stock ranch in Kansas; Isaac, who died at the age of thirty-three years; William, of Harrisburg, Pa.; Samuel, also of Harrisburg; Susan, Mrs. Graham; Kate, who is not married; Sarah, married; Fanny, Mrs. Simmers.

John R. Sourbeer entered upon an apprenticeship to the machinist's trade when sixteen years of age and became an expert artisan. He followed his trade at various places in Pennsylvania and also worked on the river at intervals, as a pilot, while for two years he was engaged in rolling boiler plate. In 1871 he came to Indianapolis, where he secured employment as a machinist in the old rolling-mill, continuing to be there engaged for thirteen years, when the mill was abandoned. He then engaged in business on his own responsibility, establishing himself in the plumbing business, and also giving special attention to driving wells. Later he conducted a grocery for three years, and since that time he has been successfully engaged in the plumbing and gas-fitting business, having a well equipped establishment and having built up a prosperous enterprise. He has a comfortable residence on Morris street, a two-story frame structure which he erected in 1875. His course has been such as to commend him to the confidence and good-will of the public, and his honor and integrity in all business transactions have been the factors which have promoted his success. In politics he gives his allegiance to the Republican party, and both he and his wife are members of the Methodist Church.

Mr. Sourbeer married Miss Hester Reil, who was born in Luzerne county, Pa., a daughter of William and Clarissa (Bowman) Reil, the former of German and the latter of English lineage. Mr. Reil, who was a stonemason by trade, was a son of Benjamin Reil, who was a blacksmith by trade and who also engaged in farming on a small scale. William Reil was the eldest in a family of five children, the others being Jacob, whose whereabouts are not known to other members of the family; Charles, who died in Wilkesbarre, Pa.; Mary and Anna. William Reil passed his entire life in Luzerne county, Pa., where he died in 1893, his wife passing away in 1884. Both were members of the Methodist Church, and in politics he was a Democrat. Mrs. Reil was a daughter of John Bowman, a blacksmith, who died in Luzerne county. William and Clarissa Reil became the parents of seven children, namely: Mary, Mrs. Gillett; Elizabeth, Mrs. Kibber; Charles and George, both deceased; Hester, deceased wife of our subject; Sarah, the present wife of Mr. Sourbeer; and Jane C., Mrs. Crosby. Mrs. Hester Sourbeer died in Pennsylvania in 1863, leaving two children: Walter, a civil engineer of Indianapolis; and Martha E., Mrs. McCullough, whose husband is a prominent business man of this city, being a stockholder and superintendent of the Century Bakery & Biscuit Company. In 1865 Mr. Sourbeer wedded Miss Sarah Reil (sister of his former wife), who was born Sept. 11, 1846. Of this union one son has been born, Edward G., who is a prominent merchant of Indianapolis and a leading member of the city council, being known as a progressive and public-spirited citizen.

W. H. SMEAD. This efficient yardmaster of the Belt Line, now residing at his pleasant residence at No. 1333 Nordyke avenue, Indianapolis, is a railroad employe of long experience, who has always held the unbounded confidence of his superiors. Starting as a brakeman, he in a remarkably short time, worked his way up to conductor, a place which he has filled long and ably, first on the old Vandalia Line, later on the J. M. & I., and finally on the Belt Line.

Mr. Smead comes of an old New England family. His grandfather, B. F. Smead, a carpenter by trade, and a patriotic citizen, who fought in the War of 1812, was reared in a New England home. As a preparation for his future work he early learned the trade of a carpenter, and continued it for the most part throughout his active career. He had made a fair start in life and was rapidly achieving success for himself, when the War of 1812 put an end to his business activities for a time. Enlisting and going to the front he rendered valiant service to his country. After the close of the war he resumed his trade, and followed it for some time in his own State. The rapid growth of the Middle West later decided him to break home ties, and take up his residence in Indiana. Here he found a good business opening in the little town of Terre Haute, and settling there he continued his trade for many years, assisting in building up not only the residences, but many of the public buildings and business places. After many years of fruitful industry he finally retired from active work. He died, while paying a visit to his sister in Jeffersonville, and was buried in Terre Haute. By his marriage there were five children: Enan, who is mentioned below; Mary, who married Mr. Wilson, an engineer of a steam boat; Edwin, a prominent farmer, and stock raiser, of Michigan; Adeline, who married J. Hedgecock; and Lucretia, who never married.

Mr. Smead always evinced an ardent interest in public affairs, and politically he affiliated with the Democrats.

Enan Smead, father of W. H., a blacksmith and farmer by occupation, possessed great energy and marked business ability. Born in Vermont, he there grew to manhood, acquiring habits of industry and thrift, and some valuable practical knowledge of business. He learned the blacksmith's trade, and giving close attention to business, soon became a master of the craft. As a young man he came to Terre Haute, Indiana, and there entered a blacksmith's shop, where he continued his trade for many years. Thorough work and square dealings, won him the confidence of the public, and a steadily increasing patronage. His shop was long one of the most popular establishments of its kind in the vicinity, and here he conducted a highly flourishing business. In 1858 he moved to Michigan, where, settling upon a promising farm, he engaged for about seven years, and then returned to Indiana, and settled at Brazil. He again started a blacksmith's business, and conducting his industry with his usual success he remained here throughout the rest of his business life. During his young manhood Mr. Smead married at Terre Haute, Catherine Hyde, whom death, unfortunately, claimed early. Of this union there were four children: John B., a railroad engineer, met his death from injuries received in an accident, W. H. is mentioned below; Charles A. is a railroad employe; and B. F. is a conductor on the Belt Line. The Methodist Church to which his wife also belonged counted Mr. Smead among its most liberal members and earnest workers, and honored him with many of its offices. His influence carried weight in all circles, and politically he affiliated with the Democrats.

W. H. Smead was born at Terre Haute, Indiana, March 31, 1848, and there passed the first ten years of his life, attending the well established schools of that place for some time. At the end of this period he moved with his parents to Michigan, where, in a pleasant little farming community, he finished his schooling and applied himself for some time to stone masonry. When about seventeen years old he returned with his parents to Indiana, and took up his residence at Brazil, where he remained for some time acquiring valuable knowledge of several lines of business. The rapid development of the railroad industry at this time afforded good business openings, and in 1864 he secured a position as brakeman on a freight train over the Vandalia Line. Close attention to business gained him favor with the company, and in three months time he was promoted to conductor. Continuing to give satisfaction he remained here for several years, and then accepted a position on the J. M. & I. Line, first acting as brakeman, and then as conductor. In the course of a year, however, feeling the need of a change, he went to Michigan and began working at his trade of stone mason. Meeting with success he continued here for about one year, when he returned to Indianapolis, and soon afterward, in December, 1877, took a position as brakeman on the Belt Line. After a short time he was promoted to conductor, a position which he filled very acceptably for three years, when he was promoted to yard master. Skilled in directing affairs, he has continued to give satisfaction, and has remained there ever since. He has made this city his permanent residence since 1877, settling first in West Indianapolis, and later erecting an attractive home on Nordyke avenue, where he has since made his abode.

On Sept. 17, 1885, Mr. Smead married Margaret A. Quinn, who was born in the village of Middletown, County Mayo, Ireland, in September, 1850, and to this union has come one son, Thomas W., born Aug. 4, 1886, and now a most promising student of the railroad business. Mr. Smead has availed himself of every opportunity of acquiring knowledge of his business, and is now one of the best informed men along his line in the employ of the Belt Line. Particularly active in fraternal circles he fills the offices of secretary and treasurer of the Indianapolis Union Railway Benefit Association; is past officer of the P. O. S. of A.; is also a past officer of the I. O. O. F., having filled all the chairs; is a past officer in the Encampment; and is a member in good standing of the I. O. of R. M. In politics he is a strong Democrat, and, though utterly disinclined to office seeking, has, through the merited esteem of his fellow citizens, often been assigned to places of trust and responsibility on the boards of election. His wife is a consistent and worthy member of the Catholic Church.

Edward Quinn, father of Mrs. Smead, lived for the most part in County Mayo, Ireland. He was a man of ability and some means, and followed farming for an occupation. After a long and useful life he died in his native country, in 1891. During his young manhood Mr. Quinn married Ann Ward, of County Mayo, who died in 1895. Of this union there were these children: Bridget married John Brennan, and they came to America and settled at Indianapolis, where after some years she died; Mary, who resides in her native Ireland, has never married; Ellen, who married H. Lohing, who was of German extraction, settled in Indianapolis, Indiana, and there died; Margaret (Mrs. Smead) is mentioned above; Anthony died in Indianapolis; Edward has remained in his native Ireland; and Thomas is a resident of East Chicago, Indiana. Both Mr. and Mrs. Quinn came of prominent Catholic families, were consistent members of that Church, and in that faith reared their children.

H. W. TECKENBROCK, one of the old settlers of Indianapolis, and one who has been prominently identified with the development of various interests in the city, was born at the village of Osnabruck, Province of Hanover, Germany, Dec. 27, 1826, and was reared to the honest pursuits of agriculture.

Harmon and Mary (Overhiser) Teckenbrock, his parents, were both born in Germany, the former in Prussia, and the latter in Hanover. The father was reared in Prussia, leaving in young manhood to escape being pressed into Napoleon's army. Locating in Hanover, he there married, settled on a small rented farm, and remained until all his six children were born, reared and began to find homes for themselves. All his children were born in the same house and there the devoted wife and mother died, and in 1850, with his family, Mr. Teckenbrock started for the United States. Fourteen weeks later found him in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, and he remained there for three years, moving then to Indianapolis and soon after joining two of his sons who were successful farmers in Massac county, Ill. Here his death took place, in 1868, at the age of eighty years. After coming to America he undertook no business as his children made his last days most comfortable. It was a matter of congratulation with him that all of them were well established in life, his greatest ambition having been to educate and rear them carefully, and their success was a source of great comfort to him. He was a most worthy member of the Lutheran Church, a man of sterling integrity and high ideas of honor. His children were as follows: Henry, who was the only member of the family to remain in the old country; Fred, who came to the United States in 1847, lived at Cincinnati and Dayton, Ohio, and later moved to Illinois, where he engaged in farming, and died; Casper, who also died in Illinois; Mary, Mrs. F. Nieman, who died on a farm in Ohio; H. W., of Indianapolis; and Christ H., a prominent citizen of Indianapolis, who has been in the employ of the Vandalia Railroad Company for about fifty years.

H. W. Teckenbrock was reared to manhood in Germany and there was first married. He settled down to farming, but when the family started for America, in 1850, he accompanied them, taking passage on a sailing vessel bound for Baltimore. They were stranded on a sand bar off the coast of Virginia, and in this emergency, the captain chartered a fishing smack, which transferred the women, children and baggage to port, but all who could walk were obliged to tramp for fifty miles through the heavy sand, to Norfolk, Va., where they took a steamer to Baltimore, and thence to Pittsburg and on to Cincinnati. Fourteen weeks had been consumed in this weary journey. In Cincinnati Mr. Teckenbrock accepted the first work he found, the construction of a church steeple, and later he found employment in a plow factory. He remained at Cincinnati until 1854, removing then to Indianapolis, where he became blacksmith's helper in a machine shop. Three weeks later, on account of scarcity of work, he was obliged to seek employment elsewhere, and was then engaged in what was then the Washington Foundry, but later became the Eagle Machine Works. For five months he worked as a blacksmith's helper and then, work again becoming slack, he engaged with the old Cincinnati Railroad Company in the same capacity. Three months later, with a partner, he went into a sawmill business. After six months he sold out and took a position in the freight house of the Vandalia railroad, later being transferred to the shops, where he was first given charge of the stationary engine. There is a lesson in the recital of Mr. Teckenbrock's earnest endeavor to succeed. It was his unflagging industry and his constant perseverance that attracted the attention of employers, who soon saw that he was willing and competent and that his work, whatever it was, would bear inspection. With every employer he parted on the best of terms, and he remained with the Vandalia Company for almost forty years. In 1899 he retired from active labor and is now able to enjoy the fruits of his former industry. Mr. Teckenbrock has been careful and frugal and has invested his money so that he not only owns his own comfortable home but also other properties, which he rents. He is entirely self-made and is one of the honorable and upright citizens of Indianapolis.

In politics Mr. Teckenbrock has been in sympathy with the Democratic party, but he has never cared for political office, enjoying, however, various offices in the I. O. O. F. and also his association with the German Pioneer Society. He was one of the organizers of the German Orphans' Home Society, was on the committee that bought the ground and was very active in gaining the necessary financial aid. For many years he was one of the trustees of that great institution. His broad-minded charity was also shown in his assistance in the organization of the Deaconess Home for Aged People, while his private acts of benevolence are known only to himself and those benefited. Mr. Teckenbrock can recall many interesting events of the early life of this great city, and remembers when some of the closest built portions were commons and given over to pastures or vegetable patches.

The first marriage of Mr. Teckenbrock was to Bandina Delmyre, who was born in Hanover, Germany, and one daughter was born to this union, Menia; she married William Kelemyer, a motorman on the city street railway in Indianapolis, who was born in Germany, came to America in youth with his parents, and was reared on a farm. The mother died in 1851, and in 1852, at Cincinnati, Mr. Teckenbrock married his present wife, who was born in Germany and came to America with her parents, Edward and Christina (Bensman) Lindeman, of Hanover, Germany. They had five children born to them in Germany, and came with their family to America in 1850, on the same vessel as the Teckenbrocks. They settled in Cincinnati, where they remained for nearly forty years, Mr. Lindeman being employed in a stone factory. When too old to continue work, he came to Indianapolis and here both he and wife passed the rest of their days, both dying at the age of eighty-nine years; the mother of Mrs. Teckenbrock preceding her husband to the grave by fifteen months. Their children were: Mrs. Teckenbrock; Frederika, who married Christ H. Teckenbrock, brother of H. W.; Molly, who married H. Rodeburg, who died while serving in the Civil war, leaving two daughters, who are in Indianapolis; Minnie, who became Mrs. Fecken, of Cincinnati; and Louisa, Mrs. Charles E. Smith, of Indianapolis.

A family of six children was born to the second marriage of Mr. Teckenbrock, namely: Edward, who is a painter by trade; Miss Lizzie, who remains at home; three who died young; and Caroline, who married H. Resener, and died leaving two sons, Otto and Henry Resener. The family for many years has been connected with Zion Lutheran Church. Mr. Teckenbrock enjoys the esteem of many friends and can look back, in the evening of life, upon a period of honest industry and feel that he has performed well the duties which have come to him.

JOHN LANDERS was born in Morgan county, Ind., Oct. 14, 1830, a son of William and Delila (Stone) Landers, and grandson of Jonathan Landers.

Jonathan Landers was born in England, of Scotch-Irish ancestry. The black plague destroyed all his family, leaving him alone in the world at the age of twenty years. Coming to Virginia in Colonial times, he fought in the Revolution. When peace returned he again settled in Virginia, where he married a widow, Mrs. Withero, who was possessed of considerable property, which, however, went to the children of her former marriage. Mr. and Mrs. Landers moved to Kentucky, where he followed farming, and in 1820, moving still farther west, became pioneer settlers in Morgan county, Ind. There he entered land which he converted into a good farm, and by industry, thrift and integrity he became wealthy, owning large tracts of land. He was noted as one of the solid and substantial citizens of Morgan county. In politics a Democrat, he had no aspiration for office, but lived and died a plain, honest farmer. He was a member of the Primitive Baptist Church, and was thoroughly honored and respected in the community. His children were as follows: William, the father of John Landers; James, who went to Missouri, where he became a prominent slave holder, his family being on the Confederate side during the Civil war; John, a farmer in Indiana; and Lucy, Mrs. Priest, who died in Iowa.

William Landers was born in Virginia in 1788, and when ten years old accompanied his parents on their removal to Kentucky, then a very new country, where he assisted his father in the cultivation of a small farm. There he was first married, and had a family of five children, all sons. In 1820 all the members of the Landers family in Kentucky removed to Indiana, settling in Morgan county, where about a year later Mrs. William Landers died. The country was still infested with Indians and wild game abounded. William Landers entered land, became a successful farmer, and in time became one of the influential men of the county. In politics he was a strong Democrat, and well known as one of the active workers in the party organization; he was connected with the Martinsville Democrat, which he ran, and which had a large circulation. For many years he was associate judge of Morgan county, and long filled the office of justice of the peace, as well as other positions of honor and trust. A candidate for representative, he was defeated by a small vote on the issue whether the canal should be built in sections or altogether. Taking the latter proposition, he ran counter to the opinion of the public, and suffered defeat. Broad-minded and intelligent, he was well and favorably known throughout his section of the State. His death occurred Oct. 10, 1851. He was survived by all his large family.

William Landers was first married, in Kentucky, to Eva Stone, who was born in that State, a daughter of Nimrod and Sarah (Craig) Stone. Her parents were both born in Virginia, and in an early day moved to Kentucky, in 1820 coming to Morgan county, Ind. Her father was a soldier in the war of the Revolution, and was a wheelwright by trade. In religious matters he was associated with the Primitive Baptist Church, and was a relative of Bartlett Stone, of Kentucky, a reformer of national reputation, and an associate with Alexander Campbell in the establishment of what is commonly known as the Campbellite Church. Nimrod Stone united with the rising church, and became one of the most zealous advocates of the new order, devoting most of his remaining life to its ministry in different parts of Indiana. He was a pure-minded, Christian gentleman, and died in 1844, at the ripe age of eighty-seven years. His children were as follows: Eva, the first wife of William Landers; Nancy, Mrs. Green; Polly, Mrs. Hood; Delila, the second wife of William Landers, and the mother of John; Gabriel, deceased; and John.

The children of William and Eva Landers were: Jonathan, a farmer; Joshua, a farmer and a druggist; William, a farmer; Nimrod, who was a farmer, served in the Mexican war, was a strong and leading Democrat, and died at Lebanon, Indiana; and Jeremiah, a physician.

For his second wife William Landers married Delila Stone, a sister of his first wife and a native of Mercer county, Ky. To this union were born the following children: (1) Washington, died leaving one son. (2) Franklin, who became a man of national reputation, began life as a farmer and school teacher. He dealt in general merchandise at Waverly; platted the town of Brooklyn, where he sold many town lots, and where he conducted a general store; became interested in the wholesale dry-goods business in Indianapolis; for many years did pork packing on a most extensive scale in this city; was a large land owner, farmer, and stockman, dealing extensively in stock, making a specialty of mules. He represented Morgan and Johnson counties in Congress, and was a candidate for governor in 1876, being defeated by A. G. Porter. He was a leader of the Democratic party in the State, and a strong campaigner, being a man of earnest convictions, and the most honest intentions. He died in September, 1901. (3) Sarah became Mrs. C. Vickery. (4) Henry became a farmer. (5) Ibba, died young. (6) John is mentioned further on. (7) Harriet became Mrs. Cox. (8) Jackson, who was at one time the treasurer of Marion county, is now the secretary and treasurer of the Encaustic Tile Works.

John Landers was reared on his father's farm, remaining at home until he reached manhood. For two years he was engaged in a general merchandise business at Waverly, and while there was married. After this he went to farming, at the same time devoting himself to handling stock. In this line he still continues. At one time he was interested in pork packing with his brother, but resumed farming. In 1870 Mr. Landers located in Indianapolis, where he had built a commodious residence, and he now hires his farm work done, still carrying on the farm to suit himself. For years he has been known as one of the leading farmers in White River Valley. In politics he is an uncompromising Democrat, but cherishes no aspirations for official station.

John Landers married Miss Polly A. Jackson, who was born in Marion county, Ind., May 27, 1833, daughter of Eli and Celia (Cook) Jackson. Her parents were from North Carolina, where they were married, and were members of the Society of Friends. They came to Indiana in 1831 and entered land, improving a farm in Marion county, on which Mr. Jackson died in 1835. His widow long survived, and died in Iowa. Their children were as follows: Elizabeth, the wife of Samuel Swope; Joseph, who served in the Civil war, and died in 1898; Jessup, of Nebraska; Sally, Mrs. House, of Iowa; Polly A., the wife of John Landers; and Eli, a farmer in Morgan county.

John and Polly A. Landers have had the following family: Hicklin J., a prominent rice farmer in Louisiana, and a manufacturer of machinery; Laurissa, the wife of Benedict White, a traveling salesman, who died Oct. 21, 1901, leaving her with one son, John Landers White, a member of the Society of the Sons of the Revolution; Louisa, who married George Neff, a business man of Kansas City; Arlina, Mrs. Hendricks, whose husband was a prominent member of the legal profession. The death of Mr. White was the first for many years in the immediate family.

GEORGE W. RYAN, general agent of the State Life Insurance Company, of Indianapolis, an honored survivor of the Civil war, and a prominent and esteemed citizen, was born in Morgan county, Ind., June 21, 1845. His parents, Joel Walker and Caroline Elizabeth (Pottorff) Ryan, were born in Tennessee and Kentucky, respectively, and John Ryan, his paternal grandfather, was a native of Tennessee, of Irish descent. He carried on farming in Tennessee until starting to found a new home in Indiana, where he died, at New Albany, of typhoid fever. He had a family of four sons and one daughter.

George Pottorff, Mr. Ryan's maternal grandfather, was a native of Maryland and an early settler in Jefferson County, Ky., later becoming a pioneer in Morgan county, Ind., where he followed his trade of millwright and general mechanic, also engaging in farming. He took part in the war of 1812. He died at the age of eighty-eight years, leaving a large family.

Joel Walker Ryan, the father of George W., accompanied his widowed mother first to Owen and later to Morgan county, Ind., where he took up government land. Here he married Caroline Elizabeth Pottorff, and four children were born to this union, three sons and one daughter, namely: George W.; John W., of Peoria, Ill.; Elias A., of Cedar Rapids, Iowa; and Jane Elizabeth, the latter dying at about the age of three and one-half years. Mr. Ryan moved to Hendricks county but a short time prior to his death, in 1852, of typhoid fever, at the age of twenty-eight years. He and his wife were consistent members of the Methodist Church. She survived him many years, dying in August, 1888, at the age of sixty-four. She had married again, her second husband being William A. Shoemaker, and to this union were born three sons and one daughter, the survivors being: Anna, the wife of James H. Mason, of Charleston, Ill.; and Henry B., of Indianapolis.

George W. Ryan was reared on a farm and attended the district schools of his locality, later taking an academic course at Mooresville, following which he was engaged some five or six years as a teacher. From 1877 to 1880 he was the able editor of the Martinsville Republican, supporting with his pen the principles for which he fought through almost four years, in the Civil war. At his country's call he enlisted, in 1861, in Company B, 59th Ind. Veteran Volunteer Infantry, serving faithfully three years, nine months, four days, and being mustered out of the army July 22, 1865. Mr. Ryan was the principal musician of his regiment, and participated in the following battles: New Madrid, Island No. 10, the three days' battle with Price and Van Dorn at Corinth, Champion's Hills, Jackson, the charge in the rear of Vicksburg, the siege and surrender of Vicksburg, Missionary Ridge, the Atlanta campaign with all its engagements, and Sherman's march to the sea, and finally marched in the grand review at Washington City. His regiment was then ordered to Louisville, Ky., where with other brave comrades he was honorably discharged.

Upon his return to Morgan county Mr. Ryan resumed farming and teaching in the public schools, and then entered upon his honorable business career. In 1880 he entered the postal department of the government, and there continued for a period of eleven years, residing a part of the time in Indianapolis and a part in Cincinnati, Ohio. After giving up these duties he embarked in the wholesale produce and cold storage business, at Davenport, Iowa, and was so engaged until 1893, when he returned to Indianapolis. In 1896 he became interested in the insurance business, connecting himself with the reliable State Life Insurance Company, of Indiana, and on account of his progressive yet at the same time careful and judicious course was made district manager of this company, for southeastern Indiana, in 1900. Since that time business has materially increased and the company has become better known over a much wider extent of country.

The first marriage of Mr. Ryan, on Aug. 15, 1871, was to Miss Eliza Dunnington, daughter of William Dunnington, whose wife's maiden name was Douglas. One daughter, Edna Gertrude, was born to this union. The death of Mrs. Ryan took place Feb. 24, 1877, when she was about twenty-eight years old. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church. The second marriage of Mr. Ryan occurred Jan. 19, 1882, and was to Miss Laura E. Sweet, daughter of William Sweet, whose wife was a New. No children have been born to this union. The pleasant family residence is located at No. 712 East Twenty-fifth street, Indianapolis, where both Mr. and Mrs. Ryan delight to offer hospitality to their large circle of friends. They are members of the Memorial Presbyterian Church, in which Mr. Ryan is an elder.

In politics Mr. Ryan is a Republican, yet he does not regard partisan control, or party rule, always essential to the public good. He is deeply interested in the perpetuity of a free government by and for the people—a "square deal"—as against monopoly, plutocracy and aristocracy. For these principles he fought first with the sword and then with the pen. Fraternally he is connected with George H. Thomas Post and the Union Veteran Legion. Mr. Ryan is highly esteemed in Indianapolis as a business man and as one of the useful and representative citizens of this city.

JOHN PARK. The Park family is one of the oldest and best known of those in Johnson county, Ind., and a prominent representative of it is John Park, of Franklin, Ind., born in Union township, that county, Jan. 26, 1837, son of Samuel and Palina (Boaz) Park, natives of Kentucky and Virginia, respectively, who were married in Indiana.

Samuel Park was the son of Samuel, Sr., and Martha Park, both of Kentucky, where Samuel, Sr., was a wealthy farmer and slave owner. As early as 1823, the family removed to Indiana, where the father took up land, and commenced to improve a farm in Johnson county, but he died in 1825. During his residence in Kentucky, he was prominently identified with the best interests of the community, and he and his family were members of the Presbyterian Church. His wife survived him many years and was one of the noble, pioneer women of the county. Her religious interest was very strong, and she taught the first Sunday School ever held in White River township. During the many years which followed, she had the pleasure of seeing the good seeds she had sown under many privations and difficulties, blossom and bear precious fruit. The children born to Samuel and Martha Park were: William, Harriett; Isabell; Samuel; Martha and Jane.

Samuel Park, son of Samuel, Sr., was born about 1804, and was in the neighborhood of eighteen years of age, when the family came to Indiana. The remainder of a useful and happy life he spent in the confines of this State, bravely doing his part in sustaining the government and upbuilding one of the greatest commonwealths of the nation. His death occurred in August, 1878, and he is still kindly remembered as a hard working, plain farmer, ready and willing to help others and support the principles, first of the Whig, and later of the Republican parties, although he never accepted nomination for office. He and his family were identified with the Christian Church. His first wife, who died in 1840, was Palina, daughter of Daniel Boaz, of Virginia, who came to Indiana in 1822, settling in White River township, Johnson Co., Ind., and becoming prominent in that locality. Mr. Boaz was a worthy farmer and trusted and respected public official, serving eight years as justice of the peace, and four years as county judge, firmly establishing himself in the confidence of the people. His children were: Palina, mother of John Park; Palma, Harrison and John. The children born to Samuel and Palina Park were as follows: William; Francis; Martha; Daniel and John. Mr. Park's second marriage was blessed with these children: Jane, Billipps, Mariah, Rebecca, Mary, Alexander, Josephine, Sarah and Harriet.

John Park was three years of age when his mother died, and he was reared by his step-mother, whom he learned to love dearly, and he remained at home with his father until he reached his majority, when he began life for himself, working by the month as a farm hand. When twenty-four years of age, he settled on rented land, there remaining until 1873, when he purchased 100 acres, and on it still makes his home. When he entered into possession of the farm, about eighty-five acres were cleared, and there was upon it a small frame house. Since then he has cleared off the remaining acres, and built substantial barns, outbuildings, a comfortable home, and brought his land into a fine state of cultivation. This home is conveniently located about two miles south of Stones Crossing, in White River township, and he has long been prominently identified with the farming interests of that township. Mr. Park remembers many entertaining incidents of pioneer life in this locality, which he relates to his numerous friends.

In 1861, he married Miss Mary Sell, born in White River township, daughter of David Sell, of Ohio, an influential and honored pioneer of Johnson county, who improved a fine farm, upon which he lived and died, the father of the following children: Michael; Martha; Nicholas; Mary; Hester and Sarah. By his first wife, Mr. Park had these children: Nellie, who died young; Charles; William; Samuel and Fred. This wife and mother died in 1882, a devoted member of the Christian Church. In 1883, he married for his second wife, Julia Carnine, a lady of intelligent refinement, born in Union township, Johnson county, Oct. 1, 1856, daughter of Nicholas Carnine and Mary C. Gilmore, natives of Kentucky, and esteemed pioneers of Johnson county, who are now living full of years and happy in the love and devotion of their children, which were as follows: Margaret, Mrs. Bounty; Sally, Mrs. Roberts; Julia, Mrs. Park; Stephen; James; Adeline; Benjamin and Charles. The father was a staunch Democrat, but never aspired to office. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Park, Bell, now Mrs. A. Darl. Mr. and Mrs. Park are consistent members of the Christian Church. In his political opinions Mr. Park adheres to the principles of the Democratic party, although he has never aspired to office.

ADAM HELM, an honored citizen of Indianapolis, residing at No. 529 Jefferson avenue, has for many years prominently identified himself with the business interests of that city, having been a leading building contractor there since the early days. As such he has assisted in the erection of many of the handsome residences of the city, as well as of some business blocks. Being now over eighty-seven years old, he has long ago retired from active work.

Mr. Helm comes of good German stock. His father, Adam H. Helm, a stonemason by trade, came of an old and prominent Protestant family of Germany, and was born in Amt Osnabruck, Kingdom of Hanover. Under the influence of the advanced institutions of his native land he received good rearing and, possessed of inherent ability for handicrafts, early began learning the trade of stonemason. Becoming proficient in his line, as a young man he continued that occupation, following it for some years in his own country. A competent and thorough workman, he always procured steady work and commanded good wages. Soon after reaching manhood he married in Germany, Mary A. Balsmire, also of Osnabruck, Hanover, a descendant of a fine old Protestant family of that section, and of this union there have been five children, all of whom evinced much force of character, and, coming to the United States, have here found good homes for themselves. Adam is mentioned below. Henry is a retired stonemason of Indianapolis. John, who came to this country with his brother Adam in 1841, learned the tailor's trade in Cincinnati, and when the Mexican war broke out he enlisted and went to the front; later he was engaged in the grocery business in Indianapolis, and he died in Cincinnati, in 1900, meeting his death through an accident. Catherine married a Mr. Blochsterdt, and resides in Indianapolis. Caroline is the wife of J. Ray, of Cincinnati.

After marriage, Mr. Helm, the father of Adam, took up his residence in the Kingdom of Hanover, where he continued the pursuit of his trade. A hard worker and a good manager, he provided a good home for himself and family and started his children on the road to success in life. As some of them—Adam and John—had already come to this country in 1847 he with the rest of the family set out for the United States, where he soon joined his son Adam in Cincinnati. Here, finding a splendid opening for his trade, he carried on a highly prosperous business for some time. In 1854, induced by his sons

Adam and Henry to move to Indianapolis, he settled in that place and there he afterward made his home. For some years he continued his trade of stonemason, but finally, with approaching age, he engaged in lighter kinds of work, doing little odd pieces that chance opened up for him. He lived to the advanced age of seventy-six years, and died in 1862. His wife passed away in 1858, at the age of sixty-four years. Mr. Helm was a typical middle-class German, industrious, conscientious and far-sighted. He was an excellent workman, and aimed to perfect every piece of work that fell to his lot. Reared in the Protestant faith, he and his wife were consistent and highly respected members of the Lutheran Church.

Adam Helm, whose name heads this sketch, was born in Schleddehausen, Hanover, Germany, Feb. 18, 1820, and there in a rural community grew to manhood, receiving good training in agriculture and forming habits of industry and self-reliance of value to him in later years. For several years he attended the well-conducted schools of his locality, and there laid the foundation of a solid education. Under the careful oversight of good parents he was early set to learning the carpenter's trade, for which he evinced much inherent ability, and by close attention to details he after a time became a proficient workman in that line. Impressed with the advantages of a Republican form of government, and of the many desirable openings in all branches of industry in this country, in 1841, when about twenty-one years old, he and his brother John broke home ties, and came to America, settling first in Bartholomew county, Ind., where an uncle of his resided. After about nine months, however, spent largely in acquainting himself with his new environments, he came to Cincinnati, where he at once found good openings in carpentry. Steady work and frugal habits enabled him to save enough money in time to assist his father and other members of the family in coming to America, and in 1847 they joined him in Cincinnati. Continuing to prosper in his business he remained here until 1853. During this period—1846—he married Charlotte Runge, who was born in Schellenberg, Germany. Her father was Henry Runge, a letter carrier of that country and assistant to a nobleman, who came from Hanover in the early days, and settled in Cincinnati, where he worked as a day laborer. Later he settled in Richmond, Ind., and there he died. His children were: William, now a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio; Louis, a resident of Richmond, Ind.; and Charlotte, who is mentioned above. Mrs. Charlotte Helm died in 1854 in Indianapolis, and in 1855 Mr. Helm married Maria E. Kokomiller, who was born on a farm in Auglaize county, Ohio, Sept. 26, 1836, and who died Jan. 22, 1906. By the first marriage there were two children: Anna, who married Joseph Afterheide; and John, who is a carpenter in Indianapolis. By the second marriage there were three children: George, a carpenter by trade, now assistant clerk at the Atkins Saw Factory in Indianapolis; Edward, a bookkeeper and cashier at the branch office of the Atkins Saw Works in Minneapolis, Minn.; and Sarah, who married E. J. Fellman, of the Milwaukee Phoenix Manufacturing Company. Adam Helm has five great-grandchildren, descendants of the children of his first marriage.

In 1853 Mr. Helm moved to Indianapolis, where, finding most desirable openings in his line, he soon rose to the position of contract builder. Highly efficient work and promptness in filling orders won him patrons from the start, and he soon had all the business he could possibly attend to. A man of push, he assisted in the promotion of many local enterprises, and he took a strong hand in the organization of the Carpenters' Union and in 1870 he became one of the original stockholders of that company, which built the extensive planing-mill and manufacturing buildings. For some time he acted as director of this company, and superintended the management of the lumber yard. Then, in 1873, during the business panic, he sold his stock, though at a discount. Taking up his old industry of carpentry and building he continued it steadily until 1890, when he retired from active work. On the whole he has been exceptionally prosperous, and now has a good income to maintain himself through life's declining years.

Mr. Helm is in every respect a self-made man, having won his place in life entirely through his own efforts. Reared a Lutheran, he adhered strictly to the teachings of that church until 1882, filling at different times many important offices. He transferred his membership to the First Baptist Church and later to the Woodruff Place Baptist Church, to which he now belongs. On the political questions of the day he has kept himself well informed, and at first affiliated with the Democrats, later with the Republicans, now espousing the cause of the Prohibitionists.

Henry Kokomiller, father of Mrs. Maria E. Helm, was born in Hanover, Germany, and in that region passed many years of his life. Hoping to better his prospects after some years of business activity, he came to the United States, and procured a tract of wild land, in Auglaize county, Ohio, where he settled and began making improvements. He had erected comfortable buildings and made a good start when death, in 1838, cut short his activities. While in Germany he married Louisa Sherer of the Kingdom of Hanover. She died in this country in 1835. Of this union there were five children, most of whom were quite young when the parents died: Henrietta, the oldest, who found homes for herself and brothers and sisters in Cincinnati, married C. Russie, a stonemason and contractor; she died in Indianapolis. Henry died of the cholera in New Bremen, Auglaize Co., Ohio, in 1848. Fred, who became a sailor and afterward served through the Civil war, settled in Indianapolis and died there. Caroline (Mrs. Henry Helm) died in 1892. The parents were good Christians and consistent members of the Lutheran Church.

CHARLES E. SWAIN, a reliable business man of Pendleton, Ind., who is serving his second term as commissioner of Madison county, was born Jan. 28, 1844, in Newton, Bucks Co., Pa., son of Charles W. and Sarah (Schofield) Swain, and a descendant of Abraham Swain, who came from England to this country at a very early day.

Charles W. Swain, the father, who learned the trade of hatter in Philadelphia, carried on that business in Dublin, Wayne county, for five years, and then removed, about 1852 to Fall Creek township, where he purchased eighty acres of land, which he improved, and added thereto until at the time of his death he owned 170 acres. In his later days he removed to Pendleton, intending to live retired from active life. In March, 1867, he went to Dublin, Wayne county, to attend the quarterly meeting of the Friends Society and died while there. He was a prominent Friend or Quaker, and his wife an eloquent Quaker preacher. Mrs. Swain was born between Alexandria and Washington, Va., daughter of Jonathan and Eleanor Schofield. Five children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Swain, namely: Mary E., Caroline, Anna, Joseph and Charles E.

Charles E. Swain was but three years of age when he was brought by his parents to Indiana. He was educated in the district school and Dublin Academy, in Wayne county. He worked on his father's farm when a boy, and when still quite young became a clerk in a dry goods store at Elwood. He lived at home until he was twenty-two years of age, and was married near Pendleton, Nov. 15, 1865, to Margaret S. Brown, born near Richmond, Ind., April 29, 1845, daughter of Elwood and Mary Ann (Smith) Brown, the former born in New Jersey of Welsh descent.

After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Swain settled on a farm belonging to his father near Pendleton, and at the time of his father's death he purchased eighty acres of this land, his brother buying the other ninety acres. On this land he resided until 1874, when he removed to the Newcastle Pike, three miles east of Pendleton, where he bought 160 acres of Elwood Brown, his father-in-law. In 1900 he located in Pendleton, and was soon thereafter elected a member of the board of commissioners of Madison county, a position he has since held. In political matters Mr. Swain is a Republican. He is one of Pendleton's good citizens, and is highly regarded by the people of his community. To Mr. and Mrs. Swain children were born as follows: Edwin H., Elwood B., Elnora B., Walter A., and William N. and George H., twins.

JOHN S. GILBREATH, a well-known and much respected citizen of Indianapolis, and a survivor of the Civil war, is a descendant of North Carolina people of worth and prominence. His birth took place Feb. 23, 1833, in Guilford county, N. C., and he is a son of Jesse and Hester A. (Willoughby) Gilbreath.

Robert Gilbreath, his great-grandfather, was a native of Scotland, and his wife was of Irish birth. They came to America and settled near Greensboro, N. C., where he became a prominent farmer, reared his family, and died in the Methodist faith. He was three times married, and by the first union had three sons, viz.: Thomas, who settled in North Carolina; Robert, who settled in Ohio and became a prominent farmer; and John, who settled in Tennessee, where he became a large planter and reared a large family. His children by his second marriage were William, Joseph, James, Katie and Polly.

Thomas Gilbreath, grandfather of John S. Gilbreath, was born in North Carolina, married Mary McCullough, also of that state, and settled on a farm there, where all his children were born and partially reared. In 1851 he moved to Indiana and located in Henry county, dying on his farm there in 1864. In addition to being a farmer he was a wagon-maker. On political questions he was first a Whig, later a Republican. In all the relations of life he was an honest, upright man and possessed the confidence and respect of all who knew him. His children were: Jesse; John; Robert; Mrs. Abigail Howern; and Mrs. Irena Camplin, now ninety-one years old, who is the mother of thirteen children and a very worthy member of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. Members of the Gilbreath family belonged in early times to the general State militia and attended the general musters.

Jesse Gilbreath was born in 1808 in North Carolina, where he was twice married and where all his children were born. He was a wagonmaker by trade, and followed the same many years, living in different localities. In 1851, assisted by his sons, he came to Indiana and located at Greensboro, Henry county, where he followed his trade and did some farming also, remaining there the rest of his life. He was a plain, honest mechanic and farmer, and always supported his family in comfort, but it is said that he was too charitable to leave any very large estate to his heirs. In politics he was first a Whig and later a Republican. In early life he was a Wesleyan Methodist, but later he accompanied his second wife to the Quaker meetings, she being a member of the Society of Friends. Jesse Gilbreath possessed many very estimable characteristics and was always found ready to help the sick and afflicted. His death took place in 1876, while he was on a visit in Indianapolis, at the home of his son John. His first marriage, which took place in 1830 in his native State, was to Hester A. Willoughby, who was born in Maryland, and in 1834 they moved to Georgia, where she died in 1835. He then returned to his old home. The three children of this marriage were: Thomas W., born in 1831, who came to Indiana in 1851, and died in 1861; John S., and Mary M., Mrs. Elliott.

The mother was a Wesleyan Methodist. Jesse Gilbreath's second marriage was to Sarah Mendenhall, daughter of Joseph Burcham, who was of English descent, a farmer, carpenter and trader, well known in North Carolina, where he died on his homestead in 1845. He was a Friend in religious observance. His children were: Sarah, born June 19, 1808, and Shepard, both of whom died in Indiana; Mrs. Mary Bowman; Reuben, who died in Missouri; Mrs. Lydia Knight; Mrs. Betsey Smith; and William, who came to Indiana in 1853 and served in the war of the Rebellion. The children born to this second marriage were five in number, as follows: Mrs. Emley Jane Rose; Mrs. Caroline Hardin; Mrs. Lydia Forbes; and Robert (of Charlottesville, Ind.) and J. F. (a prominent citizen of Indianapolis), who were both soldiers in the Civil war. The mother of these children died in 1878. She was reared in and always attended the Friends Church. All the children of both marriages are living with the exception of Thomas; the oldest is seventy-four, the youngest sixty years old.

In 1851 the two eldest sons of Jesse Gilbreath, Thomas and John S., tired of agricultural life in North Carolina and decided to venture into the West and seek their fortunes. Their means were limited, and they walked the whole distance of 550 miles, making the journey in thirteen days and joining an uncle in Fayette county. John S. was then eighteen years of age and full of energy and hope. He had been reared to agricultural pursuits and received a district school education. Soon after he arrived in Indiana he obtained work as a farm hand at $10 a month, saved his earnings, and bought a team of horses and a wagon, with which he went back to North Carolina to move his father and family to Indiana. In that year—1851—he had the satisfaction of seeing them comfortably located in Henry county. In the spring of 1852 he rented a farm which he operated for two years, in the spring of 1854 removing to Iowa. There he remained, in a transportation business, until 1856, when he returned to Henry county, Ind., and after doing some trading bought a shingle factory, which he conducted two years. He then embarked in a mercantile business at Raysville, which he continued for one season, later moving the goods to Carthage, where he remained until 1862, when he sold out and enlisted in the 19th Indiana Battery. He was mustered into the service at Indianapolis and served under General Thomas in the Army of the Tennessee, later being one of the victorious soldiers who made the memorable march under General Sherman to the sea; at the same time he was a spy, and at times marched in the Confederate ranks. Mr. Gilbreath served until the war closed. At one time he was detailed as a scout, was always on the skirmish line, and during the whole campaign was under fire, participating in many hotly contested battles. Although he escaped without being wounded he was injured in handling an ammunition chest and hurt his back, never fully recovering. He did not go into a hospital, but was kindly cared for in the home of a friend and by his comrades, later being given a furlough of four months at home. During this time he was detailed to take charge of a ward in the city hospital, but later joined his command at Munciesboro as quartermaster, acting in that capacity until he was detailed as scout when the great march began. In February, 1865, he was commissioned second lieutenant. He was at Goldsboro, N. C., when General Johnston surrendered to General Sherman, and later participated in the triumphal review at Washington City. In June, 1865, he received his honorable discharge and sergeant's pay at Indianapolis.

Mr. Gilbreath again engaged in a mercantile business, at Knightstown, but in 1873 he came to Indianapolis and located in the residence he still occupies, on East Eleventh street. Here he engaged in carpentering and contracting and built many of the residences, business blocks and factories which still stand as monuments to his skill. He built the Nordyke & Marmon factory and many others. A severe attack of rheumatism caused him to change his activities in some lines and he entered into trading, handling horses and cattle, being the first man to bring Jersey cattle from Connecticut to Indianapolis. In 1884 he entered into a livery business on St. Clair street, which he later transferred to the rear of his residence, where he continued until his large boarding stable burned. Since that time Mr. Gilbreath has been active in many ways, trading, buying and selling real estate, keeping busy and quietly accumulating means. He is a strong Republican, and in all national questions submits to the will of his party, but in local affairs he votes independently. He is a valued comrade in the G. A. R. and the Union Veteran Legion.

In 1853 Mr. Gilbreath married Miss Anna Bowman, who was born in October, 1836, in Henry county, Ind., daughter of Jesse and Mary (Burcham) Bowman, both of whom were of North Carolina, and came to Indiana in 1833, entering land and settling among the pioneers of Henry county, where they improved a fine farm. Jesse Bowman was a son of William Bowman and a grandson of Richard Bowman, who came from England at an early day. He was a member of the Society of Friends. William Bowman's wife was a daughter of William Workman, a prominent friend of North Carolina. Jesse Bowman and his father moved together to Indiana in 1833 and together entered land.

The children of William Bowman were: Annis, Mrs. Benjamin Henshaw; Edmond; Richard; Rebecca, Mrs. J. Hiatt; William; Sarah, Mrs. B. Norton; George; Jesse; and Anna, Mrs. S. Stanley. In 1841 Jesse Bowman died, leaving his widow with six children, namely: Lucinda, Mrs. E. Elliott; William, who died at Indianapolis in 1900; Anna, wife of John S. Gilbreath; Shepherd, of Knightstown; Caroline, Mrs. G. Bundy; and Lydia, Mrs. B. Hill. The mother married for her second husband Obediah Elliott, a prominent early settler, and four children were born to this union, namely: Charles, Jessie, Frank and Gulie (Mrs. N. Biers).

Four children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Gilbreath: Jessie, who died in infancy while the family lived in Iowa; Sarah, who died at the age of six years; Ida L., wife of William Carlin, of the music house of Carlin & Co.; and Harry A., a salesman and piano repairer, who is married and well settled in life. Mr. and Mrs. Gilbreath are members of the Central Avenue Methodist Church. Mr. Gilbreath enjoys universal esteem. He has an honorable war record and has proved himself a patriotic and public-spirited citizen.

JAMES S. MERRILL. The Buckeye State has given to Indiana many of the latter's best residents and most progressive citizens, and among these may be classed the Merrill family.

Among the representatives of the family was the late James S. Merrill, whose home was in Fortville, Hancock county, but who was born on the Mad river, between Bellefontaine and Sidney, in Clark county, Ohio, Jan. 27, 1827. His parents, John and Nancy (Gardner) Merrill, were natives of Indiana, where they were married June 23, 1822, but spent their prime in Ohio, where the mother died about 1834, when James S. Merrill was seven years old. She had borne her husband seven children, five of whom grew to maturity, the record of this family being as follows: (1) Lucinda, born March 20, 1823, married Thomas Brevard, and died near Keokuk, Iowa, leaving two daughters. (2) Hulda, born Nov. 5, 1824, married Emanuel Amack, and moved to Hendricks county, Ind. She died leaving six children, three sons and three daughters. (3) Joseph, born Feb. 2, 1826, died in infancy. (4) James S. was born Jan. 27, 1827. (5) John was born April 20, 1829. (6) William, born Aug. 14, 1831, served a term in an Iowa regiment during the Civil war. He married Susannah Shull, by whom he had one daughter. He subsequently married again, and he died in Nebraska, leaving a large family. (7) Anna, born Sept. 8, 1833, married Nathan Allen, and settled near Sidney, Ohio. She left a family of five children, four sons and one daughter, who still live near Sidney.

For his third wife John Merrill married, in Ohio, Louisa Allen, and to them were born five children, one son and four daughters, Perry, Mary, Elizabeth, Abigail and Eudora. Three daughters lived to maturity and married in Iowa. John Merrill's first wife, Elizabeth Alexander, daughter of Joseph Alexander, died in Franklin county, Ind., leaving one child, Charity.

John Merrill was born in Franklin county, Ind., on the old family homestead, and there grew to manhood and remained until just after his second marriage, to Nancy Gardner, who it is believed was born in Franklin county. They immediately moved to Ohio, settling in the Mad river country, between Bellefontaine and Sidney—probably in Clark county, and there Mr. Merrill remained for sixteen or eighteen years. Coming back to Indiana after his long residence in Ohio, Mr. Merrill settled in Whitley county, where he remained until his death, which occurred there in 1848-49. He was a farmer and carpenter, and a man of such decided mechanical ability that it was said he could make anything "from a fiddle to a saw-mill," being able to make many of the wood and iron utensils generally used by the pioneers. He built houses and barns, and also mills, erecting a saw and flouring mill on the banks of a creek, in Champaign county, Ohio.

The Merrill family is of Scottish extraction, Joseph Merrill, the grandfather of James S. Merrill, having been born in Scotland, whence he came to America before his marriage. He settled in the woods near Brookville, Franklin Co., Ind., entering a farm of eighty acres which he cleared from the heavy timber and improved, and upon which he passed the remainder of his life, dying in middle age. He was one of the first settlers in that region, the Indians being still here when he came, and he was a good type of the pioneer citizen, hard-working, thrifty and straightforward, with the ruggedness characteristic of the race from which he sprang. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. He and his wife Charity had but one child, John, the father of James S. Merrill, born Feb. 26, 1804.

The Gardner family, to which Mrs. Nancy (Gardner) Merrill belonged, migrated to Indiana from Vermont, settling in Franklin county, where John Merrill and Nancy Gardner were married. The family has been well known from Colonial times in New York, and in fact all over New England. The Gardiners of Gardiner, Maine, were people of worth and prominence in Colonial times and settled early along the Kennebec river. Another branch of distinction is found in the Gardiners of Gardiner's Island, New York, who had a coat of arms and a title. The family is of English origin, and the following account will be of interest as showing the important part its various members have played in the history of the country.

Lion (or Lyon) Gardiner was a military engineer born in England in 1599, and died in Easthampton, N. Y., in 1663. He was an officer in the English army and served in the Netherlands. While in the Netherlands he was employed by Hugh Peters and other Englishmen to enter the service of a company of lords and gentlemen, the proprietors of a tract of land at the mouth of the Connecticut river, and was to serve that company four years. He was to draw plans for a city, town and forts in the locality, and was to have 300 able-bodied men under his control. He arrived in Boston Nov. 28, 1635. There the authorities requested him to draft designs for a fort, which he did, and a committee was appointed to supervise the erection of the work, and each citizen of Boston was compelled to contribute two days' labor. After the completion of this work Lion Gardiner sailed for his destination and built Fort Saybrook, named in honor of Lords Saye and Sele and Brooke. He stayed at the fort four years during the Pequot war. In 1639 he purchased from the Indians Manchnonat, which he named the Isle of Wight, but which since has become best known as Gardiner's Island. This was the first English settlement within the present boundaries of New York State. Mr. Gardiner married Mary Wilmonson, July 10, 1635, and their son, David, born at Saybrook, was the first white child born in Connecticut. His daughter, Elizabeth, born on the Isle of Wight, was the first white child born in New York. The original grant by which Mr. Gardiner acquired his proprietary rights in the island made it a separate and independent "plantation" in no way connected with either New England or New York. He had power to draft laws for church and state, observing the forms, so ran the instrument, "agreeable to God, to the king and to the practicing of the country." Several other patents were subsequently issued, the last by Governor Dongan, erecting the island into a lordship and manor to be called "Gardiner's Island," giving Lion Gardiner full power to hold "court leet and court baron, distrain for rents, exercise the rights of advowson," etc. The island is now a part of Easthampton, Suffolk Co., N. Y., and is nine miles long and a mile and a half wide, containing about 3,300 acres. Lion Gardiner was a man of sterling qualities and acquired the esteem of all with whom he came in contact.

The island was entailed on the first male heirs of the Gardiner family, and was never to be alienated. These conditions were observed to the close of the eighteenth century, David Johnson Gardiner, the eighth lord of the manor (deceased in 1829), being the last to receive the property by entail. John Griswold Gardiner, his brother, ninth lord, died unmarried and intestate in 1861. Samuel Buel Gardiner, third brother, purchased the interest of his sister, Mrs. Sarah Deodate Thompson, and became the tenth. At his death the island was left to his eldest son, David Johnson, as eleventh lord. It was owned by the latter's brother in 1887. This is the only illustration of the practical working of the law of primogeniture in this country, covering so long a period. During the life of John, the third owner, the island was visited by Captain Kidd, who deposited treasures there which were secured by Governor Bellomont after Kidd's death.

During the Revolutionary war the island and bay were made a rendezvous by the British, and again in the war of 1812. In 1869 it was the rallying point of an expedition intended to liberate Cuba from the Spanish yoke.

David Gardiner, only son of Lion, was sent to England to be educated. He married June 4, 1657, Mary Lungman, and had John, David, Elizabeth and Lyon. Each of these children married and had large families.

Major Josiah Gardner married Catherine Fenton, and had four sons and two daughters. The sons were: Asher, Adolphus, Roswell and Parley. Major Josiah Gardner was one of Washington's staff during the Revolutionary war, and was a pensioner of Massachusetts. A number of his descendants live in Wyoming, New York.

Thomas Gardner came from Dorsetshire, England, in 1624.

John Gardner, colonist, was admitted a freeman in Newport, R. I., in 1722. From 1732 to 1737 he was an assistant and while so engaged was one of a committee appointed by New York, New Jersey, Rhode Island and Nova Scotia to settle disputes between New Hampshire and Massachusetts in regard to their boundary lines. In 1741 he was appointed general assistant with John Cranston and Hezekiah Carpenter to ascertain if two additional companies could be raised for the defense of the Colony, and to put the fort on Goat Island in proper condition to protect the port. He had the rank of colonel, and in 1744 was appointed commissary general. In 1743 he was elected general treasurer and held that office until 1748, when he was again chosen assistant. He was deputy governor for one year, 1754. The next year Jonathan Nichols, Jr., was chosen deputy governor, but died before his term expired, and John Gardner was elected to fill his place. This office he held until he died. In 1757 he was chief justice of the Supreme court, to which was added that of assizes and general jail delivery. He died in January, 1764, at the age of sixty-nine years.

George Warren Gardner, clergyman, born in Pomfret, Vt., Oct. 8, 1828, graduated from Dartmouth in 1852. He attended the New London (N. H.) Institution from 1853 to 1861, was ordained in 1858, and in November, 1861, was installed pastor of the First Baptist Church, Charlestown, Mass. In 1872 he was corresponding secretary of the American Baptist Missionary Union; 1876-78 pastor of the Baptist Church at Cleveland, Ohio; 1881-85 president of the Central University, Iowa; during 1870 visited Europe, Palestine and Greece. In 1867 he received the degree of D. D. from Dartmouth College.

To return to the Merrills: From Franklin county James S. Merrill came to Hancock county in 1837, with his uncle, Archibald Gardner, a pioneer farmer of Franklin county, who took him and his sister Hulda upon their mother's death. Mr. Gardner moved to Vernon township, Hancock Co., Ind., where he took up his home on a forty-acre tract which had a one-room log cabin by way of dwelling. The family occupied same for about a year, until Mr. Gardner put up a hewed-log house of two stories. A few years later he sold this place of forty acres and bought eighty acres adjoining, upon which he moved, and which he cleared with the help of his nephew, Mr. Merrill. In the work of clearing the land from the heavy timber, and other employment incidental to rural life in those days, the boy became a skillful woodsman and well prepared for his own career. He received little schooling, as the schools of those days were none too good at the best, and he could attend only a few months during the winter season, when his services were not required at home. The neighboring schoolhouse was a typical structure of round logs, with puncheon floor and seats, and lighted by an opening in the logs covered with greased paper. It will be seen that Mr. Merrill was for the most part necessarily self-educated, and he did not neglect opportunities, reading good books and observing intelligently the details of practical business transactions until he became a well-informed man on many topics. At the age of nineteen he started out to make his own way, beginning as a farm hand. His wages ranged from $10 to $13 per month during the busy season. That same year, 1846, he was also with a party of surveyors, carrying the chain, on the line of the Big Four road, then known as the Bee Line. In 1847 he bought the tract of eighty acres upon which he afterward made his home, near Fortville, Hancock county. Not a stick of the heavy timber had been cut, and the trees were so close he could not see out a hundred yards from the road. He cleared up a small patch upon which he put up the usual log cabin, a structure of hewed logs 18x33 feet in dimensions, and commenced what would have seemed to many a hopeless task. But industry and well-directed energy brought their reward, and he added to his original place until he owned a fine place of 240 acres, all under cultivation and highly improved. Mr. Merrill was frugal and thrifty, and in the early days, like his neighbors, he had few aids in the rough work of clearing, but he was nevertheless interested in labor-saving machinery after it was introduced, and always felt that it was economy to provide himself with everything in the way of necessary machinery that he could afford. Thus he brought into the country the first separator and threshing machine, and also the first twine binder in his township; he bought and used the first improved cultivator, and he added to his stock of machinery as necessity demanded and invention permitted. New and practical improvements always met with encouragement from him.

There are few phases of pioneer life in Ohio and Indiana with which he was not familiar. He resided at his late home in Vernon township, Hancock county, from 1847 until his death, and he deserved to be called one of the first citizens of the locality for many reasons. Settling here in pioneer days, when a bare living had to be fairly wrested from the soil, he was a party to all the progressive movements which made the region what it is to-day, a prosperous agricultural section, with all the modern accessories which make the lot of the up-to-date farmer a truly enviable one. Mr. Merrill worked hard and won success, but he nevertheless found much opportunity for enjoyment in life, and though he never took any specially active part in public affairs he was foremost in promoting enterprises for the public welfare. Almost every project for the advancement or improvement of the community received his hearty support and co-operation, and he was at the head of many undertakings which proved of inestimable benefit.

Mr. Merrill was probably one of the most extensive explorers, excursionists and prospectors that ever lived in Hancock county, and had the only museum, self-collected, in the State, of which further mention will be made later on. The reminiscences of Mr. Merrill are so interesting and so vivid touching his early life in Indiana that it may be well to introduce them here in almost his own language: "My first recollections of Vernon township are as follows: My uncle, Archibald Gardner, settled on what is now known as the Greenfield & Noblesville road, about three-quarters of a mile northeast of where Fortville now stands. At that time there were only three houses between Greenfield and the site of Fortville, and these had small pieces of ground cleared around them. The country was quite a wilderness round and about, and no one could see any distance into the woods on account of the intervening spice bushes and grubs, but there were several houses scattered along Lick and Fall creeks. We had to depend on the small farms on the creeks for our grain and other supplies for several years, and had to go to the settlements along the creek to secure patches of cleared land on which to raise our corn or a little crop of flax, which we would pull up and spread on the ground to cure; then take it up and bind in sheaves; then stack it until the fall rains came in; then spread it down on some clean ground to rot. We prefer to get a pasture or meadow field to spread flax on, so as to keep straw or hay out of it, as straw would not rot as flax would. When the flax was properly rotted, we took it up, bound it in sheaves and put away. During the winter we would build a scaffold and kindle a fire under it to thoroughly dry the flax, which was spread on the top of the structures. This would cause the flax to break easily. After it was broken it was cleaned by a process called scutching, and after all the refuse was beaten out of it it was taken through another process called hackling, which separated the flax from the tow proper. The women then took the flax and tow and spun from the flax a fine, smooth thread, which was called chain. The tow was spun into a coarse thread which was called filling. These were woven into a cloth, called flax and tow cloth, which was converted into wearing apparel for Sunday use, and for a fine dress the yarn was colored with copperas and indigo, which would make yellow and blue. This work was all done by the women, who would make their dresses striped in blue, yellow and white, but if one was fortunate enough to secure a calico dress she was clad in 'store clothes' and was something above the ordinary. The coarser tow was also spun into a thread and woven into a cloth for every-day wear. The boys, who were very hard on their clothes, wore buckskin, and when their pants were wet and dried again they would be stiff enough to stand alone.

"When we had cattle to sell, we received for a three-year-old steer, in good flesh, from five to eight dollars, and about 1835 a Mr. Stewart Fawcett bought a large drove of hogs for $.75 per hundredweight, drove them to Cincinnati and came back bankrupt. He compromised with his neighbors by paying, in part, in canal State scrip, which was worth only thirty or forty cents on the dollar, and used only in payment for State taxes. Fawcett's neighbors sympathized with him in his trouble and helped him to pull through. In those days, when we raised any wheat we cut it with the reap-hook or sickle, as it was called. When we threshed it we had to clean off grass in a circular form about forty feet across and then lay the wheat in the center, the head all up; collect all the neighbors' horses, put them two abreast and a boy on every pair to guide them, and keep them on the wheat, while it took a man or two to stir the grain while the horses stamped it out. When this was done the straw was pitched off and the same process was gone over again, until the threshing was completed. Then the cleaning process was commenced. Two men would take a sheet—one at each end—and with a hand aloft each opposite corner would make wind enough to blow away the chaff. The wheat was then thrown on a screen by a third man and thus cleaned for the mill or market.

"We generally had biscuits for breakfast Sunday morning; the remainder of the week we had cornbread three times a day, but occasionally mush and milk for supper. Pork and corn dodgers constituted our common diet.

"At times we would make up a wagonload of wheat and get some neighbor who had a four-horse team to haul it to Cincinnati, our nearest market, and give him half the proceeds for hauling the grain and bringing back the value of the other half in salt and leather. The price obtained for wheat at the Ohio river was thirty to forty cents a bushel. When we killed a calf we took the hide to Huntsville, Madison county, where we had it tanned and gave the tanner one-half for his trouble, the leather thus obtained to shoe the family for a year. The shoemaker came to the house with his kit of tools and there made all the boots and shoes for the family. If he or the family failed to have lasts of a proper size the shoemaker would chop out a block from a log and make one.

"Men would cut timber and split rails for twenty-five cents a hundred, and I have known men to cut cordwood, four feet in length, for twelve and a half cents per cord, and I have myself worked for ten dollars a month, in winter.

"In 1839 there were but two Whigs, Archibald Gardner and Thomas McKinsy. The township was always Democratic. I bought the first threshing machine that cleaned wheat for the market in the township in 1854. I introduced the first twine-binder and the first riding breaking-plow and the first riding corn-plow also."

Such were the experiences of one of the earliest pioneers of Hancock county, and in giving this recountal Mr. Merrill gave not only the events which occurred in the early pioneer days of Vernon township as they touched himself and neighbors, but the experience of nineteen-twentieths of the backwoodsmen of Hancock county.

Mr. Merrill in his day traveled extensively, was a careful observer of men and nature, and profited immensely by what he saw. On March 15, 1859, he left Fortville for a trip to Pike's Peak. He reached Leavenworth, Kans., March 27th, thence pursued his way in company with several others by wagon across the prairies, enjoying camp life and caring little for the blizzard that swept over and almost obliterated the landscape. The party reached a point near Manhattan April 1st, laid up for repairs to the "schooners," and while there saw twenty-six wagons pass by, with six mules to each wagon, which belonged to the Russell Express Company, and were loaded with freight for Pike's Peak. Twelve ox-teams, five yoke to each wagon of four thousand pounds capacity, belonging to the same company, also passed by. On this trip Mr. Merrill had much difficulty with buffaloes, which constantly attacked his oxen, as if angered at the latter for having been domesticated, but many a good feast did he enjoy from buffalo "rump" or steak. Antelope also abounded and furnished a palatable meal. Difficulties were frequently encountered in crossing streams and in many cases it required great skill in guiding teams across them. The number of miles traveled each day was ten to fifteen, according as the condition of the so-called roads permitted. When the party camped they had many visits from peaceable Indians, who desired to trade, but gave no particular trouble. The Merrill expedition reached Denver, then a very modest but noted town, June 8, 1859, whence until June 13th it had a rough and weary time over mountain and through gulches in search of "diggings," which were found on the latter date at 2 P. M. Prospecting soon began, but suitable diggings not being available at once and provisions running short Mr. Merrill started in search of another claim, reconciled some little difficulties he had had with the party, and celebrated the 4th of July following by commencing work in a new digging or claim, five of the party taking out amalgam of the value of two dollars and fifty cents. On July 9th there was yielded a return of one dollar for each man. This not proving satisfactory, Mr. Merrill and others sought new fields, and after a bitterly cold trip of twelve days through the mountains another claim was found, which panned out twenty-five dollars the first day. This claim was abandoned Aug. 2d and the party returned to the original camp, where their companions received them with much surprise, as they had been informed by prospectors that all had been killed by the Indians. A few other diggings were worked with similar results. Mr. Merrill started for home Sept. 2, reaching Omaha by river Oct. 12, and there the outfit was sold. Steamboat was the next conveyance, as far as St. Joseph, and the remainder of the journey was made by rail, Fortville being reached Oct. 20. Mr. Merrill made another interesting trip to the West in August, 1895, when he visited the National Park, in the Yellowstone country.

Although the only schooling Mr. Merrill ever had was in one of the old-fashioned backwoods log schoolhouses so often described in this volume, he possessed a retentive memory and keen perceptivity, with habits of close observation, and two or three months' attendance sufficed for his studies, but he became one of the most useful citizens that ever lived in Vernon township. He was a man of marked business ability, and in addition to looking after his agricultural work successfully he interested himself in local enterprises of various kinds. He originated the first newspaper, the Sun, in Fortville, and established it through subscriptions, securing the first subscriptions for the stock. But the plant was destroyed by fire and the publication resumed by John Smail, in the interests of Stewart Brothers. Mr. Merrill also started the subscriptions for the construction of the pike from Fortville to Sugar Creek in 1872, and for the first gas well in the county, in 1886, acting as president of the company formed for that purpose. He secured the first gas in Fortville, and continued to be interested in this industry, having drilled two wells for himself in 1889, one of which he used for lighting and heating his own home. Being independent and original in his views, as well as progressive in all he did, he took an effective interest in all matters of importance which came to his notice, and his farm and home showed the care of an intelligent owner. The substantial buildings and well-kept fields indicate the prosperity which attended Mr. Merrill's efforts, and the dwelling is a modern brick structure 48x39 feet in dimensions, with cellar under the entire house, and every modern convenience. There are nineteen rooms, heated by an excellent system of hot water, and comfort has been considered in every detail. This residence was constructed about 1890, and that of his son John, near by, in 1897. In 1901 he erected a residence for his daughter Amanda, in Lawrence township, Marion county, these latter having been gifts. From the observatory of his own house may be seen four counties, Hancock, Madison, Hamilton and Marion.

Mr. Merrill made a feature of choice stock and reared many pets, including five head of antelope and seven deer and elks. Some of the latter were quite vicious, as on one occasion an old buck pursued Mr. Merrill up to a fence and ran his antlers through his leg, making him a cripple for life. A year later he was chased by a buck elk, which battered him down, cut open his eyebrows, and bruised his entire body; but Mr. Merrill understood the nature of an elk and he did not get angry.

The only strictly private museum in the State was probably that owned by Mr. Merrill, which was replete with curiosities and articles of virtu collected by himself in the many parts of the country through which he traveled or visited. His hobby was natural history, and his collection of objects of interest in that line quite extensive, the many natural curiosities he possessed including a cabinet of rare mineral specimens. He had the head of a magnificent male elk, with wide-spreading antlers, five feet long and spreading over three feet. This giant of the forest was a caribou elk weighing 900 pounds, and Mr. Merrill secured him in North Dakota when he was three years old. He had been captured when a calf and trained to work, but had become uncontrollable. Mr. Merrill shipped him and his mate home to Ohio, and he reared a dozen of their young. For some years he made it his business to save the horns the deer shed; and he had a fine chair made entirely from the horns of deer raised on his place. He also had the horns of a Brazilian ox, from an island off the South American coast. These horns stand as high as a tall man can reach and have a spread of seven feet; they are very highly polished. Mr. Merrill also secured the head and antlers of a Scandinavian elk, which he secured at the World's Columbian Exposition, at Chicago; the head and antlers of a reindeer from Norway; a wonderful ram's head; the head and horns of an antelope; a fine specimen of the African antelope; one of the Big Horn or Rocky Mountain sheep; and the horns of a rare specimen of the genus bok from South Africa, which he purchased at the World's Fair held at St. Louis in 1904.

In political sentiment Mr. Merrill was originally an old-line Whig and cast his first vote for Zachary Taylor, in 1848. He was one of the original Republicans in his county and voted for Abraham Lincoln both times, and he continued to be a staunch Republican in national affairs; in local matters he exercised his own judgment in supporting candidates. He would never consent to accept or hold political office of any kind, though offered such honors many times.

Mr. Merrill was a charter member of Edwards Lodge, No. 178, I. O. O. F., at Fortville, which has since disbanded. He was initiated Nov. 10, 1856, J. H. Perry being then noble grand, and until his death he was a member of the order, with which he had been identified for the long period of fifty years. He filled all the offices in the subordinate lodge and encampment, and also in the Rebekahs, as on the organization of same the ladies were persuaded with difficulty to accept offices. Mr. Merrill's membership was with the Pendleton lodge.

In December, 1849, Mr. Merrill married Miss Mary A. Larew, who was born Jan. 15, 1823, in Maryland, daughter of John and Margaret Larew, also natives of Maryland, but at that time residents of Vernon township, Hancock Co., Ind., where they were pioneer settlers. They had two children, Mary Ann, Mrs. Merrill, and Rachel, Mrs. Masters. The Larews were of French stock. John Larew, Mrs. Merrill's father, was a soldier in the War of 1812. He was a farmer by occupation, improving a tract of forty acres which he cleared from the woods, but toward the close of his life he and his wife made their home with their son-in-law, Mr. Merrill, both dying at his residence. Mr. Larew lived to be between seventy and eighty years of age, dying Sept. 6, 1869, and Mrs. Larew lived to the age of about eighty.

To Mr. and Mrs. Merrill were born five children, of whom three grew to maturity: (1) Joseph, born Aug. 10, 1850, died Sept. 29, 1851. (2) John, born Aug. 30, 1851, was accidentally killed, by the running away of his team. He married Ida Day, daughter of George W. and Elizabeth (White) Day, and left two children, Harry and Hazel. (3) Amanda, born Feb. 20, 1853, married William R. White, a farmer, and settled near Lawrence, Marion Co., Ind. To them were born three children, two of whom are living, Fred and Mary. (4) Charles P. T., born Oct. 11, 1855, is engaged in farming on the home place; he married Olive Day, daughter of George W. and Elizabeth (White) Day, and they have two children, Carrie and Mary. (5) Margaret Arrillia, born Sept. 19, 1857, died Aug. 15, 1858. The mother of this family, Mrs. Mary A. (Larew) Merrill, passed away Nov. 11, 1902.

In disposition Mr. Merrill was truly kind, and he was one of the most generous hearted of men, enjoying the high regard as well as respect of all who knew him. His death occurred Aug. 2, 1907.

EDWARD THISTLETHWAITE, capitalist, one of the prominent and progressive business men of Sheridan, was born March 13, 1850, in Wayne Co., Ind., son of John and Rebecca (Symons) Thistlethwaite.

John Thistlethwaite, father of Edward, was born in England, and was about three years old when he accompanied his parents to America. He was reared and educated at Richmond, Ind., where he married Rebecca Symons, born near that city, daughter of Thomas Symons. The Symonses are of Pennsylvania Dutch stock. After marriage John Thistlethwaite settled for a few years at Richmond, and then removed to Porter county, where he bought eighty acres of new land, but a few years later returned to Wayne county, buying eighty acres west of Richmond, which he improved and resided upon for eight years. In 1858 he moved to Hamilton county, settling in the woods southeast of Sheridan, on 320 acres, which he cleared with the assistance of his sons. He first built a log house, but subsequently erected a two-story brick house, one of the first in that part of the country. He was a man of great energy, very industrious, and became a practical farmer and through good judgment accumulated a large property. His 800 acres of land was partly divided with his children. In religious belief he was a Quaker, and he was a man of such exemplary life and genial disposition that he commanded the affection of his family and the respect of all who knew him. The children of his first marriage were: Harriet, Henry, Hannah, Charles, Edward and Mary. The mother of these children died in Spiceland. His second marriage was to Eliza Bethel, born in Ireland, and the children of this union were: Johanna, William, Caroline, Walter, Sherman, Grant (who died aged twelve years), Oscar, Lillie and Grace (who died aged four years). All the children who survived were given good educational advantages, and both Harriet and Mary taught school. Mr. Thistlethwaite was a Democrat, but he was a strong Abolitionist. He died on his farm, aged seventy-two years.

Edward Thistlethwaite was reared among pioneer surroundings, and early was put to work on the farm. He received such education as the schools of the locality afforded. He was well trained in all agricultural pursuits, and in 1872, at the time of his marriage, he bought eighty acres of his father's farm, and started to improve it. He was married to Martha L. Waller, born in Hamilton county, Ind., daughter of Jacob Waller, and their children were: Cora; Alotes; Sadona; John; Farie; and Jesse. Mrs. Thistlethwaite died at the age of thirty-six years. On Nov. 12, 1890, Mr. Thistlethwaite was married (second) to Etta Brinegar, born in Boone county, Ind., July 20, 1860, daughter of Calvin and Rhoda E. (Sullins) Brinegar. Calvin Brinegar was born in Kentucky, son of Morgan Brinegar, who was a pioneer there, having settled in the forests of Boone county, and Carson Sullins was also a pioneer of that county. Mr. Brinegar died four years after marriage, leaving two daughters, Etta and Atrah. Mr. and Mrs. Thistlethwaite had two children: Duane and Lamar.

Mr. Thistlethwaite lived on the farm for several years, and then engaged in a mercantile business, in which he is still interested. He has also been largely interested in real estate and building, and in partnership with his brothers Charles and Henry, bought 214 acres of land south and west adjoining the hamlet of Sheridan. They laid it off, and it is now a large part of this prosperous town. They made many improvements in the way of building business houses in Sheridan, including the hotel, mill and bank, and a large part of the block in which these stand. The brothers built all of the brick structures in the west end of the town. Mr. Thistlethwaite is a public-spirited man and a believer in the march of progress. He is one of the largest landholders in this part of Indiana, owning 600 acres in Hamilton and Clinton counties, and 6,000 acres in St. Landry parish, and is one of the principal stockholders in the Farmers' National Bank.

In politics Mr. Thistlethwaite is a staunch Democrat. Fraternally he belongs to the Knights of Pythias of Sheridan. He is a member of the Christian Church.

ALONZO L. LEFEBER, late of Eaton, Ind., was one of the well-known business men of that place for fifteen years prior to his death, engaged in lumber dealing.

This name was originally spelled LaFebre, and the family is of French origin. Tradition says the LaFebres were of noble blood, probably French Huguenots. John LaFebre, grandfather of Alonzo L., was born in France, and was a carpenter and contractor by occupation. He lived for a time in Virginia, and in an early day, about 1838, moved to Madison county, Ind., where he was among the pioneers. He followed his calling there until his death, which occurred in Madison when he was fifty-two years of age. His widow, Martha, lived to be ninety-two years of age, dying in Paris, Ind., with her son John L. She was of old Virginia stock. John and Martha LaFebre had children as follows:

John, William, Stephen, James, and Katie (who married Stephen Day). In religion the father was a Presbyterian.

John L. Lefebber, son of John, was born in Virginia and when young moved with his father to Ohio, the family settling on land near Milford, in Clermont county. There he grew to manhood and became a farmer, owning a good farm, but he also learned the carpenter's trade and followed contracting. He was married in Clermont county to Rebecca Skinner, who was born there, daughter of Archie and Elizabeth Skinner, the former a pioneer of Clermont county who came of old American stock of English descent. About 1838 John Lefebber and his wife moved to near Lancaster, Jefferson Co., Ind., nine miles from Madison, settling on a tract of 120 acres which had been partly cleared. Mr. Lefebber finished clearing this place and made a fine home thereon. He first put up a hewed log house, and in later years, after he had cleared the land, replaced it with a substantial two-story frame dwelling. He subsequently sold this property and bought 216 acres near Paris, Ind., with good improvements. Mr. Lefebber was a hard-working man and a respected citizen, of excellent moral character, strong mind and hardy constitution. He died in Paris, Ind., in 1885, at the advanced age of eighty-two years. Mr. Lefebber was originally an old-line Whig in political faith, voted for Abraham Lincoln, and thereafter supported the Republican party. During the Civil war he was a strong Union man, and he had one son in the Federal army. John L. and Rebecca (Skinner) Lefebber had children as follows: George K., Martha Jane, James M., Eliza C., John W., Albert A., Alonzo L., Benton R. and Daniel L. The first two were born in Clermont county, Ohio, the others in Jefferson county, Ind. All the sons received a good common-school training, and James attended Louisville and Cincinnati medical colleges and became a physician. The mother of this family was a member of the Presbyterian Church.

Alonzo L. Lefebber was born Aug. 21, 1843, in Jefferson county, Ind., on his father's farm, and he well remembered pioneer days and scenes. His boyhood was spent in the hewed log house on the home place. He attended his first school when he was about ten years old, in a hewed log schoolhouse in the neighborhood, furnished with slab seats; the window was made by cutting out a log. Later he attended a frame schoolhouse. The winter term lasted about forty days, just about the number of weeks in a modern school year. He continued to go to school winters and work on the farm summers until he was seventeen years old, and when eighteen began to learn the carpenter's trade with his father, working at same for about six years. Mr. Lefebber was married, in Paris, Ind., Oct. 31, 1865, to Mary Ann Dixon, who was born March 3, 1839, in Jennings county, Ind., three miles from Paris, daughter of John and Margaret (Wilson) Dixon. John Dixon was a pioneer of Jennings county, where he owned a fine farm of three hundred acres which he had cleared from the woods, and which is still in the possession of one of his sons.

After marriage Mr. Lefebber moved to Anderson, where he lived from 1871 to 1873. Though only twenty-seven years old when he moved to Anderson he was made foreman of the Eagle Chair Works, obtaining this responsible position on account of his executive ability and straightforward character, and he was retained until he resigned to engage in the milling and elevator business, in 1873, in company with J. B. Anderson and W. R. Rash. Remaining in this business for about five years, he subsequently engaged in the dry good business and general merchandising, in which he succeeded very well. In 1891 he removed to Eaton, where he passed the remainder of his life engaged in the lumber business, in which he built up an excellent patronage. His death, which occurred May 15, 1906, removed from the commercial circles of that place one of its most substantial men.

Mrs. Mary Ann (Dixon) Lefebber passed away Feb. 14, 1901, the mother of children as follows: Frank B. married L. Watson, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and died at the age of thirty-four years; Lillian married W. C. Scott, train dispatcher on the Big Four road, and they reside in Albany, Ind., and have one child, Walter C.; Harry Martin, bookkeeper for the Lefebber Lumber Company, married Josephine Duke. For his second wife Mr. Lefebber married Mrs. Elizabeth Grove, of Eaton, who survives him. She is a member of the Christian Church, but Mr. Lefebber was a member of the Methodist Church, to which his first wife also belonged. He was a liberal supporter of the church and an active worker, serving as a member of the board of trustees and as one of the building committee when the new church was constructed. In fraternal connection he was a member of the Knights of Honor.

In political faith Mr. Lefeber was a Republican, and during the Civil war he was a strong Union man, enlisting in Indiana in the spring of 1862, in the State Guards. He was sworn into the United States service as corporal of the 9th Legion, Company A, and served in Indianapolis guarding prisoners until honorably discharged. He was then in the service in Alabama, at Bridgeport, building gunboats and transports, for four months. He was always a public-spirited man, and he was respected in Eaton and throughout the vicinity for his worth as a man and his exemplary life.

WILLIAM M. APPLE, an officer in the Civil war with a brilliant record, is one of a family very numerous represented in that struggle. The family was founded in Indiana about 1830, by three brothers, John, Christopher and Andrew, who are believed to have come from Center county, Pa., to Clermont county, Ohio, and thence to Marion county, Ind. From these three has sprung a large progeny, of whom a number responded loyally to their country's call for aid. Among those from Marion county alone "Capt." Apple, as he is generally called, can recall eleven besides himself who enlisted, namely: Jackson Apple, who was slightly wounded at Shiloh; John V. Apple, who was killed at Port Gibson, Miss.; John S. Apple; Jacob Apple, mortally wounded at Jackson, Miss.; Peter Apple; Henry Apple, who died at Crump's Landing, Tenn., from sickness incurred in the army, and who like all those mentioned, was in Company K, 11th Ind. V. L., with William M. Apple; William S. and Samuel Apple, brothers, who were in another Indiana regiment; and Valentine, George and Andrew Apple, who served in an Illinois regiment.

John Apple, the pioneer ancestor of William M., on coming to Indiana, settled in Lawrence township, Marion county, where he entered and cleared a good farm. There he lived to a good old age and at his death his remains were interred in the Smith cemetery. The children born to him and his wife Katie were as follows: Solomon; Henry; John, who remained in Ohio, married a Miss McCord, and was the grandfather of Valentine and William Apple; Polly married a Mr. Quill; Sophia married Jesse Smith; Rebecca married William Smith; Sally married Richard McCord; and others whose names are not known.

Solomon Apple was born in Clermont county, Ohio, Jan. 29, 1809, and from boyhood was accustomed to a farmer's life. He married Phoebe, daughter of ——— and Mary Crumbaugh, and after some years of their wedded life had passed, he took his family to Indiana, in 1832, two years after his father's removal thither. He entered 160 acres of land, receiving his title from the government, when Andrew Jackson was president, and this property is still the Apple homestead. It was then virgin forest of immense black oaks, etc., and it meant much toil to get it cleared. The log cabin which Mr. Apple built there was torn down after the Civil war. He died at this home Aug. 28, 1877, while his wife lived on, still at the homestead, until May 12, 1900, passing away at the age of ninety years, five months and twenty-eight days. Their children were: George W., who served in the Mexican war, born in Ohio in September, 1828; Andrew Jackson, who was born in January, 1832; Mary Jane, who was the first child born in Indiana; William M.; Sarah, Mrs. Noah Mock; Rebecca Ellen; Ann Eliza, Mrs. David G. Hannah; and John Harvey, born in April, 1851. Solomon Apple was an industrious and upright man, respected in his community. He was a Jacksonian Democrat in his politics, while in their religious views both he and his wife were liberal.

William M. Apple was born on the farm where he still resides, Dec. 3, 1838, in the log cabin his father first built. Later the family occupied a story and a half hewed log house. For two or three months during the winters he attended school and learned to read and write, and gained something of a knowledge of arithmetic, but most of his time until the war was spent in helping to clear the farm. On July 8, 1861, when twenty-two years old, he enlisted as a private in Company K, 11th Ind. V. L., under Capt. W. W. Darnell. After serving his first three years, he veteranized at New Orleans, in February, 1864, for three years more, but was discharged at Indianapolis in July, 1865, at the close of the war. In April, 1862, he was promoted to be corporal, then duty sergeant in 1864, and was made first lieutenant in May, 1865, for gallant and meritorious conduct. His friends and neighbors now gave him the title of Captain as an act of courtesy. He was remarkably fortunate in his experience, for in all the four years and more he was never wounded, never in hospital nor ever a prisoner, though he shared in all the vicissitudes of his regiment except the struggle at Fort Donelson, when his company was on guard duty at Paducah.

Capt. Apple's service carried him through Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, Virginia and West Virginia, and he was in the battles of Shiloh, Port Gibson, Raymond, Champion Hills, Vicksburg, Winchester, Cedar Creek, Fisher's Creek, Carrion Crow Bayou, and Halltown. While in Sheridan's command he saw that great general frequently. At Cedar Creek, that gentleman rode up very near to him and again at Fisher's Hill he came into the rifle pit where Capt. Apple was and ordered a charge. Capt. Apple was in the Shenandoah valley when its devastation was ordered, so that the Rebels might not use it as a place of shelter. The people had frequently been warned to leave, and many had done so, leaving their cattle, sheep, horses and hogs to be confiscated by the enemy. The orders were to burn barns, mills and public buildings, but not homes, but through accident and carelessness many homes were destroyed. The valley was filled with the smoke of battle and conflagration, so that the surrounding mountains were completely shut out from view.

The war over, Capt. Apple returned home, where he had been only once during his military career, when he was sent as a recruiting officer and helped to raise 700 men. This visit occurred early in 1865, and during the course of it, Feb. 21, he was united in marriage to Miss Addie Fausett, of Lawrence township. In July he was discharged and the re-united couple settled on the homestead. Capt. Apple, who bought out the other heirs, now owns 176 acres situated on the Pendleton and Indianapolis pike, adjoining Camp Benjamin Harrison on the east, and he has built a large and comfortable residence on the place. Both Mr. and Mrs. Apple are members of the Christian Church. He belongs to Beard Post, G. A. R., and has held all the offices therein. In politics he has been a stanch Republican ever since the day he voted for Lincoln for his first term.

Six children were born to William M. and Addie Fausett Apple: (1) Effie Bell, born Dec. 26, 1865, married Dec. 31, 1884, John Lingle, a railroad man of Sedalia, Mo., and they have two children, Harry Morton and Marguerite. (2) Hattie May, born Jan. 5, 1868, married, Dec. 24, 1887, Joseph Watson, a farmer on part of the Apple homestead. Mrs. Watson died June 18, 1899, leaving three sons, William T., George M. and Claude. (3) Joanna, born Jan. 1, 1870, married Jan. 1, 1890, John E. Sellars, a farmer in Lawrence township, and they have two children, James Ross and Emma. (4) Martha Ellen, born Sept. 7, 1872, married Oct. 27, 1894, John Hinds, an electrician in Tipton, and they have one son, Norman. (5) Edward Charles, born Dec. 12, 1876, is still at the homestead. He married, July 31, 1898, Miss Emma Combs, and they have one son, William Vernon. (6) Mamie Elizabeth, born April 20, 1880, married July 31, 1898, Albert Yorger, of Lawrence, an electrician on the traction line, and they have one son, William M.

Mrs. Apple, who was born May 4, 1844, was a daughter of Charles and Elizabeth Ann (Sanders) Fausett, old settlers in Indiana. Charles Fausett was born in Louisiana, July 30, 1808, of Irish ancestry. He became a harness maker at Oaklandon, and while living there served several times as justice of the peace and postmaster. His last years were spent with his daughter Amanda, in Indianapolis, where he died in April, 1892. In politics he was a Republican. His wife, whose maiden name was Elizabeth Sanders, was born Jan. 10, 1810, and died Aug. 28, 1868. They had children: Mary Ann, Catherine, Jacob, Amanda, Ellen, Robert and Addie.

HENRY HOLT, attorney, in Indianapolis, Ind., was born in Rush county, Ind., Nov. 13, 1846, a son of Drury and Sarah (Kendall) Holt, the former born in Hawkins county, Tenn., in 1800, and the latter in Trimble county, Ky., in 1806. They died in Rush county, Ind., in 1882 and 1880, respectively.

Mr. Henry Holt's professional studies were conducted under the supervision of the Hon. George B. Sleeth, of Rushville, Ind., from whose office he was admitted to practice in 1879, being at the same time associate editor of the Rushville Republican. In 1882 he purchased the Franklin Jeffersonian. This publication he sold in 1886, and he then leased the office of the Columbus, Ind., Democrat for a year. In February, 1890, he removed to Indianapolis, where he resumed a special law practice and also engaged as an advocate.

Mr. Holt was married in Rush county, Ind.,

Jan. 21, 1874, to Miss Anna E. Brosius, a native of that county, and a daughter of George and Sarah Brosius. Both Mr. and Mrs. Holt are members of the Christian Church. They reside at No. 1101 East Market street, Indianapolis.

CHARLES HOWARD BAKER, secretary and treasurer of the Baker Bros. Glass Factory, formerly in Arcadia, Hamilton county, is one of several brothers who have done much to promote the growth and prosperity of that town.

Mr. C. H. Baker was born in Wheeling, W. Va., Jan. 7, 1868, son of Christopher and Martha (Edmonston) Baker, both natives of Maryland. The Bakers are of French origin, but are one of the old American families. Christopher was the son of James of Maryland, but left that State in the early fifties and removed to Virginia, whence he went on later in life to Ohio, and there died. He was a Republican, and with his wife was a member of the Methodist Church. There were nine children in the family, namely: J. D., who married Mary C. McMurchon, resides in Indianapolis, and is a banker and president of Baker Bros. Glass Company; Elizabeth and Harriet are deceased; Everett, who married Lena McKean, is a shipping clerk for Baker Bros.; Nora L., deceased, married C. Shepherd; Ulysses G., who married Mary E. Ruthrauff, of Findlay, Ohio, resides in Indianapolis, there serving as secretary of the company; Charles H.; Martha is deceased; one died in infancy. All were given good educations, and all the boys learned to be ironworkers, as their father owned large iron works, and they were put in at the very bottom and were obliged to work up.

In 1884 U. G. Baker started as a shipping clerk in a glass factory in Bellaire, Ohio, and two years later built the glass works at Findlay, Ohio, and began in the business for himself. The following year J. D. Baker joined him and they organized the Ohio Window Glass Company, which three years afterward, on the admission of C. H. Baker, became the Findlay Window Glass Works. In 1893 the company sold out in Ohio, and located in Arcadia, Ind., an admirable situation, they being the only manufacturers of window glass in the county. Their plant was one of the largest in the State, and shipped glass all over the United States, the annual sales amounting to $100,000. When running at full capacity the plant employs 200 men. The company have since moved both their plants to Caney, Kans. Baker Brothers are also interested in the Union National Bank of Indianapolis, and in the New Castle Bridge Works. They are all self made men, and have been remarkably successful. Their success has reacted upon the place in which they located, and has done much for its industrial prosperity.

Charles H. Baker chose for his wife Miss Maude Davis, of Worthington, Minn., to whom he was married in 1897. Miss Davis was the daughter of Samuel and Harriet J. Davis, the former a merchant in Worthington. Both Mr. Baker and his wife are members of the Methodist Church. He is a Republican in his political sentiments, but not an active politician. Fraternally he is a 32d degree Mason, and also belongs to the K. of P. His brothers, J. D. and U. G., are also 32d degree Masons. Mr. Baker has a handsome home property in Arcadia, which serves as the exponent both of his success and his hospitality.

H. N. GOE, a well-established grocer at Irvington, was born in Madison county, Ind., at Pendleton, Jan. 11, 1837, son of Hezekiah M. and Elizabeth R. (Boston) Goe.

William Goe, his grandfather, was born in Pennsylvania, of English and Scotch ancestry, and his occupation was farming. He came to Indiana in 1816, dying in Hamilton county when over seventy years of age. He and his son Hezekiah were both pioneers of Indiana, and were inured to the hardships incident to the life on the frontier. A man of fine education, and the possessor of an extensive library, he was influential in the affairs of his day, and at one time served as land commissioner. He had a numerous family.

Hezekiah M. Goe was born in Fayette county, Pa. He came to Indiana in 1816, settling in Hamilton county, where he secured land from the government, and this land has since become the site of Noblesville. On this land was opened the first successful gas well in the county. Here Mr. Goe made his home until 1836, when he removed to Pendleton, Ind., where he engaged in the making of carriages and wagons. His home was maintained in that town until 1861, when he retired from the wagon shop and entered into trade, at a time when prices were very low, and goods were generally exchanged for produce, so that he did not long continue in that line. For eight or ten years he was a farmer, when he came to Indianapolis. Here he spent his remaining years, and died at the home of his son, H. N., at the advanced age of eighty-four years, without any apparent sickness. His wife died some ten or twelve years before in Indianapolis. She was born on the eastern shore of Maryland. Both Mr. and Mrs. Goe were conscientious and devout members of the Methodist Church. In the early days he was a justice of the peace, but he was often called to settle cases out of court. He and his wife had a family of four sons and three daughters, three now living: Lemuel T., of Morgan Park, Ill.; H. N.; and David Edward, of Minneapolis.

Mr. Goe's maternal grandfather was Elijah Boston, a native of Maryland of English lineage, who served as an officer in the Revolution. In the early days he came to Pendleton, Ind., and while living there his son, Hiram, was employed on the iron work of the old White River Bridge in Indianapolis, on Washington street. Elijah Boston was a merchant in the east, but after coming west to Indiana lived retired. He died in Madison county, when over seventy years of age. He had a small family.

H. N. Goe spent his boyhood days mainly in Madison county, living in town until he was twenty-two years old, and then for six years lived on a farm. His education was secured in the public schools and in the Academy at Attica, Ind. In 1861 Mr. Goe came to Indianapolis, and his first employment was in the old last and peg factory of Osgood & Smith. Afterward he was employed in the bakery of Parrott & Nickum, being engaged as a shipping clerk. In time he was ready to go into business for himself as a grocer, at the corner of Pratt and Illinois streets. This was just after the war, and the enterprise proved so successful that he has continued in it to the present time. About 1884 he came to Irvington, where he has been in business ever since.

Mr. Goe was married in April, 1864, to Miss Winifred A. Mauzy, a daughter of Cornelius and Sarah Mauzy, and to this union was born one child, who died in infancy. Mrs. Winifred Goe died in Indianapolis Dec. 11, 1865. She was a member of the Christian Church. Mr. Goe was married in 1872 to Miss Margaret Farnsworth, daughter of William A. and Margaret (White) Farnsworth, and to them were born six children: Clara, Herbert E., Grace M., Percy F., Cornelia, and one who died in infancy. Miss Clara is a teacher in the public schools of Indianapolis. Herbert E., deceased, was in business at Sault Ste. Marie. During the Morgan raid, Mr. Goe enlisted in a company raised in Madison county, and was a member of the company until it disbanded.

Mr. and Mrs. Goe have a pleasant home at No. 131 South Ritter avenue, Irvington, which was built by him in 1890. They are members of the Irvington Methodist Church, which he serves as a trustee. He is a member of Irvington Lodge No. 324, K. P. In politics he is a Republican, and he is a man of much standing and character in the community.

DR. JESSE H. LANAM, one of the leading members of the medical profession in Franklin, Ind., was born Nov. 9, 1847, near Caldwell, Ohio, son of William W. and Arathusa (Ogle) Lanam, natives of Ohio.

Thomas Lanam, the grandfather, was a native of Maryland, and one of the early settlers of Noble county, Ohio, where he took up government land and improved it and reared a large family. The working portion of his life was spent upon a farm, and he died in Ohio, at the age of eighty-five years. The family of Lanam originally came from Scotland, and the descendants possess many of the sterling qualities of that nation. The maternal grandfather was Hercules Ogle, a native of Virginia, who removed to Ohio at an early day in the history of that State, first settling in Columbiana county, and later in Ross county, where he died at the age of ninety-three. During the War of 1812, he was in the employ of the government as a spy, and the habits of close observation acquired at this time, remained with him through life. By occupation this most worthy man was a blacksmith, and his descendants are many, for he had a large family.

William W. Lanam was a farmer and mail contractor in Noble county, Ohio, but devoted the greater portion of his attention to the former calling. His death occurred in 1883, near Sarahsville, Ohio, at the age of seventy-five years. His wife survived until 1894, and was seventy-nine at the time of her death. Both were earnest members of the Methodist Church. Six sons and four daughters came to bless their union, of whom the following survive: Frances, wife of Joseph Carter of Gallipolis, Ohio; Nancy, wife of Seneca Lyle, of Bridgeport, Ohio; Levi of Alliance, Ohio; Dr. Jesse H.; Mary, wife of Joseph Taylor, of Zanesville, Ohio; and Emma, wife of S. B. Johns of Bridgeport, Ohio. One brother Hiram enlisted in Company D, 27th O. V. I., and was killed July 22, 1864, at the battle of Peach Tree Creek. Another brother, Martin enlisted in Company K, 30th O. V. I., and died in April, 1901. The eldest of the family, Thomas, was drowned at Senecaville, Ohio, about 1858, while carrying the United States mail. The youngest brother, William, was auditor of Noble county, Ohio, and died at the county seat, of typhoid fever, in 1888.

Dr. Jesse H. Lanam resided in Noble county, Ohio, six miles from Caldwell, until 1876, and he attended the common schools of that neighborhood, as well as a normal school at Caldwell for a number of years, and later entered Wesleyan University, at Delaware, Ohio. After this, he taught school for a number of years, and also took a commercial course at Valparaiso, Ind. During all these years, even when a boy upon his father's farm, Dr. Lanam was interested in the medical profession, and he finally resolved to enter it. With this idea in view, he read medicine at Franklin, graduating from the Central College of Physicians and Surgeons in Indianapolis, in 1882. After graduating, Dr. Lanam began the practice of medicine at Nineveh, Johnson Co., Ind., and remained there until 1887, when he removed to Edinburg, Ind. Here he remained until 1896, when he located in Franklin, and has since remained, residing on East Jefferson street, where he owns an excellent home.

On April 19, 1883, Dr. Lanam married Miss Carrie McCaslin, daughter of Robert and Elizabeth (McCaffrey) McCaslin, and one daughter has been born of this union, Nellie. Mrs. Lanam and daughter are earnest members of the Presbyterian Church. In 1871, Dr. Lanam was made a member of the Masonic fraternity, while living in the State of Ohio, and is now connected with Franklin Lodge No. 107, F. & A. M., Franklin Chapter No. 65, R. A. M. and Franklin Commandery No. 23, K. T., and is a Scottish Rite Mason. In politics Dr. Lanam is a Republican, and always supports the candidates of that party.

During his career as a physician, Dr. Lanam has pursued his profession with great interest, always embracing every opportunity for keeping thoroughly abreast of the advances made in medical science, and he is an active member of the Johnson County Medical Society and the Indiana State Medical Society. Being a skilled and learned physician, as well as possessing in marked degree a personality which wins confidence and inspires respect, Dr. Lanam has met with enviable success, and is destined to still greater success in the years before him.

TETER. The Teter family is one of the old pioneer families of Indiana, and its representatives are of that sturdy type of fearless men who dared to enter the wilderness and to hew out the pathway for civilization. The country has been built by such as these, and the nation maintained by their sons. George Teter, of Tipton, prominent in business and public affairs, and Newton Teter, of Noblesville, a successful farmer and stock dealer, are worthily bearing the honored name.

The first of the family to come to America was Elisha Teter, who emigrated from Germany (some accounts say Holland) to New Jersey about the time of the American Revolution. About 1796 he settled in Pennsylvania, and still later came farther west, locating in Columbiana (now Mahoning) county, Ohio. It is also said that his homestead was on Paint Creek, in Ross county, and that he owned several thousand acres of land there, clearing up a large farm. One of his sons, John, was a colonel in the War of 1812, and was an active Democrat until the Civil war, when he became a Republican; he married Mary Cook. The family were Friends.

Samuel Teter married Mary Dodridge, of Virginia, of a leading family of the Old Dominion, of old Colonial stock. The young couple settled first in Pennsylvania, and about 1797, with others, they moved to the interior of Ohio, and, going up the Scioto river, they built the first cabin at Chillicothe. In 1800 Samuel Teter took his family to Ross county, and there they lived until his death. It is evident that Samuel Teter had made at least two expeditions into Ohio before removing his family thither. There is yet preserved in the family of Newton Teter an iron tomahawk that belonged to Samuel Teter. This was made by David Stewart in western Pennsylvania in 1739, and was one of the first tomahawks carried by an English speaking white man across the Ohio river. It was carried in his belt by Mr. Teter when he went over to examine the territory of Ohio, and on this expedition he and his companions had several narrow escapes from the Indians. To Samuel and Mary (Dodridge) Teter were born five children, Samuel, George, Mary, John and Daniel, all of whom lived to mature years and married.

John Teter, son of Samuel, was born in Washington county, Pa., Jan. 11, 1777. He married Mary Edmiston, who was born in Ohio. Her mother was a member of the Hare family, who were a numerous family of energetic people, of German descent, and who were the only relatives who spoke any but the English language. The Edmistons were of English stock, and Mrs. Mary (Edmiston) Teter's father was the only one to come to America, he settling on Buckskin Creek in Ross county, Ohio. The Dodridges, Houghs, Shannons, Williamses, Briggses, Carsons and Holmeses were all related, some by marriage and some by blood, to the Teters, and they settled in Pennsylvania and Virginia. Philip Dodridge was one of the most noted lawyers of his day, and his brother, Joseph, died while a member of the Constitutional Convention. Wilson Shannon was once governor of Ohio. To John Teter and wife, Mary, were born the following children: Benjamin, born Sept. 3, 1801; Elizabeth, April 14, 1803; Nancy, Dec. 27, 1804; Mary, July 29, 1806; Hannah, Aug. 16, 1808; Thomas E., May 22, 1810; —, April 6, 1812; Christina, July 25, 1814; Samuel E., May 1, 1817; George, Jan. 27, 1819; Charity, Jan. 19, 1821; Bethena, July 5, 1823; Wesley, Feb. 26, 1824; and Amos, Sept. 5, 1826. All these lived to be grown, and John Teter said that his doctor bill in all those years would not amount to ten dollars. John Teter was a life long farmer, never ran for office and never engaged in any speculation. He cleared up his farm on Buckskin Creek, Ross Co., Ohio, and sold only his surplus. He was very conscientious, charging his neighbors no more than a very reasonable price for any of his products or for any work done for them by his boys. He was of mild and just disposition, and governed his children by gentle methods and moral suasion. He died Sept. 22, 1844, aged over sixty-seven years, and his wife passed away June 6, 1845.

Thomas E. Teter, son of John and Mary, was born in Ross county, Ohio, May 22, 1810, and was reared on a farm. When still quite young he was able to do a man's work, and worked at farm labor for twenty-five cents per day. In his neighborhood were several stock traders, and he was often employed by them to drive stock, and soon to buy stock. In this way he became a good judge of live stock—knowledge that helped him on the road to success in after years. For a time he clerked in a general store in Ross county, and then engaged in the stock business for himself, being located at Bourneville until 1847, when he moved to Indiana and settled on Stony creek, in Hamilton county, two and one-half miles east of Noblesville. His household effects were moved in a two-horse wagon, while his wife rode in a one-horse vehicle. He settled on a claim of 160 acres of land in the timber, but a little of which had been cleared, and a log house built, and he finished the clearing, built a double log house with a frame addition, and then bought more land, owning 200 acres besides his original farm. At the time he settled in Hamilton county, he was, like most of the pioneers, hard pressed for ready money, and in addition he had to pay a number of security notes and debts from his old business in Ohio. Among his neighbors was an old time clock peddler, Abner Bond, who was often obliged to take notes in payment for the clocks. The makers of these notes lived not only in Indiana, but over the line into Ohio. He engaged Mr. Teter to collect these notes, and in this the latter was quite successful, and gathered a considerable sum of money, his commissions giving him a good start, and he finally bought out Mr. Bond's business. In this he prospered, soon running seven wagons. He later bought land warrants, and also went to Minnesota, where he entered land. About 1860 he moved into Noblesville, where for a short time he engaged in the flour milling business, with his son Newton as a partner, under the firm name of Teter & Son. At one time he was very wealthy, but as a director of the Midland railroad he lost heavily. He had a high reputation for integrity, and the confidence of all who knew him, often being made administrator of estates and guardian for children. In politics he was first an old-line Whig, and afterward a Republican. He was very public-spirited, and for many years was president of the city council of Noblesville, and he assisted in the building of the Third ward school building.

Mr. Thomas E. Teter was one of the founders of the Masonic lodge at Noblesville, and at his death one of the oldest Masons in the county. In 1854 he became a member of Noblesville Lodge, No. 57, F. & A. M., and held the offices of secretary and treasurer, and until his health failed he was regular in attending meetings.

At one time Mr. Teter began reading medicine, but as his father did not encourage or approve he gave it up, although all through his life he studied it more or less, and treated his own family, seldom calling a physician, and in his later years he spent most of his time in this study. On Jan. 2, 1838, in Ross county, Ohio, Thomas E. Teter was married to Mary R. Rockhold, daughter of Joseph and Mary (Rickets) Rockhold, the Rockholds being a family of French descent, early settled on the Susquehanna river in Pennsylvania. Joseph Rockhold moved in an early day to Ross county, Ohio, from Pennsylvania, where he had been born Oct. 8, 1774 (son of Capt. John Rockhold, a patriot soldier of the Revolution), and his wife, Mary Rickets, whom he married Oct. 12, 1796, on Dec. 26, 1777. They were the parents of the following children: Hannah, born Aug. 14, 1797; Rebecca, Jan. 20, 1800; Elijah, Oct. 29, 1801; Ruth, 1803; Joseph, 1805; Samuel, 1807; Hezekiah, 1811; Matilda, 1809; Alfred, 1814; Mary (Mrs. Teter), April 21, 1817; Perry, Dec. 8, 1818; and Mahala, April, 1821. Joseph Rockhold was in some way connected with Indian affairs, and the Redmen were frequent visitors at his home. He was well-known and highly respected, at one time serving as justice of the peace, and he died on his farm in Ross county. To Thomas E. Teter and wife were born the following children, namely: Hannah R., born Nov. 1, 1838, died in infancy; Charity, born July 1, 1841, died in infancy; Joseph R., born April 14, 1843, died Oct. 22, 1863, in United States Hospital at Chickamauga, Tenn., from wound received in the battle there; George, born July 3, 1845; Newton, born Nov. 10, 1848, in Hamilton county, Indiana; twin daughters, born June 25, 1851, died in infancy; and a daughter, born June 29, 1853, also died in infancy.

GEORGE TETER, son of Thomas E., was born in Ross county, Ohio, July 3, 1845. He was therefore quite young when he accompanied his parents to Indiana. This journey was made as above stated with wagon and horses and a one-horse cart. In many places there were only corduroy roads, and the journey was often interrupted by the necessity of repairing these roads, and some times to cut a new road through some wilderness. Young George was reared on the farm, and acquired his primary education in the old log cabin school house. He was an apt pupil, especially in arithmetic, and was but fifteen when, in 1860, he went to Noblesville and attended school there two years. About the same time he began work in his father's mill when not at school. He learned the miller's trade thoroughly, as it was learned in those days, and became an expert. During the Civil war the price of grain ran very high, and at one time during the latter part of that struggle, he paid as high as $4.50 for extra white wheat, and made it into flour at $22 per barrel.

At the age of sixteen in 1861 he enlisted as a private in the 75th Indiana Infantry, but the quota of that regiment being full he served but two weeks. He then again enlisted in the 39th Indiana Infantry, but receiving a serious injury to his knee-cap while hunting wild turkeys was refused on that account. He enlisted a third time, becoming a member of Company B, 136th Indiana, for 100 days. He was honorably discharged Sept. 2, 1864, at Indianapolis, at the expiration of his term of enlistment. He served at Memphis, Tenn., and was under fire in several skirmishes while on foraging expeditions.

Returning to Noblesville at the close of the war, Mr. Teter determined to better his education. He attended a business college at Indianapolis, and then spent one year in the State University at Bloomington. At the end of that time he resumed his work in the mill, remaining there until 1870. For a year after his marriage he remained in the mill with his brother, and then began the furniture and undertaking business, which he carried on for four years with good success. He then removed to Bangor, Marshall Co., Iowa, where he engaged in a mercantile business for nine years, and where, during Grant's administration, he was postmaster. When he left Iowa he went to Colorado for a short time on account of his health, and then returned to Indiana, and buying a mill, engaged in milling and buying grain at Frankfort, Ind. In 1885 he moved to Hamilton county, Ind., and bought the Conner mill on the White river, near Noblesville. In 1887 he moved to Tip-ton, and since then has been managing his various interests. He has been successful in all his business undertakings, and is the owner of considerable valuable real estate and residence property in Noblesville, Kokomo and Tipton.

On Oct. 21, 1869, in Noblesville, Mr. George Teter was married to Mary Alice Paswater, who was born Feb. 20, 1850, in Noblesville, daughter of Andrew and Caroline (Cottingham) Paswater. To Mr. and Mrs. Teter were born the following children: (1) Edward Thomas, born in Noblesville, Feb. 5, 1871, graduated from the high school at Tipton, and, then reading law with R. B. Beauchamp, was admitted to the Bar at the age of nineteen, and began practicing in Tipton, where he became deputy prosecuting attorney. He now resides in Rensselaer, Ind. On Oct. 14, 1890, he married Mary Cleveland, and they have two sons: Eugene Austin, born in Tipton, July 23, 1892; and Paul Edmiston, born in Boulder, Colo., Jan. 4, 1896. (2) Lora, born Nov. 3, 1872, married, Dec. 27, 1893, J. W. Hubbard, a lawyer by profession, but now teaching in the State Normal School at Duluth, Minn. They have two children: Helen, born Oct. 22, 1894, in South Bend, Ind.; and Alice, born Oct. 4, 1896, in Tipton. (3) Caroline, born at Bangor, Iowa, Feb. 3, 1878, is a graduate of the Tipton high school, and lives at home. (4) Ralph, born Oct. 6, 1879, graduated from the Indianapolis business college, and married Aug. 1, 1901, Ettie Emmerson, of Indianapolis.

Mr. George Teter is one of the best known citizens of his town. Both he and his wife are active members of the Methodist Church. In his fraternal connections Mr. Teter has been active in the I. O. O. F., having passed all the chairs in the local lodge, and he is a member of the Encampment, where he has held the offices of chief patriarch and high priest. He was one of the early members of the G. A. R. Post at Noblesville, and is now a member of John Price Post at Tipton, where he served as commander two years in succession, and which he has represented at the State Encampment many times. He has also been a delegate to the National Encampment, and served on the staff of Commander-in-chief Stewart.

PASWATER-COTTINGHAM. The Paswaters were an old Colonial family of Maryland of English descent. Richard Paswater, father of Andrew, was a pioneer farmer and stock trader of Connersville, where he cleared up a farm in the woods: he died in middle life in Harrison county, when on his way home from a trip to New Orleans. He was twice married. His first wife, a Coats, whom he married in Maryland, bore him children, Maria, Nancy, Elizabeth and Andrew; and his second wife, a widow McCormick, bore him a daughter, Sallie. Andrew Paswater, father of Mrs. Teter, was born in Connersville in 1828, and received a good education, later learning the trade of merchant tailor. On April 3, 1849, in Noblesville, he married Caroline Cottingham, born June 5, 1830, in Hamilton Co., Ind., daughter of Joshua and Elizabeth (Cowan) Cottingham, and he died two years later, leaving one daughter, Mary Alice.

Tradition says that the Cottingshams descended from two brothers, who were driven from England. Certain it is, however, they are of English descent, and were an early settled family in Maryland. Elijah Cottingham, father of Joshua, came with his wife, Mary Laws, as a pioneer to Connersville, where he died six months later. His children were: Joshua, Nancy, Ann, Mary, John D. and William.

Joshua Cottingham was born in Maryland Jan. 7, 1791, and in Delaware married Elizabeth Cowan, born there Sept. 28, 1793, daughter of George and Sarah Cowan. With his family Joshua Cottingham came to Connersville in the fall of 1823. Six months later, early in 1824, he settled in Hamilton county on 160 acres of woodland, two miles southeast of Noblesville. He cleared this farm from heavy timber, built a log house, and afterward, before 1830, burning the brick on his land, built a two-story brick house. He brought some money with him to Indiana and also received some money from his wife's people, who were slave holders in Delaware. In his religious principles he was a Methodist, and in political belief first an old-line Whig and later a Republican. He was a man of intelligence and good business ability, and for several years served as Probate Judge of the county. He died May 22, 1874, aged eighty-three years, and his wife passed away July 22, 1877. Their children were: Elijah, Sallie, Ann, Eliza Jane, Joshua, Hettie Maria, Mary L., Caroline and Clarinda.

NEWTON TETER, son of Thomas E. and brother of George, was born in Hamilton county, Ind., Nov. 10, 1848. He was about twelve years old when the family moved to Noblesville, previous to which time he had attended the district schools. He then entered the school in town, attending until he was eighteen, when he entered the State University at Bloomington, remaining three years, or until the end of the junior year. He worked in his father's mill during vacations, and on leaving college was admitted as a partner in the business. This continued for four years, when he became first agent for the Midland railroad at Noblesville, in 1876 billing out the first freight over this road from that town. This position he filled with great satisfaction both to the company and to the patrons until 1885. For one year as receiver for the Enslow and Munger Flouring Mill he ran that mill, and then at the order of the court sold it. Since then he has been engaged in farming and stock dealing. He owns 200 acres of land in Wayne township, nearly adjoining the corporation, and here is the largest gravel pit yet discovered in the State. Mr. Teter is a man of energy and business acumen, and has been successful in whatever he has undertaken. In 1892 he erected a pleasant modern residence, and he is the owner of other residence property. He is progressive and careful, and whatever belongs to him is sure to be found in up-to-date condition.

On Nov. 10, 1869, in Bloomington, Mr. Teter married Susan E. Adkins, born in Monroe county, Ind., Nov. 2, 1851, daughter of James and Martha (Faris) Adkins. To this union have come children as follows: Sanford F., born May 25, 1871, is a graduate of the State University at Bloomington, and is now secretary of a large manufacturing company in that city which employs three hundred hands; Mary J., born July 1, 1874; William Jerome, born Dec. 17, 1879, studied at Bloomington one year and has been with the Vandalia Coal Company for five years; and Walter Allen, born Sept. 22, 1888. All the children are graduates of the Noblesville high school.

Mr. Teter cast his first presidential vote in 1872 for General Grant, and he has ever since been a staunch Republican, actively interested in the success of his party. Both he and his wife are members of the Christian Church, and he served as deacon for sixteen or seventeen years, and treasurer thirteen years. He held the latter office when the present church was built at a cost of $30,000, and he is now one of the trustees. He is a thoroughly reliable man, and one in whom the people have the utmost confidence. Several times he has been administrator of estates and guardian of children. His fraternal relations are all with the I. O. O. F., in which he has passed all the chairs in the Noblesville lodge, and been representative to the Grand Lodge. He belongs to the Uniform Rank. But a short time ago Mr. Teter had the honor of having bestowed upon him the Decoration of Chivalry, but three others in Hamilton county having that special honor. The occasion was a notable one, the Grand Officers of the Uniformed Lodge, General Perrin and Staff, with the Noblesville Military Band, being present at the Lodge Hall, where a delightful social hour was spent.

GEORGE NICHOL, a representative business man of Anderson, Ind., who has been prominent in the political circles of Madison county, is a survivor of the Civil war, in which he took an active part. Mr. Nichol was born Jan. 14, 1830, in Butler county, Ohio, son of Thomas and Jane (Marshall) Nichol.

The origin of the ancient family of Nichol, written at various periods as Nycol, Nicoll, Nicolls, Nicholls, Nichols and Nicholl, is as follows: In the time of Edward the Confessor, one Nicholas de Albine, also Nigell or Nicholl, came over from Normandy, and was the common ancestor of the Nichol family. In the County of Chester, William Nichol, Baron of Malpas, in the reign of Henry II, bore for his arms "three pheons or darts heads." In the County of Essex the Nichols family bore "sable, a pheon, argent." In the County of Northampton William Nichols, Esq., of Hardwick (1479), "sable, three pheons, argent." In Glamorganshire, John Nichol, Esq., "sable, three pheons, argent." Motto: Nil falsi audeat. All of the Nichol family seem to have had the pheons for their coat of arms. (Nat. Encyclo. Vol. III, p. 210).

Francis Nichols, soldier, was born in Greive Hill, Enniskillen, Ireland, in 1737. He came to America with his brother, William (1754-1804), who was a captain in the American army. They settled in Cumberland county, Pa., and Francis enlisted in the Patriot army from there in June, 1775. He was promoted to second lieutenant, and served in the battle of Quebec, Dec. 31, 1775, and was taken prisoner. He was released in August, 1776, and his sword was returned to him in the presence of all American officers there. He rose to the rank of brigadier-general. At the close of the war he was elected the first United States marshal of eastern Pennsylvania. He died in Pottstown, Pa., Feb. 13, 1812.

Thomas Nichol, the grandfather of George, who came from near Belfast, Ireland, to the United States, settled on land near Wheeling, Va., on the Ohio side, but soon thereafter removed to Butler county, Ohio, and entered 160 acres of land, clearing it from the woods with his axe, and descendants of his bearing the name of Nichol, still reside there. His children were: Joseph, a soldier in the War of 1812; John; Thomas; George; Wells; Sarah A., who married Jesse Andrew; Mary, who married a Marshall; and Martha, who married a Royce.

Thomas Nichol was born about 1803, in Belmont county, Ohio, and was between two and three years old when his father located in Butler county, Ohio, and he received a fair education in the pioneer schools of his district. He was married in Butler county, to Jane Marshall, daughter of Gilbert and Mary (Taylor) Marshall, and after their marriage they settled on land in the woods. He entered 160 acres of land, and to this he added until he was the possessor of 240 acres, and on this property he spent the remainder of his life. In politics he was a Jacksonian Democrat. One of his brothers, Joseph Nichol, was a soldier in the War of 1812, and at Detroit was surrendered by Hull, dying shortly afterward. The children of Thomas and Jane (Marshall) Nichol were: William M., born in 1828; George; Mary; Joseph W.; Martha; Gilbert; Jennie; Frances; Catherine; John and Robert.

George Nichol was reared as other boys in the pioneer days, working on the farm in the summer months and attending school in the winter time. He received a common school education, and later attended the old Farmers College, on College Hill, for two terms, this old time institution having been founded by Freeman Cary and his brother. In 1852, when about twenty-two years of age, Mr. Nichol went to Keokuk, Iowa, to clerk in a hardware store, but in March, 1854, left there and located in Anderson, Ind., engaging in that business on his own account. He married, Dec. 4, 1855, in Anderson, Harriet Robinson, who was born in Ripley county, Ind., in 1835, daughter of Josephus and Matilda Robinson. Josephus Robinson was born in Tennessee, educated himself in the law, and was a pioneer at Versailles, and later at Greensburg, Decatur Co., Ind. His children were: Squire, Perry, Capt. John T., Col. Milton S., Harriet (Mrs. Nichol), Matilda and Margaret. Two children were born to Mr. and Mrs. George Nichol: Thomas J., born Sept. 15, 1856; and George E., born Oct. 4, 1861. The mother died May 25, 1896, and Mr. Nichol married (second), on Sept. 27, 1899, Mrs. Mary Eglin, widow of Capt. John F. Eglin, of the 47th Ind. V. I. She died Sept. 24, 1907.

After marriage Mr. Nichol and his first wife settled in Anderson, from where he enlisted, in September, 1861, as a private in the 47th Ind. V. I., and was soon thereafter appointed regimental quartermaster, serving in that capacity until honorably discharged in March, 1864. While serving in an official capacity he was in every active campaign with his regiment. He ranked as first lieutenant with the pay of captain. After the war Mr. Nichol returned to Anderson and engaged in business, in which he has successfully continued to the present time. Probably no man is better known in business and political circles in Madison county than he. He was one of the founders of the Republican party in this section of the country, and voted for its first presidential candidate, John C. Fremont, for Abraham Lincoln, and for every other Republican candidate to the present time. He was auditor of Madison county from 1871 to 1875; was a member of the 64th General Assembly of Indiana in 1905; and in 1907 was appointed by Governor Hanly a member of the board of trustees for Indiana Epileptic Village, at New Castle, and is still serving in this capacity. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church, to which his wife also belonged, and in which he has been a trustee for many years, and to which he has given liberally of his means. Mr. Nichol is an honored member of Major May Post, G. A. R., Anderson, and was quartermaster thereof for five consecutive years.

NOAH R. VANDIVIER, one of the leading farmers of Franklin township, residing in Section 30, was born Feb. 28, 1848, on a farm near where he now resides, son of Joseph S. and Rachel (McCauley) Vandivier.

The paternal grandfather was Peter Vandivier, an early settler in Johnson county, Ind., at a time when wolves, deer and other wild game were numerous. Peter Vandivier entered land in Union township, Johnson county, and there resided until his death, which occurred when he was about eighty-five years of age. During the pioneer days, he gained a great reputation as a deer hunter. His family was a large one. The maternal grandfather was Robert McCauley, a native of Scotland, who coming to America settled in Kentucky, where he resided until his marriage, at which time he located a large farm of from 300 to 400 acres in Johnson county, Indiana, and there he died at the age of forty-nine years. In addition to being a farmer, he practiced medicine. He was a most worthy and upright man. His family consisted of three children.

Joseph S. Vandivier, son of Peter and father of Noah R., was brought from his native State, Kentucky, by his parents when a small boy, and lived with them in Franklin township. All of his life was spent upon the old home farm, except a year and a half when he resided in the city of Franklin. His death occurred on the home farm in 1892, when he was seventy-two years old. His wife, Rachel McCauley, who was a native of Johnson county, Ind., died in 1871, aged forty-four years and twenty-four days. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and he of the Christian Church. Twelve children were born to them, six of whom are now living: William S.; Noah R.; Carrie, wife of William King, of Franklin; Emma, wife of Wesley Deer, of Union township; Cornelius A.; Annie, wife of Jesse Harris of Union township.

Noah R. Vandivier resided upon the farm of his father until he had attained manhood, when he purchased thirty acres of land and now owns 275 acres, part of which belonged to the homestead. This farm he has improved until it is one of the best in the township, and through his industry and energy, amassed a considerable fortune, which he is now enjoying. While his educational advantages were confined to the subscription schools, Mr. Vandivier is a well-informed man. In politics he always votes the Democratic ticket.

On July 24, 1890, Mr. Vandivier married Miss Cordelia Frazier, daughter of Green and Nancy Frazier. Six children have been born to them: Byron, Herman, Nellie, Claude, Dolph and Halcy. The parents of Mrs. Vandivier were natives of Kentucky who came to Indiana many years ago. They had eight children, five now living. Mrs. Frazier died in 1899, but Mr. Frazier survives and lives with his children.

JOHN H. CECIL, an influential citizen and Civil war veteran of Muncie, Ind., where he is engaged in the grocery business, was born on a farm in Delaware county, Ind., son of Steward and Margaret (Shellenbarger) Cecil.

Steward Cecil was born June 11, 1810, in West Virginia, son of Henry and Hannah (Guthrie) Cecil, the former a soldier in the Revolutionary war and the War of 1812, and a farmer of near Dublin, W. Va., where he died. His children were: John, who was a soldier in the Confederate army; Wilson; Steward; Eliza; Nancy; Malinda, who married a Haney; Julia, who married an Inman; and Cynthia. Eliza, Nancy and Cynthia married brothers, and settled in Pickaway county, Ohio. Steward Cecil received but limited education and was reared to the hard work of the farm. He married Margaret Shellenbarger, daughter of Isaac and Mariah (Clark) Shellenbarger, born in Ohio, whither Mr. Cecil had gone when a small boy with his mother. After marriage, in 1843, he journeyed to Indiana by horse and wagon, and settled about four miles northeast of Muncie, where he entered 120 acres of land and cleared a farm from the woods, building a log cabin, later a double log cabin and finally a frame house. He was a typical Indiana pioneer, threshing his wheat with a flail and using other primitive implements, the cooking for the family being done in an old-fashioned fire-place. Mr. Cecil lived to be seventy-eight years old, and his widow resided with her son, George, until her death when more than four score years of age. She was one of the last of the brave pioneer women. Mr. and Mrs. Cecil were members of the Methodist Church, having joined in early days, and were prominent in the building of the Salem frame church, which is still standing. Mrs. Cecil's brother, Henry, was in the Mexican war, and three other brothers, John, Andrew and Samuel, were in the Civil war, the first named being killed at the battle of Gettysburg. To Mr. and Mrs. Steward Cecil were born these children: John H., Samuel M., Francis, William, Jeremiah, James, George, Sarah, Martha, Mary, Ellen, Julia and Belle.

John H. Cecil received his education in a little log schoolhouse, ten by twelve feet, with puncheon floors and seats, and to which light was admitted through greased paper which had been inserted where a log had been removed. The school, which Mr. Cecil attended about two months each winter, was situated two miles from his home. He was reared to the hard work of the farm, hauling wood and tanbark and using the old fashioned tools. He enlisted when sixteen years old, at Muncie, March 8, 1862, as a private of Company I, 36th Ind. V. I., to serve three years or during the war, and was honorably discharged near Strawberry Plains, March 24, 1865. His services were with the Army of the Cumberland, in Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, Georgia and Mississippi, and he participated in the battles of Shiloh, Stone River, Chickamauga, Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, the great Atlanta Campaign (when the Union troops were for four months under fire), Pine Mountain, Buzard's Roost, Dalton, Ga., Marietta, Rocky Face Ridge, the fall of Atlanta, and then back with "Pap" Thomas in the second battle of Franklin, one of the hardest fought struggles of the Civil war. The same night he marched back to Nashville and took part in the great battle at that place. He was never wounded, but both at Corinth and Dalton he had narrow escapes, bullets passing through his clothes. He was sick with smallpox at Louisville and Indianapolis, for about six weeks, but with this exception was with his regiment in every skirmish, march and battle, proving himself a faithful and gallant soldier.

After the war Mr. Cecil returned to Indiana and worked on the home farm for about three years, there marrying Oct. 5, 1867, Catherine Bloom, born in Wilmington, Ohio, Oct. 17, 1851, daughter of Aaron and Martha (Polk) Bloom, the former a farmer of Wilmington, where his father had been a pioneer. Three of Mr. Bloom's sons, Charles, Robert and Leander, were soldiers in the Civil war, being members of the 147th Ind. V. I. After marriage Mr. Cecil settled in Muncie and worked at ordinary labor for two years, then renting land near the home farm. Several years later he returned to Muncie and engaged in the grocery business, in which he has continued to the present time with much success. He built his present business building and a dwelling house, and this has been his home ever since. He is a Democrat, and for twenty-eight years has been a member of the board of city commissioners. He is a capable public official, a good citizen, and a substantial business man, and is esteemed by all who know him.

Mr. and Mrs. Cecil have had these children: Henry, Albert, Frederick, Carl, Ivy and Nellie. Albert was a soldier in the Spanish war, being in Governor Durbin's regiment, and participated in the battle of Santiago; he re-enlisted and served three years in the Philippines and China. Frederick was also in the Spanish-American war, and went to China during the Boxer trouble, helping to scale the walls.

JOHN BORN. There are many points of interest attaching to the life history of this honored and representative citizen of Indianapolis in connection with the compilation of a work of this character. Not only is he a native son of Indiana's capital city, where his entire life has been passed, but he is a member of one of the prominent pioneer families of Indianapolis, where his father located when it was scarce more than a struggling backwoods town, with no metropolitan pretensions, and here lived and labored to goodly ends, accumulating a large estate and becoming one of the influential citizens of the place. John Born has been also conspicuously identified with the development and growth of his native city, from which he went forth in defense of the Union when its integrity was menaced by armed rebellion.

John Born was born in Indianapolis Sept. 19, 1844, and here he was reared to maturity, receiving his educational training in the public schools of his day. He is a son of William F. and Charlotte Born, the former of whom was born in Germany, and the latter in the United States, of English lineage. She died when her son John was but a child, and he knows little of the family history in the maternal line. William F. Born was born in the year 1810, and his father was a successful miller in the Fatherland, where William was reared to maturity. He early began to assist in the work of the mill and later learned the trade of rope maker, in which he became an expert. About the time he attained his majority he bade adieu to home and native land and set forth to seek his fortune in the New World, landing at Castle Garden in due course of time and remaining in New York for but a short interval, after which he made his way westward by the primitive means then in vogue, making Fort Wayne, Ind., his destination. There he remained until about 1828, when he came to Indianapolis, and thus gained the distinction of being one of its pioneers. He was persuaded to come to Indianapolis by Mr. McCarty, for whom he manufactured hemp rope, the material being grown on the farm of his employer. Eventually he engaged in this line of industry on his own account, beginning operations on a modest scale and gradually expanding the scope of the undertaking, which ultimately became one of the leading industries of the city. The plant was large and well equipped, and in this business Mr. Born continued for many years. Like the average pioneer he had but small financial resources, but he was self-reliant, industrious and determined, and such was his business sagacity and acumen that he was able to make his way toward the goal of definite and worthy success. He first located near Merrill street, outside the original corporate limits of the town, his plant being located on South West street, and in a district which was comparatively yet in the woods, interspersed with cultivated fields. As fast as he secured a little surplus money he bought vacant ground and held it, and later improved the several tracts with buildings, and with the growth of the city these real estate holdings greatly appreciated in value. Thus he had many houses on his rental list, receiving excellent returns from his investments. His property interests engaged his entire attention during his later years, he having retired from active business. He was the first to make a home on West street south of the original city limits and north of Merrill street, and owned much of the property in that section, together with lots and blocks in other districts in the city. His prescience and good judgment, as well as his faith in the fine future in store for the capital city, were signally manifest in his real estate operations, for he continued to hold his property until it came within the municipal limits and greatly increased in value. He was essentially enterprising and public-spirited, never afraid to buy property which his judgment approved, and he lived to see the city realize the prediction which he had made for it, while his wisdom had its reward in the large returns he received by the growth and development of the municipality. He was possessed of more than average business ability and accumulated a large and valuable estate entirely through his own efforts, being honored by all who knew him and standing as one of the solid men of the city at the time of his death, which occurred at his homestead on South West street, April 14, 1894.

In politics Mr. Born maintained an independent attitude, giving his support to those men and measures which his judgment approved rather than being directed along lines that were strictly partisan. He was reared in the Lutheran faith, to which he continued to cling throughout life. He was a man of the highest principles, quiet and conservative in business, tolerant and kindly in his intercourse with his fellow-men, and the lesson of his life is one which may be read with interest and profit, for the record is without spot or blemish, and shows the possibilities of a strong and noble manhood.

William F. Born was four times married, his first union having been to Mrs. Charlotte Hill, a widow with three children. The only child of the union was John, who was a mere infant at the time of his mother's death. The father's second wife was a native of Germany, and she lived but a few years after her marriage, the mother of one child, which did not survive infancy. William F. Born was afterward twice married, but the son of his third wife also died in infancy, so that John Born was the sole heir to his large holdings, save for the interest of his stepmother, and the estate was amicably settled.

John Born attended the schools of his native city during his boyhood days and remained beneath the paternal roof until he had attained the age of seventeen years and six months, when the intrinsic loyalty and patriotism of his nature led him to tender his services in defense of his country's honor. In January, 1862, he enlisted as a member of Company C, 11th United States Infantry, with Capt. Ames and Major Jones in command. By some oversight his name at the time of enlistment was recorded as John Burns, and the matter was allowed to pass in this form, while since the war his governmental papers and transactions have been conducted under the name of Burns. His regiment was assigned to the Army of the Potomac, under General McClellan, and passed the first winter at Perryville, Md. Later he took part in the various campaigns of the army to which his regiment belonged, and endured all the hardships and privations which marked the greatest Civil war in the history of the world. The first battle in which he participated was that at Gainesville, Va., and among others of the important battles in which he took part were those of Malvern Hill, Fair Oaks, Second Bull Run, Chancellorsville (under General Hooker), Gettysburg, Lookout Mountain, Fredericksburg, Spottsylvania Court House, etc. At the battle of Fredericksburg Mr. Born received a wound in the top of the head, being struck by a minie ball, and the indenture is still discernible. At Spottsylvania he was wounded in the muscle of the right arm, the cords being cut, so that the strength of the member has been permanently impaired. He was confined to the hospital for a time on each of these occasions, but otherwise was found at the post of duty during the three long years of faithful and valiant service, since he never had a furlough. At the expiration of his term he was at Cambridge, Md., where he received his honorable discharge.

Returning to Indianapolis Mr. Born associated himself with a partner, in the grocery business, in which he continued for a short while, at the expiration of which he sold out and then engaged in the cooping business, in which he continued for the long period of thirty years, following the precepts of his honored father and fully indorsing the idea that frequent changes are bad policy and that conservative application along a clearly defined line of endeavor will almost invariably return the best results. After the death of his father he made a satisfactory settlement of the estate, and he then assumed the management of this important inheritance to which he has given his attention for a number of years past. He is one of the representative citizens of his native place, being well known to all the old families and having been a witness to the development of the capital into one of the fairest and most stately cities in the Union, while he is ably carrying forward the ideas and the work instituted by his father, of whom he is a worthy successor.

In politics Mr. Born gives a staunch allegiance to the Republican party, but he has never sought office of any sort, though he has been frequently called upon to serve as a member of the board of election judges. He and his wife are members of the Presbyterian Church, of which he was for many years an elder, and fraternally he is an honored and valued member of Chapman Post, G. A. R. His commodious and attractive residence, located on South West street, was erected by him shortly after marriage.

On Oct. 5, 1869, Mr. Born was united in marriage to Miss Mary C. Bacon, who was born in Indianapolis March 13, 1846, daughter of Elisha W. and Eliza J. (Conn) Bacon, natives respectively of Connecticut and Ohio, and numbered among the honored pioneers of Indianapolis, where their marriage occurred. Mr. Bacon, who was a painter by trade, died many years ago, and his widow survived to venerable age, passing away Feb. 20, 1895. The children of this union were as follows: Joshua C., of Muncie, Ind., William M., of Indianapolis, who died Nov. 8, 1887; Robert D., of Indianapolis, a member of the merchant police; John L., of Indianapolis, who was a soldier in the Civil war; Nancy E. and Dorcas M., who died in infancy; Mary C., wife of John Born, of Indianapolis; George M., a resident of Illinois; and Fannie E., wife of I. L. Klingensmith, a druggist of Indianapolis.

To Mr. and Mrs. Born have been born six children, namely: (1) Katie V., the wife of William Hicks, of Louisville, Ky., died Dec. 19, 1903, leaving one child, Mary Emma. (2) Frederick W., of Indianapolis, married Frances Stout, of Scottsburg, Ind., and has four children, three sons and one daughter. (3) Albert C., of Indianapolis, married Bertha Clark, of Evansville, Ind., and they have two daughters and one son. Albert C. Born was formerly a soldier in the regular army, Company D, 3d United States Infantry, and when the late war with Spain was declared went with his command to Cuba. He is now engaged as a farmer at Evansville. (4) Fannie B. (best known as Blanche) is a successful kindergarten teacher and lives at home. (5) Edna M. and (6) Mary Florence are also at home.

JOHN SUTTON, who died at his home on Section 28, White River township, Nov. 23, 1907, was one of the largest land-owners and a prominent and substantial citizen of Johnson county. He was born in this county, Dec. 10, 1829, son of Jacob and Abigail (Doty) Sutton, the former of whom was a native of Ohio, and the latter of North Carolina.

The Sutton and Doty families have long been leading ones in Johnson county and identified with her farming interests. James Sutton, the paternal grandfather of John Sutton, was an Ohio farmer, who married twice, reared eight children, and passed away in middle life. On the maternal side, John Doty, born in North Carolina, migrated to Ohio, thence to Indiana in 1821, settling in White River township, Johnson county. Here he spent the remainder of his life, reared ten children and died at the age of seventy-eight years. His ancestry was Dutch.

Jacob Sutton, father of John, was a tanner for many years, but followed farming in Indiana, after coming to the State in 1821. Both he and his sister invested $50 each in land near the old Bluff Creek, in Johnson county, entering eighty acres, and here he died in February, 1882, in his eightieth year. His wife passed away in 1860, at the age of fifty-four years. Both parents of Mr. Sutton were consistent members of the Christian Church. Twelve children were born to this couple: seven sons and five daughters, the survivors being: Isaac, of Marion county; Peter, of Johnson county; Jane, widow of Richard Watts, near Casey, Ill.; and Mary, wife of L. B. Dolan, of Waverly, Morgan Co., Indiana.

Until he was twenty years of age, John Sutton lived in Johnson county, removing then to Marion county. His education was acquired in the old-fashioned subscription schools, and through life he followed agricultural pursuits, farming and stockraising. For twenty-one years succeeding his marriage, he resided in Perry township, Marion county, renting land for the first two years, and then purchasing the same farm, which contained 139 acres. His beginning was in a small way, as he owned but one horse and had all his tools to buy, but success attended his vigorous efforts from the first. As soon as one piece of property was paid for, Mr. Sutton began to arrange for the securing of another, and thus he continued until he owned 321 acres in Perry township. This he later traded for a farm of 472 acres, in Johnson county, which constituted the home farm. Still later, Mr. Sutton added 400 acres more, making a grand total of 872 acres, all of it being finely improved. Mr. Sutton took great interest in his farming operations, thoroughly understanding every detail of work, soil and growth, and became widely known for his excellent crops and fine cattle and stock.

On Dec. 23, 1849, Mr. Sutton was married to Miss Eliza A. Stewart, daughter of James and Catherine (Surface) Stewart, and six children were born to this union, three sons and three daughters, namely: Marshall, Charles Ingram, Melvin, Catherine, Harriet and Rosetta. Marshall died at the age of eleven years; Charles I., a farmer in Marion county, married Florence Bell Glenn (who died in June, 1901), and had four children—

John, Roy, Alva and Florence; Melvin, a farmer in Johnson county, married Elizabeth Harmon, and has three children—Ralph, Irene and Amma; Catherine died in infancy; Harriet married Franklin Presser, and they live in Johnson county; and Rosetta married John W. Paddock, of White River township, and their two living children are Dessie and Densel. Mrs. Eliza A. (Stewart) Sutton died June 17, 1871, aged forty-one years, in the faith of the Christian Church. On June 1, 1874, Mr. Sutton was married (second) to Mrs. Emily Hess, widow of Jacob Hess, and daughter of Paul and Sarah (Matthews) Cox, natives of North Carolina. Mr. and Mrs. Cox had three sons and five daughters, five of this family surviving, viz.: Milton, of Denver Colo.; Morgan, of Wichita, Kans.; Elizabeth A., widow of John Paddock, who now lives in Indianapolis; Emily, wife of John Sutton; and Miss Margaret, of Indianapolis, who died Oct. 6, 1906. Mr. and Mrs. Cox were early settlers in Morgan county, Ind., coming with their parents when children. Mrs. Sarah Cox died in 1846, and Mr. Cox married (second) Elizabeth Chandler, now also deceased. He died in 1876, at the age of sixty-nine years.

Mr. Sutton was a most worthy and valued member of the Christian Church (as is his widow), in which he served as deacon fifteen years. In politics although reared a Whig, and later a supporter of the Republican ticket, in 1884 he became an adherent of the Prohibition party. He was always ready to help the poor and the cause of Christ. He gave $1,000 to the cause of prohibition, and another $1,000 to the Church of Christ of West Indianapolis, in which he and his wife put their membership Dec. 10, 1905. Mr. Sutton watched with interest the changes which have taken place in the county since his boyhood. He could recall the time when deer, wild turkeys and squirrels were in great abundance, and also remembered seeing one bear. In the progress made, he took a leading part, ever using his influence in the direction of temperance and morality, and voting for measures which were intended to raise the moral tone of his locality. Mr. Sutton was widely known and few men were more universally respected. "He was a man of faith, of works—a true man of God."

JAMES F. BROWN. Incessant, intelligent labor is perhaps the most potent factor with humanity. In indolent ease, a man or a race decays; but what will not yield to hard work? Some one has said, "There is no such thing as genius, it is but another name for incessant, unremitting toil." There is great force in this view, for where, at great intervals, an isolated individual may seem to thrive without any effort and by brilliance of intellect alone, yet in the vast majority of instances, the successful men are the most industrious and painstaking. If the whole truth were known we venture to say that even the so called "genius," who seems to accomplish great things without effort, really labors hard to achieve his ends but seeks to conceal the fact, as being subversive of the impression he seeks to convey.

Of this type of earnest workers is Mr. James F. Brown; starting with almost nothing he has continued year after year, to add to his possessions, and by arduous labor has constantly improved his holdings.

It was in Wythe county, Virginia, on the 11th of April, 1828, that he began his career. His father, Andrew Brown, was a native of Virginia, as was his mother Susan (Leonard) Brown. He was one of seven children, two sons besides himself, and four daughters, of whom the following are now living: Sophronia, wife of Thomas Henderson, of Independence, Kans.; John J. of Providence, Ind.; Mary, wife of Abraham Garshwiler, of Danville, Ind.; and Lena, wife of Henry Hildebrand, of Hendricks county, this State. Andrew Brown was a blacksmith in his early manhood, coming to Indiana in 1830, and buying land in White River township, Johnson county. He also added to this vocation that of farmer, and had 115 acres of fine land, giving his children farms besides this. He died here in 1864, at the age of sixty-four years, his wife surviving him until 1873, when she passed away at the age of seventy-two years. Both were earnest and faithful Methodists. When Andrew Brown came to Indiana he built a log cabin, and the country was so wholly wild and undeveloped that he often had to fight away the wolves with firebrands from his cabin, he having at that time no door, and the wolves when hungry, being perfectly fearless and exceedingly dangerous. At that early day all kinds of game were plentiful, and Mr. Brown often killed deer while standing in his cabin doorway. Wild hogs were abundant, and he often killed these, and used them to advantage in the sustenance of his family.

The paternal grandfather bore the same name as the father and was also a native of Virginia.

Mr. James F. Brown spent his boyhood days in White River township, and early interested himself in the tilling of the soil. Taking up blacksmithing he pursued this occupation with his father for some fifteen or twenty years, moving to Franklin in 1872, where he has since lived. He remained with his parents until he reached the age of twenty-four years, when his father presented him with a deed to 100 acres of timber land, which he at once set about clearing. Gradually adding more land to this from time to time, he now finds himself still the proud possessor of over 100 acres of land, after having given to his children various tracts of land.

On Aug. 21, 1851, Mr. Brown was joined in marriage to Martha Flake, daughter of Adam and Elizabeth Flake, and by her had nine children—three sons and six daughters—as follows: Susan, Angeline, Joan, Laura, Wiley, William, Andrew, Ida and Effie. Of these children Susan died in infancy; Angeline married Daniel Doty, of Franklin, and has three children, Florence, Ethel and Goldie; Joan still remains at home unmarried; Laura lost her life when at the age of sixteen by fire; Wiley, a prosperous farmer in Franklin township, married Mary Drake, and has six children, Carl, Effie, Hazel, Homer, Johnnie and Laura; William died in infancy; Andrew, an enterprising farmer in Franklin township, married Amanda Gillaspay, and has seven children, James, Edith, Iona, Carl, Zella, Alice and Paul; Ida married Frank Sturgeon, of Needham township, and has one child Harrie; Effie married Fred Holstein, of Needham township, and has one child, Roy.

Mrs. Martha (Flake) Brown died in 1891, at the age of fifty-six years, and on the second day of December in the following year Mr. Brown was married to Lydia Henderson, who departed this life July 16, 1895, leaving two children, Clarence and Lydia Ellen. Clarence was accidentally killed by the turning over of a wagon upon him when he was about four years of age, and Lydia died when an infant of three weeks.

On May 14, 1896, Mr. Brown married Ellen Solenberg, daughter of Eli and Martha (Johnson) Solenberg, who claimed Brown county, Ohio, as the place of their nativity, and came to Indiana in 1853 locating in Edinburg. Mr. Solenberg was a carpenter by occupation and now resides in Franklin, his wife having died in 1890, at the age of about sixty-two years. Both were members of the Methodist Church. Mrs. Brown's paternal grandfather was Joseph Solenberg of Ohio, where he died. Her maternal grandfather was Richard Johnson, a soldier in the war of 1812. He lived to an advanced age, his widow still surviving him, and drawing a pension from the United States. She resides in Bethel, Ohio, and has eight or ten children.

Both Mr. Brown and his wife are influential members of the Christian Church, where they have for many years been most highly esteemed. He is also a Master Mason in Franklin Lodge. In political belief he has always identified himself with the Democratic party, and from the ranks of the voters has rendered efficient service to it in times past. The life of Mr. Brown is a brilliant example for the rising generation to emulate. Now, the tendency, not alone of impetuous youth but of all men, is to seek to accomplish a life work in a day, by speculation or other wild ventures, with the too common result of failure and misery. Could the people of today but fully appreciate the lessons taught by the experience of this one man, the whole country would profit greatly thereby, and it would enjoy more happiness and true prosperity.

ELMER Q. THAYER, one of the enterprising business men of Noblesville, Ind., comes of Puritan English stock, his ancestors having been Colonial settlers of New England, and his grandfather was a native of Vermont.

Elmer Q. Thayer was born in Aroma, Hamilton Co., Ind., Aug. 26, 1869. He received a common school education, and was reared on the farm, later attending the Normal College at Danville, Ind., from which he was graduated in 1894. He learned the business of photography in Noblesville, with C. C. Pike, now of Indianapolis, and opened a studio in 1898, purchasing a complete outfit of modern appliances. He met with almost instantaneous success, and he has since built up a large business, his work ranking with the best in the State. He attends the State and National conventions, and keeps well abreast of the times as to recent inventions and improvements.

Mr. Thayer was married Dec. 24, 1895, in Arcadia to Miss Lena R. Myers, born on her father's farm near Arcadia, daughter of George W. and Sarah C. (Cluckner) Myers. George W. Myers is an old settler of White River township. Mr. and Mrs. Thayer are the parents of four children: Nolia Kathleen, Rudyard, Donald and Albert, the latter two of whom are twins. Mr. and Mrs. Thayer are members of the Christian Church. He belongs to the I. O. O. F., Lodge No. 125, Noblesville, and to Cherokee Tribe, No. 96. I. O. R. M.; and in politics is a Republican. Mr. Thayer has studied his business with the conception and feeling of an artist, and his photographs are portraits in the true sense of the word.

THEODORE C. STEELE, artist, with a well equipped studio in the Security Trust building, Indianapolis, was born Sept. 11, 1847, in Owen county, Ind. His parents, Samuel H. and Harriet N. (Evans) Steele, were both natives of Indiana. His grandfather was of Scotch-Irish descent and was born in Kentucky, where he engaged in farming. He was one of the early pioneer settlers in Indiana, as his father had been in Kentucky, coming from Virginia. He married Anna Johnson, and they had a family of eleven children.

Samuel Steele was born in Owen county, Ind., and followed the trade of saddler there, later becoming a merchant. In 1852 he moved to Montgomery county and established himself in the mercantile business at Waveland, dying in that village in 1862, at the age of thirty-seven years. His widow still survives, aged eighty-two years, residing at Albany, Oregon. In but one particular did they disagree, and that was in their religious association, he being a Methodist and she a Presbyterian. They had five children born to them: Theodore C.; Charles A., of Wichita, Kans.; William J., of Jefferson, Oregon; Samuel N., of Albany, Oregon; and Altice H., of Oregon.

Jesse Evans, Mr. Steele's maternal grandfather, came to Indiana from Tennessee, being one of the first settlers in Owen county. His forebears came from North Carolina. Mr. Evans was a soldier in the Black Hawk war. His family consisted of seven children.

In tracing the ancestry of the distinguished subject of this sketch we find no indication of the source of the artistic talents which have made his name known all through his native State. Good, worthy farming people, they possessed the courage and enterprise of pioneers, living useful, exemplary lives and dying respected by all who knew them, but not showing that unmistakable talent which makes the difference between an art lover and a simple tiller of the soil. Mr. Steele was reared in the village of Waveland, Owen county, and had only the advantages afforded by the local schools. His talent was inborn and began to display itself when he was but a child, his success at painting portraits without instructions, being one of the surprises of the town. In later years he was able to go to Munich and spent the years between 1880 and 1885 under the best masters at the Royal Academy. Since then his interests have centered at Indianapolis, where he has long striven to build up an art institute which will be a credit to the city and will show the good work that has been done by American artists, and particularly those of Indiana.

For a number of years after his return from abroad Mr. Steele taught art in the city, but has not given his attention personally to teaching for the past six years. He is one of the directors of the Indianapolis Art Association, which has several hundred members, and is a body enthused with the idea of founding here, amid ideally artistic surroundings, a great art institution. Mr. Steele belongs to the Society of Western Artists and served ably as the president of the organization from 1898 to 1900. He has had an individual place in the art history of the city and has devoted years to its encouragement.

Mr. Steele was married Feb. 14, 1869, to Miss Mary Elizabeth Lakin, daughter of Simmons and Mary (Matson) Lakin. Five children were born to this union: Rembrandt T., Margaret, Charles, Shirley L., and one who died in infancy. Of these, Rembrandt T. is a designer and resides in Indianapolis; he married Helen McKay, and they have one son, Horace McKay. Margaret resides at home. Charles died young. Shirley L., who resides in Indianapolis, married Myra Daggett, and they have one daughter, Margaret.

The beautiful family home is located at No. 430 East St. Clair street, and it is a repository of many artistic gems, not only the work of Mr. Steele's own brush, but collections of the works of others from his own and foreign lands.

Mr. Steele has never taken any very active part in politics, but is an independent Republican and performs the duties of good citizenship. He belongs to the Plymouth Congregational Church, of which religious body his wife was a consistent member until her lamented death, which took place in 1900, when she was aged fifty years.

DANIEL C. LaGRANGE (deceased), a prominent, substantial and representative farmer of Section 8, in Franklin township, Johnson county, was born Feb. 9, 1826, in Mercer county, Ky., son of Peter and Lammie (Covert) LaGrange, both of whom were natives of New Jersey.

The paternal grandparents were natives of New Jersey, and the grandfather was a soldier in the Revolution. The Coverts also came from New Jersey, but Grandfather Covert moved to Kentucky and died there in advanced age. His family was large and descendants may still be found in that State.

Peter and Lammie (Covert) LaGrange were among the early settlers in Kentucky, with their parents, and came to Indiana, themselves pioneers, in the fall of 1826, only ten years after this great State was admitted to the Union. These early settlers possessed stout hearts as well as physical strength, for at that time the land they entered from the Government was but a wilderness, and had to be cleared before cultivation could take place. Mr. LaGrange, with great labor, cleared up his farm of 160 acres, but only lived until about fifty-five years of age. His widow survived him many years, dying in her eighty-fourth year. Both were members of the Presbyterian Church.

To have lived in and been identified with the growth, progress and development of one section of country for a space of seventy-five years, is not given to every individual, but such was the fortune of Daniel C. LaGrange, who lived in Franklin township from the time he was one year old. The wonderful changes which took place in that time, would require many pages to describe. From the virgin forest he witnessed the development of a rich farming country, the transformation of the pioneer cabins into fine homes, stately school houses and handsome churches, and the proportionate increase in the financial condition of the people. Mr. LaGrange had very meager educational opportunities, mainly in the subscription schools. Until maturity he lived with his mother, and then began life for himself, by buying first an eighty-acre tract, selling it to advantage for another, and at the time of his death he owned a fine farm of 160 acres, and in addition a compact little home place of seven acres, improved with fine buildings, in the Hopewell district, three miles west of Franklin. Here he lived in great comfort for over twenty-five years, and here his death occurred late in November, 1904. He was greatly beloved in the community and was affectionately known as "Uncle Dan."

In 1848 Mr. LaGrange married Catherine List, daughter of Theodore and Susan (Van Nuys) List, and a family of six children was born to them, namely: Margaret, Samuel, John, Laura, William and Edith. Of these, Margaret, who married John E. Banta, and had a daughter Minnie (who married Bert Covert and has two children, John and Margaret), is deceased. Samuel, a Presbyterian preacher, located at Bloomington, Minn., married Mildred Hall, and has two children, Myron and Mary. John, who lives in Franklin, Ind., married Effie Demott, and has two children, Edna and Mabel. Laura died in early childhood, and William at the age of two years. Edith married Newton Brown, of Pleasant township, and their surviving child is Margaret Catherine. The mother of this family passed away in 1890, aged about sixty years. Both she and her husband belonged to the Presbyterian Church.

Mr. LaGrange was a lifelong Republican, and took an active interest in the affairs of his township. For a number of years he was a school director, and also served efficiently for a long period as supervisor. In a marked degree Mr. LaGrange enjoyed the esteem and regard of his fellow-citizens, who knew him to be a man of strict integrity. He kept in touch with the march of men and events and throughout his life was interested in the enterprises which promised to benefit Franklin township. As a matter of general interest it may be mentioned that one of his ancestors lived in Trenton, N. J., during the Revolutionary war, and he was captured by the British and was never heard from afterward.

JOHN S. MCCONNELL, a general merchant at Cumberland, Ind., was born in Marion county, Ind., Sept. 26, 1851, son of Joseph and Mary (McAdoo) McConnell.

Joseph McConnell, Sr., grandfather of John S., was born in Ireland, and early emigrated to this country. For a time he had his home in Pennsylvania, and then removed to the vicinity of Cincinnati. He became a pioneer in the Territory of Indiana, and settled on a farm in Warren township, Marion county, where he died at the age of eighty-four years. Two sons were born to him; William and Joseph. William McAdoo, the maternal grandfather of John S. McConnell, was a very early settler in Warren township, Marion Co., Ind., where he followed farming, and where he died in old age. His two children both preceded him to the unknown shore.

Joseph McConnell, son of Joseph, Sr., spent the first fifty years of his life engaged in farming, and then became a general merchant in Cumberland. About 1832 he came to Marion county, and died in Cumberland Oct. 3, 1884, at the age of seventy-two years, lacking only fifteen days. For about eighteen years Mr. McConnell served as justice of the peace. His wife, Mary McAdoo, died in 1856, at the age of forty-five years. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and both she and her husband stood high in the esteem of the community. They were the parents of five sons and six daughters, and five of their family are now living: David, of Indianapolis; Nancy (twin to David), the wife of Benjamin Kinney, of Hancock county, Ind.; Martha, the wife of Leander White, whose home is near Irvington, Ind.; John S.; and Lucinda, the wife of George Huntington, of Marion county. Two of the sons served in the Union army during the Civil war: David; and James, who was an orderly sergeant in the 35th Ind. V. I., and who served four years and four months.

John S. McConnell has spent his entire life in Marion county. He left the farm when he was twelve years old, but lived at home until he attained mature years. His education was secured in the public schools, and his first business experiences were in his father's store, with whom he remained as long as the latter lived, and then became the proprietor of the establishment.

Mr. McConnell was married July 4, 1877, to Miss Bidelia, daughter of Dennis and Mary (Sullivan) Foley. To this union have come three children, Joseph, Mary Gertrude and Mabel, all of whom are living, and at home. Mrs. McConnell is a member of the Catholic Church.

Mr. McConnell belongs to Cumberland

Camp, No. 8146, M. W. of A., and is a man of much character and standing in the community where his many excellent qualities and manifest ability are recognized, making him many friends, and winning for him the public favor to a very creditable degree. He is a Democrat, and under President Cleveland was made postmaster at Cumberland, a position he held a little more than five years.

Mrs. McConnell's parents came, in 1863, from County Kerry, Ireland, Kilgarvin being their native town. They first settled in Cambridge City, Ind., and later lived at Louisville, Philadelphia, and Cumberland. Her father, Dennis Foley, died in Cumberland in 1876, at the age of sixty-two years. His widow is still living, and has her home in Indianapolis. They had five sons and three daughters, and all but one of their children are now living; Daniel; Mary, the wife of Robert Hayes; John; Bidelia, Mrs. McConnell; Dennis; Patrick; and Margaret. The paternal grandfather of Mrs. McConnell died in Ireland; John Sullivan, her maternal grandfather, came to Indiana, and died at Cambridge, when over eighty years of age.

JOSEPH R. EBAUGH, senior partner of the firm of J. R. Ebaugh & Co., general merchants at Cumberland, Ind., was born in that place Feb. 4, 1869, son of Jesse R. and Mary (McConnell) Ebaugh.

The Ebaughs came originally from Germany, and settled in Maryland. Jacob Ebaugh, paternal grandfather of Joseph R., was born in Maryland, and lived a quiet, unostentatious but useful and honorable life as a farmer. He died in 1895, at the age of seventy-two years. Among his children were: Jesse R., mentioned below; Frank T., now living in Freedland, Baltimore Co., Md.; Jacob F., a resident of Snoddersburg, Carroll Co., Md.; Carrie, wife of Mr. Craft, of Baltimore.

Jesse R. Ebaugh, a native of Maryland, was a blacksmith in his early manhood, and shod horses for the government. During the war he came to Indiana, and for about forty years his home was in Marion county. For some three years he lived at Wanamaker, then called New Bethel, and from that point he removed to Cumberland, where he was engaged at blacksmithing for a time, but afterward went into trade. He died there in 1898, at the age of fifty-eight years. He was the administrator of his father's estate, and settled it up to the satisfaction of all concerned.

He was a man of remarkable judgment, and was honorable in all his dealings. On Aug. 30, 1866, he married Mary McConnell, who was born in Marion county, daughter of Joseph McConnell. The McConnells originated in Ireland, and the first representative of this family in America came over in the early days of the eighteenth century. Joseph McConnell was a merchant in Cincinnati, and became an early settler in Marion county, dying when over seventy years of age in Cumberland, in which community he had become prominent, serving for a time as a justice of the peace. His character and ability were both recognized. Several of his sons served in the Civil war. Mrs. Mary (McConnell) Ebaugh died in 1875, the mother of four children: Jesse; Mary, who married Otis Snyder, of Hancock county; Joseph R.; and William, deceased. For his second wife, Jesse R. Ebaugh married Mrs. Mary Shepherd, widow of Andy Shepherd, and daughter of Aaron Caylor.

Joseph R. Ebaugh has spent all his life in Marion county, and was reared to manhood in Cumberland. His education was secured in the schools of his native place, and in Danville, Ind., where he took a normal course. When only fifteen years of age he applied himself to the learning of the carpenter's trade, at which he worked for about twelve years. After the death of his father he became his successor in the general store, having William A. Caylor for a partner. In addition to his store interest he owns some valuable real estate in Cumberland, and is a provident and forehanded man, of marked business ability, and high character.

Mr. Ebaugh is a Baptist in religious belief. He is a member of Cumberland Camp, No. 8146, Modern Woodmen. In politics he has always been a Democrat.

ABRAM D. ATEN, a retired farmer of the city of Franklin, and one of the substantial men of that locality, was born Sept. 7, 1824, in Preble county, Ohio, six miles from Eaton, and one mile from West Alexandria, son of Aaron M. and Margaret (DeMott) Aten, natives of Kentucky.

Adrian Aten, his paternal grandfather, was a native of Kentucky and a farmer by occupation, who moved to Ohio, and died there at an advanced age, the father of four children. The maternal grandfather, Abram DeMott, was a native of Kentucky, who moved to Preble county, Ohio, devoted himself to farming, and there died advanced in years; he had six sons and two daughters.

Aaron M. Aten moved from Kentucky to Ohio in the pioneer days, settling in Preble county, Ohio, and in 1840 removed to Indiana, locating in Franklin township, Johnson county, two miles southwest of Franklin, where he purchased a farm of eighty acres, and later added 120 acres more, thus having 200 acres in all, nearly all of which he improved. Here he resided until 1880, when he went to Illinois and settled in Cumberland county, and died at the age of eighty. His wife died many years prior to him. His second wife was a Mrs. Martha Banta, widow of Albert Banta, and daughter of a Mr. Voris, and after her death, he married a Mrs. McKinley. Mr. Aten was a member of the Presbyterian Church, to which his several wives belonged. Ten children were born of his first marriage, two of whom are now living: Abram D.; and Dorothy Jane, who married James Voris, and after his death E. P. Thompson, of Shelbyville, and he died in January, 1907.

The boyhood of Abram D. Aten was passed in Ohio, and when he was sixteen years of age he came to Johnson county, Ind., where he has since resided, a period of sixty-two years. His preliminary education was obtained in Ohio, but later he went to the district school in Franklin township and to the County Seminary in Franklin. For several years he taught during the winter term, and farmed in the summer, living at home until grown to manhood. During all this time he was frugal and industrious, and accumulated sufficient to purchase 120 acres of land, by making a payment down and several additional ones. To this he added twenty acres and still later, eighty more, and then he purchased his comfortable home in the city of Franklin. Mr. Aten has given 100 acres to his children and has 120 acres left, in addition to the home in Franklin. Until 1877 he resided upon the farm, but at that time, removed to Franklin, where he resides, enjoying the comforts his industry and thrift have provided.

In November, 1852, Mr. Aten was married to Miss Eliza Jane Thompson, daughter of William and Susan (High) Thompson. Four children were born of this marriage: Susan M. married Taylor Wheat and they live in the Hopewell settlement. Riley W. died at the age of twenty-six years, unmarried. Mary Alma is the wife of Rev. Edward Jewett, a Methodist minister, now in Greenwood, and they have four children, Charley, Chester, Mary and Russell. Florence married (first) Lew Breedlove (now deceased) and (second) his cousin, George Breedlove, a physician. Mrs. Eliza Jane Aten died about 1870, aged about forty years. She was a member of the Methodist Church. Mr. Aten married for his second wife, Miss Jennie Epperson, daughter of Littleton Berry and Elizabeth Epperson, both from near Natural Bridge, Va. One child was born of this union, Opal, who was the wife of Conora Clemmer, and she died in 1901. Mr. and Mrs. Abram D. Aten are members of the Methodist Church. In politics Mr. Aten supports the candidates of the Prohibitionist party, he taking a deep interest in the temperance movement.

GEORGE ALBERT PENNY, a veteran of the Civil war, who is a substantial business man and highly esteemed citizen of Muncie, Ind., was born Oct. 5, 1845, in Harrison, Ohio, son of Thomas and Elmira (Osgood) Penny.

The Penny family originally came from England, as did that of Osgood, which is an old Colonial New York family long settled in the Mohawk Valley. Tradition says that members of this latter family were soldiers in the Revolutionary war. Thomas Penny, father of George Albert, came from England to America when about eighteen years of age, one of his brothers, Richard, having come on before and settled at Cincinnati, where he worked at his trade of carpenter. William, an older brother, was a tailor, and it is believed that he was the first of the family to come to this country. George, a younger brother, married in England and came later to America with his family, settling in Harrison, Ohio, where he followed cabinet-making. Richard and George started a cabinet-maker's shop in Harrison, Ohio, later engaging in an undertaking and finally in a furniture business, continuing in the latter for many years, the manufacturing of bedsteads being their specialty. John T. Penny, a son of George, still carries on this business.

Thomas Penny engaged with his brother Richard in the grocery business, and in Harrison married Elmira Osgood, born in Mohawk Valley, N. Y., near the Indian reservation, about 1820, daughter of Silas and Mary (Postem) Osgood, and granddaughter of Silas Osgood, who it is believed was a soldier in the Revolutionary war. He was one of the early pioneers of Harrison, Ohio, but later settled in Oxford, Butler Co., Ohio, where he was buried. The families of father and son met together and came down the Monongahela river to the Ohio river, and thence to Cincinnati in a flat-boat. Silas Osgood was a wheelwright by trade, and lived to be about seventy-five years old. Two of his children, Silas and John, first settled in Ohio, and latter in Indiana. Silas Osgood, the grandfather of George Albert Penny, married Mary Postem of New York State, where the first three of their children were born, the others being born in Ohio. They were as follows: Elmira, Aaron, Mary, Emeline and Caroline, twins; and Levina, yet living, who married Anton Wears, and resides in Oxford, Ohio. Silas Osgood was a resident of Oxford, where he followed his trade for many years, and also operated a chair factory. He was a member of the Universalist Church, an old-line Whig in political matters, and lived to be about seventy years of age, his death occurring in Oxford.

Thomas Penny had received the common school education of his day. He continued in the grocery business with his brother for some twenty years, his death occurring in 1859, his widow passing away at the age of forty-five years, in Oxford, Ohio, whither she had removed after her husband's death. Thomas Penny was a Presbyterian in religious belief, and in politics was an old-line Whig, serving his party as trustee of Harrison and as a member of the council, he being a member of the council in Indiana, as the State line ran through Harrison. He was a member of the I. O. O. F., and an original member of the Red Men. His children were: Harriet E., George A. and William Henry.

William Henry Penny, youngest son of Thomas, was born Oct. 25, 1849. On Oct. 5, 1871, he married in Oxford, Ohio, Laura Wing, born in that town, daughter of Zimri and Maria (Crane) Wing, the former of whom was a soldier in the Civil war. The Wings are one of the oldest families in the country, descending from Rev. John and Deborah (Batchlor) Wing. William Henry Penny came to Muncie, Ind., in 1888, and here he has since been engaged in brick and broom making. His children are: Cora, Carrie, Frank and Nellie B. Mrs. Penny is a member of the Methodist Church, and active in church and charitable work.

George Albert Penny, the subject proper of this sketch, received a common school education, and until sixteen years of age worked at brickmaking. At this time, in Oxford, when returning from work one night, he enlisted as a private in Company K, 86th O. V. I., for six months, and served until honorably discharged at Cleveland, in January, 1863, his services being in Ohio and Kentucky. In the Morgan raid his regiment assisted in the capture of Morgan on the Ohio river, and two companies of this regiment served as his guard to Columbus, Ohio. He was with his regiment at the capture of Cumberland Gap, and remained there as guard for about five months, the regiment then marching back to Camp Nelson, Ky. After his discharge he returned to Oxford, and after two weeks re-enlisted in January, 1863, as a private of Company B, 69th O. V. I., for three years or during the war, being honorably discharged at Camp Dennison, Ohio, and mustered out at Louisville, Ky., in July, 1865. He served during this term in Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, North and South Carolina, Virginia and the District of Columbia, in the great Atlanta Campaign, where the Union troops were under fire for almost four months; the battle of Resaca; Fair Hope Church; Allatoona; Kenesaw Mountain, where he was shot in the elbow by a piece of shell, being confined to the hospital, which, however, he left before he was fully recovered, in order to rejoin his regiment at Atlanta. He was at Bentonville, N. C., in the skirmish at Raleigh, the siege of Savannah, and did much foraging in Georgia and through the Carolinas. He marched with his regiment to Raleigh, N. C., and participated in the noted forced march from Raleigh to Richmond, the Union troops sometimes making forty miles a day, and he finally took part in the Grand Review at Washington, D. C. He was ever an active, faithful soldier, and did his duty cheerfully and well.

After the war he engaged in brick-making with his brother, William Henry, and in 1888 they located in Muncie and have since been engaged in broom making. Mr. Penny is a Republican in political sentiment. He was a charter member of Milligan Post, G. A. R., Oxford, Ohio, where he was officer of the guard and officer of the day, and is now connected with Williams Post, G. A. R.,

Muncie, Ind. He is a good, honest, straightforward business man and public-spirited citizen, and is honored and esteemed by those who have the pleasure of his acquaintance.

WILLIAM H. BRANSON, a reliable and respected citizen of Anderson, was born Sept. 5, 1846, in Shelby county, Ind., son of James B. and Lovina (Cotton) Branson.

The Bransons are of Scotch extraction, and this branch belongs to an old established family of Buncombe county, N. C. The grandparents of William H., Henley P. and Nancy (Holbrook) Branson, moved with their family from Buncombe county, N. C., to Shelby county, Ind., about 1829. There the grandfather secured government land and cleared up a farm of 200 acres from the heavy timber, and here he passed his remaining days, and this farm is still in the hands of his descendants. He and his wife had these children: James B.; Elizabeth; Franklin; Uriah, who died young; Nancy J. and Jane, twins; Landy H.; Mary; Jacob H. and Leander M. Mr. Branson was a member of the Baptist Church. He died in 1869, and his wife died on the farm in 1878.

James B. Branson, father of William H., was born in March, 1823, in Buncombe county, N. C., and was six years old when the family came to Shelby county. He married Lovina Cotton, daughter of William and Mary (Anderson) Cotton. Both the Cotton and Anderson families were ones of prominence and the former was of Scotch-Irish, and the latter of Scotch extraction. William Cotton moved from near Dayton, Ohio, to Shelby county, Ind., about 1828, where he cleared up a large farm and became a substantial citizen. His children were: Robert; Joseph, who was a chaplain during the Civil war, and subsequently a Methodist minister; John, who was a soldier in the Mexican war; Lovina; Elizabeth and Thomas. William Cotton died in February, 1864, on his farm in Shelby county, which adjoins the Branson homestead. He was a deacon in the Baptist Church. James B. and Lovina (Cotton) Branson had two children, William H. and Thomas. Mrs. Branson died in July, 1849, and Mr. Branson married (second) Elizabeth Anderson, a daughter of Neil and Permelia (Leathers) Anderson. The Anderson family is of Kentucky stock and Neil Anderson was a soldier in the Revolutionary war. The children of this marriage were: Robert F.;

Permelia; Anna; Larz A., a substantial farmer living near Fort Wayne; Luella and James.

James B. Branson settled on a farm a half mile west of his father. It consisted of 189 acres, and he cleared this large body of land, made many improvements and erected comfortable and substantial buildings. Here he died at the age of seventy-four years, in April, 1897. In politics he was a Republican, but never pushed his ideas upon the attention of others. He was an industrious, quiet man, one who had enjoyed few educational advantages in the pioneer days, but had much native intelligence and his acquirements met all his needs.

William H. Branson was reared on his father's farm in Shelby county, attending school during the winter seasons and working on the farm through the summers. Thus he acquired a good, common school education which was interrupted by his enlistment for service in the Civil war, when only eighteen years of age. He joined Company F, 146th Ind. V. I., from Posey township, Rush Co., Ind., Jan. 3, 1865, for one year or during the war, as a private under Capt. Barton W. Cole. Mr. Branson was soon promoted to be corporal and color guard, and at Harper's Ferry he was promoted to be duty sergeant, serving as such until honorably discharged at Indianapolis; he was mustered out at Baltimore, Aug. 31, 1865. His services were performed at Harper's Ferry, his regiment being a part of General Hancock's reserve corps. He was a faithful soldier and did his full duty promptly and willingly. He took a deep interest in the duties of a soldier's life, especially the drill, and escaped without serious sickness. After the surrender of General Lee's army, a large part of it marched by the Union lines at Winchester, and Mr. Branson saw and conversed with a number of the Confederates. They were so ragged, dirty and tired that the scene was indelibly impressed on Mr. Branson's memory. He also witnessed much of the destructive effects of the raid made by General Sheridan through the Valley of the Shenandoah. After the war he returned to his home in Indiana and farmed on the old homestead until 1868.

Mr. Branson was married Feb. 25, 1868, to Nancy E. Hurst, born in Rush county, Ind., May 15, 1847, daughter of Rev. Emmons and Nancy J. (Hilligoss) Hurst, and they became the parents of Thomas A., William E. and Blanche E. (who married Ross Eshelman).

Rev. Emmons Hurst was born in 1810, in Fleming county, Ky., son of Rev. Landy Hurst, a pioneer Baptist minister of Fleming county, who was born in Virginia. Rev. Landy Hurst married Sarah Crowe, of Kentucky, and they came to Rush county, Ind., as pioneers, among the first settlers. Rev. Landy was one of the notable characters of his day. He preached old-time Methodism many years in Indiana, up and down through the wilderness and never ceased his labors until the close of his life of eighty years. He not only preached, but he worked, and was the means of organizing and building many of the early Methodist churches through the State. His son, Rev. Emmons Hurst, was born in Kentucky and accompanied his parents to Indiana at the age of sixteen years. He married Nancy J. Hilligoss, born May 25, 1802, in Fleming county, Ky., this marriage being celebrated when he was nineteen and she was fifteen years old. The young preacher and his child bride first settled in a log house and he worked until he had cleared up a farm of 200 acres which remained his home through life. During the Civil war he was enrolling officer of Walker township, Rush county, when the draft was ordered and its resistance caused distress and trouble. His father died in June, 1863, and when this draft disturbance was at its height, his body was being buried on his farm. Rev. Emmons Hurst, the enrolling officer, was obliged to attend the funeral and provost marshal Stephens and deputy Craycraft, concluded to make the enrollment. These officers stopped to enroll a man when they were ambushed by several men, supposed to belong to an anti-government organization, "The Knights of the Golden Circle," and both of the officers were killed, one of them being shot with eleven balls. A force of 500 soldiers were immediately sent from Indianapolis, and with this protection, Rev. Emmons Hurst completed the enrollment. He died in 1866. Mrs. Nancy J. Hurst still survives, at the age of over ninety years. She has been a lifelong member of the Baptist Church and retains her faculties to a remarkable degree. She became the mother of a large family (two of whom died in infancy), namely: William, Landy, Isaac, Alva, Emmons, Mary J., Sarah A., Margaret E., Nancy E., James E., Isaac and Martha.

Isaac Hilligoss, father of Mrs. Emmons Hurst, was also a pioneer of Rush county, Ind., and was born in Fleming county, Ky., where he married Nancy Inlow. They reared a family of sixteen children, and he owned a farm of 300 acres.

After his marriage William H. Branson settled first on a farm in Shelby county, Ind., on which he lived for two years, and then, in the latter part of 1870, moved to Anderson. Two years later he returned to Shelby county and resumed farming, until 1877, when he went to Rush county and continued to farm until 1881. From that date until 1890, he resided at Rushville, and then returned to Anderson. In his political sympathies Mr. Branson is a zealous Republican. He is a member of Major May Post, G. A. R., of Anderson, the Haymakers and the Improved Order of Red Men, having been a member of the latter body since its organization. He is a straightforward, liberal-minded man and a first-class citizen.

WENDELIN SCHIER, one of the first artistic glass workers to come to America, was born in Vienna, Austria, Sept. 26, 1858, son of Wendelin (Sr.) and Veronia (Schreier) Schier, natives of that country.

Wendelin Schier, Sr., was born about 1831, and received a good education. Although hardly more than a boy at the time of the rebellion of 1848, he served in that struggle as an officer. As a consequence his property was confiscated, but he remained in Austria and was located at Rochlitz as a veterinarian and blacksmith. His great-uncle, Paul Schier, was a brigadier-general in the Austrian army, and Wendelin Schier likewise saw considerable military service, being in the war with Schleswig-Holstein in 1858, and in the Austro-Russian war in 1866. He lived to the age of seventy years, and was prosperous, accumulating a considerable property, so that he became a man of importance in his locality, and was chosen first councilman in his city. He left a family of eleven children: Julius, Wendelin, Paul, Rosamund, Sigmond, Rudolph, Julia, Mary, Matilda, Clotilda and Adelaide.

Wendelin Schier, son of Wendelin, Sr., was given a fair education, taking a chemical course in an architectural college. He also spent six months in Munich, Bavaria, in another similar institution. When only eleven years old he began to learn the business of architectural glass work, and for twenty-eight years has been in that work. At the age of twenty he began a period of three years military service in his native country. Six months were spent in the military school at Buda-Pesth, Hungary, and he became first corporal and then orderly sergeant. He belonged to regiment No. 5, Austrian Field Artillery, and earned the reputation of being a well-drilled and capable officer.

In 1878 Julius Schier had come to America and was established in Boston as a glass worker, for he, too, was skilled in that line. In 1882 Wendelin Schier decided to join his elder brother, and accordingly sailed from Bremen on a North German-Lloyd steamer, landing at Hoboken, Sept. 26, 1882. Instead of going to Boston, he secured work in Pennsylvania and remained there eight years engaged as an artistic glass worker. When he finally left Pennsylvania he took a place in Anderson, Ind., as superintendent of a department in the glass works there. Three years later he made another change and spent several years working in glass in Indiana. He came, July 6, 1901, to Alexandria, where he has ever since worked. Not only is he a man of great ability and talent in his chosen line, but he has developed a finely balanced and strong character that makes him a valuable citizen.

Mr. Schier was married in 1882 just before leaving Rochlitz to Miss Wilhelmina Bergman, daughter of Vinzens Bergman, and the journey to America was their wedding trip. Three sons have been born to them: Wendelin F., Rudolph and Paul. Ever since he became a citizen of this country Mr. Schier has been a strong Republican, and has been actively interested in politics. Religiously he is a Lutheran and during his residence in Pennsylvania was trustee of his church. He is also active in lodge work, was one of the charter members of the Elks in Alexandria, and is a lieutenant in the uniform rank of the I. O. R. M.

From boyhood Mr. Schier has been a great lover of nature and devoted to hunting, and since coming to this country he has indulged in considerable hunting of big game, in Pennsylvania, North and South Carolina, Arkansas, Mississippi, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Texas and Indian Territory, killing deer, wolves, moose and elk, and he has a number of fine specimens as evidences of his woodcraft.

ALFRED BROWN, of Madison county, Ind., is of pioneer Indiana stock, and was born four miles south of Anderson, Feb. 13, 1846, son of Robert and Margaret (Proby) Brown.

The Brown family was founded in America by Martin Brown, who was born in England, but ran away from home in his youth and settled in Virginia. Then he married, and reared a family of three children, Martin, Abel, and a daughter, who married a Mr. McAlister. In 1832 the younger son moved to Indiana, and at a somewhat later period the father and elder brother followed. The latter settled in Madison county, and Martin Brown, Sr., made his home with him until he died at an advanced age. The father was a man of strong character, and had marked peculiarities, some of which are still remembered. To the end of his life he wore the old-fashioned knee breeches, and ate his meals on a lap-board by himself.

Abel Brown was born in Virginia, in 1775, and there grew up and was married. His wife, Polly Frazier, was of Scotch-Irish descent, and she and her husband had the following children: Robert, born Jan. 16, 1811; Preston, in 1813; Franklin, in 1815; Hamilton, in 1817; Mary Ann, in 1819; Elizabeth, in 1821; Martin, in 1823; William, in 1825; Minerva, in 1827; Abel, in 1829; and Julia, in 18—. The journey to Indiana was made in 1832, with horses and wagons, and Mr. Brown's chief occupation for years after was teaming. He drove a four-horse team with a big Conestoga wagon, with the bed bowed up at each end to keep the load from dipping as they went up and down hill. Mr. Brown made trips to Cincinnati, Pendleton and Huntsville, hauling merchandise and all kinds of goods. Abel Brown took up eighty acres of wooded land, between Big and Little Prairies, three miles south of Anderson, and left most of the work of clearing the place to his sons, while he attended to his teaming business. Their first home was a log cabin, but after the purchase of a second tract of fifty-nine acres, east of his first piece, he put up a good substantial, but plain, house, and there spent his last years. He died in 1865 at the age of ninety. His wife died at their farm home in 1847. Mr. Brown was one of the prosperous farmers of his section and did well in all he undertook. In politics he was a Jacksonian Democrat.

Robert Brown, born Jan. 16, 1811, was just twenty-one years of age when he came to Indiana, and for five years devoted himself to the clearing and cultivating of his father's land. In 1837 he married and settled on the fifty-nine-acre tract already referred to, which he purchased from his father a little later. This tract he cleared from the forest, and made his home there in a little log cabin, consisting of only one room, 16x18 feet, with a loft reached by a ladder. It was built in the primitive fashion of the day and place, covered with oak boards four feet long, held down by weight poles which were kept in place by knees and lower poles fastened with pins. There was a puncheon floor split out of white ash and kept white by the constant care of Mrs. Brown. The fire-place, large enough to hold a three foot back log and a four foot front log, was built of stone and the stick chimney was daubed with mud. This was the home of the family for years until 1854, when Mr. Brown built a story and a half residence, the first frame house in that vicinity. Its style was due to Mrs. Brown's objections to a two-story house. Robert Brown eventually acquired 128 acres of land, some of the best farming land in Madison county, and was one of the well-to-do men of the locality. He was noted among the many good hunters of the region and killed a number of deer and wild turkey. In politics he was a Republican.

Robert Brown was married in 1837, in Fall Creek township, to Margaret, daughter of William and Millie Proby, born in Pasquotank county, N. C. William Proby was a native of North Carolina and died there, leaving a daughter by a former marriage, Polly, and two daughters by the second, Margaret and Betsey. Mrs. Proby afterward married Dempsey Wilson, and they moved to Indiana in 1833, settling on eighty acres two miles south of Anderson, to which forty acres east of it were later added. There were four children born to this second union, John, Benjamin, Sallie and Eliza Wilson. The children of Robert and Margaret Brown were as follows: Mary J., born Sept. 1, 1839, who married, and died in 1892; Lorenzo D., born May 7, 1841; William A., born April 25, 1842; Margaret A., born March 8, 1844; and Alfred, born Feb. 13, 1846. Robert Brown died in his sixty-ninth year, and his wife survived him two years and passed away July 30, 1882. They were members of the Methodist Church. Mr. Brown was hardworking and industrious and his corn-crib, never empty, was typical of his forethought and prudence.

Alfred Brown grew up amid frontier surroundings, but received a rather better education than was sometimes possible under such conditions. His first two terms were passed in a log cabin school house with desks of slabs, held up by pins. Afterward the school was held in a frame house. The boy attended every winter until he was sixteen, working on the farm during the summers. The following year he enlisted, and on Oct. 3, 1863, was mustered in as a private in Company B, 130th Ind. V. I., under Capt. Ephraim Doll, and after more than two years' active service, without missing a day from his company, he was honorably discharged Dec. 16, 1865, at Charlotte, N. C. He was in the Atlanta Campaign and in the battles of Burnt Hickory, Kenesaw Mountain, Buzzard's Roost, Peach Tree Creek, Decatur, Franklin, Nashville and Wilmington, marching through the northern and eastern States of the Confederacy. At Nashville Mr. Brown was struck on the chin by a spent ball, but was not otherwise injured. He had just left the picket line on another occasion and was eating breakfast with a comrade from Anderson, Jacob Ellis, when the latter was struck down but Mr. Brown escaped injury.

On his return from the war Alfred Brown resumed work on the homestead, and after his father's death bought out the other heirs and made the place his own property. To the original fifty-nine acres he added nineteen and later sold the whole tract. He then bought 120 acres of partly improved land in Stony Creek township, and lived there until he had brought it all under cultivation and then sold it. His next enterprise, was to purchase, in company with Levi De Lougher, 260 acres in Green township. He also owned three houses and lots in Anderson, and was for some years located there, engaged in contracting. He moved to his present residence in 1897. Mr. Brown is not only a hard worker and a very industrious man, but he has unusually sound judgment in business matters and has been very successful.

Mr. Brown married (first) Miss Parley A. Stanley, and had the following children: Elmer E., born June 25, 1869; Valeria C., born Jan. 24, 1871; and Elder E., born July 19, 1872, who died Sept. 15, 1873. For his second wife, Mr. Brown married, on Sept. 12, 1877, Barbara A. Souders, born in Ohio, July 5, 1861, daughter of Peter and Catherine (Mott) Souders, who were of German ancestry. Peter Souders owned a farm in Ohio, where he died in 1861, and his widow later married William Brown, now of Anderson. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Brown, viz.: Garrett, born Nov. 21, 1881, deceased Dec. 23, 1881; Blanche, born Feb. 15, 1883, deceased Sept. 25, 1883; Chester Arthur, born in Fall Creek township, Nov. 7, 1884; Oscar B., born Oct. 14, 1886; August V., born Aug. 17, 1889; Storie Marie, Aug. 3, 1892; and Palma L., born Jan. 16, 1897. The parents are both members of the Christian Church of which Mr. Brown is a trustee and a member of the board.

ENOS W. HOOVER, a prominent lawyer of Indianapolis, occupying rooms Nos. 7, 8 and 9, at No. 10 North Pennsylvania street, was born in Maywood, Ind., March 3, 1862, son of Carey S. and Massie A. (Sylvester) Hoover, both natives of Maywood, and both born where they now live, four miles southwest of Indianapolis.

Andrew Hoover, grandfather of Enos W., was one of the early settlers of Marion county, and secured land from the government, four miles southwest of Indianapolis, which he transformed into a fertile and attractive farm, on which he died about 1864, at the age of seventy-eight years. He was of German descent and reared a goodly family.

Gabriel Sylvester, the maternal grandfather of Enos W. Hoover, was one of the pioneer farmers of Marion county. When he came to this country the Indians were still numerous in the vicinity of Indianapolis, and wild game very abundant. His was a large family, and when he died, about 1880, he was a very old man.

Carey S. Hoover has spent his entire life on one farm. He and his wife are Methodists in religious faith. They are honest and industrious people, and their many good qualities and neighborly characteristics command the respect and esteem of all who know them. They have had ten children—six sons and four daughters—Flora A.; Maria (wife of Aaron A. Wright); Enos W.; Lena L. (widow of Zachariah Selby, of Greencastle, Ind.); Harry S.; Charlie A.; Melville, and three now deceased.

Enos W. Hoover has passed all his life in Marion county. Here he was reared on his father's farm, and here he attended the public schools. When he became a young man he took up the occupation of blacksmithing in connection with farming, and was thus engaged until 1890, that year entering the real estate business in this city. In 1895 Mr. Hoover began the study of law, and as he carried on his legal studies in connection with his other work, it was not until 1900 that he sought and secured admission to the Bar.

Mr. Hoover was married Feb. 16, 1899, to Miss Minnie G., daughter of Christopher and Louisa (Holtzermann) Schetter.

Mr. Hoover in politics is a staunch Republican. He and his wife reside at No. 2309 Prospect street. Her parents were both born in Germany, but have lived in this country many years, and long had a home in Ohio. Her father now lives in Indianapolis, where he is deputy county recorder. During the late Civil war he bore arms for the cause of the Union. His wife died Sept. 12, 1898. They were both members of the German Lutheran Church. Four of their five children are now living: Jacob, Minnie G., Louis F. and Fred.

DAVID GLASSBURN, who died Dec. 28, 1906, was a descendant of one of the honorable pioneer families of Indiana, one of the large farmers and substantial men of Johnson county, and was born Nov. 2, 1831, son of Frederick and Mary (Pursinger) Glassburn, both of whom were natives of Virginia, where they married. The grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812, was of German descent and died in Virginia. His widow came to Indiana and spent her declining years with her son Frederick, dying here, leaving three children, Frederick, Mrs. Duke and a daughter whose name is not recalled.

Frederick Glassburn, with some of his kindred and friends, left Virginia for the West, and a portion of the party located in Ohio, but Frederick came on to Indiana, arriving in 1834. His first settlement was on Fall Creek above Indianapolis, where he remained about one year, coming then to Johnson county. Here he leased land in White River township that was the property of some Virginians, and he soon had put up a cabin and comfortably settled his family. For seven years he put much hard work into this property, improving, clearing and cultivating, and then he died, leaving his family with little means of support. His aim had been to make a good home for them but this he was not permitted to do. The mother was a very capable woman, and with great industry managed to keep her children together, being ably assisted by the older children. Some years later she married again and then the children left home and cared for themselves as best they could. These were seven in number, namely: Peter, who is a prominent and wealthy farmer of Miami county, Ind., who at the age of eighty-seven years is still able to work; Joseph, who died unmarried; Ellen, who is Mrs. Quinnett; Samuel, who served in the Mexican war, and lives in Miami county; Martha, who is Mrs. Brunmer; David; and Andrew, who resides in Iowa. The mother was a consistent member of the Methodist Church.

David Glassburn was about five years old when his parents left Virginia and settled in the wilds of Indiana. His rearing was among pioneer surroundings and his educational opportunities were very meager. During a busy life he acquired a practical education, better doubtless than the schools of that day could have given him. He easily recalled the deprivations and trials of those early days. When his father died he was not over ten years of age, but with all his strength and energy he assisted his mother, and continued to do so until her marriage to a man with two sons. Until he was fifteen years of age he remained at home, but as is often the case, troubles arose with the younger members of the family, and rather than have it continue, he bade his mother farewell and started out to make his own way in the world. Blessed with health and strength, he soon was engaged by farmers, and being a willing worker and a provident saver, he was able soon to rent land. By the time he was twenty years of age, he was in fair enough financial condition to marry. His young wife was a good housekeeper and together they soon had saved enough to enable him to enter a small tract of land in Howard county, Ind., which he later sold to advantage, investing the proceeds in land in Johnson county. By his honesty and persevering industry he established a reputation among his neighbors which enabled him at first to borrow money to invest in cheap land, which he would improve and later sell with profit. Thus he continually increased his capital, at the same time raising corn and feeding hogs. Under the hard conditions which he imposed upon himself he made money, and at one time owned 400 acres of land all well improved. Afterward he assisted his older children in their start in life, remembering his own forlorn state, and owned at his homestead, about 320 acres of fine land. Mr. Glassburn had a beautiful home surrounded with forest and fruit groves and commodious and substantial buildings of every kind. In his younger days he did not despise any kind of work; he cleared up land, and he split rails, and was the best well digger in the neighborhood and a ditcher that few could equal. Of course this was all hard labor, but it was thus he honorably obtained the money to start on the successful career which made him one of the substantial men of Johnson county. His business ability was above the average, but all his transactions were honest and above board, and he was regarded with confidence and esteem by all who knew him.

In 1850 Mr. Glassburn was married to Margaret Parnell, who was born in Kentucky, daughter of Joseph and Winnifred Parnell, both natives of Kentucky and early settlers in Indiana. Mrs. Parnell died in Johnson county, and Mr. Parnell later moved to Edgar county, Ill., where he became a prominent farmer and died, the father of: Eliza, Mrs. Seals; Lucy, Mrs. Steward; Margaret, Mrs. Glassburn; and John, formerly of Missouri, now of Illinois. Mrs. Glassburn died in 1879, in the faith of the Christian Church. Her children were: Joseph, a merchant in West Indianapolis; John, a farmer in Johnson county; Ida, who is Mrs. R. Doty; and George, a farmer in Johnson county.

In 1880 Mr. Glassburn was married (second) to Mrs. Jane (Barls) Church, who died three years later, leaving no issue of this marriage although her six children by her former marriage were cared for by Mr. Glassburn. In 1885 he married (third) Mrs. Elizabeth C. (Pottenger) Jacobs, widow of William Jacobs, who had died in December, 1882, leaving four children, Myrtilla, Mary A., Charles B. and Frederick H. Mrs. Glassburn was born June 27, 1852, in Shelby county, Ind., daughter of Harvey and Sidney (Hand) Pottenger. Mr. Pottenger was an early settler from Ohio, locating first in Johnson county, where he spent his declining years, dying in 1896, at the age of eighty-four years. His widow still survives at the old homestead, aged eighty-three years, on the farm which has been her home for forty-nine years, and she still takes an interest and active part in the household duties. Mr. Pottinger was a man of great industry, and was home-loving and of exemplary character. In politics he was a strong Republican from principle, but would never accept office. Both he and his wife were leading members of the Christian Church. Their children were: Charlotte, Mrs. Clark; Nancy, Mrs. Fetes; Fanny, Mrs. Cook; Elijah, of the homestead farm; Mrs. Glassburn; and James, John and Molly, deceased. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Glassburn, namely: Pearl, born in 1886; Oma, born Dec. 10, 1888; and Olena, born in 1895, the family circle being yet unbroken. Both parents are most worthy members of the Christian Church.

No record of the life of Mr. Glassburn would be complete without an account of his ten months of army service, when he took the place of a drafted man, entering Company K, 99th Ind. V. I., in the Army of the Tennessee, and did picket duty at Memphis, Vicksburg and Jackson, Miss., safely returning without injury. In politics he was a life-long Democrat, but no office-seeker.

JAMES H. HOAG, M. D., one of the leading medical practitioners in and around Vincennes, Knox Co., Ind., was born in Greene county, N. Y., of which county his grandfather, Abner Hoag, was also a native. He was a farmer by occupation.

Henry Hoag, the Doctor's father, was born on the old homestead in Greene county. He married Orebria G. Hawley, daughter of James P. Hawley, and they moved to Jackson county, Mich. Mr. Hoag served eighteen months in the 11th Michigan Regiment during the Civil war. He was a farmer and hotel-keeper by occupation. He finally moved to Detroit. He and his wife had three children, as follows: Dr. James H.; Jennie, who married Wm. Dancer and died in 1902 while living at Stockbridge, Mich.; and Edward G., the last named a merchant at Ann Arbor, Michigan.

Dr. James H. Hoag gained his education in the public schools of Jackson county, Michigan, graduating from the high school at Napoleon, and he received his professional training at Ann Arbor, where he attended during 1874-75-76, and at Hahnemann Medical College, Chicago, where he attended in 1883. He began the practice of medicine at Fife Lake, Grand Traverse Co., Mich., where he remained until 1882, in which year he went to Chicago to attend Hahnemann College. In 1885 he went to Kingman, Kans., where he practiced eight years, and in 1893 went to Oxford, Benton Co., Ind., in 1903 coming to Vincennes, where he has established an excellent practice. He is a physician of long experience and has a good medical library, keeping abreast of the times in his profession. He is a member of the Hahnemann Institute Medical Society and of the American Homeopathic Society, and in fraternal connection he is a thirty-second degree Mason, belong to Commandery No. 3, Knights Templar, Lafayette, and to the Mystic Shrine. In political sentiment he is a Republican.

In 1901 Dr. Hoag married Mrs. Anna B. Blue, of Oxford, Benton Co., Ind., daughter of John and Sarah Seecamp, the former a physician and prominent citizen of Vincennes, Indiana.

ALVIN GILBERT HICKS, the leading photographer of Franklin, Ind., as well as a prominent citizen, was born in Franklin, Ind., Feb. 23, 1851, son of Royal S. and Mary (Keene) Hicks, natives of Switzerland county, Indiana.

Joshua Hicks, the paternal grandfather, was a very early settler in Indiana, but while still a young man removed to Iowa, where he died when nearly ninety years of age. His wife lived to be over ninety. They had a large family and his calling was that of a minister of the gospel. The maternal grandfather was one of the pioneers of Switzerland county, where he died at an advanced age. During the war of 1812, he served his country gallantly. Three daughters were born to himself and wife, two of whom are living: Mrs. Huldah Hamilton, of Cincinnati, Ohio, and Mrs. Rebecca Marshall, of Florence, Indiana.

Royal S. Hicks, the father, was a resident of Franklin when a young man, but in 1852 he became deputy auditor of State under Major Dunn, and a year or two later took charge of the Rockport Weekly Democrat, at Rockport, Ind., in about 1854, and was its editor and publisher for several years, and his son Alvin G. has the files of this paper. About 1858, he was elected county clerk of Spencer county, and served as such until 1866, when he began the practice of law, and continued in this profession until his death. During the war, he was a member of the Home Guards, and helped to drive Morgan out of Kentucky in the vicinity of Owensboro. His death occurred in 1884, in Rockport, while his wife died in 1869. In religious belief he was a Congregationalist, and she a Presbyterian. Eight children were born to the parents, five now living: Charles A., of Owensboro, Ky.; Alvin G.; Mary G., wife of Irvin Armstrong, of Florence, Ind.; Harry E., and Arthur W., both of Owensboro, Kentucky.

Alvin Gilbert Hicks resided in Spencer county, Ind., until he was seventeen years old, attending the public schools of that locality. In 1868, he removed to Franklin in order to learn to be a photographer, he having a decided leaning towards that calling. After learning the business from John Nicholson, Sr., he purchased his outfit, good will, etc., and is now one of the most successful photographers of Franklin. Not only does he thoroughly understand every detail of his business, but he possesses an artistic comprehension of the best effects, which proves of great service to him, and adds to his popularity.

In 1871, Mr. Hicks was married to Miss Bettie Burton, who died in 1874. On June 15, 1875, he was married to Miss Sarah C. Jackson, daughter of Nathaniel and Margaret (Hord) Jackson. Mr. and Mrs. Hicks are members of the Christian Church. Fraternally, Mr. Hicks is a member of Hesperion Lodge, No. 12, Knights of Pythias, while his political affiliations are with the Democratic party. His pleasant home is at No. 496 West Jefferson street, and this property belongs to him.

JEPHTHA STRAWN, a reliable citizen of Muncie, Ind., who has an honorable record in peace and in war, was born June 24, 1840, near Somerset, Perry Co., Ohio, son of Thomas and Mary Strawn, both of German descent and Pennsylvania stock. The father died when Jephtha was six years old, and the mother some time prior.

Mr. Strawn was born on a farm, and he has no recollection whatever of his mother, and but little of his father. He was brought up by strangers, being bound out when his father died to Oliver M. Holister, a farmer in Perry county, who, in 1854, removed to Delaware county, Ind., settling two miles south of Muncie. There the young boy was reared to farming, becoming familiar with the hard work incident to a pioneer's life. His schooling was limited to the winter term at the district school. He lived with Mr. Holister until he was past twenty-one years of age.

On Sept. 22, 1861, Mr. Strawn enlisted as a private in Company D, 2d Indiana Cavalry, under Capt. Edwin C. Anthony, who organized the company. He served three years and nine months, and was honorably discharged at Cleveland, Tenn., Jan. 1, 1864, immediately re-enlisting as a veteran in the same organization to "serve three years or during the war." His final discharge occurred at Madison, Ind., June 22, 1865. His service was chiefly in Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi, and this included the battle of Shiloh, evacuation of Corinth—the latter a campaign of two months, in which many skirmishes were fought, while the weather with constant rains made much suffering, and the regiment was constantly on the move—Luka, Miss., Triune, Tenn., Chickamauga, Tenn., East Tennessee campaign, Strawberry Plains, Mossy Creek and Beans Station. During November and December, 1862, and January and February, 1863, he was ill in the hospital at Louisville, Ky., and was much weakened, weighing at the end of that time only ninety-eight pounds. He enjoyed a veteran furlough of thirty days beginning May 9, 1864, spending the time at his home in Indiana, and on returning to the front was placed on detached duty and provost marshal duty at Louisville, notifying drafted men in Kentucky, and later pressing horses into service. While engaged on detached service, on one occasion with a squad of ten men under Sergeant Leister, who was from near Albany, Ind., it was intended to capture a Confederate major who had come into that region. They rode fifteen miles into the country at night, and the detachment surrounded the house. A dog appeared on the scene and attacked Mr. Strawn who was dismounted, and who thrust at him with his carbine, which was accidentally discharged, the ball passing through his right foot, making a very painful wound. This was on Aug. 20, 1864. The major was captured, and Mr. Strawn was sent to the hospital in Louisville, but in a few days was transferred to the hospital at Madison, Ind., where he remained until January, 1865, during much of the time on detail as a nurse, as an order had been received to send no more able men to the front. Mr. Strawn was always on active duty, and while he spent so many years in the service was never captured by the enemy. At Chickamauga, his regiment particularly distinguished itself, and when obliged to fall back, experienced then one of the hardest things that ever falls to a soldier's lot—that is, being compelled to leave the battlefield without removing wounded comrades.

When the war was over Mr. Strawn returned to Indiana, and again resumed farming. After his marriage he lived for three years on a farm south of Muncie, but in November, 1869, he moved into town, and for five years was connected with the Kirby Lumber Company, for ten years with the Johnson & Woods Lumber Company, and he has been with the Goddard Wholesale Grocery Company eleven years. His length of service in each place is the best testimonial for his reliability and integrity. He is a true self-made man, his success is no way attributable to any one but himself. He bought his present residence, an attractive two-story frame house in 1899, and he also owns other residence property on East Adams street, which he rents.

On Oct. 2, 1866, in Muncie, Mr. Strawn was married to Emily Jane Hawk, who was born in Blountsville, Henry Co., Ind., Dec. 22, 1847, daughter of Philip and Levina (Turner) Hawk. This union has been blessed with two children: Lillie May, who died at the age of thirteen; and Carrie Levina, born Nov. 6, 1871, who graduated from the Muncie high school, afterward teaching in the graded schools of this city for three years, and then married Charles A. Wood, member of the firm of Kirby & Wood, lumber merchants, and they have one daughter, Emily Clara.

Fraternally Mr. Strawn is a member of Williams Post, No. 78, G. A. R., and the local lodge of the K. P. In his political faith he is a staunch Republican, his first Presidential vote being cast for Abraham Lincoln (second term), and he has continued to support the Republican nominees from that time on. Both he and his wife are members of the Friends Church. Mr. Strawn has by his upright life, his loyalty to his friends and his country, and his devotion to his home and his family, proved himself well worthy the high esteem in which he is held.

HAWK. The Hawk family to which Mrs. Strawn belongs came of Pennsylvania German stock. John Hawk, her grandfather, was born in Ohio, whither his parents had migrated from Pennsylvania, settling, it is supposed, in Darke county where they cleared up a large farm and died at advanced years. John Hawk was a cabinet maker by trade, and settled in Blountsville, Ind., where he built a cabin in the woods and followed his trade. He died in Blountsville, aged seventy-eight years, and his wife, whose maiden name was Mary Moore, died at the age of fifty-five. Their children were: Eliza, Philip, John, George, William, Daniel and Catherine. Three of the sons were soldiers in the Civil war, William serving in the 57th Indiana Infantry, John in the 19th Indiana and Daniel, also in an Indiana regiment, who was wounded in battle.

Philip Hawk, father of Mrs. Strawn, was born in Henry county, Ind., Sept. 24, 1826, and on reaching manhood learned the trade of wagon maker. After his marriage he settled first on Buck creek, and later in Blountsville. He finally settled on a farm four miles south of Muncie and there lived for some twenty years, but he is now making his home in Muncie. He followed his trade all his active days, and has been an honest, straightforward citizen, esteemed for his industry and integrity. In Muncie he married Levina Turner—the Turners were of English descent, making their home near Knoxville—who died aged seventy-four years, in the faith of the Christian Friends Church. This union was blessed with children as follows: Mary E., Emily J., Francis Marion, George, John, William, Charles and Martha. In politics Mr. Hawk is a Republican.

TAYLOR. The Taylor family an old and honorable pioneer family of Madison county, Ind., of Scotch extraction and Virginia ancestry, has many representatives in the vicinity of Pendleton, Ind. The name of Taylor has been prominent in the history of the United States for many years, and one of its most distinguished members was no less than President Zachary Taylor, whose administration covered an important period of the nation's life.

The first of the name with which the Indiana branch of the Taylor family is correctly connected, was John Taylor, grandfather of Jacob C. Taylor, one of the original pioneer Taylor brothers who came from Virginia and settled near Pendleton, Ind., and is the only survivor. John Taylor, family tradition says, was killed in Greenbrier county, W. Va., the accident happening during a heavy storm. His children were: William, James, Matthew, John, Sally (who married Joseph Guinn), Holly (who also married a Guinn), Nancy (who married a Milburn), and another daughter (who married a Johnson).

John Taylor, son of John, was nine years old when his father was killed, which was probably between 1790 and 1800, as he was old enough in 1812 to become a soldier, although he did not take part in the war. He was married in Monroe county, W. Va., to Mary Magaw, and settled in that county, on land in the woods, which was owned by his father-in-law, Henry Magaw, proprietor of some 400 acres. John Taylor cleared up a farm on Indian Creek. He was considered a great hunter in his day, and he not only killed deer, wild turkey and bear, but once upon a time killed a panther. The story goes that James Kale, a cooper, wounded the animal which went into a saltpeter cave, at the mouth of which the two men built a fire and smoked it to death. They secured the services of a boy, who went into the cave and wound a rope around the animal, which when pulled out was shown to be of great size, eleven feet long from the tip of its nose to the tip of its tail. John and Mary (Magaw) Taylor were the parents of thirteen children: Henry, Armstrong, Andrew B., Matthew, Samuel, James A., Betsey, Jacob, Nancy, Mary, Mahala, John and Isaac. Of these Henry remained on the homestead and died there. He married Mary Clark, daughter of a slave holder and the owner of large plantations. Mary Clark Taylor inherited slaves, but her husband belonged to a family which was always opposed to slavery and he set them all free. A cousin by the name of Guinn now owns the old Taylor farm, the real Taylors having all left that neighborhood.

Henry Magaw, the father-in-law of John Taylor, is described as being what was called at that time a Black Dutchman. He was small of stature, black of hair and beard and of dark swarthy complexion. In figure he was very erect and was one of the strongest men in his region. He descended from old American German stock which probably traces its ancestors to early settlers in Pennsylvania from Germany. His wife belonged to an old family of Virginia settled in the neighborhood of Indian Creek.

In 1838 Andrew B. and Armstrong Taylor walked the entire distance from Virginia to Madison county, Ind. The former had learned the sawmill business in Virginia, and the brothers secured work at Irish Mills at the Fall in Pendleton. Andrew B. saved his money and bought 200 acres of land in 1840, which was situated in the woods two miles northwest of Pendleton, where he built a log house and did some clearing. About five years after he came to Pendleton he married Catherine Boston, daughter of Jesse and Catherine Boston, the former of whom was a pioneer of Pendleton. Mr. Boston owned and cleared up a farm near Pendleton, but continued to live in the village, where he operated a hotel known as the Boston House. Andrew B. Taylor became a prominent citizen, and at death left a large property. His brother Armstrong, who came with him, had been crippled in his right shoulder by a falling tree when he was only eight years old. Not being able to work like his brother, he was sent to school, subsequently becoming a teacher, and was one of the first teachers in the log schoolhouse two miles west of Pendleton. After teaching four years he was elected county assessor, an office he held for four years and then he was elected recorder of Madison county, which office he continued to hold during the rest of his active life. His death occurred at Anderson, when he was seventy-four years of age. He married Johannah Goodikoontz, a relative of the well-known Judge Goodikoontz. Armstrong Taylor left four children.

John Taylor, father of Armstrong and Andrew, came two years later than his sons to Indiana, settling on a small piece of land two miles west of Pendleton, which belonged to his son Andrew B. Here he built a log house with the assistance of his sons. Later he bought eighty acres of land four miles north of Anderson, but as he was then too aged to do much work he never cleared this farm nor lived on it. The rest of his life he spent with his son Andrew B. and died at Pendleton, aged seventy-two years. His wife died at the same place, aged sixty-seven years. Both were members of the Methodist Church.

JACOB C. TAYLOR came to Pendleton when he was thirteen years of age with his parents. Prior to this he had attended school a short time in West Virginia, and completed his education in the old log cabin school of Madison county. His youth was spent in hard work, farming during the summer time and cutting cord wood during the winter. On June 1, 1850, when twenty-three years old, he was married in Pendleton to Harriet Chapman, born in Kentucky, daughter of Martin and Nancy (Ulm) Chapman. Martin Chapman was a pioneer carpenter of this section. After marriage Mr. Taylor farmed for about three years and then engaged with his brother Andrew in a successful milling business. He bought land then in the woods about one and one-half miles west of Pendleton, from which he cut the timber and sawed it in his mill. He improved his farm with good buildings and seven years later sold it and then bought 190 acres northwest of his other property. This land he partially cleared, and on it erected a good frame house, and resided there for thirty years. It is now the home of his son Samuel. During this period Mr. Taylor was largely engaged in the buying, shipping and breeding of cattle. In 1890 he moved to Pendleton buying his present residence property at that time. He still retains 190 acres of land although at one time he owned over 400 acres. He is not only one of the most substantial, but one of the most highly esteemed citizens of the township.

Mr. Taylor's first wife, Harriet Chapman, died Nov. 25, 1890, and he married (second) Nov. 18, 1896, in Richmond, Ind., Phoebe Knobe, born in Hagerstown, Wayne Co., Ind., daughter of George Matthias and Margaret Catherine (Hersperger) Knobe. The three children of Mr. Taylor, Leroy C., Evelyn and Samuel A., were all born to his first marriage. Mrs. Taylor was a member of the Methodist Church. In political matters Mr. Taylor is a Republican. With his brothers, Andrew B. and Armstrong, he had much to do with the progress and development of this section of Madison county. With his brother Andrew B. he was largely instrumental in securing the building of the Fishersburg & Pendleton Turnpike Road. When the Bee Line railroad was surveyed through this section, Andrew B. was one of the chain carriers.

Mr. Taylor is a typical Indiana pioneer, a representative of a class which has no superior in any section of the United States. He enjoys the possession of a name which in Indiana represents integrity of character, public spirit and remarkable enterprise. He is very well known in this vicinity where he has many friends.

JOHN S. HINSHAW, one of the most highly respected citizens of Clay township, Hamilton county, was born March 3, 1830, in Randolph county, N. C., son of Stephen S. and Maria M. (Hoover) Hinshaw.

Thomas Hinshaw, the grandfather, was born in Ireland, was a weaver by trade, and died in North Carolina in 1820. In 1830 Stephen S. Hinshaw left North Carolina and came to Wayne county, Ind., and spent three years engaged in farming and making boots and shoes for the farming community, often traveling from one place to the other, as was the custom of the time. In 1833 he had accumulated enough capital to enter the land comprising our subject's present farm, and still continued to work at his trade. He built a log cabin in the wilderness, which was frequently visited by wolves and bears, and often the children went to sleep while listening to the howling of panthers in the adjacent woods.

Domestic peace, however, reigned in the little cabin, and a family of ten children grew up in this pioneer home, some of these moving far away, others departing to the land whence none return, and others still surviving, honorable men and women of the old locality. The children of Stephen S. Hinshaw and wife, Maria M. Hoover, were: Millie, deceased; Andrew, living in Lyon county, Kans., a farmer and carpenter; John S.; Thomas, who died in Kansas; Enos, deceased; Lucinda, deceased; William H., of Kansas; Rebecca, a residence of Noblesville; Martha, who died in Kansas; and Ira, a farmer in Lyon county, Kansas. The father of this family died in 1854 and the mother in 1873. In politics he was a Whig. He was a man who always stood well with his neighbors and was prominent in township matters.

John S. Hinshaw had few educational advantages in his boyhood, as the country was but sparsely settled and so much work had to be done in order to get the new land cleared and fit for cultivation. For twenty years he worked not only through the long day, but frequently through half the night. He now enjoys the rewards won by his persevering industry, owning 300 acres of fine land. This he cleared almost by himself, and he has made all the fine and substantial improvements here. Formerly he did considerable trading, and has been a very extensive sheep farmer, in fact, has been the leader in this industry in the county. He has frequently been awarded prizes at the State fairs for his sheep and Chester White hogs. For some years he has not been actively interested in either farming or stock growing, but he has not given up all supervision, and his advice is yet followed on important agricultural changes.

Mr. Hinshaw was married March 23, 1858, to Mary J. Cruse, daughter of Henry and Eliza (Whiting) Cruse, and granddaughter of Henry and Susan (Cress) Cruse. Her great-grandparents were Philip and May (Stump) Cruse, who were born in Germany, and came from that country in 1725, and settled in North Carolina.

In 1835 the father of Mrs. Hinshaw entered land in Clay township, Hamilton county, where he engaged in farming until old age came upon him. He almost rounded out a century, dying in Marion county, Ind., at the age of ninety-two years. Of his family of fifteen children, eight survive.

A family of eleven children were born to John S. Hinshaw and wife, as follows: Elizabeth A. died young; Sarah E. married F. M. Williams, a farmer in Hamilton county and lives with John S. Hinshaw; Mary married M. L. Vreeland, a farmer in Rawlins county, Kans.; William H., a farmer, married Effie Berry; Jennie, married A. E. Mendenhall, (deceased in 1898), a farmer; John C., a farmer, married Alfretta R. Davis; Thomas M., a farmer in Frederick, Okla., married Belle Williams; Martha married Frank E. Woodward, who is a cabinetmaker and operates a saw mill at Lapel, Ind.; Stephen, who manages the home farm for his father, married Dolly Nicum; Lemuel, a farmer in this county, married Cora Conrad (he and his brother William H., are engaged in raising Chester White hogs, and have won many premiums at fairs, including the State fair); and Miss R. Mae, the youngest, a most attractive lady, makes her home with Martha Woodward at Lapel. The mother of these children died Oct. 31, 1905.

Mr. Hinshaw is a member of the Society of Friends and belongs to the congregation at Poplar Ridge, Clay township. He has always been interested in public affairs, both at home and in wider fields. His convictions have made him an adherent of the Republican party, but, with one exception, he has never consented to hold office. He recalls an occasion, when, to oblige a friend, he consented to relieve him, for a time, of the duties of constable, but very shortly afterward, changed his mind. He is a man much respected in this locality and probably as widely known as any other.

SAMUEL M. GEORGE is one of the native sons of the Hoosier State, and one of which it may well be proud. Indiana has produced many men of note, in both public and private life, statesmen and many others, but perhaps her best offspring are those sturdy, stanch and true sons of the soil, who, starting in life with nothing, save a healthy body and willing hands, have won success by dint of perseverance and faithful, arduous toil. Such a boy and man was Samuel M. George. Beginning his career with nothing, deprived of a father's care and advice at an early age, the future may well have seemed dark to him; but he never gave way to somber reflections, being ever optimistic and full of determination to win success in material things, as well as the approbation of his fellows.

He was born in Jefferson county, Ind., May 10, 1854, son of Thomas D. George, a native of Kentucky. The latter came to Indiana, however, when eleven years old, his parents settling in Jefferson county, where he grew up as a young farmer. In later years he was an able and influential preacher in the Baptist Church. He died on the old homestead in Jefferson, at the age of forty-five years, in 1869. His wife was Elizabeth (Clark) George, born in Cincinnati, Ohio, April 1, 1829. She also was an earnest member of the Baptist Church, in which she was greatly interested and an enthusiastic worker. Nine children were born to them, three sons and five daughters besides Mr. George of this review, seven of whom are now living. These children are: Samuel M.; Mary, widow of James Cavanaugh, of Santa Barbara, California; Charles H., of Jefferson county, Indiana; Emma, wife of Dr. William Marcus, of Carpinteria, California, where he is an able and successful practitioner; Louisa, widow of Dr. Frank Smith of Santa Barbara, California; Thomas M. of the same place; and Frank, a teacher in the Philippine Islands. Thomas D. George had quite an eventful career, teaching school for a number of years in early manhood and preaching in later years, in various places, where he was well received. He also served ably as township trustee.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. George was Milton George, one of the early settlers in Jefferson county, where he died in the prime of life, at the age of fifty-four years, leaving several sons and daughters. The maternal grandfather of Mr. George was Samuel Clark, who came from Baltimore, Md., in the early days, and was for many years captain of a steamboat on the Ohio river. His death occurred in Little Rock, Ark., from the explosion of a boiler upon the boat, which totally destroyed it, and brought death to Captain Clark and a number of others. He had four children.

Samuel M. George passed his boyhood days in Jefferson county on a farm, attending the district schools as he was able, and remaining at home caring for his widowed mother and her children, his father having died when he was about fourteen years of age. At the age of twenty-one he took full charge of the management of the farm, his brother having directed this before that time. He continued operating the farm until 1881, when he came to Johnson county, and rented the John Clark farm, located just northwest of the city of Franklin. This he has operated for the past twenty-one years. He also owns a farm of 264 acres in the Hopewell district, which he rents out for a very satisfactory price.

On Nov. 25, 1880, Mr. George was joined in marriage to Sallie Daily, daughter of Martin H. and Julia (Nichols) Daily, and to them were born three children, Gertrude, Bessie and Harry.

The parents of Mrs. George were early settled in Jefferson county, Ind., and had twelve children, all of whom are now living: Anna A., wife of George Stevenson, of Greenwood, Ind.; Addie, who married James McNamar, of Helena, Mont.; Emily, wife of Harry Hollenbeck, of Missoula, Mont.; Julia A., wife of David Johnson, of Helena, Mont.; Louisa, wife of W. B. Maxfield, of Indianapolis; Frank Daily, of Auburn, Neb.; Charles, of Butte, Mont.; John R., of Missoula, Mont.; Florence, wife of Allen Miles, of Bellevue, Ind.; George Daily, of Madison, Ind.; Nellie, wife of John Herring, of Franklin, Ind.; and Sallie, wife of Mr. George.

Martin H. Daily was by occupation a farmer, but enlisted in the Civil war when it broke out, and was made lieutenant, in which capacity he served with much honor, and he is now living at Madison where he occupies the responsible position of county commissioner. His wife is now deceased, dying on April 6, 1881, at the age of forty-eight years. She was a sincere and faithful member of the Baptist Church.

Both Mr. and Mrs. George are now prominent and influential members of the Baptist Church, in which he holds the position of deacon. He is a member of the fraternity of the Knights of Pythias and has been a life long member of the Republican party, in whose welfare he has always taken great interest. Mr. George deserves the many successes that have come to him, and now, in the prime of manhood, may well anticipate greater reward further along in life's journey. He is held in highest esteem throughout the township in which he lives and has been honorable and upright at all times and an earnest Christian gentleman respected by all.

WILLIAM OWENS. Since very early days in Indiana, the name of Owens has been associated with the reclaiming of Johnson county from the wilderness, and its gradual development into its present condition of fertility and productiveness. Grandfather, father, and son have alike all done much to promote the welfare and success of this county, and William Owens, of whom we write, is now receiving the reward of their joint toil and effort, and is accounted one of the most enterprising and successful farmers of Needham township. It was in the township and county of his present residence that he began life's battle, and this was on the twenty-first day of November, 1840.

Samuel Owens, his father, was also a native of Indiana, born March 13, 1808, and spent his life as an agriculturist, moving to Johnson county in the year 1827, and in the following year entering land there, upon which he located at that time. A large part of this tract was covered with a dense growth of virgin forest, and his first work was that of clearing this away for cultivation. He greatly increased the size of his farm until he had acquired 246 acres at the time of his death, which occurred on the old farm Oct. 15, 1846, he being aged at that time only thirty-eight years, seven months and two days. Samuel Owens married Millie Fisher, who claimed the State of North Carolina as the place of her nativity. To her were born ten children, six sons and four daughters of whom three are now living, George, William and Nancy (wife of Theophilus McBride), all residing in Needham township. She was born Feb. 22, 1810, and died at the advanced age of eighty-six years, lacking only one day, Feb. 21, 1896. Both she and her husband were prominent and influential members of the Baptist Church.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. William Owens was James Owens, who was born in Virginia and came to Clark county, Indiana, at a very early day, finally settling in Johnson county in about the year 1830 or 1831. He also entered land from the government, which he cultivated and there lived to a ripe old age. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. He reared a large family.

The maternal grandfather of Mr. Owens was George Fisher, who was born in North Carolina, coming to Clark county, Indiana, where he died at an honored old age. He was by occupation a farmer, and he reared several sons and daughters.

William Owens has spent all his years in Needham township, following successfully the occupation of farmer. In his youth he attended the old-fashioned subscription schools until he acquired a very fair education, which he amplified in later years by reading and experience. On reaching the age of manhood, previous to which he had remained at home, he began farming upon his own account, on the old farm, and continued his work there until March, 1863, when he purchased the forty-acre farm which he now occupies, and to this he has added from time to time other lands. He is now the possessor of 212 acres of highly cultivated and developed land.

On April 22, 1867, he was united in marriage to Susanna Clark, daughter of John and Susanna (Webb) Clark. Three children, Mabel Grace, Edith Millie and John Clark, were born to them. Of these, Edith M. was married to Albert Brown, and they now live in Needham township, and have one daughter, Mabel Grace. John C. married Cora A. Brickert, of Bargersville, and has one child, Marjorie Fern. Mrs. Cora A. Owens died in February, 1901.

John Clark, father of Mrs. Owens, was a native of Epworth, Lincolnshire, England, and his wife was from Camden, N. J. Mr.

Clark was a miller by occupation, and came to Indianapolis in the fall of 1841, where he operated a mill for some years very successfully. Leaving this place he bought a mill in Johnson county on Sugar Creek, which he conducted for a number of years with like success. He and his wife had seven children, four sons and three daughters, of whom four are now living: Hannah, wife of Jacob Tresler, of White River township; Josiah, of Los Angeles, Cal.; Susanna, wife of Mr. Owens; and John, of Delaware county, near Muncie. William, another son, who made his home in Shelby county, Ind., survived until Nov. 6, 1903. John Clark, the father, died at the age of sixty-nine years, Feb. 22, 1879, and his wife passed away aged sixty-one, Dec. 24, 1871. Both were Episcopalians and prominent in that Church.

William Clark, the paternal grandfather of Mrs. Owens, was born in England, and died at an advanced age, leaving four children. He was by occupation a farmer. The maternal grandfather of Mrs. Owens was John Webb, whose birth place was in the State of New Jersey. He also was a farmer and died in that State, when well along in years, leaving two sons and two daughters. His wife was formerly married to a Mr. Huntsinger, who fought valiantly in the Revolutionary war.

Mrs. Millie (Fisher) Owens was born in Rowan county, North Carolina, Feb. 22, 1810, daughter of George and Catherine Fisher, who came to Indiana in 1815, in the early history of the country, a year before it was admitted as a State. Of the descendants of Catherine Fisher there were forty-seven grandchildren and thirty-one great-grandchildren.

Mr. Owens has long been an active and highly esteemed member of the Knights of Pythias, and both he and his wife are active and influential members of the First Baptist Church of Franklin, in which he has long served as a deacon. Early in life he espoused the principles of the Democratic party, in which he has rendered faithful services for many years. In all the relations of his long, eventful life Mr. Owens has won the admiration and respect of all who have known him, and now in his journey towards the setting sun he cannot but view with satisfaction the life work which in business and society has been crowned with success.

OMRI D. KLEPFER, who died in July, 1905, was an undertaker at Oaklondon, Ind. He was born in Lancaster county, Pa., May 12, 1835, son of George and Peggy (Snyder) Klepfer, both of whom were natives of Pennsylvania. The ancestral home of the Klepfers was in Germany, and the grandfather of Omri D. immigrated to America, and settled in Lancaster county, Pa., where he reared a family of several sons and daughters, and where he died when advanced in years. The father of Mrs. Peggy (Snyder) Klepfer, was also a native of Germany, and he died in Pennsylvania, where he had engaged in farming.

George Klepfer was a tailor by trade, and came from Pennsylvania to Indiana in 1837, locating in Hamilton county, about three miles from Cicero, where he took up land from the government, and there he reared his children. Later in his life he removed to Lawrence township, Marion county, where he owned a farm, but devoted himself principally to preaching in the German Evangelical Church. His death occurred in Lawrence township, about 1892, when he was about seventy-five years old. His widow, Peggy Snyder, passed to her rest in 1895, at the same age. They were the parents of five sons and two daughters, all but two of these now living: Omri D.; Sarah, widow of Aaron Armocost, of Indianapolis; Enos, of Noblesville, Ind.; Levi, who was killed in the battle of Resaca, in the Atlanta Campaign, during the Civil war; Rebecca, wife of Perry Able, of California; Paul, of Lawrence township, Marion county; and Solomon, of Indianapolis.

Omri D. Klepfer was but two years old when his parents came to Indiana. His youthful years were passed in Hamilton county, and he remained on the farm until he was nineteen years of age, when he took up the carpenter's trade, making it his occupation for many years. During this period he made coffins by hand as they were ordered, a business he began when he was about twenty-four years old, and continued until a comparatively short time before his death. After 1866 he conducted an undertaking business in the village of Oaklondon, and he had a wide acquaintance throughout the county.

Mr. Klepfer was married Feb. 18, 1857, to Miss Louisa Fee, daughter of Aaron and Mary Ann (Armocost) Fee. To this union were born the following children: George W. is a photographer at McLoud, Oklahoma, who is married and has two children; Orvin A., a farmer in Lawrence township, Marion county, who married Maggie Silvey, and has two children, Travis and Ada; Curtis Ellis, a bridge builder, and a contractor near Lincoln, Nebr., who is married, and the father of three children; Sarah Belle, who married Marshall Sellers, of Indianapolis, and has two children, Harry and Fraudia; Allie May, who married Will Gustin, of Indianapolis, and is the mother of three children, Wanda, and the twins, Otto and Leo; Clara Ann, who married Frank McCord, of Oaklondon, and is the mother of Erbin and Bertha; and Ora Melvina, who married George Bogart, of Indianapolis, and is the mother of one son, Rogers.

Mr. Klepfer belonged to the United Brethren Church, of which his wife is also a member. He was a Mason, being affiliated with Oaklondon Lodge, No. 140, F. & A. M., McCordsville Chapter, No. 52, R. A. M., and McCordsville Council. Mr. Klepfer belonged to Oakland Lodge, No. 534, I. O. O. F., and the Encampment. In politics he was a Republican, and he was highly respected in the community where his long and useful life had been passed. In 1872 he built his handsome and attractive home in Oaklondon, where he also constructed his undertaking establishment. All his hearses and funeral cars were built by him.

TOBIAS D. BUTLER, a prosperous farmer of Ray township, Morgan county, Ind., was born in this county, Feb. 4, 1838, a son of Tobias H. and Sally (Goss) Butler, the former of whom was born in Maryland, and was a veteran of the War of 1812.

The Butler family is of Scotch-Irish descent. The great-great-grandfather of our subject, Sir "Tobey" Butler, was a prominent lawyer in Philadelphia during Colonial days, while the father of our subject was related to the famous Gen. B. F. Butler.

Tobias H. Butler, father of our subject was married four times, his first wife being Betsey Weller, of Jefferson county, Ky. His second wife was Sallie Reed, who died, leaving a son who died at the age of two years. The third wife was Sally Goss, mother of our subject, born in North Carolina, a daughter of David Goss, also of North Carolina. His fourth wife was Elizabeth Ressel. To the marriage of Tobias H. Butler and Sally (Goss) were born: Elizabeth, who married (first) Andrew Rodgers (deceased), (second) Thomas Evans (who was killed in the Civil war), (third) James Beck, and resides in Greene county, Ind.; George O., who married Caroline James, and both are deceased; Sally, deceased; Tobias D. Tobias H. Butler was a prominent Mason, and well known throughout Morgan county. He was successful as a farmer and citizen and left behind an unstained name to his children.

Until he was seventeen years of age, Tobias D. Butler was with his father. He enlisted, on July 6, 1861, in Company B, 21st Ind. V. I. and served eighteen months, when he was transferred to Company B, 1st Heavy Siege Artillery, with which he served until July, 1864. He saw very active service, and was a brave and gallant soldier.

On Oct. 20, 1864, Mr. Butler was married to Mary C. Asher, born in Owen county, Ind., daughter of Alan and Sarah (Allen) Asher, the former a farmer of Jefferson county, Ind. Mrs. Butler died July 15, 1881, a consistent member of the Baptist Church. Seven children had blessed this union: Edward, a graduate in the Musical department, of the school for the Blind at Indianapolis, is now a teacher of music on piano and organ, a most remarkable young man; Franklin married Ellie Holmes; Blanch married Grant Adley, a farmer of Owen county; Leota married William Storen, and resides at Indianapolis; Richard is a school teacher; Walter is a farmer and school teacher; May married William Brown, a resident of Morgan county.

On Oct. 30, 1887, Mr. Butler married Laura Asher, born in Owen county, Ind., a daughter of Daniel and Rachel (Dean) Asher. Mr. and Mrs. Butler have three children: Kate, Sally E. and Bertha, all at home. Mr. Butler is a Mason, a member of Paragon Lodge No. 647. In politics he is a Republican, although he does not desire office. His farm of 120 acres on which he carries on general farming, is one of the finest in the county, and he is respected throughout the township as a square, honorable man, and one who has attained his success through upright methods.

SAMUEL D. VAN PELT, the son of pioneer parents and himself a pioneer of Madison county, Ind., now a substantial and highly respected citizen of Anderson, was born in Preble county, Ohio, Sept. 23, 1832.

The Van Pelts are of sturdy Holland-Dutch stock, but the place of their original settlement in the New World is unknown, as each succeeding generation moved a little farther from the seacoast into the wilderness. Of these migrations remain many an interesting tradition—stories of heroic struggles against primeval forests, of farms and homes wrested by physical strength and endurance from the natural wilderness, of dangers from wild beasts and savage men, of privation and renunciation. Out of such conflict came fertile cultivated fields and cultured homes, and a race of men strong and straight and true as the giants of the forests laid low by the mighty blows of the axmen.

Uriah Van Pelt, father of Samuel D., was born in Highland county, Ohio, in 1803, son of Benjamin Van Pelt, who moved from Knoxville, Tenn., to Highland county, Ohio. Uriah Van Pelt was married in Preble county, Ohio, to Almira Daugherty, daughter of William Daugherty. The Daughertys were a Scotch-Irish family, and William Daugherty came from County Antrim, Ireland, to Pennsylvania in 1789, when about seventeen years old. He settled in Chester county, Pa., where, being well educated, he followed school teaching. There he married Mary Foster, daughter of Rev. William Foster, and wife, the latter a member of the Blair family. Both the Fosters and Blairs were Scotch-Irish, and early emigrated to Pennsylvania. Rev. William Foster, a Presbyterian clergyman, married one of the daughters of the Rev. James Blair, who had four children, all of whom married Presbyterian ministers. The Blairs were prominent in Colonial times, and Rev. James Blair was one of the founders of William and Mary College. Some years after the Revolution, perhaps as late as the beginning of the nineteenth century, the Daughertys and Fosters settled in Mercer county, Pa. William Daugherty and wife had pushed farther to the West, and moving from Kentucky to Montgomery county, Ohio, settled on government land, and there he died aged about forty-eight years. He helped to establish the old Duck Creek Presbyterian Church, one of the historical churches of Montgomery county, and was one of its liberal supporters. His children were: Samuel, a soldier in the war of 1812; William; Margaret; Almira; James; and Joseph Foster, who became the father of Capt. W. W. Daugherty, of Indianapolis.

where he followed the millwright's trade. In 1837 he built a grist mill three-quarters of a mile east of Anderson, on the White river, and the next year he built a grist mill for Frederick Bronnenberg three miles east of Anderson. This latter mill he ran himself until 1839, when he moved to what is now known as the Moss Island mill on White river, three miles west of Anderson. He bought an old sawmill, entirely remodeled it, and then took as a partner Dr. Henry Wyman. The latter bought a lot of horses on credit, giving the firm's notes, and then took the horses south to sell. Nothing was realized from this venture, and Mr. Van Pelt was greatly distressed over the payment of the notes. Selling out the mill to Lloyd Brown, he then also built a woolen mill for Mr. Brown on Moss Island. In the spring of 1845 he moved to 120 acres of land he had previously purchased in the woods, about four miles north of Anderson. Of this land forty acres had seven entirely cleared, and a large "deadening" and was very wet. A hewed log cabin was already built, and there the family were hardly settled when Mr. Van Pelt sickened and died June 4, 1846. Facing almost unsurmountable obstacles, Mrs. Van Pelt, a woman of great force of character, grappled with the problem that confronted her. There was no time for sentiment, for there was a farm to be cleared, and seven children to be clothed and fed. With the outlook for the future as cheerless as the trees in the deadening around her cabin, she set to work. Her oldest son, Samuel D., was but fourteen, and with his aid, and that of the others, for the youngest even could pick brush in the clearing to feed the fires, she started work on the farm, bringing forcibly to mind the following stanza from one of our early poets:

The mothers of our forest land,
Stout-hearted dames were they,
With nerve to wield the battle axe,
And join the border fray.

Mrs. Van Pelt worked on the clearing, axe in hand, she worked in the fields, she cared for the family even to the making of the cloth for the clothing they wore, and she kept the family together. By the time she left the farm some twelve years later, she had cleared a large portion of it, and had a comfortable home. She was a member of the New Light Church, and in its faith she died at the age of ninety-one years. The family have preserved a fine picture of her, sitting in her chair by the side of an old-fashioned fire place. She instilled into the hearts and minds of her children the principles of morality and religion, kindled in them a love of country and the spirit of liberty, and when the need came gave four of her sons to the service of her country, and one of the four laid down his life for the nation. The children born to Uriah Van Pelt and wife were: Rebecca A.; Samuel D.; Isaac H., who died in 1857; Francis M., born Aug. 15, 1838, an officer in the Civil war, and mentioned elsewhere; Matilda; William P., a private in the 116th Ind. Inf., and later in the 142d Indiana in the Civil war; Uriah J., a private in the 137th Indiana, who died in service at Tullahoma, Tenn. Uriah Van Pelt, the father, was a man of intelligence and strength of character. He was skilful with tools, and was able to make almost anything needed by the pioneers. Governor Bigger appointed him, in 1837, associate judge, his commission (bearing date Dec. 1, 1841, in the "twenty-sixth year of the State of Indiana") entitling him to serve seven years, after which, in 1844, he was re-elected. He was well-known, his judgment was respected and his advice frequently sought.

Samuel D. Van Pelt was about eighteen months old when he was brought by his parents to Madison county, Ind., and his earliest recollections are of pioneer scenes and incidents, and the pioneers themselves. The first school he attended was on the home farm four miles north of Anderson. This was a regulation log cabin school of the early days, and young Samuel D. attended during the winters, learning the "three R's." When his father died it was necessary for the lad to work hard to help his mother, though small of his age and scarcely able to swing the big axe of the backwoodsman. Often he worked with his mother and the younger children until far into the night. His indomitable mother would encourage him with "Now, Sam, don't you think you can cut down this one more tree; it is a big one I know, and it is late, but if you can cut it down, I will fix the fires, and by morning it will be nearly burned up." The boy would answer "Well, mother, I'll try," and with his unwieldy axe would cut away, tired though he was. They would then place fires under the tree at regular distances, and this would burn all night, and the charred or "niggered" logs would then be rolled into heaps. The education of the pioneer was not gleaned from books, but it made self-reliant men and women, who cleared the forests, made roads, built bridges, erected homes and laid out towns. When Samuel D. was about eighteen years of age he was apprenticed by his guardian to learn the carpenter's trade under Dryson & Brown. He remained with them two years (1850-52), his natural aptitude for the use of tools, to which he had been accustomed all his life, soon making him a skilful mechanic. At the end of his apprenticeship he engaged in contracting in Anderson in partnership with Capt. Makepeace, and they continued together until both enlisted for service in the Civil war. Mr. Van Pelt enlisted in Anderson July 29, 1861, in the regimental band of the 19th Indiana Infantry, with the rank of first sergeant. His enlistment was for three years or during the war. The leader of the band, William Earle Reede, a very fine musician, now lives in Denver, Colo. Mr. Van Pelt played the barytone, and was presented with a fine silver instrument by Company A, of his regiment, which he still retains as a relic of the war. He served about fifteen months, when the bands were discharged by order of the War Department on account of the expense, only brigade bands being permitted. The band of the 19th was a brigade band but it was never mustered after its discharge. The duties of the band members, during battle, were as stretcher bearers, carrying wounded from the fields, and in attendance generally at the field hospital. Mr. Van Pelt saw service and was under fire in several battles, among them, Gainesville, Lewinsville (Sept. 11, 1861), Bull Run, Fairfax Court House, Cedar Mountain, Fredericksburg, and many others. The band members often, too, were detailed for guard duty. Mr. Van Pelt kept faithfully at work assigned him, and was honorably discharged at Rappahannock, Va., and mustered out at Washington, D. C., in September, 1862.

After his return from the front Mr. Van Pelt was married, and then resumed his contracting, becoming an expert stair builder. Later he engaged in slate roofing, and he invented a machine for puncturing the slate and later for trimming it. These machines were an entire success and have come into general use. He is a natural mechanic, and for a long time operated a novelty shop, and he did general repairing for many years, still having his repair shop at the present time. In 1865 he bought property on Meridian street, between Eleventh and Twelfth, and there built a comfortable dwelling, in which he lived for thirty-eight years. This he sold in 1903, and bought his present property at No. 1331 Ohio avenue, where he erected a substantial residence in the modern style of architecture. He also owns two houses and lots on Nineteenth and Jackson streets. Mr. Van Pelt is an ingenious cabinet maker, and has a beautiful black walnut table, cut from an old walnut tree, scarred by the heat of many a fierce fire in the days when the clearing was made on the old Van Pelt homestead. The tree was entirely hollow for many feet, and was five feet in diameter. From the top of the old thirty-five foot stump was growing a flourishing gooseberry bush.

On Dec. 9, 1862, in Anderson, Ind., Samuel D. Van Pelt was married to Frances W. Bonner, who was born in Wilmington, Ind., Dec. 23, 1838, daughter of Rev. Charles and Sarah (Lake) Bonner. To this union came one son, Frank B., born Jan. 27, 1864, who received his education in the public schools, afterward learning the carpenter's trade and slate roofing business, and who married, in Anderson, Oct. 25, 1885, Angie Cannon, of Madison county.

Mr. Van Pelt is a member of Major May Post, G. A. R., of Anderson, and has held several offices. In politics he is a Republican, and although his first presidential vote was cast for Stephen A. Douglas, he voted for Abraham Lincoln, for his second term. In 1853 he joined Mt. Moriah Lodge, A. F. & A. M. He was also at one time a member of the I. O. O. F. He is very popular with all who know him. Honest and upright in all his dealings, kind and charitable to the mistakes of others, wise in his judgment, he has the respect and esteem of his fellowmen.

Rev. Charles Bonner, father of Mrs. Van Pelt, was of sterling Scotch-Irish stock, and born in Pittsburg, Pa., Feb. 17, 1806, and there educated. He entered the Methodist ministry, preached for many years, and was a pioneer circuit rider and noted revivalist in the early days in Indiana. He held the first camp meeting ever conducted in Madison county at Pendleton. He married Sarah Lake, born March 28, 1806, probably in New Jersey, daughter of Samuel Lake, a pioneer of Indianapolis of English stock. Mrs. Sarah (Lake) Bonner died May 16, 1844, and the Rev. Mr. Bonner married (second) in Salem, Ind., March 4, 1845, Eliza Lyon, daughter of a pioneer and man of wealth of Washington county. To the first marriage were born:

William, born July 26, 1831, in Marion county, Ind., died April 13, 1855; John Wesley, born Dec. 2, 1832, in Shelby county, Ind.; Mary Isabelle, born Oct. 5, 1834, in Marion county, Ind.; Martha Caroline, born Oct. 7, 1836; Frances W., born Dec. 23, 1838; Charles Henry, born Nov. 8, 1840; and Sarah Helen, born Nov. 3, 1842. To the second marriage was born but one child, Amanda, born April 26, 1846. In 1852 the Rev. Mr. Bonner went to California, he and two companions crossing the Great Plains with ox-teams, being three months on the journey. He died in California Aug. 31, 1856. He was an eloquent preacher, and is yet remembered by the older Methodists of Indiana. Two of his brothers were Presbyterian ministers, and lived in southern Indiana. It is believed that they were of the same stock originally as the noted publisher, Robert Bonner, of New York.

JAMES M. BECK, an honored representative of one of the old pioneer families of Indiana, was born at the old homestead where he yet lives, in White River township, Johnson Co., Ind., Jan. 20, 1854, son of Gottlieb and Rebecca (Bowser) Beck, the former of whom was a native of Germany, and reared upon the historic river Rhine. The parents and brothers and sisters of Gottlieb Beck remained in Germany, with the exception of one brother, Adam, who settled and finally died in Pennsylvania, where he reared a large family. The Beck family was very prosperous in Germany, and its members stood high in the estimation of their fellow countrymen.

Gottlieb was but sixteen years of age when he emigrated to America, and he had previously learned the trade of baker. Upon landing he drifted on westward into Ohio, where he sought work at his trade, and at first was glad to accept nine dollars and board for three months. Later, he made his way to Indianapolis, and after a few years of hard effort, he established himself in a good bakery business. Opportunity came to him, and he was quick to grasp it. The State House was then in process of construction, and Mr. Beck, who was conveniently located, opened a restaurant and boarding house in connection with his establishment, and provided food for the workmen, and so successful was he, that in 1846, he retired from city life, and purchased a small distillery at Old Bluffs, which he operated until he bought a fine farm of 160 acres, on which he lived, and on which his son James M., was born. From time to time, he added to his property until he owned 1,000 acres in all. On this land he did general farming and stock raising and became very successful. During his life, he divided his broad acres among his children, the old homestead falling to the share of his son, James M., and with this son the good man and his wife spent their declining years, his death occurring June 27, 1897, while his wife passed away March 15, 1894. For many years, Mr. Beck was a consistent member of the Lutheran Church, while late in life his wife became a member of the Christian Church. In politics he was a strong Democrat, but never aspired to office. He was twice married, first to Barbara Bowser, and second to her sister, Rebecca Bowser, who were of German descent, born in Ohio, daughters of Adam Bowser, a pioneer farmer, who settled in Indiana, and was one of the leading men of Indianapolis. Adam Bowser had the following family: Daniel; Henry; George; Sarah, Mrs. John Moore; Susan, Mrs. Mullen; Barbara, first wife of Gottlieb Beck; Rebecca, mother of James M. Beck. No children were born of the marriage with Barbara, while to the marriage with Rebecca were born: Henry, born at Indianapolis; John, born at the homestead; Elma, Mrs. George Travis; Mariah, who married O. Brunnemer, and second Jacob Brown; Sarah, Mrs. R. Wilhelm; William, deceased; George, who died in this township; and James M.

For seventeen years prior to their death, James M. Beck made a pleasant and comfortable home for his parents. During his childhood he was reared to healthy manhood on the farm, his school advantages being furnished by the district school. In 1878, he married and settled at the homestead (which was his portion of his father's estate), consisting of 120 acres, all well improved, to which he has added more land until he now owns 400 acres more adjoining his home farm, and it all forms one of the finest farms in Indiana. Mr. Beck has followed in the footsteps of his father in the matter of making improvements, as well as in personal habits, a strong sense of honesty and uprightness of dealing. Success has crowned his efforts, and he may well look back with pride upon a well spent life. Having been deeply attached to his father, Mr. Beck preserves many little mementoes of the past of that good man, among which perhaps the most interesting is his wedding suit. The coat is a Prince Albert, made of a fine grade of black cloth, and the entire suit gives a good representation of the styles of those days. Never departing from his father's example, Mr. Beck always votes the Democratic ticket, and has never desired political preferment. For many years he has been a consistent member of the Christian Church, in which he is also elder and trustee.

James M. Beck married Miss Nancy E. Foglesong, born in this township, Oct. 27, 1862, a most cultured and intelligent lady, daughter of Jacob and Matilda (Boles) Foglesong, natives of Virginia and North Carolina, respectively. The Boles family are of Irish descent, the Foglesongs coming from Germany, and Jacob and Matilda were married in Johnson county, Ind. Jacob Foglesong was a son of Christian, a pioneer settler in the wooded wilderness of Johnson county, and he and his wife died in the locality they helped to settle, the parents of two children: Katie, Mrs. James; and Jacob. Jacob Foglesong was a strong Democrat, but never desired office. In religious belief he was a consistent member of the Lutheran Church. His wife died March 31, 1900, and he passed away Dec. 10, 1901. The children born to Jacob and Matilda Foglesong were: Edward, who died unmarried; Henrietta, Mrs. Doty, of Portland, Ind.; Jane, Mrs. Elter, of Carroll county; Elias, a farmer of this county; Mary, Mrs. George Beck; Nancy E., wife of Mr. Beck; and Alva, a farmer on the old homestead. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. James M. Beck: George A., born May 9, 1880; Cora, born June 9, 1882; and Bertha, born April 14, 1887. The mother is also a devoted member of the Christian Church, and all are numbered among the leading people of this locality.

JONAS BENJAMIN MANSHIP. Agricultural interests predominate in Fall Creek township, Hamilton Co., Ind., and this portion of the State can boast of some of the best farmers of the country. Among them may be mentioned Jonas Benjamin Manship, born in the township, Nov. 1, 1867, son of George and Emily (Fisher) Manship.

(I) Eben Manship was the American progenitor of the family, coming to this country from England prior to the Revolution. History preserves an incident relative to this gentleman. While passing along a road in the State of Maryland, during the war, he met the immortal George Washington. The great man kindly advised him to "Push on for the enemy was at hand." Eben was a farmer by occupation, and eventually settled in North Carolina during the war, where he resided until his death.

(II) Matthew Manship, great-grandfather of Jonas B. was a successful farmer in North Carolina, and reared a family of seven children, all of whom became prosperous. The mother's maiden name was Elizabeth Ledman.

(III) John Manship, grandfather of our subject, married Celia Ledman, and both were of North Carolina. They had a family of the following children: Lucinda, deceased; Matilda; Nathan; George; John and Elijah; William, deceased; Robert, deceased; Mary and Thomas, all of whom married and were prosperous. John and his twin brother Elijah, the eldest of the family, came to Indiana about 1833, settling first in Wayne county, but after a year coming to Hamilton county, locating in Fall Creek township, where John began his pioneer life. He was fortunate in possessing ox-teams, as many farmers did not possess these. The houses were all built of logs in those days, and the spinning wheel was a very important piece of furniture. The land was obtained from the government and was absolutely wild, while the nearest market was Indianapolis. However, hearts were brave, and arms strong in those venturesome days, and he and his wife lived happily in Fall Creek township until their death. They became very well known, and when the Methodist Church was founded, they became earnest members. When they died the whole community mourned.

(IV) George Manship, born in Hamilton county, Ind., Jan. 22, 1837, received a limited education, there being few or no schools in his boyhood days, in that portion of the State. At the age of twenty-one years, he began life for himself, first renting land. As soon as he accumulated sufficient money, he bought sixty acres, and added to his property, until in time he had six hundred acres, the greater portion of which he has given to his children. His life has been spent in hard work, and he can rejoice in his success.

On Feb. 28, 1861, George Manship married Emily C. Fisher, who was born in North Carolina, daughter of Salathiel and Mary Fisher, and granddaughter of Henry Fisher, all of North Carolina, the Fisher family being one of the old and aristocratic Southern ones, of English descent. Both father and son came to Indiana in 1853, and Salathiel became a successful farmer in Delaware township, Hamilton county, where he died. Ten children were born to George and Emily Fisher: William Henry, a farmer of Fall Creek township, married Elphenia Klepper, and has two children; Robert F., deceased, was married to Mattie Brooks, and had a family of four children of whom one is deceased; Noah Gifford, a farmer of Delaware township, married Cora McCarty, and has a family of five children; Jonas Benjamin; Newton, resides at Noblesville, married Eva Nieman, and has a family of three; Lemuel F. and Mary M. died in infancy; Cora is a teacher in the schools; one died in infancy; and Walter W. died at the age of sixteen. All were well educated in the public schools and were a credit to their parents. Cora in particular, was thoroughly educated in music, and now is one of the most popular and successful teachers of music in this locality. The parents were members of the Methodist Church. In politics Mr. Manship is a Democrat, and one of the well known men of Fall Creek township.

(V) At the age of twenty-one years Jonas Benjamin Manship, son of George, started out in life for himself, like his father renting land at first. In 1896 he bought 160 acres in Delaware township, but in 1901 he traded that farm for 140 acres of highly cultivated land in Delaware and Fall Creek townships. He resides on Section 18, Delaware township, Hamilton county, and carries on general farming and stock-raising, carrying an excellent grade of stock, and being noted for his success in both lines of business.

On Nov. 15, 1891, Mr. Manship was united in marriage with Cora Virgin, born in Hamilton county, Ind., daughter of William and Christiann (Brooks) Virgin. Mr. and Mrs. Manship are very consistent members of the Christian Church. In politics Mr. Manship is a Democrat. Fraternally Mr. Manship is pleasantly associated with Lodge No. 440, I. O. O. F., while his wife is a member of the Daughters of Rebekah, No. 526; and of Burnt Hickory W. R. C., No. 35. Fishers. Mr. Manship has accumulated his property by legitimate business methods, and through legitimate business opportunities, and he is justly recognized as one of the conservative, upright and substantial men of his community.

William Virgin, father of Mrs. Manship, was of Scotch descent, born March 22, 1842, son of Allen Virgin and Sarah Jane Carr. He is now a retired farmer, living on his farm east of New Britton. He enlisted in the Civil war Aug. 12, 1862, and was wounded in the battle of Winchester, Va. He served his country until the war closed when he was honorably discharged. William Virgin was married March 7, 1867, to Christiann Brooks, daughter of Madison and Nancy Brooks, who were both reared in North Carolina. Madison Brooks was born Sept. 5, 1814. He and his wife early came to Indiana, and he has resided in Fall Creek township all the while. He has been married twice since and is the father of fifteen children, three dying in infancy. He has been a prosperous farmer, accumulating wide acres and giving to his surviving children eighty acres each. In all he has possessed 3,500 acres.

JOSEPH S. HOOVER. The nation will ever owe a debt of honor to the brave boys in blue who at so great sacrifice and with exalted patriotism offered their services to their country when its integrity was menaced by armed rebellion. One of the brave men whom Indiana sent to the front and whose military career was one of distinctive honor is Joseph S. Hoover, who is now living retired in Indianapolis, and who is a member of one of the sterling pioneer families of the State.

Mr. Hoover was born in Butler county, Ohio, Aug. 17, 1831, son of Conrad and Eleanor (Ducat) Hoover, the former a native of Germany and the latter of Pennsylvania, where their marriage occurred. The paternal grandfather was of stanch old German stock and was a successful farmer in the Fatherland, where twelve sons and three daughters were born to him. He emigrated with his family to America, settling as a farmer in Pennsylvania, where his children were reared to maturity and where he and his wife passed the residue of their days, honored by all and known as devoted members of the Lutheran Church.

Conrad Hoover was a child at the time of his parents' removal to America and he was reared on the old homestead in Pennsylvania. In his youth he learned the trade of carpenter, which continued to be his vocation throughout his active business life. After his marriage he resided in Pennsylvania until 1826, when he removed to Butler county, Ohio, becoming one of its pioneers. He located in the village of Oxford, where he continued to reside until his death, in 1839. His life was one of integrity and honor and one prolific in good works. While a young man, in Pennsylvania, he enlisted and served in the War of 1812. Having a large family he was not able to accumulate much property, leaving his family with limited resources but with that best of all heritages, an honored name. His wife Eleanor (Ducat) Hoover survived him many years and her devotion to her home and children was one of great strength and ideality. She died in 1860, at the age of seventy-four years, loved by all who had come within the sphere of her gracious influence. He father was of Scotch lineage, her mother of English, and they were married in Pennsylvania, whence they eventually removed to Franklin county, Ind., where he followed his trade of potter until his death. His widow later removed to Connersville, where she lived to the patriarchal age of more than ninety years. They had three children: John, Eleanor (mother of Mr. Hoover), and Mary E. (who died in Louisville, Ky.). Conrad and Eleanor (Ducat) Hoover became the parents of sixteen children, of whom ten lived to years of maturity, namely: Sarah, Mrs. Clark; Mary Ann, Mrs. Madden; Casinda, Mrs. D. Rinehart; Ellen, Mrs. J. Rinehart; Rachel, Mrs. Hawthorne; Harriet Maria, Mrs. Strickler; Frances Charline, Mrs. Clements; Rebecca, Mrs. W. Tribbey; Charles, who served in the Confederate army during the Rebellion and who died in Cincinnati, in November, 1868; and Joseph S.

Joseph S. Hoover was reared to the age of thirteen in Ohio, attending the common schools as opportunity afforded, and then came to Connersville, Ind., where he grew to manhood. While yet a boy he began working in a woolen factory, and he continued in the employ of one concern for many years. At the outbreak of the Rebellion his loyalty was quickened to responsive protest, and in 1862 he enlisted as a private in Company K, 60th Ind. V. I., which was first assigned to the Department of the West and later to the Army of the Tennessee. Mr. Hoover participated in the battle at Richmond, Ky., in August, 1862, where about two hundred Union soldiers met their death and where the greater portion of his regiment was captured. They were paroled three day later, after which the men returned to their homes; later, being exchanged, they effected a reorganization at Indianapolis and again proceeded to the front, in November, 1862. After remaining for a time in camp at Memphis, Tenn., the command started forth on the Vicksburg campaign, landing at Yazoo, and soon afterward meeting with a repulse in an engagement at Chickasaw river. They then proceeded up the Arkansas river to Arkansas Post, which they captured Jan. 11, 1863, and then proceeded to Milliken's Bend on the Mississippi, and after a hot skirmish started on the march to Vicksburg, taking part in the entire campaign and remaining in that city for a month after its capture. The troops then went down the river and effected the capture of Jackson, Miss., returned to Vicksburg and later were stationed for some time in New Orleans, having in the meanwhile made a reconnoitering tour through the western part of the State. Then they went up the Pascagoula river for an attack on Mobile, having a number of skirmishes from the boat while enroute, and finally encamping on Dauphine island, at the entrance of Mobile bay, from which point they shortly afterward returned to New Orleans and thence proceeded to Fort Esperanza, Tex., where a number of men were drowned by the breaking down of a frail pontoon bridge. After a short time the command joined Banks' forces and took part in the various maneuvers of the Red river campaign, returning to New Orleans, where they remained in camp for a few weeks. Proceeding to Pensacola, Fla., they remained there until March, 1865, when they started on the march to Mobile, capturing Blakely enroute, in April, 1865, and then moving forward to join Sherman at Selma, where they were stationed when the welcome news came to them of Lee's surrender. In June they returned to Mobile, where they were mustered out on July 5th, the regiment returning to Indianapolis, where Mr. Hoover received an honorable discharge, having proved a loyal and valiant soldier and enduring a full quota of the trials and hardships of war.

Mr. Hoover then returned to Connersville, where he continued work in the woolen factory until the plant was destroyed by fire, after which he found employment in a local furniture factory, where he advanced to a position of responsibility and trust and where he remained for a long term of years, until 1886. For the following six years he held the position of superintendent of the Connersville water-works. In 1892 Mr. Hoover came to Indianapolis, and here was employed in the freight department of the Pan Handle Railroad about eight years, at the expiration of which time he retired from active labor, having gained a competence through his honorable and well directed efforts, and having at all times held the confidence and esteem of his fellow men. He has a commodious and attractive modern home on Summit street, which he erected in 1898. In politics he has taken no active part, though he has given a staunch allegiance to the Republican party. He and his wife are worthy adherents of the Presbyterian Church, and fraternally he holds membership in George H. Chapman Post, No. 209, G. A. R., of his home city.

In 1854 Mr. Hoover was united in marriage to Miss Mary Fritch, who was born in Pennsylvania, in 1837, a daughter of Jacob Fritch, who was born in the province of Alsace, Germany, where he continued to live until after the birth of his two eldest children. Jacob Fritch was a soldier in Napoleon's army. A weaver by trade, he emigrated to Pennsylvania, but there engaged in farming until 1844, when he removed to Connersville, Ind., where he passed the remainder of his life. His children were as follows: Malinda, Mrs. McCann; Jacob, of Rush county, Ind.; Sarah, Mrs. Miller; Mary, wife of Mr. Hoover; Daniel, deceased; Samuel, of Fairmount, Ind.; and Margaret, of Indianapolis. Mr. and Mrs. Hoover have had eleven children, namely: William, deceased; Charles, of Indianapolis; Anna May, Mrs. S. Jacobs; Francis M., of Cincinnati; Mary B., who died at the age of twenty-seven years; Joseph, of New York City; Samuel F., who died at the age of thirteen; Katherine M., Mrs. G. Graves; Conrad D., of Indianapolis; Claud T., of Indianapolis; and Elizabeth Eleanor, Mrs. M. L. Robinson, of Indianapolis.

WITT BROTHERS, ALBERT E. WITT AND RICHARD C. WITT, are among the successful business men of Lebanon, Ind., holding positions of prominence and influence in Boone county. They are sons of William W. and Lavina Caroline (Haun) Witt.

William W. Witt was a native of North Carolina, born in 1825, and his wife Lavina Caroline Haun, was born in Tennessee in 1827. Of their ten children eight are now living. The names of the children were as follows: Oliver C., Milroy L., Alonzo H., Thomas Edward, Joseph W., Albert E., Richard C., Charles E., Lillie M. (wife of Walter Matthews, of Thorntown, Ind.), and Ella (wife of James Allen Hogshire, of Lebanon). The father was a carpenter by trade. He came to Indiana in 1829 with his father and brothers, and for a number of years before his marriage followed his trade in Lebanon. After marrying he moved on a farm east of the town and remained there until 1878, when he returned to Lebanon and went into the milling business. He was very successful in all his enterprises, and a few years before his death retired from all active and specific business to look after his various property interests. His death occurred in 1898, and his wife's in 1887. Both were devout Methodists.

Michael Witt, father of William W., was a native of North Carolina, of German descent. He migrated to Union county, Ind., about 1827, and five years later moved to Boone county, where he bought a farm on the present site of Lebanon. His wife, Susan (Wyrick) Witt, bore him a good sized family, and died in middle life, while he lived to advanced age. The maternal grandfather of the Witt brothers was Abraham Haun, who came from Tennessee to Indiana, and settled on a farm near Thorntown, where he lived to a good old age. He and his wife had a large family.

Richard C. Witt was born in Center township, Boone county, Aug. 16, 1862, and passed his boyhood on his father's farm two miles east of Lebanon. He attended the district school, later the Lebanon public school, and then settled upon an active and varied business career. Beginning as clerk in a grocery store for several years, he soon decided to start in for himself, and selected Kansas as his field. He took up a claim of 160 acres in Meade county, and spent three years on it, living in a sod house while he improved his land. Later he took up a timber claim of 160 acres, and another homestead claim of the same extent, but sold the last two and eventually even his first purchase. His life in Kansas was primitive in the last degree, and he was obliged to do his own cooking and washing. Mr. Witt returned to Lebanon after selling his Kansas property, and at first clerked in a shoe store, but afterward in partnership with Charles Morgan bought the establishment and conducted it eight or nine years.

Selling his interest in this store to his brother, Albert E., he spent one year on the road as agent in Illinois for a Boston shoe firm, and then returned to his old calling in Lebanon as a partner of his brother Albert E. After two years he again sold out his share, and built a washing machine and furniture factory which he conducted in partnership with his brother-in-law, Clifton C. Utter. Although the concern was prosperous from the start, Mr. Witt sold out here, too, after two years, and then embarked in the real estate business with his uncle, Adam H. Haun. After several years Mr. Haun died and then Mr. Witt took into the firm his cousin, Harry L. Kenworthy, under the firm name of Witt & Kenworthy. After they had been in partnership for eight years Mr. Kenworthy retired and Albert E. Witt acquired a half interest, the firm name becoming Witt Bros. They do a large business in real estate, loan and insurance lines, while their holdings in both town and farm properties are considerable. In political sentiment Mr. Witt is a Republican. He is a member of the I. O. R. M., the M. W. A. and the Elks.

Richard C. Witt was married in 1889 to Miss Minnie Utter, daughter of Samuel J. and Emma (Fall) Utter. One daughter has been born to them, Dorothy C. Mr. Witt is a man of unusual ability, bright and keen, and of the soundest judgment, and has been uniformly successful, whatever his line of work. He has become one of the wealthy men of Boone county, and is not only respected for his material success, but is held in high esteem for his many fine traits of character.

WILLIAM ECKERT, the well known cigar manufacturer at No. 520 West Washington street, Indianapolis, was born Aug. 12, 1859, in Wasbach, Baden, Germany, son of Jacob and Barbara (Schneider) Eckert, both natives of that country. His education was acquired partly in Germany, and was finished in Indianapolis, whither he had come with his sister when he was fourteen, arriving Nov. 26, 1873. His sister, Mrs. Schlegel, still resides here.

Mr. Eckert attended school in Indianapolis for some time after his arrival. On April 15, 1874, he went to work at cigar making for J. P. C. Meyer, spending three years mastering the trade. For over nine years he worked as a journeyman for John Rauch. In 1886 Mr. Meyer was about to go away for his health, and wanted some honest person to close up at nights for him, and to take his receipts for each day. Knowing Mr. Eckert's reliability, he asked him to do this work, and on his return Mr. Meyer showed his appreciation of the favor done by Mr. Eckert, by offering him better inducements than he found at Mr. Rauch's. Mr. Eckert made the change and remained with Mr. Meyer for over five years. At the end of that time, Mr. Eckert, from ill health, was obliged to rest, and when he regained his health, he went to Cincinnati, Ohio, to try his luck for one year. At the expiration of that time he found that "there was no place like home," and he returned to Indianapolis, going to J. Wenger & Co. He recognized the fact that the work he turned out for others was largely patronized, and he began to save up his dollars until on Jan. 22, 1894, he opened up a business for himself at No. 211 Blake street, in a small room. He lived on the premises, and his patronage was soon increased to such an extent that his quarters were too small. In the latter part of 1901 he moved his business (factory and office) to No. 520 West Washington street. Mr. Eckert's friends always speak of him as a straightforward, sober man, honest in his business dealings, and his success is due to his business methods which are entirely his own. While his business is located, as stated, at No. 520 West Washington street, he has a comfortable home at No. 406 North West street.

On New Year's eve, 1902, Mr. Eckert was married to Bessie L. Stone. Mr. Eckert belongs to the Knights of Fidelity, Improved Order of Red Men, Knights of Pythias, Haymakers and the Badischer Unterstutzungs Verein.

JOHN MOORE, a general merchant at Oaklondon, Ind., where he has attained considerable prominence and a substantial standing in the business and commercial circles of Marion county, was born in Madison county, Ind., May 22, 1849, a son of Moses and Sarah (Bauer) Moore, both of whom were natives of Virginia.

John Moore, grandfather of John, was born in Pennsylvania, of German descent. He was a farmer and a miller, and moving into Virginia, died there well advanced in years, the father of a large family. Philip Bauer, maternal grandfather of John Moore, was born in Virginia, and removing early in his life to Ohio, became a very successful farmer in that State. His family consisted of eight children. He was of German descent, and died in Ohio when quite old.

Moses Moore was a farmer all his life, and in an early day came into the western country, making a location on a farm of eighty acres in Madison county, where he died in 1872, at the age of sixty-six years. His widow survived until 1896, when she passed away at the age of seventy-three years. They were of the United Brethren faith. They had a family of six sons and five daughters, and six of their children are now living: Catherine, the widow of Philip Shetterly, of Elwood, Ind.; Eli, of Alma, Kans.; Sarah, the wife of Jacob Bogart, of Perkinsville, Ind.; John, of Oaklandon, Ind.; Isaiah, of Alma, Kans.; and Setilla, the wife of Allen Foland, also of Alma, Kansas.

John Moore was reared in Madison county, Ind., and remained on his father's farm until he was eighteen years old. His education was secured in the district school, and when he was eighteen years old, he set himself to the learning of the trade of carriage and wagon maker, which was his occupation for some twenty years or more in Oaklandon, to which village he came in 1873. He afterward engaged in the hardware and agricultural implement business at the same place. About 1888 he embarked in a general mercantile business, which he has followed to the present time.

John Moore was married Dec. 27, 1871, to Miss Emma A., daughter of Rebs and Rebecca Jane (Freeman) Jenkins. They have an adopted son, John Delbert, who has now grown to manhood, and is a clerk in Mr. Moore's store. He married Clemmie L. Ginder, and is the father of one child, Lucile.

Mrs. Moore is a member of the Christian Church. Mr. Moore belongs to Oakland Lodge, No. 534, I. O. O. F., and the Encampment. He is a Democrat, and is an upright and honorable citizen, much respected in the community where his useful and industrious life is passing. Half a mile west of the village of Oaklandon he has a good farm of eighty-six acres, and also owns a very pleasant home in the village. His father was a pioneer in Indiana, his grandfather in Virginia, and his great-grandfather in Pennsylvania. The deed to his great-grandfather's farm was signed by the sons of William Penn, and here he built a large stone house, 140 years ago, which is still standing, and is in a good state of preservation. Mrs. Moore's people are interested in an estate in England, which once belonged to a Freeman, who was a bachelor.

In his store Mr. Moore carries a large and well selected stock of dry goods, groceries and general merchandise, and he is a progressive and public-spirited citizen and business man. He is a genuine "Hoosier," his parents having settled in this State over seventy years ago when the country was new and very sparsely settled, being among the very early pioneers of this region. Mr. Moore has lived in the State more than half a century, and was well acquainted with many of the sturdy pioneers of Madison and Marion counties.

CAPT. FRANCIS M. VAN PELT, an officer of the Civil war, past commander of Major May Post, G. A. R., Anderson, and a respected citizen of Anderson, where he is serving as justice of the peace, was born Aug. 15, 1838, in that town, son of Uriah and Almira (Daugherty) Van Pelt.

Captain Van Pelt received his education in the district schools, which he attended until he was eighteen years old. He was reared on a farm but had begun to learn the carpenter's trade, when, in April, 1861, he enlisted and was mustered into the U. S. service at Indianapolis, Ind., as a private of Company G, 17th Ind. V. I. He received his honorable discharge at Nashville, Tenn., in January, 1865, after three years and eight months service. For meritorious services he was promoted to duty sergeant and to second lieutenant in April, 1862, after the battle of Shiloh, and to first lieutenant Dec. 18, 1862. He was in charge of his company from December, 1862, until Nov. 20, 1863, being in command at the battle of Chickamauga. He commanded his company in the battle at Hoover's Gap, June 24, 1863, and during the siege of Chattanooga. His brigade was mounted at Murfreesboro, Tenn., and was afterward known as Wilder's Brigade. He was under General Crook in pursuit of Gen. Joseph Wheeler, and participated in the battle at Farmington, Tenn., where Wilder's Brigade lost heavily. During this battle, Captain Van Pelt, in command of his company, made a gallant charge, capturing three of the enemy's field pieces, and driving the Confederates across the Tennessee river. At Mooresville, Ala., after the battle of Chickamauga, in the latter part of November, 1863, he was detailed in the field in recruiting service, by general order from Governor Morton that the Indiana regiments be recruited. Capt. Van Pelt, representing Company G, came home at once on this order, and acted as recruiting officer until April 1, 1864. He rejoined his regiment at Indianapolis at the end of a veteran furlough of thirty days. He left Indianapolis with his regiment as first lieutenant, and at Louisville, Ky., was detailed in command of sixty men to go in search of guerrillas. On this expedition he first met and became acquainted with Felix G. Stidger, of Taylorsville, Ky., to whom he had been referred as a Union man. Later he was in a raid on Bardstown, Ky., which was captured with six prisoners. At the mouth of Cox's Creek, a branch of the Salt river, Lieutenant Van Pelt and his men captured a Mr. Blanchard, a wealthy planter and secessionist, who had harbored guerrillas, and sent him in charge of Lieutenant Wagner to Louisville, Ky. Captain Van Pelt then took twenty men, went to the towns of Chaplin and Bloomfield, Nelson county, Ky., and took three prisoners. The extract printed below is from the Louisville Journal of April 14, 1864, and is a graphic account of the affair by George D. Prentice, known the world over for his ability and genius, who was at that time editor of the Journal:

"Lieutenant Van Pelt of the 17th Indiana regiment, who was in command of the detachment of troops sent to Bardstown on Saturday, returned to the city yesterday afternoon with two prisoners in charge. Their names are Mitchell and Lyon, and they claim to belong to the 8th Kentucky Cavalry. They state that they deserted the regiment during the Morgan raid last summer and they have not been connected with the service since. But it is the opinion of the military authorities that they have been serving in the guerrilla companies in the State, and belong to a gang that made the late raid into Shelbyville. Lieutenant Van Pelt was riding at the head of his detachment, and on entering Bloomfield, three men in butternut suits spurred their horses to their mettle and dashed madly down the road in an opposite direction. The Lieutenant gave chase, but in starting his horse became frightened and in bounding over a wood pile fell and threw his rider against a frame building. The Lieutenant was stunned, but remounted his horse and followed in pursuit. Being better mounted than the men of his detachment, he soon distanced them, and with a sadly jaded steed found himself close upon the heels of the pursued, but alone, his men back to the rear. Finding he could not overtake the guerrillas without a fresh horse, he quickly dismounted in front of a farm yard and leading a spirited animal from the stable soon girted on the saddle and was speeding on after the fleeing thieves.

"A two-mile run brought the pursuer and pursued face to face, and presenting his revolver the lieutenant demanded them to surrender. Two of the party complied with the demand without a show of resistance, while the third, whose high mettle steed appeared still to be fresh, dashed into the cedars and succeeded in making his escape. Lieutenant Van Pelt started back to Bloomfield with his prisoners and soon met a portion of his detachment. They returned to Bardstown in the evening, and with the cool of blood and excitement, the Lieutenant found that the injury of his fall was so great as to almost prevent him from remaining in the saddle. His right arm was badly injured and he had other bruises, so that it required assistance to get on and off his horse. Notwithstanding this, he remained up all night, and riding on to Mt. Washington placed the prisoners under guard and saw to it that no recapture could be made by a surprise, by placing a guard around the house as well as in the road. With little sleep and rest, he rode next morning into Louisville and turned the prisoners over to the military authorities. The bold, daring ride of Lieutenant Van Pelt of the 17th Indiana regiment, outrivals the wild, dashing feats of the renowned heroes of knightly days, and smacks of romance almost too thrilling to be real—but the truth of these statements being established beyond question, we must yield to facts, and crown the Lieutenant as one of the dashing heroes of the war. The two guerrillas are now confined in the military prison."

Being disabled by his injuries, Captain Van Pelt went to the convalescent camp at Columbia, Tenn., in charge of the convalescent squad from Louisville, where he remained about one week, at the end of this time marching with his regiment from Columbia to Chattanooga, where he had been detached for staff duty on General Wilder's staff, but by his own request returned to his own company. Lieutenant Van Pelt participated in all the battles participated in by his regiment, and in the summer of 1864 took part in the Atlanta campaign.

In the fall of 1864 our subject received leave of absence for twenty days, on account of the death of his younger brother, Uriah, a private of the 137th Indiana Infantry, who died at Tullahoma, Tenn. During this furlough Captain Van Pelt again met in Indianapolis Felix G. Stidger, famous for his exposure of the Knights of the Golden Circle, and was subpoenaed as a witness to substantiate Stidger's character as a Union man, before the commissioners who were to investigate the organization known as the "American Knights of the Golden Circle" or "Sons of Liberty." After these services to his country, Captain Van Pelt returned to Anderson, but soon went to Galesburg, Ill., in December, 1865, where he was in the employ of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad, with which company he remained until 1870.

In 1869 he was elected postmaster by a large majority, but the election was not accepted by the postal authorities. On Dec. 24, 1868, Captain Van Pelt was married in Galesburg, Ill., to Amanda M. Slater, born in Rochester, Ill., in 1842, daughter of Dr. Samuel D. and Malvina A. (Stafford) Slater. Dr. Slater was born in Concord, N. H., of English descent, coming of an old Colonial family, members of which served in the American war of the Revolution. Doctor Slater went to Kentucky, where he graduated at the Medical College at Lexington, and moved to Rochester, Ill., about 1825. He was medical director of the 1st Illinois Militia. He went to Galesburg in 1855, for the purpose of educating his children, and there he practiced medicine for years. He was accidentally killed on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad in 1870. Dr. and Mrs. Slater were the parents of the following children: Dr. Albert S., who served as assistant surgeon in the Civil war; Amanda M., ten years a teacher in the public schools in Galesburg and vicinity, and now the wife of Captain Van Pelt; Anna, the wife of Senator J. B. Harsh, of Iowa, president of the First National Bank of Creston, Iowa; Frank H., of Creston, Iowa; and Minnie, the wife of Dr. Herbert Judd, both now deceased.

In 1870 Captain Van Pelt went to Atlanta, Ga., representing William Garrison &

Co., of Philadelphia, publishers, in the management there of their branch office, covering several States. After a few years, he resigned and engaged in contracting for J. C. Peak & Co., until 1874, when he received an appointment in the railway mail service, his route being from Chattanooga to Atlanta, and he continued in this until 1880. Two years of this time he was in the office of L. M. Terrell, superintendent 4th division, Railway Mail Service. In 1880 he was appointed to a position in the United States Revenue service as deputy collector for five counties, with headquarters at Rome, Ga. In 1882 he resigned and returned to Atlanta, and was again appointed in the railway mail service, continuing until 1885. He resigned this position and engaged in contracting in Atlanta until 1889, in which year he became superintendent of the registry department under Gen. John R. Lewis, postmaster of Atlanta, Ga., and served until 1890, when he returned to the railway mail service, running from Atlanta to Brunswick, Ga. In 1890 he accepted a position as deputy collector in the United States Internal Revenue service, his district being five counties in Georgia, with headquarters at Newnan, and here he served until the fall of 1893. In the spring of 1894 Captain Van Pelt removed with his family to Lincoln, Neb., where three of his daughters graduated at the Western Normal College, and where he resided until the fall of 1895. In that year he returned to Anderson, Ind. In 1902 he was elected justice of the peace, an office which he still retains, having proved an efficient and able justice, whose judgment is respected by the people.

Captain Van Pelt is one of the original Republicans, having voted for Abraham Lincoln, and for every Republican candidate for the presidency since. He joined the G. A. R. in Galesburg, Ill., in 1866, that post, with Gen. A. A. Smith post commander, being one of the first posts ever organized. He has held many offices and was commander of Major May Post, Anderson, in 1902. He was a member of O. M. Mitchell Post, Atlanta, Ga. Captain Van Pelt is an honored member of the I. O. O. F., and was recording secretary of his lodge in Newnan, Georgia.

Captain and Mrs. Van Pelt are the parents of the following children: Minnie A., a teacher; Frances M., the wife of E. W. Bilzen, assistant superintendent of the Metropolitan Insurance Company; Ada Madge, a teacher in the public schools of Anderson; and Almira S., wife of Walter W. Nuzum, assistant superintendent Western-Southern Life Insurance Company.

The 17th Indiana regiment, to which Captain Van Pelt belonged, marched over 4,000 miles during its service in the Civil war, and captured over 5,000 prisoners, more than 6,000 stands of arms, seventy pieces of artillery, eleven stands of colors, and more than 3,000 horses and mules. All this was done with a loss of three officers and sixty-six men killed, and thirteen officers and seventeen men wounded. The regiment fought in nearly every State in the South, viz.: Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi, Georgia and Alabama. Lieutenant Van Pelt served nobly and gallantly in all battles of his regiment. In an article from his pen descriptive of his visit to the battlefield of Chickamauga, he writes: "On the outside of the Wilder monument engraved in slabs of polished granite are the names of every officer in the entire brigade, and on the inside is a huge safe, in which are deposited the names, on parchment, of every man who was in the brigade and participated in the battle. To be able to see my name on that monument gives me more pleasure than to be possessed of all the wealth required to build all the monuments on the entire field."

Uriah Van Pelt, the father of our subject, was born in Highland county, Ohio, in 1803. He was of sturdy Holland-Dutch stock, son of Benjamin Van Pelt, who moved from Knoxville, Tenn., to Highland county, Ohio, as a pioneer. Uriah Van Pelt married Almira Daugherty, in Preble county, Ohio. The Daughertys were of sterling Scotch-Irish descent, and the founder of the family in America, William Daugherty, came from County Antrim, Ireland, to Pennsylvania, in 1789, when he was about seventeen years old. He settled in Chester county, where, being well educated, he followed school teaching. There he was married to Mary Foster, the daughter of Rev. William Foster (whose wife's name was Blair). Both the Fosters and the Blairs were of Scotch-Irish stock, and the ancestors of the Rev. William Foster, who was a Presbyterian clergyman, came on one of the early Scotch-Irish emigrations to Pennsylvania. He married one of the daughters of the Rev. James Blair, also a Presbyterian minister, who had four daughters, all of whom married Presbyterian ministers. The Blairs were a very prominent Chester county, Pa., family in Colonial times, and very patriotic. Rev. James Blair, of Virginia, was one of the founders of William and Mary College. The Daugherty and Foster families moved to Mercer county, Pa., some years after the Revolution, and about the beginning of the nineteenth century. William Daugherty and wife removed from Kentucky to Montgomery county, Ohio, as pioneers, and settled on Government land, where he died aged about forty-eight years. He and his family were Presbyterians in religion, and Mr. Daugherty helped to establish one of the most historical churches in Montgomery county, Ohio,—the old Duck Creek Presbyterian Church, of which he was a liberal supporter and faithful member. His children were: Samuel, a soldier in the war of 1812; William; Margaret; Almira; James; and Joseph Foster, who became the father of Captain W. W. Daugherty, of Indianapolis.

After marriage Uriah Van Pelt and his wife settled in Huntsville, Ind., in 1832, where Mr. Van Pelt worked at the trade of millwright. He bought a saw and grist mill at the Jackson mill site, one mile southeast of Anderson (where Capt. Francis M. was born), and built a mill on the Bronnenburg site on the White river. He moved in 1841 to the Moss Island mill site, two miles west of Anderson, and built a mill there, and was appointed associate judge by Governor Bigger, holding that office seven years. He moved in 1845 to a farm, and there died in 1846. The commission given to Mr. Van Pelt by the Governor on his appointment in 1837 to the associate judgeship of Madison county, was dated Dec. 1, 1841, in "the 26th year of the State of Indiana." This commission is in the possession of Capt. Van Pelt. It was signed by Daniel Bigger, Governor, and William Sheets as Secretary of State; Andrew Jackson, as clerk of Madison county, and James M. Jackson as deputy clerk. Mr. Van Pelt was elected to serve seven years, and at the end of that time, in 1844, was re-elected.

The children born to Uriah Van Pelt and his estimable wife were as follows: Rebecca A.; Samuel D., a member of the 19th Indiana Regiment; Isaac H., who died in 1857; Francis M., our subject; Jane C., who died in 1857; Matilda; William P., who was in the 116th and then in the 132d Indiana Infantry; and Uriah J., who died in the service, being a member of the 137th Indiana Infantry.

Captain Francis M. Van Pelt has a genuine literary feeling and a true poetic fancy. He has written many beautiful poems, which have given his friends much pleasure, and have been printed widely in the columns of the Western press. We insert two of them, which evidence his poetic talent in its sweetest strain:

UNKNOWN.

Our own, and yet unknown
To fame, yet just the same Right here we drop the tear
On grave for warrior brave,
Who lies 'neath southern skies;
He's blest, so let him rest.

Unknown, except as shown On scroll, as they unroll
And tell how patriots fell
And died on land and tide.
He's gone, his deeds live on;
'Tis best, so let him rest.

Though sweet to yearly meet,
And show while here below
How true he wore the blue.
Let's trust o'er precious dust
Some day, not far away,
We'll build, from hearts well filled,
With love, shaft high above
This earth, for 'tis well worth
The cost. 'Twill not be lost;
With pride when we have died
They'll say, in some sweet day,
"Unknown will there be known."

WHEN THE ROBINS COME BACK IN THE SPRING.

Yes, the meadow lark, blue bird and wren,
May sit on the trellis and sing,
But I always feel happiest when
The robin comes back in the spring.
It kind 'a seems like, when I meet him,
When he first comes hopping around,
I want to say "hello," and greet him.
Just like some old friend I had found.
Then way goes my fancy to drinking
In draughts of the old-fashioned joy
Of childhood, and sets me to thinking Of good times I had when a boy.
He always slips in without warning,
Like mushrooms that grow in a night;
He's out there to tell me good morning,
And looks just as chipper and bright
As though he had slept under cover
Of magnolia groves far away.
But, fairy-like, simply dropped over,
This morning to visit and say:
"I'm not here with notes all impassioned,
Like sweet little mockers that sing,
But only the plain and old-fashioned Friend Robin, who comes every spring."

JOHN T. GLAZIER, first assistant chief of the fire department of Indianapolis, was born in this city Feb. 8, 1852, son of Frank H. and Louisa C. (Francis) Glazier. He is a grandson of Jacob Glazier, who was born in Maryland, of German ancestry. Several families of the name settled in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and Maryland, and they are now widely distributed throughout the United States. Jacob Glazier came to Indiana about 1835, and locating on a farm in Warren township, Marion county, died there at the age of fifty-six years. He reared a family of four daughters and three sons. His wife's father was a soldier in the war of the Revolution.

Frank H. Glazier was born in Maryland. He was an engineer, serving as such on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. He came to Indianapolis over half a century ago, and here made a permanent home, was with the Eagle Machine Works and the Sinkers-Davis Company years ago, and ran the first steam fire engine in the city. But he retired over twenty years ago, and for a number of years he has been totally blind. From 1860 to 1870 he was connected with the fire department. He and his wife are faithful and devoted members of the Meridian Street Methodist Church. Mrs. Glazier was born in Ohio. They had a family of six sons and two daughters, four sons now surviving: Peter F., John T., Charles C., and Lewis A. The deceased sons are Ulysses G. and Henry S. Ulysses G. Glazier belonged to the fire department, and was killed in the Bowen-Merrill fire, March 17, 1890. Henry S. was in the printing bureau at Washington, where he had charge of the press that prints the stamp on the money during Harrison's administration. While on leave of absence he fell ill of pneumonia, and died in Indianapolis in December, 1892.

Peter Francis, the maternal grandfather of John T. Glazier, was born in France, settled in Pennsylvania in an early day, and about 1838 removed to Indiana, settling in Indianapolis, where he followed his trade as a stonemason and did contracting on a considerable scale. Here he died when about seventy years old. He had a family of four children, one son and three daughters.

John T. Glazier has passed all his life in Indianapolis, where he received his education in the public schools. For over thirty years he has been on the fire force of the city, though not continuously, as for four years he filled the position of deputy sheriff and jailer. This was from Dec. 9, 1880, to Dec. 9, 1884. Mr. Glazier first became connected with the fire department in 1870. For several years he was a captain, and since the law was passed establishing the firemen's fund, he has been the secretary of the fund; the law was enacted Feb. 23, 1895.

Mr. Glazier was married Nov. 16, 1874, to Miss Sallie B. Kendall, a daughter of John and Elizabeth (Custer) Kendall. Her father was a Scotchman, and her mother a native of Indiana. Mr. and Mrs. Glazier are the parents of three children: Frank T., John P., and Lewis A. Frank is a switchman in the yards of the P. & E. railway; he married Gertrude Randall. John P., who married Florence Fry, is a clerk in the Vandalia offices. Lewis A. is a brakeman on the Cincinnati Division of the "Big Four." The oldest and youngest sons served in the Spanish-American war, and saw service in Cuba. Frank belonged to the 2d Engineer Corps, stationed at Havana; the detention camp at Montauk for the care of the sick soldiers was constructed by this corps.

Mr. Glazier is a member of Center Lodge, No. 23, F. & A. M., and is a Republican in politics. His home is at No. 620 East South street. He is the patentee of a nozzle for general purposes for the equipment of factories.

JOHN L. MCFARLAND, the energetic and enterprising manager of the Railroad Transfer Company, of Indianapolis, with offices at No. 126 South Alabama street, was born in Marion county June 22, 1846, a son of William and Martha (Clinn) McFarland. The parents were natives of Kentucky and had a family of eleven children, of whom we have mention as follows: Cary A., of Marion county; Mary, wife of Rev. E. R. Riley, of Kansas; Miss Appoline; John L.; Artemesia, deceased; Benjamin F., of Indianapolis; Margaret; Luella, deceased; William H.; Belle, Mrs. Collins, deceased; and Lillian. The father, William McFarland, was always a farmer, and was an early settler in Marion county, having had his home here for seventy-five years. In September, 1901, he and his wife celebrated the sixty-second anniversary of their marriage. Both are Baptists in their religious faith.

Benjamin McFarland, the grandfather of John L., was a native of Scotland, an early settler in Kentucky, and later an early settler in Marion county, Ind., where he lived many years, and where he died at the age of ninety-one years. His profession in life was that of a physician. His family was small. He served in the war of 1812, and in the Blackhawk war. John Clinn, the maternal grandfather of Mr. McFarland, was a native of Kentucky, and an early settler in Marion county, Ind., where he spent the remainder of his life. He had a numerous offspring.

John L. McFarland has passed all his life in Marion county, and was reared to manhood on his father's farm, where he attended the local schools. In the fall of 1869 he came to Indianapolis and engaged in the feed and grocery business. For a time he clerked for Thomas Cottrell, in his wholesale tinner's tools, stock and supply business. His next engagement was in the freight house of the Panhandle railroad company. Later he was employed in the freight house of the Wabash road, and then in the same line for the Lake Erie & Western. This brought him up to 1889, in which year he became owner and manager of the Railroad Transfer Company, which is his present business.

Mr. McFarland was married Dec. 26, 1873, to Miss Elnora, daughter of Benjamin and Rachel (Robinson) Davis, and to this union have come one daughter and one son, Edith and Charles W. In religious connection Mr. McFarland is a Baptist and his wife a Methodist. In politics he is a Republican, and he belongs to the Marion and Commercial Clubs. Mr. McFarland was elected councilman at large, Oct. 8, 1901, his election being thus for the entire city, and a compliment well bestowed. The McFarland home is at No. 844 Fletcher avenue, and Mr. McFarland built it the year he was married.

MARTIN H. WILLHIDE. Among the highly esteemed citizens of Green township, Madison county, Ind., may be mentioned Martin H. Willhide, a veteran of the Civil war, who was born in Mechanicsville, Md., June 13, 1843, son of John Daniel and Matilda (Staufer) Willhide.

The great grandfather of our subject came from Germany and settled in Mechanicsville, Md., where one of his sons, Conrad, the grandfather of Martin H., owned a large tract of farming land, a grist mill and saw mill, all of which he operated. At his death the children of Conrad Willhide received each a farm. They were: Joseph; Frederick;

William; David; John Daniel; one daughter, who married a Mr. Letherman, and settled in Indianapolis; Barbara, who married Frederick Rider, of Maryland; and Phoebe, who married George W. Foreman. Conrad Willhide died on his farm, in the faith of the Moravian Church.

John Daniel Willhide was born April 10, 1799, in Maryland, near Mechanicsville, on the old Willhide homestead, which is still owned by members of this family. He received a common school education and was reared on the home farm. He married Matilda Stauffer, probably of Pennsylvania-Dutch descent, and they had children: Simeon, John, Catherine, Conrad, Jane, Susan, Mary and Sarah (twins), Edward, Daniel and Martin H. John Daniel Willhide inherited eighty acres of land from his father, and this he improved and converted into a good farm. He was a skillful cradler in the wheatfield, and was a man of great physical strength. In his religious faith he was a Moravian, was very conscientious, and always lived up to his convictions. For many years he held the office of supervisor, and was very highly respected. At the time of his death, Feb. 15, 1870, in his seventy-first year, he was the owner of 300 acres of mountain land. In politics Mr. Willhide was a Republican. Five of the sons of John Daniel Willhide and his estimable wife were soldiers in the Civil war: Simeon, Conrad, Edward, Daniel and Martin H. Simeon, Conrad and Edward were in the 6th Maryland Infantry, in the three years' service, were in several battles, and all returned home safely. Daniel and Martin H. were in the 1st Maryland, Potomac Home Brigade, and Daniel was shot in the left hip at the battle of Gettysburg, dying from the effects of his wounds at home, one year and five days after. He was a married man.

Martin H. Willhide received but a meager education, and prior to his enlistment in the army worked on the home farm. He enlisted at the age of eighteen years, Aug. 12, 1861, in Mechanicsville, Md., as a private of Company D, 1st Maryland, Potomac Home Brigade, being mustered into the U. S. service September 6th of that year for three years service, and was honorably discharged Jan. 18, 1865, at Frederick City, Md. He enlisted again as a veteran, with the 13th Md. V. I., for three years or during the war, and was again honorably discharged June 9, 1865, at Camp Carroll, Baltimore, Md., on account of the closing of the war. He was in the battles of Berryville, Va.; Monocacy Junction, Md.; Harpers Ferry, Va.; Bolivar Heights and three days at Gettysburg. At the latter battle he assisted his wounded half-brother, Frank Baxter, from the battle field, being assisted by Jacob Leidy. Baxter's left ankle was shattered by a ball, and he died before reaching home. Mr. Willhide was in the battle of Antietam in 1863, on the skirmish line for three days. He was sick in the hospital for three days at Weaverton, Md., and was a prisoner of war from Sept. 15, 1862, until March 1, 1863, at Parole Camp, Annapolis, Md. He was captured at Harper's Ferry with his whole regiment, and was paroled the same day, the regiment being marched to Annapolis, Md. He was never wounded in battle, but was ever an active soldier.

After the war Mr. Willhide returned to his father's home. When sixteen years of age he had learned the blacksmith's trade, and this he followed for a time in Hagerstown, Frederick county, also carrying on a farm for about fifteen years. He was married in Hagerstown, Md., Jan. 2, 1868, to Mary Ann Bruner, born in Wolfsville, Frederick county, Sept. 7, 1844, daughter of John and Regina (Marker) Bruner. John Bruner was of Maryland German stock, and was born March 19, 1811, in Frederick county, son of John and Madeline (Smith) Bruner. He married Regina Marker Aug. 7, 1834. Mrs. Bruner was born Aug. 16, 1816, daughter of Henry and Margaret (Coon) Marker, and to her and her husband were born: William, born May 3, 1835; Levi, Jan. 13, 1838; Elizabeth, Sept. 20, 1839; Silas, April 25, 1842; Mary, Sept. 7, 1844; Sophia, Nov. 10, 1846; John, Oct. 16, 1851; and Margaret, Nov. 28, 1855.

After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Willhide lived in Frederick county for fifteen years, and in Washington county, Md., for a short time. In 1883 he came with his family to Indiana, arriving in Anderson January 29th or 30th of that year. They moved to Green township, where Mr. Willhide opened a blacksmith shop, afterward moving to Anderson, where he lived from 1888 to 1895, operating a shop. In 1895 he located in Ingalls, where he operated for five years. Mr. Willhide has purchased a pleasant home in Ingalls, where the family now reside. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Willhide have been: John Henry; Simon; Walter; Clarence Nelson, who served three years in the regular U. S. army, in the Philippines, was on the Island of Samar, and in several battles during his service; Cora F.; Elma, who died aged about sixteen years; Charles E.; Katie; Irving; Maude and Frank.

Mr. and Mrs. Willhide are members of the United Brethren Church, in which he has been class-leader and steward. In politics a Republican, he voted twice for Abraham Lincoln. He is a member of Sol D. Kempton Post, G. A. R., Fortville, of which he has been commander. He has also been a member of the I. O. O. F. for many years, and when in Anderson was a member of the K. G. E. He is a highly respected citizen, and, aided by his estimable wife, has reared an excellent family of children.

O. W. TINGLE, one of the prominent farmers of Johnson county, Ind., has by his own energy and industry gained a position of respect and prominence.

Japtha Tingle, his grandfather, was a native of Scotland, who came to America at an early date and settled in Virginia. He served with honor through the war of the Revolution, and after the war returned to Virginia, but later removed to Kentucky, where he improved a farm and where he spent the rest of his life. He lived to enjoy the freedom and liberty he had fought for. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church. Japtha Tingle was the father of six children as follows: Ebenezer, David, Jessie, Nathaniel, Catherine and Mary.

Nathaniel Tingle, son of Japtha, was born in Kentucky, in 1793. He was a cotton spinner, having a small plant at Georgetown, Ky., where he operated for a number of years, then removed to Shelbyville, and from there to Versailles. Having been successful and prosperous, he erected a large plant at Salvisa, where he had a good business and was meeting with greater success, when fire destroyed his entire plant including a large stock of raw material and manufactured goods. Being without insurance Mr. Tingle found himself bereft of his life's earnings at an advanced age. In 1855 he moved with his family to Johnson county, Ind., where he leased a farm and remained until his death, which occurred in 1869, at the age of seventy-six years. He was a good business man and prosperous, and had accumulated considerable property when the misfortune of the fire overcame him. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church, and was highly respected in all the communities where he lived.

Nathaniel Tingle was married three times. By his first marriage he had no children. His second marriage was to Miss Eliza Young, of Kentucky, daughter of a highly respected family of that State. The result of this union was three children as follows: Amanda, Mrs. William Tingle; Ann M., who died single, at the age of seventy years; and Sarah, Mrs. Robinson. His wife having died, Mr. Tingle again married, the bride being Sarah Whitemack, who was born in Kentucky. Her father was a native of Holland, who had an unusual experience on his voyage to America, having spent seven months on the sea. He settled in Kentucky where he became a respected and successful farmer. He had nine children as follows: Peter, Andrew, Henry, Samuel, John, Sarah, Lavinia, Charity and Ann. Sarah (Whitemack) Tingle died in 1860. Mr. Tingle's third marriage was blessed with seven children as follows: Eliza, who died young; O. W.; John, a farmer in Pleasant township; Samuel, a railroad man, who died leaving five children; Alice, Mrs. Shortridge, of Indianapolis, a widow; David O., of Greenwood; and Luella, who died young.

O. W. Tingle was born in 1843, in Kentucky, and came to Johnson county with his parents when he was twelve years old. He remained at home assisting his father with the farm work for several years.

Mr. Tingle was married in 1868, to Miss Mary A. Brewer, a lady of refinement, who was born in Pleasant township, daughter of John C. and Ann (Comingore) Brewer.

John C. and Ann (Comingore) Brewer were natives of Kentucky, but were married in Indiana and settled on a farm at Greenwood, where he became one of the solid men of the county. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church and died in 1873. To Mr. and Mrs. Brewer were born seven children as follows: Mary A., Mrs. Tingle; Elizabeth, Mrs. J. E. Smith; Marcella, Mrs. D. Tingle; Eldora, Mrs. T. H. Pettit; Laura, Mrs. Jos. Rubush; Charles E., of Sullivan county; and Edward, a farmer. Mrs. Ann (Comingore) Brewer survived her husband, and married (second) William Brooks, a highly respected farmer and citizen. She died in 1894.

Mrs. Mary A. (Brewer) Tingle was a successful teacher before her marriage, and was a worthy member of the Presbyterian Church. She died Dec. 5, 1893, the mother of two children, namely: John E., born in 1883, died in November, 1888; Mary E., born April 19, 1886, is still at home.

In 1806 Mr. Tingle was married to Julia Jennings, born in Marion county, Ind., daughter of Thomas and Lucy (Eckles) Jennings, of Indiana. Thomas Jennings is a retired farmer, living in Greenwood. He is highly respected, has been a school trustee, and has filled other public offices in Greenwood. Mr. and Mrs. Jennings had five children, namely: Julia, Mrs. Tingle; Samuel, bookkeeper for the Packing Company; John; and Katie and William who are at home. To Mr. Tingle and his second wife one child was born, Julia Alice, born Feb. 17, 1899. Mrs. Julia (Jennings) Tingle died March 26, 1901. She was for ten years a successful teacher and is tenderly remembered as a good Christian woman, devoted wife and mother, and faithful member of the Presbyterian Church.

At the time of his first marriage Mr. Tingle rented a farm which in a few years he bought, and on which he still lives. He has made many improvements, and now has a fine place adjoining the corporation of Greenwood. Mr. Tingle is a successful farmer and business man. For a number of years he was foreman at Polk's Canning factory. By a life of industry and upright living he has won the esteem of all who know him. In politics he has long been identified with the Democratic party, and although he has never sought office he was elected county commissioner in 1892 and 1895, serving two terms with honor and credit to himself and to the satisfaction of the people. He has taken an active part in charitable work, was a director of the cemetery, also a director of the Building and Loan Association. Mr. Tingle has for many years been prominently connected with fraternal orders, being a Knight Templar Mason, Franklin Commandery; he is also a member of the I. O. O. F., Greenwood Lodge, No. 198, has attended Grand Lodge, filled all the chairs of his lodge and has been treasurer of his lodge. He and his family are connected with the Presbyterian Church, in which he takes an active part. He has been a deacon, for many years a trustee, and was also a member of the committee in charge of the construction of the new church edifice.

THOMAS W. WONNELL was born in Marion county, Ind., in July, 1851, son of James and Eliza (Van Eaton) Wonnell, the former of whom was born in 1808, in Delaware, and the latter in 1818, in Hamilton county, Ohio.

The paternal grandfather was a native of Delaware, and followed blacksmithing. He was a son of a Hessian soldier who came with the English army to fight the Colonies and ended by becoming one of the Patriots. On the maternal side, the grandfather came from North Carolina to Hamilton county, Ohio, where he settled near Mt. Washington. This was in 1795, after his marriage. He was born Sept. 12, 1773, and in 1795 married Rebecca Renshaw, born March 6, 1777. He died Feb. 12, 1846, and she died in 1868. A family of twelve children were born to them. The paternal grandparents had nine children, all of whom are deceased.

By his first marriage James Wonnell had six children, namely: Albert and John, deceased; George, a resident of Brownsburg, Ind.; William, who died in the war in 1862, in North Carolina; Mary, living in Indianapolis; and Ruth, deceased. The children of the second marriage of James Wonnell were: Charles; Sarah, deceased; Rebecca, deceased; Thomas W.; James, deceased; Samuel H.; Wilbur C.; and Walton, deceased. One of the pioneers here, James Wonnell came to Indianapolis in 1842, and in 1844 he built a house in Warren township, on land which is now worth from $100 to $125 an acre.

Thomas W. Wonnell attended the district schools in Warren township. He learned the blacksmith trade, which he has followed more or less ever since, in connection with farming. He is very enterprising and industrious, and has done much in the improvement of his home place. He carries on general farming and raises a great many Chester White and Poland China hogs.

On Jan. 29, 1884, Mr. Wonnell married Ella Enoch, daughter of Tobias and Sophia (McGinnis) Enoch, the former of whom was born in 1818 in France, and the latter in 1828, in Ohio. Mr. Enoch followed farming for years in Ohio, and in 1863, he came to Marion county, where he continued until his death, in 1891. In politics he was a life-long Democrat. In his religious belief he was a Baptist.

The children of Mr. and Mrs. Wonnell are: Grover, who is engaged with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, at Indianapolis; John D., who is about closing his third year of instruction in the manual training school; and Sydney and Ruth, at home.

Mr. Wonnell owns sixty acres of good land, eight acres of which he devotes to pasturage, as he is largely interested in dairying, his products finding ready sale in the city. All that he owns he has accumulated by hard work, and he deserves a large amount of credit. He has come to the time now when he can afford to enjoy some of the good things of life. His home is one of hospitality, and both he and his estimable wife have a wide circle of warm friends. In politics Mr. Wonnell has always been a Democrat, and has been prominent in the councils of his party in this section. In 1900 he was elected township trustee. He is connected with a number of fraternal organizations, being a member of the Knights of Pythias, Lodge No. 324, at Irvington; of the Odd Fellows, Lodge No. 508, at Irvington; and both he and his wife belong to the Knights and Ladies of Honor, Lodge No. 1137.

SAMUEL E. BUSBY, a highly respected resident of Lapel, and formerly an extensive farmer and stock raiser of Stonycreek township, Madison Co., Ind., where he still owns 223 acres of finely improved land, belongs to one of the old pioneer families of this county. He was born Dec. 16, 1828, on Paint Creek, Kanawha Co., W. Va., son of Thomas and Isabella (Guinn) Busby.

The Busby family is of English extraction. Isaac Busby, the grandfather of Samuel E., came from England and settled at a very early day in Kanawha county, W. Va., where he lived until after the death of his wife, when he accompanied his two youngest sons, Isaac and John, to Madison county, Ind. Isaac, the son with whom the elder Isaac lived, settled three miles east of Pendleton, on new land and cleared up a farm from the woods. It is not known in what year this settlement was made, but as the farm was well cleared in 1833, it is presumed that the settlement was as early as 1825. On this farm the elder Isaac died in 1840. His children were: Thomas, William, Isaac, John, Margaret (who married Addison Ellison) and Jennie (who married Henry Perry). The daughters with their husbands settled on Lick Creek in Madison county.

Thomas Busby, father of Samuel E., was born in 1799, in West Virginia, and was married in Greenbrier county, that State, to Isabella Guinn, daughter of Samuel Guinn. The latter came from Ireland, settled in West Virginia, and for his day was considered a very wealthy man, owning a large tract of land and many slaves. As a wedding present to his daughter Isabella, he gave a colored boy, whom the former brought to Indiana and set free. The Guinn children were: Moses, Samuel, John, Isabella and one who became Mrs. Newsome. The Guinns were Presbyterians.

After marriage Thomas Busby and wife settled on West Paint Creek, making the journey to Madison county, Ind., with a four-horse wagon in 1833. On starting the wife and five small children rode in a one-horse carryall, but it broke down on the rough mountain road, and they were obliged to ride in the heavy wagon, in which they slept at night. Thomas Busby settled one-half mile east of Huntsville, on Fall Creek, where his brother, had rented a farm for him from Jonathan Justice of Wayne county. On this farm he resided four years, during which time he was assisted by his brother in locating a tract of one-half section of uncleared land in Stonycreek township. This land was covered with very heavy timber when Thomas Busby entered it. Samuel E. Busby can well remember a giant black walnut which was cut down near his home when he was a lad, and which measured six feet through. Here Thomas Busby built first a log cabin which later was replaced by a double log cabin, a part of which was made of hewed logs. Later, as he prospered, he built good substantial buildings which are still standing. He died in 1865, at the age of seventy-six years. The death of his wife occurred on this farm when she was aged fifty-six years. Both had been lifelong members of the Methodist Church. He was one of the earliest appointed justices of the peace, and was a man who commanded the respect of his fellow-citizens. Prior to the formation of the Republican party, he had been a Democrat, but later became identified with the new organization. The children of Thomas Busby and wife were: Jane, who married Charles Fisher, of Madison county; Mariam, who married John Sloan, of Madison county; Mary, who married Thomas Stanley, of Madison county; Frances, who married William Alexander, of Madison county; Elizabeth, who became the second wife of Thomas Stanley; Margaret, who married Samuel Viney, of Cass county, Ind.; Sarah, who married James Ford, of Madison county; Susan, who married Stephen Thomas, of Madison county; and Andrew, Isaac, Samuel, John and William, of whom the last named died young.

Samuel E. Busby was nearly five years old when he came to Indiana, and can recall many incidents of the journey. His boyhood and youth were spent among pioneer surroundings, and he attended school in a log cabin near Fishersburg. Until his marriage he had school advantages for several months in the winter time, but his summers were devoted to hard work on the farm. In 1856, he was married to Clarissa Willits, born in Wayne county in 1824, daughter of Elisha and Mary (Hanna) Willits. Elisha Willits was of English stock, born in Pennsylvania, and came to Wayne county as a pioneer, where he lived to the age of ninety years. For his day he was a man of wealth. He was a soldier in the War of 1812. His children were: Nelson, Jesse, Eldridge, Irvin, Sarah, Ann, Mary and Clarissa.

After marriage Samuel E. Busby settled near Lapel, where he bought, at different times, heavily timbered lands consisting in all of 223 acres, but a small portion of which had been cleared. He built a fine house and improved his farm in other ways, and resided here until twelve years ago, when he came to Lapel and built the fine residence in which he now lives. Mrs. Busby died in 1896 at Lapel, in the faith of the Methodist Church.

On Aug. 12, 1897, at Anderson, Ind., Mr. Busby was married (second) to Elizabeth Catherine Fullwider, born in Fayette, now Sumner county, W. Va., April 16, 1845, daughter of John and Francinia (Guinn) Fullwider. John Fullwider was born Jan. 5, 1817, in West Virginia, near White Sulphur Springs. He was a son of Jacob and Sarah Fullwider, of German stock. After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Busby settled in Lapel. They have reared three children and made a home for several others. Both are members of the Methodist Church, in which Mr. Busby is a class leader, steward and exhorter. He has always been very generous in donations to the church, and has given assistance to not only his own but to other denominations. During his residence in Stonycreek township he served as assessor, and was always interested in school matters. He is a man of very fine presence, being over six feet, five inches in height, and although not so heavy now, has weighed as much as 260 pounds. Like other members of the family Mr. Busby is a straightforward, broad-minded man, and has always been held in high esteem by his fellow-citizens.

JAMES LEWIS HUTCHINS, a substantial citizen of Liberty township, Delaware county, Ind., and a soldier of the Civil war, was born in a pioneer log house then situated on his present farm of eighty acres, in the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of Section 22, range 11, east, Liberty township, March 12, 1843, a son of Sewell and Eleanor (Simmons) Hutchins.

The Hutchins family is of English extraction and its founder was a Colonial settler in Maryland. The great-grandfather came from England, probably being the family's founder, and Clemons Hutchins, the grandfather, was born near Prince Frederick, in Calvert county, Md. He was a school teacher. He married Susan Schley, in Maryland, and their two children were a daughter whose name is not known; and Sewell. Clemons Hutchins died young in Maryland.

Sewell Hutchins was born in 1784, in Calvert county, Md., and was but eight years of age when his father died. In early life he was employed in a tobacco factory and on a plantation. He took part as a soldier in the war of 1812, and participated in several battles around Baltimore and Washington, when the British made their invasion. Sewell Hutchins married (first) in Maryland, Rebecca King, and their children were George; and James, who died in infancy. This wife died in Maryland, and he married (second) Susan Dotson, who died soon after, leaving no children. He married (third) and this wife also died soon. He married (fourth) in Calvert county, Md., Eleanor Simmons, born there February 16, 1808, daughter of Basil and Mary (Wivel) Simmons. The children of this marriage were: William S., Rebecca, Sarah, Eliza, James L. and Israel.

The Simmons family was of English extraction. Basil Simmons was born in Maryland. He was a physician and a minister, and he also owned slaves and a plantation known as "White House Farm." He was a prominent man, served as a justice of the peace and lived to the age of seventy-five years. He was opposed to slavery, and several years before his death he gave his negroes their freedom. His children were: James, Mary, Susan and Eleanor.

Sewell Hutchins owned a farm of eighty acres near Prince Frederick, Md., which he disposed of, and in 1832 moved with his family to Indiana, making the journey with a two-horse wagon. They settled in the woods in Liberty township, Delaware county, that being the state of the present highly cultivated farm. Mr. Hutchins cleared this land and added forty more acres, improved all with good buildings, and became a substantial farmer. In religious belief Sewell Hutchins was a Methodist, one of the founders of Methodism in Smithfield. He furnished the timber for the erection of a church, meetings prior to its building being held in the various houses. He was one of the ready entertainers of the circuit-riders, that body of zealous men who rode through the wilderness carrying their Bibles in their saddle-bags and preaching the gospel to an otherwise neglected people. In political opinion he was an old-line Whig, later a Republican, and cast his vote for John C. Fremont and later for Abraham Lincoln. He was a typical American pioneer, industrious, straightforward and courageous. He died in February, 1865, aged eighty years, three months.

James Lewis Hutchins, son of Sewell, received his early educational training in a log cabin school house, which had an immense fire-place, six feet wide, and a stick-and-mud chimney. It had a puncheon floor and slab benches. To reach this temple of learning, Mr. Hutchins had to walk a distance of nearly two miles. Later for about six years he attended a school in Smithfield, which was held in an old red carpenter shop, his schooling occupying three months in the winter, as his summers were given to working on the farm. He next attended school in the frame building across the river, on the corner of John S. Cecil's farm, until he was nineteen years old.

On Feb. 5, 1864, Mr. Hutchins enlisted for three years or during the war as a private in Company H, 124th Ind. V. I. He served until honorably discharged at Greensboro, N. C., Aug. 31, 1865, the great Civil war having closed. His services were in Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama and North Carolina, and he participated in the battles of Resaca, siege of Atlanta when the Union troops were under fire for four months. Allatoona, Kenesaw Mountain and Atlanta. He went to Nashville under the beloved "Pap" Thomas, and was in the second battle of Franklin, one of the hardest fought battles of the war, and in the battle of Nashville. The Confederates made thirteen charges on the part of the works where Mr. Hutchins was stationed, coming up to the trenches and the carnage was only equalled in the late Russo-Japanese war. The Union troops retired to Nashville in the night, the forced march over the frozen roads being a torture to many of the troops, who, like Mr. Hutchins, were obliged to wrap their feet in blankets on account of worn out shoes, reaching Nashville with bleeding feet. Mr. Hutchins was always an active soldier, and was never captured, but was sick in the field hospital at Nashville for four weeks. Otherwise he took part in all the campaigns, marches, battles and skirmishes of his regiment, doing his full duty promptly and cheerfully. For gallantry he was promoted to be first duty sergeant.

After the war closed Mr. Hutchins returned home, and learned the blacksmith's trade, at which he worked one year, and then engaged in farming the home farm. The next two years he spent in Indianapolis, working at the carpenter's trade, and he passed 1867-68 in Iowa and Kansas. In 1874 he went to California, having previously lived in Utah and Nevada, continuing to work as a carpenter. In September, 1875, he returned to the homestead and built the present residence.

On April 5, 1876, Mr. Hutchins was married in Liberty township to Nancy Almira Bergdoll, born June 13, 1854, near Albany, Delaware county, a daughter of Nathan and Araminta (Kennedy) Bergdoll.

The Bergdolls were of Pennsylvania-Dutch and the Kennedys, from South Carolina, were of Scotch-Irish stock. Jonathan Bergdoll, the grandfather, came as a pioneer to Delaware county and settled on the Mississinewa river, where he cleared up a good farm of eighty acres. Nathan Bergdoll was born in Virginia and in manhood accompanied his father to Indiana and married Araminta Kennedy, a cousin of Andrew S. Kennedy, formerly congressman from the "Burnt District." Nathan Bergdoll was a farmer. His children were: Sarah, Rebecca, Elizabeth, William, Jonathan, Wilkerson, Nancy A. and Margaret. William and Jonathan served in the Civil war in the 147th Ind. Reg. Mr. Bergdoll died aged sixty-seven years, in Delaware county.

James L. Hutchins settled on the home farm, having bought out the other heirs. It now consists of 121 acres which he has greatly improved. His children are: Altemnia, Leopold, Margaret, Fern, and James Hovey. They have all been given excellent educational advantages and are fine representatives of American man and womanhood. In politics Mr. Hutchins is a Republican, and he cast his first Presidential vote while he was serving in the army, for Abraham Lincoln. Later he supported General Grant and has been a strong adherent of his party ever since. He takes a great deal of interest in the work of the Selma Post, G. A. R., of which he is quartermaster and has been commander. He belongs to Selma Lodge, I. O. O. F., and has passed all the chairs including that of noble grand; is also a member of Selma Encampment, No. 64, and has filled all the offices of same, and has represented his lodge at the Grand Lodge of his State. He belongs also to the order of Red Men at Selma, in which he has passed all the chairs, and was the first Sachem elected of Pueblo Tribe, and has also represented his tribe at the Great Council. He is an independent, practical farmer, and is a representative citizen who enjoys universal respect and esteem.

A. E. MARTZ, one of the representative men of Arcadia, Hamilton county, who has been largely instrumental in the development of this section of the State of Indiana, was born in this county, July 28, 1861, son of Cornelius and Martha (Cruzan) Martz, natives of Fayette county and Hamilton county, Ind., respectively.

Moses Martz, grandfather of our subject, was born in Pickaway county, Ohio, son of Peter, a native of Germany, who with six brothers came to America at a very early day, and settled in different portions of the country, their descendants probably being all over the United States in these days. Moses Martz married Tabitha McCormick, daughter of John and granddaughter of John McCormick, Sr., the latter a veteran of the Revolutionary war. John McCormick, father of Mrs. Martz, came to Indianapolis, in 1820, bringing little Tabitha with him. She was the first white child in the city of Indianapolis. Later her father returned to Fayette county, Ind., and she and her twin sister were married to the Martz brothers, who were also twins, a somewhat remarkable occurrence. These twin Martz brothers were Moses and Isaac Martz, Moses being the grandfather of our subject. Moses came to Hamilton county with his wife in 1837, and entered Government land, becoming in time a very successful farmer. He had a family of twelve children, of whom Cornelius was second in the order of birth.

Cornelius Martz, son of Moses, and father of our subject was reared in Indiana, and was married in Hamilton county to Martha Cruzan. He was taken away at the early age of twenty-four years, leaving his young wife and two children, A. E.; and Alice, who in time married C. M. Burroughs, of Sullivan county, Ind., and had a family of eight children, of whom three are deceased. Mrs. Martha (Cruzan) Martz, the mother, died in 1874. Both she and her husband were consistent Baptists. The son, left an orphan when only twelve, was thrown upon his own resources. By earnest and strenuous efforts, he gained a good common school education, and later went through the high school, and at the early age of twenty, he married, and started into the clothing business at Hoopeston, Ill., with his father-in-law. After seven years spent there, he returned to Arcadia and taught school, and at the same time, for some years, operated a small fruit farm. For twenty years he has been a very popular and successful instructor, and in 1898 his ability was recognized by his appointment to the office of postmaster at Arcadia, which he still holds, to the satisfaction of the patrons of the office. In the meanwhile, he has accumulated property, until he now owns a farm of 380 acres in Sullivan county, which is one of the richest and best improved in the county. This he manages, although living at Arcadia. Naturally, he takes a great interest in the farm, and makes a specialty of fancy poultry at his Arcadia home.

In March, 1881, Mr. Martz married Miranda Eads, born in Bedford, Ind., daughter of Thomas T. and Catherine A. Eads. Thomas Eads was a merchant for fifty years, and was very successful in his enterprises. He owned stores at different times at Bedford, Reynolds, Hoopeston, Arcadia and Sullivan, all but Hoopeston being in Indiana, and that in the adjoining state of Illinois. The death of Mr. Eads occurred at the home of Mr. Martz, April 12, 1896. His widow survives, making her home with Mr. and Mrs. Martz. Mr. Eads was a second cousin of James B. Eads, who built the St. Louis bridge and the Mississippi jetties, and also a cousin of Albert G. Potter, of Indianapolis.

Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Martz: Frederick M., a graduate of Indiana University; and Avon, born in 1888, who died in infancy. Mrs. Martz is a consistent member of the Christian Church. Mr. Martz is a very active and acceptable Republican, and a leader of his party in Arcadia. Fraternally, he is a member of the I. O. O. F., Sons of the Revolution, Knights of Pythias, the Tribe of Ben Hur and the Modern Woodmen. Having attained his present prominence through his own sagacity and perseverance, Mr. Martz may properly be regarded as a most excellent specimen of the American self-made man, and too much honor can not be given him for his upright, manly and successful career, which sets such a fine example to coming generations, and demonstrates what can be accomplished by an ambitious lad, no matter how restricted his surroundings, or limited his capital.

JAMES G. JEFFERS, one of the highly esteemed citizens of Anderson, Ind., was born in Lyons, Wayne Co., N. Y., Sept. 9, 1846, son of James and Hannah Rinehart Jeffers, the former descended from an old English family, early identified with the American Colonies, and the latter of Pennsylvania Dutch descent.

James F. Jeffers removed, in 1850, from New York State to Illinois, settling in Lockport, where he worked at the trade of millwright. In 1855 he moved to Iowa, locating in Blackhawk, where he purchased land and engaged in farming, reclaiming the land from its wild state. His next move was to Bremer county, where he purchased land near Waverly, and here he died in November, 1890, aged seventy-six years. His children were: James G.; John H.; Thomas C., a private in Company B, 38th Iowa V. I.; Robert J.; Nancy P.; Amanda M.; Mary and Alice.

James G. Jeffers was about four years old when his father located in Illinois, and about thirteen when he located in Iowa. He received a common school education, and worked on the farm until Aug. 15, 1862, when he enlisted in Company B, 38th Iowa V. I. (known as the "Bremer Rangers"), under Capt. H. F. Beebe, for three years or during the war. He served to the close of the war, and was honorably discharged at Houston, Texas, Aug. 20, 1865. He was in the battles of Vicksburg, Champion Hills, Ft. Wagner, Ft. Gaines, Spanish Fort, Ft. Blakely, Pensacola (Fla.), and the rear of Mobile, the 13th Corps capturing 15,000 prisoners. Mr. Jeffers never received a wound, and his only time in the hospital was about one week in Dubuque, Iowa, when he was suffering from measles. His service took him through Missouri, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana and Texas, and he proved himself a brave, faithful soldier.

On Sept. 9, 1868, in Cedar Falls, Iowa, Mr. Jeffers was married to Sarah A. Symons, born in Greensboro, Henry Co., Ind., Oct. 24, 1845, daughter of Mathew and Susannah (Willits) Symons. Mathew Symons was the son of Abraham and Mary (Charles) Symons and the grandson of John and Ann. Tradition says that two brothers of the Symons family came from England to this country in early Colonial times, one settling in Connecticut and one in New Jersey, the branch of the family under consideration being from the New Jersey settler. Susannah Willits, Mrs. Jeffers's mother, was born in Stokes county, N. C., June 24, 1816, daughter of Gabriel and Priscilla (Pike) Willits. The Willits family were Quakers and original settlers in the old Penn colony.

After marriage Mr. Jeffers settled in Cedar Falls, Iowa, for two and a half years, then removed to Quincy, Ill., and thence to Lyons, Iowa, remaining at the latter place for ten years, where he worked in paper mills and became an expert in that line. After three years spent in Delphi, Ind., the family located in Anderson in the fall of 1889, and here have continued ever since. Mr. and Mrs. Jeffers have had these children: Hannah O., Jennie C., Roy S. (who served in Cuba during the Spanish-American war, as a member of Company L, 160th Ind. V. I.), Susie E. (who died in December, 1904), Mary E. (who died in infancy), Clara S. (who died aged eighteen years), Phoebe M., James M., and Ruth I. (who died aged five years).

In political matters Mr. Jeffers is a Republican. He is connected with Major May Post, No. 244, G. A. R., of Anderson, and has been officer of the day, junior vice-commander and sergeant-major. He is also affiliated with Irving Lodge, No. 12, I. O. O. F.

HENRY C. EICKHOFF, a nurseryman and fruit-raiser of Warren township, Marion Co., Ind., was born June 9, 1853, son of Henry and Charlotte (Elbracht) Eickhoff, the former of whom was born in Germany.

Henry Eickhoff, the father, came to America in a sailing vessel, and settled at Cincinnati where for three years he was a baker. He then moved to Indianapolis, and in 1850 he bought land near the city, the farm consisting of 100 acres, which he greatly improved, and upon which he lived until his death in 1889, his widow surviving until 1897. Eight children were born to himself and wife, seven of whom are still living: Edward; Henry C.; Herman; Mary; Minnie; Augusta; Fred; and Katie. In politics the father was a Democrat, while in his religious professions, he was a Lutheran. He belonged to no lodges, but was a domestic man, loving his home.

Henry C. Eickhoff owns forty-four acres of good land, all under the plow, and since 1873, has been engaged in a very prosperous nursery business, and ships his trees, mostly fruit, throughout Ohio, Kentucky and northern and southern Indiana, in addition to supplying the home demand. He also raises fruit, being very successful in his undertakings. His home is one of the most attractive in Warren township, the house being surrounded by a large lawn dotted by many shade and ornamental trees. In politics he is independent, with regard to local matters, although on national questions he is a Democrat.

On Aug. 12, 1877, Mr. Eickhoff married Elizabeth Kuehn, one of the ten children (all living) of Herman and Elizabeth (Kern) Kuehn. Mr. Herman Kuehn was born in 1818, in Prussia, Germany, and came to this country in 1848. By profession he was a minister, and he died in 1898, his widow surviving and residing on Dawson street, Indianapolis. In politics he was a Democrat. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Eickhoff: Lydia is a teacher of German in the city schools; Emily, at home, has taken up music; Alvin is a bookkeeper at the Metzger agency; Arthur is in the Indiana National Bank; Theodore is an electrical engineer, a graduate of Purdue University, June, 1908; Paula is also a teacher of German in the city schools; and Hulda and Edith are attending Manual Training high school.

By energy, industry and intelligent management, Mr. Eickhoff has built up an excellent business, and at the same time has kept in touch with local affairs, being one of the honored residents of the community, and well known throughout Warren township.

NEWTON W. COWGILL, auditor of Hamilton county, Ind., and a leading newspaper man of Sheridan, was born in Tippecanoe county, Ind., April 30, 1860, son of Rev. Joel and Huldah (Timmons) Cowgill.

Lemuel Cowgill, grandfather of Newton W., was born in Ohio, and was a pioneer of Indiana, settling about 1825 at Mooresville, Morgan county, and later removed to Carroll county, where he followed the trade of shoemaker. He died at Lockport, Ind., aged seventy years, in the faith of the Friends Church. His children were: James A.; Susan, who married Edward Riegle; Malinda, who married Dr. Massy, of Westpoint, Tippecanoe Co., Ind.; and Joel.

Joel Cowgill was born in Mooresville, Ind., and his early education was self-acquired. He entered the United Brethren ministry when about twenty-five years of age, and began his work as minister of the Gospel in Warren county, Ind., in 1852, preaching all over Western Indiana and Eastern Illinois. He was a member of the Upper Wabash Conference and his ministry continued until 1901. His death occurred in 1904 at Greenhill, Ind., after he had devoted more than half a century in the service of the United Brethren Church. He was one of the founders of the Greenhill Seminary, an excellent institution. The Rev. Mr. Cowgill was thrice married, his first wife being Eliza, daughter of Rev. John Tolbert, a pioneer minister of the United Brethren Church in Indiana. To this union was born one daughter, Eva, who married Isaac Meisenhelder. Mr. Cowgill married (second) Huldah Timmons, born in Central Ohio, south of Columbus and near Chillicothe, daughter of Joseph and Nellie (Bailey) Timmons. The Timmonses came from Maryland, where they were an old Colonial family during Revolutionary times. Joseph Timmons was a minister of the United Brethren Church for many years, and settled at Milford before the Civil war, dying there aged sixty-seven years. His children were: Henry, William, Lorenzo D., Edward, Elizabeth, Huldah, Jane, Minerva and Joseph, the latter a soldier in the Civil war, who was killed at Somerset, Ky. To the second marriage of Mr. Cowgill, one child was born: Newton W., of Noblesville. Rev. Mr. Cowgill was married (third) to Jane Timmons, sister of Huldah, and they had these children: Solon P., Dell, Henry, William, Frank, Lizzie and Jessie.

Newton W. Cowgill received his education in the public schools and at the Greenhill Seminary, from which latter institution he was graduated in 1882, and he then engaged in school teaching in Warren and Benton counties, becoming principal of Otterbein public school, a position he held for three years. In 1886 he came to Hamilton county, and settled at Sheridan, where he purchased the Sheridan News, which he still publishes with his partner, I. H. McMurray, and it wields a powerful political influence in that part of Indiana. In politics Mr. Cowgill is a Republican, and in 1904 he was elected auditor of Hamilton county by a large majority, since which time he has proved himself an efficient and courteous official. He is a thirty-second degree Mason, and a member of the Mystic Shrine. He also belongs to the I. O. O. F., Sheridan Lodge, which he has served as Noble Grand, and has represented his lodge at the State Lodge, belonging also to the Encampment; is a member of the K. P., Sheridan; and of the Red Men.

Mr. Cowgill was married June 28, 1888, to Florence Palmer, born Feb. 12, 1863, in Jennings county, Ind., daughter of Osmer K. and Susan F. (Davis) Palmer, mentioned elsewhere. Since 1904 Mr. and Mrs. Cowgill have resided in Noblesville.

JOHN A. AXLINE, M. D., a leading physician of Hamilton county, Ind., whose chosen field of practice is the city of Noblesville, was born March 5, 1847, in Knox county, Ohio, son of Charles William and Elizabeth (Shannon) Axline.

Christopher Axline served in the army of Frederick the Great. He came to this country long before the Revolution, and settled in Pennsylvania, where he engaged in the manufacture of gunpowder and saltpeter, for which violation of the law, his property was confiscated by the British.

John Axline, son of Christopher, was born in 1739, and he died in 1832. He served as a soldier in the Revolution, in the Virginia service, and his monument stands in Jerusalem cemetery, in Loudoun county, Va. He had three sons, Henry, John and George, who settled in Muskingum county, Ohio, in 1824, each entering about 400 acres of land.

George Axline, son of John, married a Miss Earhart, and died on his Ohio farm, when he was aged sixty years. His children were: John, Jacob, Josiah, Philip, Daniel (who settled in Kentucky), Charles William, Andrew and Margaret (who married a Mr. Smith). Three of the sons were ministers of the Gospel, Charles William and Philip of the Christian faith, and Andrew, who was a minister of the Presbyterian Church.

Charles William Axline, father of Dr. John A., was born in March, 1824, in Muskingum county, Ohio, and there received a common school education. His father having died when he was eight years of age, he was early thrown upon his own resources, and, although the greater part of his education was self acquired, he became a teacher in Muskingum county, and in the counties of Perry and Licking. He married in the latter county Elizabeth Shannon, born there, daughter of John Shannon, who was of Scotch-Irish descent, and to this union were born: John A. and Jasper. Mr. Axline's first wife died in 1851, and he was married (second) to Margaret Shannon, by whom he had one son, Charles. The second Mrs. Axline died in 1855, and for his third wife he married Peninah Huston, by whom he had two children, Otto and Henry.

On settling in Muskingum county, Mr. Axline began the study of theology under a Lutheran divine, at Fultonham, and entered the Christian ministry. He devoted ten or twelve years to church work, and then purchased a farm in Ohio, afterward buying farms in Indiana and Iowa. He was a fluent speaker and successful as an evangelist, was untiring in his energy, but broke himself down with his ministerial labors, being stricken with paralysis twelve years prior to his death, which occurred March 20, 1896.

Dr. John A. Axline received his early education in Martinsville, Ohio, at a Quaker Academy, an excellent institution which had an able corps of teachers, Prof. Charles Foster being president, and Prof. Thomas Moon one of the teachers. Dr. Axline began teaching at the early age of nineteen years in the Clinton county district schools, and afterward taught at Burlington, Ohio, and later in Rush county, Ind. The Doctor began the study of medicine while teaching, and first attended a course of lectures in the Indiana Medical College, Indianapolis, and later entered the Medical College of Ohio, at Cincinnati, from which he received his diploma in 1873. He at once began the practice of his profession at Raleigh, Rush Co., Ind., where he continued eighteen years, but since 1891 he has been located at Noblesville, Ind., where he has established a large and lucrative practice.

On Oct. 5, 1871, Dr. Axline was married to Clara A. McMillin, born Oct. 5, 1853, daughter of John T. and Elizabeth (Buzan) McMillin, and the surviving children of this union are: William G., who married Nellie Aldred, of Noblesville, has one daughter, Margaret; and John Albert, who resides in Noblesville, married Elizabeth Bennett, and has three children, John Alwell, Clara Elizabeth and Gorden Bennett.

In political faith Dr. Axline is a Republican, casting his first vote for Grant in 1868, and since that time has supported the candidates of his chosen party. His father was an original Republican, having formerly been an old-line Whig, and he voted for Fremont in 1856. The Doctor is a member of the county, State and national medical societies, and has contributed several valuable papers to the county medical society. He has an excellent library, and takes the leading medical periodicals. Fraternally he is a Royal Arch Mason, Noblesville, member of the I. O. O. F. and the Encampment, and of the Royal Arcanum, Indianapolis.

DAVID S. GROSS. One of the leading and most influential agriculturists of Needham township, Johnson county, is David S. Gross. For two score years he has made his influence felt in the community, always on the side of advance and improvement, whether of lands and roads, or of those about him, and has throughout championed every measure tending toward the betterment of his fellow man. Beginning his career with few advantages and handicapped in many ways, he steadily surmounted all obstacles and difficulties, making each but a stepping-stone on which to rise toward the ideals for which he strove. He was born in North Carolina, in Davie county, near Mocksville, March 25, 1841, son of Jacob and Elsie (Harris) Gross, both natives of North Carolina, and was one of eight children born to them, there being four sons and four daughters in the family, of whom four are now living besides himself: Lemuel C., who has moved to Boone county, near Whitestown; Mary D., wife of William Allen, residing near Greenwood; Martha A., wife of George Allen, of the same place; and Milton D., of Brownstown, Illinois.

Jacob Gross was born Nov. 1, 1814, and was a farmer throughout his life. In 1850 he removed to Indiana, settling in Clark township, Johnson county, where he lived for some years, moving again to Pleasant township near Greenwood, dying at that place March 26, 1900, at the honored age of eighty-five years, four months and twenty-five days. He survived his first wife thirty-two years, she being born Oct. 21, 1811, and dying Nov. 5, 1867. In March, 1868, he married (second) Mathilda Brackett, who died some thirteen or fourteen years later.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. David S. Gross was named Henry Gross, and lived throughout his long and eventful life in the State of North Carolina as a farmer. He reared a large family. John Harris, father of Mrs. Elsie (Harris) Gross, was a native of North Carolina, where he died at an advanced age, after having raised a large family. He was of German descent, and by occupation was a farmer.

David S. Gross came to Indiana at the age of nine years with his parents, who located in Johnson county, and he has since lived in that place. His education was obtained in the old-fashioned subscription schools, and for many years he attended the primitive log school house of that section. Arriving at the age of maturity, prior to which he had lived at home, he began work as a carpenter, and he continued this for about five years. After his marriage in 1866 he began farming again, buying eighty acres of land, to which he gradually added in after years, until he now owns 240 acres of highly productive land, most of which he has developed and improved himself.

On Jan. 25, 1866, Mr. Gross was married to Mary E. Fisher, daughter of Jacob and Catherine (Bower) Fisher, and to them were born three sons and three daughters, as follows: (1) William J., born Feb. 7, 1867, lives at Franklin. He married Cora Swift, and has two children, Roy and Max. (2) Elmon H., born July 22, 1869 (known at home as "Chub"), is a prosperous farmer in Needham township. He married Esty Cutsinger. (3) George T., born Jan. 16, 1872, was formerly engaged successfully in the livery business in Needham, but is now farming in Clark township. He married Eva Patterson, who died Nov. 13, 1901, aged twenty-one years, two months, five days, the mother of two children, Merrill and Pearl. (4) Elsie, born Jan. 17, 1875, married William Swift, and died Oct. 2, 1896, aged twenty-one years, eight months, fifteen days, the mother of one child, who also died. Mr. Swift is likewise deceased. (5) Emma J., born Aug. 12, 1877, married I. B. Means, has one child, Marvel, and lives on the home place. (6) Ethel, born March 22, 1880, married Owen Wood, who has a horse and livery stable in Needham.

Mr. Gross has occupied many responsible positions in times past. From 1882 to 1885 he was county commissioner, has been supervisor, and for eighteen years school director. During these long periods of public work he rendered most efficient service, effecting many great improvements and winning the respect and admiration of all with whom he came in contact. He early espoused the cause of Democracy, and did much to promote the interests of his party. In his personal successes he never forgot his duty to his fellowmen, and is the happy possessor of the good-will of one and all.

George Fisher, the paternal grandfather of Mrs. Gross, was a native of North Carolina. His wife's name was Catherine.

Jacob Fisher, son of George and Catherine, and father of Mrs. Gross, was born in North Carolina Oct. 8, 1802. On Feb. 19, 1829, he married Catherine Bower, who was born in the same State Dec. 22, 1810, daughter of Henry and Margaret (Thomas) Bower, among whose other children may be mentioned, Henry Alexander, who lives in Hamilton county, Ind., at an advanced age; and Jane, Mrs. Fifer, who lives in Washington, Clark Co., Ind., now aged ninety-one years. Mrs. Margaret Mathews, widow of Allan, and a sister of Henry A. Bower, recently died at her home in Urmeysville, Indiana.

The year following their marriage, Jacob Fisher and his wife moved to Johnson county, Ind., settling in what was then known as Franklin township, now Needham, where he entered land from the government. In that early day they entered upon the life of pioneers with all the dangers and privations attendant; they were surrounded by an untamed forest, filled with a great many wolves and other wild animals. Mr. Fisher owned about 1,500 acres of land in Johnson and Tipton counties, and was exceedingly industrious and thrifty, but on account of his generosity and the failure of several banks, lost much of his property. He was able, however, to give all of his children a good start in life and provided well for them. He died at the home place in Needham township, April 5, 1884, at the age of eighty-one years, five months, twenty-eight days. His wife preceded him at the age of sixty-one years, six months, six days, dying June 28, 1872. They were buried on the home farm, but in 1898 their remains were removed to Mt. Pleasant cemetery. In religious faith he was an Universalist, and she was an ardent member of the Methodist Church. He owned considerable stock in the First National Bank at Franklin, and was one of its directors. Of the children born to Jacob and Catherine Fisher—four of whom are still living—we have the following record: (1) John, of Needham township, married Ellen McLean, and they have three children: Ira, a physician in California; Elmon, owner of the elevator at Needham; and Alma (twin to Elmon), who married Charlie Shepherd, and lives on the home farm. (2) Jane married Howard McLean, and has three children: Hettie, wife of T. W. Patterson, of Needham township; Nannie, wife of Charley Wild, of Needham; and Kate, wife of John Cutfinger, of Clark township. (3) Mary, born July 19, 1847, married Mr. Gross. (4) William M. lives on the farm in Needham township, where he was born. He married Jane Boner, and has two children, Olie and Erie. (5) George was drowned when a baby. (6) Thomas, (7) Margaret and (8) one other (name not given) died in infancy. (9) Henry served as county commissioner one term. He was a believer in the tenets of the Baptist faith as was also his wife, but never formally joined the church. He married Nancy Jane Fisher, and died June 4, 1898, the father of five children, of whom there are yet living, William M., Jr.; and Alice, wife of Daniel Campbell, of Clark township. (10) Phoebe A. married Joseph G. Taylor, May 13, 1858, and had six children, all of whom died at an early age. She died Nov. 3, 1871, and her husband Feb. 14, 1872.

ROBERT DORSTE, a highly esteemed resident and representative citizen of Anderson, Ind., was born Dec. 24, 1846, in Ronneburg, Germany, son of August and Bertha (Bankwitz) Dorste, also natives of that country, and grandson of August Dorste.

August Dorste, father of Robert, was a cabinet maker by trade, as had been his father before him, and in 1854 he came to this country from Bremen, in a sailing vessel, landing at New Orleans, whence he made his way with his family to St. Louis, Mo. He was at that place following his trade at the outbreak of the Civil war, when he enlisted in a heavy artillery company, serving one year in southern Missouri and participating in the battle of Cape Girardeau, escaping without wounds. After receiving his honorable discharge he returned to his home in St. Louis, where the rest of his life was spent at his trade. Mr. Dorste's sons, Herman, August and Robert, also served in the war, Herman and August being members of a Missouri Reserve Corps, enlisting in 1861, and serving about two years, participating in many skirmishes.

Robert Dorste was but eight years of age when he accompanied his parents to America, but he can well remember the voyage. He attended the public schools at St. Louis, and when a young man entered the Richland Academy in Rush county, Ind., thereby acquiring a good education, to which he has since added by extensive reading. Prior to the outbreak of the Civil war the excitement in St. Louis was intense, even the boys organizing military companies on both the Federal and Confederate sides, and naturally many skirmishes occurred between them, young Dorste being an active participant in many of these brushes. When the war broke out, Camp Jackson, the Rebel headquarters, was situated on one side of the city, and the United States arsenal on the other, under the command of General Lyon, and recruiting officers for both the Federal and Confederate armies were in active operation.

Young Dorste, then a lad of but fifteen years, enlisted Nov. 10, 1861, as a private in Company K, 43d Illinois Infantry, to serve three years or during the war, and served until honorably discharged on account of wounds received at the battle of Shiloh. Early in this great battle, in April, 1862, he was struck by a minie ball and his left leg badly shattered; this happened early on Sunday morning. He lay on the battle-field until about noon, when he was captured by the Confederates and taken to Shiloh Church, which was filled with the wounded of both armies. Here he received no medical attention, although he was kindly furnished with food and water by a young Confederate soldier. He was recaptured by the Federals on the advance of the Union army, but lay in the church until Tuesday without medical attention. He was then taken to Pittsburg Landing and placed in a tent, being here until the Sunday following that on which he received his wound, when he was carried to the steamboat "Tycoon," sent by Governor Todd, of Ohio, for the wounded Ohio soldiers. Mr. Dorste was refused admittance to the steamboat as he was not an Ohio soldier, but was smuggled on board by some of the Ohio soldiers without the knowledge of the authorities, and here he received his medical attention. His pants, stiff with blood, were cut from his wounded leg, and the wound found to be in a terrible condition, although he had kept the inflammation down to a certain extent by the use of water. At Cincinnati he was placed in a hospital, and here he remained until he was able to walk with the aid of crutches, when one day he fell and broke the injured leg, this causing him again to be confined in the hospital for a long period, the broken bone preventing the wound from properly healing.

Although but a mere lad, at an age when most boys are attending school and being carefully cared for by their parents, young Dorste displayed remarkable endurance and bravery, shouldering his heavy musket and knapsack without a word of complaint, and accompanying his regiment on the long, weary marches cheerfully and faithfully. One of these marches was from Fort Henry to Fort Donelson, and another was along the Tennessee, when in the month of March, the regiment was marching continuously for three days. Even while lying wounded in the church at Shiloh, while suffering intense pain, he displayed endurance and bravery which put many an older man to shame. His remarkable display of nerve is an excellent example of what the spirit of '61 really was—the spirit that saved the country to become the great and powerful nation that it is to-day.

In the fall of 1863, after recovering his health to some extent, Mr. Dorste attended the Academy in Richmond for two winters, and in 1865 he became a clerk in Milroy, Ind., for three years, at the end of which time he engaged in a general merchandise business, continuing therein until 1889. At this time he engaged in the production of natural gas, and erecting a gas works supplied the town of Milroy until 1892. In this year he removed with his family to Anderson where he has since been engaged in plumbing and gas fitting. He erected his present fine residence in 1897. Both Mr. and Mrs. Dorste are members of the Methodist Church, in which they have been very active, he serving as steward and treasurer. He is a staunch Republican in politics, and while in Milroy township served as a trustee. He is a member of Major May Post, G. A. R., Anderson, and while in Milroy was commander of his post.

Mr. Dorste was married in Higginsport, Brown Co., Ohio, to Sarah Priscilla Thomas, of Union City, Ohio, daughter of John and Abigail (Carter) Thomas, and to this union were born two children: Bertha B., a graduate of Wesleyan University; and Lewis T., a student of the class of 1907, at DePauw University.

THOMAS. John Thomas, father of Mrs. Dorste, was born in Bourbon County, Ky., son of Daniel and Sallie (Amos) Thomas, and removed to Indiana about 1820, clearing up a farm in Rush county near Milroy. He had a fine property of 200 acres, which until recently was in the hands of his son, William, and was a local minister in the Christian Church, preaching for many years in his vicinity. He lived to be an aged man, and died on his farm. He married near Cincinnati, Ohio, Abigail Carter, born in New Jersey, daughter of Samuel and Margaret (Lippincott) Carter. Several of the sons of John and Abigail (Carter) Thomas, were in the Civil war: Joseph, who served three years; Daniel, who served through the war; Clement, who served two years; and John, who was but a boy, served six months. Mr. Thomas himself participated in many raids.

A brief history of the Thomas and Carter families is herewith appended: THOMAS CREST: On a branch of a tree lying fessways (at the dexter end some sprigs, vert) a raven, wings expanded, sable. ARMS: Arg., a chevron, lozengy, or and sa., between three ravens close, of the last.

It appears that all by the name of Thomas on record seems to have sprung from a common ancestor, Sir Rhys ap Thomas of Ebbarnant, Wales, who died before 1585. In Welsh "ap" is equivalent to the "Mac" or "Mc" in the Scotch, and means "son of." Sir Rhys ap Thomas married Sybell, daughter of Philip Scidamore and his wife Joan (widow of Walter Kyle), and granddaughter of John Scidamore, gentleman usher to Henry VIII.

John Philip Thomas, son of Sir Rhys, was of Grismont, Wales, and was Queen's lessee of mills at Kenchurch in 1691. He married Gwenllian, sixth daughter of Watkin Herbert, sheriff of Monmouth, 1552.

Evan Thomas, son of John Philip, was of Swansea, South Wales, born in 1580, and died in 1650.

Philip Thomas, son of Evan, was born in Great Britain and emigrated to Maryland in 1651. His will was proved in Anne Arundel Co., Md., in 1675. He was a prominent man and leader in the Puritan party, and a provincial councillor. He married Sarah Harrison, who died in 1687.

Samuel Thomas, son of Philip, was born in 1645 and died before 1743. He was an extensive planter and a minister of the Society of Friends. He married Mary Hutchins.

Philip Thomas, son of Samuel, was born in 1694, and died in 1762.

Samuel Thomas, son of Philip, was born in 1725, and died in 1784.

John Chew Thomas, son of Samuel, was born Oct. 15, 1764, and died at Leiperville, Pa., May 10, 1836.

John Chew Thomas (2), son of John Chew, was born Sept. 22, 1803, and died at Baltimore, Md., Aug. 29, 1862. He was a physician of note.

Lawrence Buckley Thomas, son of John Chew (2), was born at Baltimore, Md., Dec. 6, 1848.

Rees Thomas, born June 4, 1690, in Pembroke, Wales, emigrated with his family to Rockingham county, Va. He married (first) Katharine —, and had issue: Mary, born Aug. 25, 1719, died in infancy; James, born Oct. 5, 1720, died Feb. 5, 1747, in Bourbon county, Ky.; Margaret, born May 16, 1723; John, born April 16, 1725. Rees Thomas married (second) Ellen —, and to this union there were these children: Grace, born Sept. 21, 1730; Katharine, Nov. 19, 1732; Mary, Nov. 3, 1734; Jane, May 13, 1737. Rees Thomas married (third) Jane —, and had three children: Evan, born Feb. 10, 1743; David, June 22, 1745; and Rees, Oct. 1, 1747.

John Thomas, youngest son of Rees and Katharine, removed to Paris, Bourbon Co., Ky. He married a Miller, and had issue: Silas, Henry, Abraham and Evan.

Abraham Thomas, third son of John, was born Dec. 20, 1774, in Virginia. He removed with his father to Kentucky, and went thence to Adams county, Ohio. He married Aug. 8, 1799, Margaret Barker, and died in 1856. They had children: John, born May 20, 1801, died without issue, Nov. 1, 1826; Abraham, born Sept. 5, 1805, died without issue, July 13, 1827; James B., born May 16, 1811; Silas, born March 10, 1814, died without issue June 22, 1856; and Wilson B., born April 19, 1820.

James B. Thomas, third son of Abraham and Margaret (Barker) Thomas, died March 17, 1892. He married Dec. 29, 1836, Esther A. Moore, and had children: Francis M., M. D., residing at Samantha, Ohio, married to Antoinette Holmes; W. C., born Oct. 30, 1843, died Sept. 8, 1860; Silas N., born Aug. 7, 1845, died Aug. 13, 1864, in the Union Army; Albert L., born April 25, 1848; John W., born Sept. 16, 1840, is a physician at Aumsville, Ore., and married May 8, 1895, Roberta Butler. CARTER (Virginia). Robert Carter, of Corotoman, Va., was born there in 1663, son of John Carter who came from England in 1649. John Carter had been married five times, first to Jane Glynn; second to Elinor Brocas (a widow); third to Anne Carter, probably a cousin; fourth to Sarah Ludlow, mother of Robert; and fifth to Elizabeth Shirley.

Robert Carter was called "King Carter," whether of his vast land possessions, or of the fact that he held so many offices. He was president of His Majesty's council in Virginia, receiver-general of the tobacco taxes in Virginia and was at one time Governor of the Colony.

John Carter, son of Robert, was born in Corotoman, Va., and died probably in Shirley, Va., in 1743. He was a man of great wealth, and married Elizabeth Hill, of noble birth.

Edward Carter, son of John, was born between 1734 and 1740, and died in Blenheim, Va. He married Sarah Champe, a noted beauty in her day. Champe is a popular name among the Carters in Virginia.

Hill Carter, son of Edward, born about 1780, died about 1828.

Henry Rose Carter, son of Hill, born in Amherst county, Va., in 1810, settled in Mississippi when young. He died in 1871.

Hill Carter, son of Henry Rose, born in 1846, was a soldier in the Confederate army.

CARTER (New Jersey). Aaron Carter was among the first of the newcomers to settle in New Jersey.

Nicholas Carter, said to be the ancestor of all Carters in New Jersey, settled in Stamford, Conn., before 1652. In that year he removed to Newtown, R. I., and was one of the purchasers of that place from the Indians, April 12, 1656. He was possessed of twenty acres there, and was one of the prominent men of the town until 1665, when he removed to Elizabethtown, N. J. He acquired large tracts of land and was of considerable means. He had children: Samuel, who was one of the Elizabethtown Associates; Elizabeth, who married John Ratcliff; and Nicholas, Jr.

Either Nicholas, Jr., or Samuel Carter removed to Morris county, N. J., as settlers of the name of Carter are mentioned as being in the township of Whippanong in 1700. Six Carters served in the Revolutionary war from New Jersey.

Benjamin Carter is the first of whom there is definite mention in Morris county, and Aaron, probably his grandson, married Elizabeth Davis, and had children: Lewis, Caleb, Hannah, Sarah and Mary (Polly).

Caleb Carter, son of Aaron, was born at Union Hill, N. J., in 1782. He married Phoebe Johnson, and had children: Elizabeth, Harriet, Mary, James, Horace, Aaron, Catherine, Almira, Anna and Phoebe.

Aaron Carter, son of Caleb, was born in Newark, N. J., Jan. 17, 1817. He married (first) Elizabeth C. Tuttle, and had one son, William Tuttle. He married (second) Sarah S. Trow, and had children: Rev. John Franklin; Ernest Trow, now a resident of Berlin; and Herbert Swift, M. D.

SYLVAN BALDWIN MORRIS. In every community, large or small, there are a few men who, by their force of character, are intuitively recognized as leaders, men who are successful in their business undertakings, generous and fair in their business relations, and who perceive and advocate warmly those measures which insure the public welfare. In the thriving city of Shelbyville, Ind., there is a representative of this class found in Sylvan Baldwin Morris. He was born in Shelbyville, Ind., April 7, 1830, son of Dr. Sylvan B., Sr., and Catherine (Knox) Morris. His paternal grandparents were David and Sarah Morris, natives of Pennsylvania and of Welsh descent, who were among the pioneers of Warren county, Ohio.

Dr. Sylvan B. Morris, Sr., was born Nov. 24, 1795, in Washington county, Pa. His rearing from boyhood was in Warren county, Ohio and he received an academical education at Lebanon, the county seat. Later he was graduated from Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, and at once began the practice of his profession, at Lebanon. In the spring of 1821 he came to Shelbyville, or rather to its vicinity, for the city was then not laid out. He located at the mouth of Conn's Creek until he could locate in the new town, which he did in July, 1822, becoming its first physician. Dr. Morris was married (first), May 25, 1825, at Lebanon, Ohio, to Catherine Knox, born near Londonderry, Ireland, in 1801, and died Sept. 4, 1835, leaving three children: Martha H., Sylvan B., and John K. Dr. Morris married (second) Frances Henderson, of Lebanon, Ohio, who bore him three children: Kate G., Anna J., and Frances.

Dr. Morris was assessor and land appraiser of Shelby county in 1828, and the same year was elected a representative, and in 1831 was again chosen to represent his county in the State Legislature. In 1829 he was elected clerk of Shelby county, serving continuously until his resignation in February, 1843. His lamented death took place Sept. 6, 1843. Dr. Morris was one of the best known pioneers of Shelby county, a man of honest, sterling traits of character and is yet recalled with words and feelings of kindness and respect. Bringing to Shelby county his large fund of medical and literary knowledge, he at once stepped to the front as a leader in everything that would build up or benefit his adopted county. This position he held until his death.

Sylvan Baldwin Morris was educated in the schools of Shelbyville and Lebanon, Ohio, removing to the latter village in 1843. There he learned the dry-goods business, and there, in 1855, he embarked in business for himself, in which he was successfully engaged for a period of twenty years, and during two years of this period, he had a branch store at Franklin, Ohio. In 1875 he returned to Shelbyville and founded the business now known as The S. B. Morris Company, starting with a floor space of 4,000 feet, and now occupying nearly 25,000 square feet. He is now the oldest dry-goods merchant in the city and State, and is the president of this department store company.

Early in the Civil war, Mr. Morris volunteered for work in the Sanitary Commission. In 1864, being captain of Company A, 27th

Ohio National Guard, which was merged into the 146th O. V. I., he saw four months' war service in the Kanawha Valley, in West Virginia. Following this he enlisted as a private in Company I, 194th O. V. I., and was at once appointed sergeant-major of the regiment, and was again promoted to the rank of second lieutenant before reaching the Shenandoah Valley, whither the regiment went as part of Hancock's Reserve Corps. While in this valley he served as adjutant of the regiment.

Mr. Morris was married, at Harrison, Ohio, May 24, 1854, to Miss Myrtilla John, daughter of Dr. Jehu and Emily (Looker) John, of Harrison, Ohio. The issue of this union was six children: Kate (deceased), Sylvan H., Harold K., Florence, Robert L., and William H. (deceased). Mr. and Mrs. Morris celebrated their Golden Wedding, May 24, 1904, receiving congratulations from many friends from far and near. On both sides, the ancestry numbers among its names many prominent patriots, lawyers, statesmen, ministers and physicians, and among these may be mentioned Robert Morris and Abram Clarke, both signers of the Declaration of Independence. Also may be mentioned Thomas Morris, the first United States senator west of the Alleghanies who raised his voice against the extension of slavery.

Mr. Morris has been president of the Shelby County Fair Association, twice, commander of Dumont Post, G. A. R., three times councilman of the city, also serving one term as mayor. He has also served as a member of the city school board twice, and gave much time to superintending the construction of the Miller Street School building. He is one of the originators of the Forest Hill Cemetery Association, one of the finest organizations of its kind in the State, its leading idea being not to bring dividends to the stockholders, but to insure the perpetual care of the resting place of all who are interred therein. He was the pioneer and promoter of the first building and loan association of Shelbyville, to which the community owes so much. He is the treasurer of the Mutual Loan and Savings Company, which is the largest, and was the first, in the city to organize on the perpetual system, adopting the "Dayton" plan of operation, its capital stock being $1,500,000, and its charter, perpetual. Mr. Morris is a member of the Indianapolis Board of Trade, and has, for several years, held membership in the Municipal League of Indiana, always attending its meetings, and taking an active interest in the bettering of municipal affairs.

In 1855, at Lebanon, Ohio, he was made a Mason, and a Knight Templar by Reed Commandery, at Dayton, Ohio, in 1857. Mr. and Mrs. Morris, their children and grandchildren, are members of the Presbyterian Church, and Mr. Morris was a trustee of the First Presbyterian Church of Shelbyville for years. Mrs. Morris is a charter member of the old Benevolent society, which was changed into the organization known as the King's Daughters, and is also an active member of the Foreign Missionary Society of this church. In politics Mr. Morris is a staunch Republican. He has been intimately associated with the enterprises through which the city has attained a higher and broader life, and has not only aided, but has taken part in almost every movement which has resulted in the permanent growth of the city, witnessing the same as a village of less than 200 souls until now its population is over ten thousand, the great majority of whom own their own homes. Shelbyville is situated in the center of Shelby county, one of the finest farming sections of the State.

WILLIAM H. NICKERSON, Justice of the Peace in Center township, Marion county, Ind., was born in Wilmington, Clinton county, Ohio, July 31, 1851, son of Samuel R. and Tamson L. (Humphreys) Nickerson, both born in Clinton county, Ohio. The mother died in 1893, at the age of sixty-nine years, and the father is living in Pulaski county, Ind., at a patriarchal age. For more than thirty years he was a practicing attorney in Ohio, but is now retired from active labor. He was the father of two sons and three daughters, and all his children are living: Susan E., the wife of Sylvanus Cox, who is a machinist in Minneapolis, but at the present time seeking his fortunes in Alaska; Miss Samantha, with her father; William H.; Artemus R., a farmer in Pulaski county, Ind., unmarried; Miss Elizabeth H., at home.

William H. Nickerson was educated in the public schools of Clinton county, Ohio, where he learned the printer's trade, at which he worked for some years. When he came into Indiana he was employed in a furniture factory in Richmond, and in 1874 he removed to Indianapolis, where he continued in the furniture business until 1880. That year he was appointed bailiff in the Superior Court of Marion county, a position he held continuously for twelve years. During this time he studied architecture, and opening an office in the city engaged in business as a superintending architect and builder. In 1894 he was elected justice of the peace on the Republican ticket, and was re-elected in 1898. Mr. Nickerson comes of good Republican stock, his grandfather, Artemus Nickerson, being a conductor on the "underground railroad," and a rank advocate of abolition in the days of slavery; while Samuel R., father of William H., was a soldier during the Civil war, being a member of the 79th O. V. I., and on account of wounds received at Bowling Green, Ky., was discharged, but during the Emergency Call of 1864 he organized a company of troops of which he was captain. Mr. William H. Nickerson is Past Chancellor of Indianapolis Lodge, No. 56, K. of P., the largest lodge of the order in America.

Mr. Nickerson was married Feb. 19, 1883, to Miss Augusta S. Gilkison, a native of Ohio, but a resident of Indianapolis at the time of her marriage. She is a daughter of William F. and Mary Gilkison, both residents of the city, the former a retired printer of more than four score years. Of their three living children, Mrs. Nickerson is the eldest; Miss Mary Z. is at home; and Melville A. is manager of a lumber business in California. Mr. and Mrs. William H. Nickerson have one child, Miss Ethel, who graduated from the Indianapolis high school, and excels in music both vocal and instrumental.

The Nickerson family is of German origin, though among their ancestors have been Scotch-Irish and Dutch. The first of the family in America came to these shores in Colonial days, and the name was common in the annals of New England for several generations. Both the Nickersons and Gilkisons were represented in the American Revolution.

CAPT. JOHN H. WAGNER, who has been a business man of Elwood, Ind., for a number of years, belongs to a pioneer family of the State, who came hither from Pennsylvania the year after his birth. He is a native of Clarion county, Pa., born Aug. 21, 1841, son of Mathias and Elizabeth (Ramsey) Wagner.

George Wagner, the Captain's grandfather, was also a native of Pennsylvania, born at Bald Eagle, on the eastern foothills of the Alleghanies, and was of Pennsylvania-Dutch stock, and the son of a Revolutionary soldier.

He was accidentally killed, in Pennsylvania, a tree falling on him. Those of his children of whom we have mention were: Jacob, who settled in Taylor county, Iowa, where he reared a family; Christopher; John, who became an extensive farmer in Ohio; George, who settled finally in Allen county, Ohio, and reared a large family; Mathias; and Catherine, who married a Mr. Cline, settled first in Pennsylvania, and later moved to Holmes county, Ohio, where they reared a large family.

Mathias Wagner, father of Capt. John H. Wagner, was born in 1801 at Bald Eagle. He was reared in a wilderness from which the Indians had not yet departed, and under uncivilized conditions, and he never had any opportunity of attending school, but nevertheless he learned to read and write. He learned the carpenter's trade, which he followed while he remained in Pennsylvania. There he married Elizabeth Ramsey, who was a little younger than himself and also a native of Pennsylvania, where her father, Hugh Ramsey, settled in an early day. Hugh Ramsey was born in Ireland, of Scotch-Irish stock, and his family consisted of two sons and one daughter, David, Andrew and Elizabeth. He followed farming in Pennsylvania, west of the Alleghanies, near some iron works. Mathias Wagner settled near Lucinda Furnace, in Clarion county, Pa., on Cherry creek, and there his son John H. was born. In 1842 the family moved to Indiana, making the journey down the Ohio river on a raft from a point on the Clarion river to Cincinnati, thence to Brookville, Ind., on the canal, and thence by wagon to Chesterfield, Madison county, Ind., where they lived one year. Mr. Wagner's brother-in-law, David Ramsey, owned a tract of 200 acres three and a quarter miles east of the site of Elwood, which land was then entirely wild. It had been located by Mr. Ramsey when he was with a surveying party on one of the first surveys of this region. He died in Ohio, and his sister, Mrs. Wagner, being his only heir, the property fell to her, and the Wagners moved thereon. Mr. Wagner cut a trail from near a woolen mill two and a half miles east of the city out to the land, one and one half miles, cleared a spot and built a log cabin. He deadened a small patch at first and proceeded to clear part of the place, which he improved as he prospered. The death of his wife was a severe blow, occurring as it did only a year after they settled on this place. In 1854 he went to Cincinnati, leaving his household in the care of a neighbor while he assisted in building the Ohio & Mississippi railroad bridge across the Ohio. Returning to the farm, he passed the remainder of his life there, three of his children, John H., Elizabeth and George, living with him. He had married for his second wife, in Madison county, Ind., Phyllis Hall, but there were no children by this union. By his first marriage he had six: David, Julia Ann, Elizabeth, Mary Jane, George W., and John H. Two of the sons, George W. and John H., served in the Civil war, George W. serving as a private of Company G, 17th Ind. V. I.; he was killed at the battle of Hoover's Gap, June 23, 1863. Mathias Wagner, the father, died on his farm when aged seventy-eight years. He and his first wife were members of the Methodist Church. In political sentiment he was originally a Democrat, but he became a Republican upon the breaking out of the Civil war.

John H. Wagner was an infant when brought by his parents to Indiana, and he was but three years old when his mother died. He began his education in the log school-house in the home district, a primitive structure furnished with benches made out of linn poles and with a log cut out on one side of the building to admit the light, the opening being fitted with window glass. He went to school winters and worked on the farm summers until he was fifteen years old, meantime, in 1854, attending school in Cincinnati for one summer, when he and his sister Elizabeth went with their father to that city. He lived in Cincinnati for about two years, and for a time worked in a cotton factory there when only nine years old. When he was sixteen he left home and went to Tippecanoe county, Ind., where he was employed at farm work until he entered the army, and being a robust and strong young man he was able to work hard.

Captain Wagner served his country throughout the period of the Civil war, enlisting in April, 1861, on the first call for troops—in fact he was the first man to enlist from the village of Pipe Creek. He heard that volunteers were wanted while he was working on the farm, and stopped only long enough to collect some money his brother-in-law owed him. Walking to Anderson, fifteen miles from his home, he became a private in Company G, 17th Ind. V. I., Capt. Robert

C. Reed, for three years or during the war, and remained in the army four years and four months, being mustered out Aug. 18, 1865, at Macon, Ga. He became corporal June 12, 1861, and was detailed as color guard; nearly one year later, in June, 1862, he became second sergeant, and then first sergeant; on Jan. 4, 1864, he was honorably discharged at McMinnville, Tenn.; veteranized in Company G, 17th Ind. V. I., and was made orderly sergeant; served as a private until discharged to receive promotion to the rank of first lieutenant of Company G, in 1865; and the same year became captain of Company G, in which rank he served until mustered out. His promotions were all received for gallant and meritorious conduct in the line of duty. During all this time he was never away from his command except while he was in hospital at Bowling Green, Ky., for three days, and he was never wounded or taken prisoner, participating in all the campaigns, marches, battles and skirmishes of his regiment and Wilder's Brigade, to which the 17th was attached. Gen. John C. Wilder was lieutenant-colonel of the regiment when it was organized and Milo S. Hascall was colonel. The latter was promoted to brigadier-general, and Lieut.-Col. Wilder was promoted to the colonelcy, commanding the regiment until he was promoted to the command of the brigade, which he made famous.

Captain Wagner saw service in West Virginia (1861), Kentucky, Mississippi, Alabama, North Carolina and Georgia. He was in thirty-five battles and numerous skirmishes, a full record of which would fill a volume. Among the important engagements in which he took part we enumerate the following: Cheat Mountain, Elk River, Summit and Greenbrier, all in West Virginia; Pittsburg Landing; skirmishes near Stevenson, Ala., and near Bardstown, Ky.; Morgan's raid; Corinth, where they were on the skirmish line from May 15th to June 2d, 1862; McMinnville; and Hoover's Gap, a hard fight, where Captain Wagner's brother George was fatally shot, dying the same night. From Aug. 21 to Sept. 8, 1863, they had frequent skirmishes with the enemy at Chickamauga and Chattanooga, and on Sept. 11th were in a sharp fight with Scott's Brigade of Confederate Cavalry, defeating them. On Sept. 12th they had a severe fight at Rock Springs, and others on the 13th and 18th. On Sept. 19th they fought all day in the battle of Chickamauga, and on Sept. 20th charged and drove the enemy, killing, wounding and capturing a large number. In one charge eighty prisoners were taken. On Oct. 1st they started in pursuit of General Wheeler, who was in the Sequatchie valley, camped at the foot of Waldron's ridge, and on the evening of Oct. 2d and 3d charged the Confederate Colonel Crew's Brigade, across Thompson's Cove. The 17th captured the battle flag of the 2d Kentucky Cavalry, presented to them by the ladies of Elizabethtown, Ky. On Oct. 4th the regiment had a sharp skirmish at McMinnville, Tenn., and on Oct. 7th had a brisk fight three miles from Shelbyville on the Lewisburg road and made an attack, driving the enemy from the field. On the same day, at Farmington, the regiment struck Wheeler a heavy blow. On Nov. 27th the 17th was attacked by Kelly's Brigade.

In May, 1864, the regiment had many skirmishes with the enemy; on May 15th, near Rome, Ga.; on the 18th near Woodland; on the 25th at Pumpkin Vine Church; on June 9th marched to Big Shanty, where they found the enemy strongly entrenched and had a very severe fight; on June 10-11-13-16 they had heavy skirmishes, continued on June 20-22-23-27. The regiment fought all day in the battle of Kenesaw Mountain. On July 3d the regiment drove the Confederates out of Marietta and followed them, capturing many prisoners. The 17th fought throughout the great Atlanta campaign. On July 4th they fought at Cotton Creek, on the 5th at Soap Creek, and on the 9th attacked the enemy, who were posted on the south bank of the Chattahoochee river. They waded the river, which was two hundred yards wide and nearly elbow deep, firing as they went, and driving the enemy, the 17th being the first troops across. On July 19th they defeated the enemy at Stone Mountain; then marched through Oxford to Covington, on July 24th, and had a skirmish, and on July 27th moved through Decatur around Stone Mountain. They camped at Flat Rock, threatening the enemy's rear, were attacked in the night by the enemy, and on July 28th were cannonaded by the enemy. That day the brigade charged the Confederate lines and cut their way through. On Aug. 1st they moved eight miles toward Atlanta, and took the place of the 25th Corps in the line of works, skirmishing with the enemy until the 14th. On Oct. 7th they struck the enemy at New Hope Church, dismounted and charged, driving the enemy from the works, and killing and wounding several. The brigade crossed the Coosa river, passed through Rome near which they met the enemy's pickets, and commenced skirmishing, driving the enemy's skirmishers to their main body. The brigade charged, killing, wounding and capturing large numbers. On Oct. 13th the brigade moved on the enemy, finding them strongly posted on a creek near Coosaville, charged, dismounted and broke the line, Captain Wiler following the enemy on the flank and capturing the flag of Terry's Texas Rangers. In the campaign of 1865 known as Wilson's raid the regiment marched on April 1st, at daylight, seven miles to Randolph, thence toward Selma. The Confederate forces under Roddy and Forrest contested the road, and battles were fought at Bogue's Creek (Ebenezer Church) and Selma. Following this came skirmishes at Spring Hill, Montpelier, Catawba Run on railroad bridge, and at Mimm's Mill, and Rocky Creek Bridge.

At Macon, Ga., on May 30, 1865, the adjutant of the 17th Indiana, William E. Doyle, in the close of his pamphlet on the history of the regiment, thus summed up the record of the regiment: "As now the war is over, and the 17th Indiana has completed its work of fighting, let us look back over its career, and glean from its history some of its claims to immortality. What has it done? Let us see. It has marched over four thousand miles, captured over five thousand prisoners, captured more than six thousand stand of arms, seventy pieces of artillery, and eleven stand of colors, and more than three thousand horses and mules, all this with a loss of three officers and sixty-six men killed, and thirteen officers and one hundred and seventy-six wounded, a total killed and wounded of two hundred and fifty-eight. We have fought in nearly every State in the South, Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi, Georgia, and Alabama, have given resting places to our dead, as they opened new fields to us for conquest. None have striven harder than we to show a bright record. The trophies of our victories hang in the Statehouse in Indianapolis and in the capitol at Washington. Terry's Texan Rangers, 2d Kentucky Cavalry, and many other Rebel regiments and battalions, have seen us carry their colors off the field. The country will give us the credit due to our actions. We never were defeated. With the cry of 'Make way for the 17th' we always carried everything before us."

After the war Captain Wagner returned to his home in Indiana and engaged in farming on part of the home place, having inherited forty acres of the homestead. He added to his original holdings until he owned 260 acres, and continued to improve his land and farm for ten years. He then came to Elwood and built, in company with Henry Hand and Milton Kidwell, a flax factory, continuing in that business successfully for several years. Following this venture, he was for fourteen years engaged in the plumbing and gas fitting business. He has been one of the substantial figures in business circles in Elwood throughout the period of his residence in that place.

In May, 1881, Captain Wagner was married, in Anderson, Ind., to Laura Ross, who was born in Madison county, Ind., daughter of Albert J. and Elizabeth (Waymire) Ross, the former a native of West Virginia, born at Buffalo, on the Big Kanawha river, and a descendant of an old Virginia family. John Ross, Mrs. Wagner's grandfather, was a pioneer of Madison county, where he cleared two large farms from the woods and became a wealthy man. Two of his sons, Albert J. and Absalom, served in the Civil war in Indiana regiments. Albert J. Ross came to Madison county with his father in an early day, and married Elizabeth Waymire, daughter of David Waymire. Captain Wagner and his wife have one daughter, Effie, who is a graduate of the Elwood high school and is now living at home.

Captain Wagner is an honored member of the G. A. R., belonging to Post No. 161, at Elwood, of which he has been commander. He is a prominent member of the I. O. O. F. and has passed all the chairs of the lower lodge, up to and including that of noble grand, and is a member of the Grand Lodge of the State. The Captain is also a member of the I. O. R. M., at Elwood. Mrs. Wagner belongs to the Daughters of Rebekah. The Captain is a Republican in politics, and though not an office seeker he served eighteen months as marshal and one year as constable.

HENRY H. CONRAD, a highly esteemed citizen of Anderson, Ind., and one of the pioneer wagon manufacturers of Madison county, was a member of Company A, 74th Ind. V. I., during the Civil war. Mr. Conrad was born March 18, 1838, between Massillon and Canton, Ohio, son of Jasper and Catherine (Bliss) Conrad, natives of Germany.

Henry H. Conrad was three years old when his parents located in 1841 in Kosciusko county, Ind., and was brought up among the pioneers, attending school in a log cabin until fifteen years of age. Until twenty-one years of age he worked on the farm, but at this time went to South Bend, Ind., and began to learn the carriage maker's trade with the firm of Whitten & Conrad, the junior member of the firm being William Conrad, an elder brother, who was long engaged in that business at South Bend and Warsaw. Henry thoroughly learned his trade, and then began to work as a journeyman. In Warsaw, Ind., he enlisted in the Union army, to serve three years or during the war, and served until honorably discharged, in June, 1865, having completed his full term, lacking twenty-eight days. He was in the battle of Chickamauga, Sept. 19, 20, 1863, and on Sunday, Sept. 20th, found the regiment surrounded and all ammunition gone. They cut their way through with the bayonet, and found the 9th Ohio in position, forming near them where they held. The Federals were finally obliged to retreat, however, but the 74th Indiana and 10th Indiana were the last to leave the field. In this struggle Mr. Conrad's company came out with eleven men, all that were left of forty-six members who had entered the battle. Later Mr. Conrad participated in the battle of Missionary Ridge, his brigade reaching the top of Missionary Ridge and reaching brigade headquarters which had been established there. He was in the Atlanta campaign and here the regiment was under fire for nearly four months, and at Jonesboro, Ga., the brigade made a charge and carried the works. In Sherman's great March to the Sea the regiment was in many skirmishes, and took part in many foraging expeditions. Mr. Conrad was appointed duty sergeant and was detailed to brigade headquarters as sergeant of provost guard, serving in that capacity until the close of the war. He was in the march to Washington and took part in the Grand Review, marching thirty-eight miles in one day and beating the 20th Corps' time to Washington. At the battle of Jonesboro, Ga., Mr. Conrad was acting orderly and in command of the company in the absence of Lieut. Jeremiah Kuter. The brigade charged up a ridge and came into a position in the rear of the Confederate breastworks, under fire of four twelve-pounders, which opened on them with grape and canister. The command swerved to the right and came in behind the breastworks before it could be fired on a second time. The orders were to throw away everything but ammunition boxes and muskets, load muskets, fix bayonets and not fire until they were over the walls of the breastworks. This brigade was made up of the 10th and 74th Ind., 4th and 10th Kentucky, and 14th Ohio, and every third man was either killed or wounded in this battle. Mr. Conrad was always an active soldier, was never wounded nor a prisoner, although he sustained some ugly scratches at Chickamauga, and his hospital record was but two weeks in Danville.

In 1866 Mr. Conrad settled in Anderson, and opened a carriage maker's shop in company with George Mathes, whom he later bought out, since which time he has been in business on his own account. He is a skilled carriage manufacturer, and has made his business one of the best known in Anderson, his trade being large and prosperous.

In September, 1865, Mr. Conrad was married in Warsaw, Ind., to Mary E. Groves, born in Leesburg, Ind. In political matters Mr. Conrad is a Democrat, and for four years has been a member of the Anderson city council. He was one of the charter members of Major May Post, G. A. R., No. 244, in which he held the office of senior vice-commander. He also belongs to the I. O. O. F., Anderson, and has passed all the chairs, including Noble Grand and High Priest.

JAMES PATTERSON, a veteran of the Civil war, whose patriotism has cost him his eyesight, was born in Ohio, May 26, 1831, son of James and Elizabeth (Watson) Patterson, who were residents of Jefferson township, Guernsey county, that State.

The paternal great-grandfather of James Patterson was captain of a British vessel during the Revolutionary war, but at the close of that struggle he cast his lot with the new nation and thereafter made his home in Philadelphia. His wife was of English ancestry, but the Captain himself was of Irish descent.

Daniel Patterson, son of the Captain, also served in the war, later settling in Washington county, Pa. From there he moved to Ohio and cleared up a farm of 160 acres in Cambridge, Guernsey county, where both he and his wife died. Their children were: James; Stout; Jonathan; Robert, who was in the war of 1812, and served under Commodore Perry in the battle of Lake Erie; Elias; William; Hannah, who married John Kirk; Elizabeth, who married a Mr. Armstrong; and Deborah.

James Patterson, oldest son of Daniel, was born in Greene county, Pa., where he married Elizabeth, daughter of James Watson, who came of Pennsylvania-Dutch stock. They remained in Greene county till after the birth of their first child, when they joined the stream of pioneers settling in Ohio. Daniel Patterson was already located there, and the son took up forty acres of government land a little west of him. The younger man cleared his farm from the woods, built a home and lived there till 1842, passing on in that year to Jay county, Indiana. There he bought a forty-acre tract which had been already cleared, and he spent the rest of his long life there. He lived to be ninety-three years and seven months of age, and died during the Tilden and Hendricks campaign, while living with his son in Union township, Madison county, Ind. During most of his active life he had been a brickmaker as well as farmer, having learned that trade in his youth in Pennsylvania. His wife, who died in Jay county, at the age of seventy-five years, bore him eleven children: William, Luzana, Mary, Deborah, Nancy, Amelia, Hannah, Elizabeth Ann, James, Matilda and Ellen. Both parents were members of the United Brethren Church in their later years, though in Ohio they attended the Methodist Church. James Patterson was a man of position in his community, served as constable for many years, and was a truly loyal and patriotic citizen, having served his country in the War of 1812.

James Patterson, youngest son of James, during his youth had attended the Ohio public schools more or less, and acquired a limited education, but the greater part of the time he had employed in farm work, and that became his regular calling. He was working on his father's property at the time the war broke out, and in 1862, he left his wife and family in order to enlist in Company C, 39th Indiana Mounted Infantry. He served ten months, was in the battle of Stone River and in many skirmishes, until at Middleton, Tenn., he was injured by a fall from his horse and was kept in a convalescent camp in Murfreesboro till sent back to his regiment and discharged, July 22, 1863.

Mr. Patterson returned home, but only to enlist again, and he served till the end of the war, a period of about one year, in Company A, 12th Ind. V. I. He joined Sherman at Buford, S. C., and most of his service was in that State and in North Carolina. On the march from Raleigh to Petersburg, Va., on the way to Washington, he had a sunstroke, falling senseless by the road. An Indiana comrade, Jim Crawford, from Jay county, remained with him, and he was carried to camp in a luggage wagon of the 26th Illinois. On the final march into Washington, he and an officer who had been similarly afflicted, were able to keep their places in the ranks, but their effects were carried on a mule driven by a colored boy. Mr. Patterson was transferred to the 59th Infantry at Louisville, Ky., and was discharged there. His eyesight had already begun to fail from the effects of his experience on the march, and after his return to his home it grew steadily worse till permanent blindness resulted. He received a pension with back pay amounting to $4,000, and has drawn $100 a month ever since—for his misfortune has rendered it impossible for him to do work of any kind since.

Thrice married, Mr. Patterson's first union was contracted in Indiana, when he was twenty-two years old. This wife, whose maiden name was Mary Ann Saucer, and who was born in North Carolina, died only twenty months after their marriage. His second wife was Mrs. Lydia Louisa (Swizer) Hahn, who was born in Muskingum county, Ohio, Aug. 4, 1831, daughter of Philip and Casty (Stotts) Swizer. The families on both sides were of Pennsylvania-Dutch stock. Philip Swizer, a farmer, had moved from Ohio to Jay county, Ind., in 1852. The children born to this union were: Frances M. and Martin Van Buren, who both died in early childhood; William Riley, now living in Madison county, who married Miss Mary Elizabeth Fenwick, and has one child; Archibald Oliver, a farmer, who married Miss Lydia Alice Fenwick and has two children; Mary G., who married the late Perry S. Stephenson, and lives in Anderson, Ind., with her four children; James Perry, of Daleville, who married Miss Clara Bell Hancock, and has two children; Jacob Sherman, of Anderson, who married Miss Rebecca Doolittle; and Isaac Newton, who married Miss Sarah Swizer, and lives on his father's farm. Mrs. Lydia Patterson died in Delaware county, Ind., and in 1889 Mr. Patterson married Mrs. Catherine (Martz) Whitehurst. They now reside in Daleville, and are numbered among the most highly esteemed residents of that town. In politics Mr. Patterson is a Democrat of the old school.

Mrs. Patterson comes of Pennsylvania-Dutch stock in both lines. Her parents were Henry and Catherine (Lydick) Martz, the former a native of Pennsylvania, who moved with his wife and children to Indiana in the early days. He cleared up a tract of 140 acres in Adams county, and made a good home there in which he spent all the rest of his days. He died in 1872, aged seventy-seven years, eleven months and seven days. By his first wife, whose name is forgotten, he had seven children, Jacob, John, William, Mary, Lena, Sarah and Julia Ann. By his second union, that to Catherine Lydick, he had: George, Lydia, Ellen, Catherine, James and Frances. Catherine, now Mrs. Patterson, who was born in Adams county, Ind., April 28, 1844, first married John Whitehurst, a farmer in Adams county, who died there leaving her with three children, Mary, Jane and George F. The youngest died in infancy.

JOEL ELMORE HAWORTH, one of the substantial and highly respected citizens of Noblesville, and the son of a pioneer of Indiana, is a member of an old Pennsylvania family of Quaker faith and English descent.

George Haworth, the founder of this family in America, came with William Penn on his second voyage to America in 1699, and it is said that his sister, Mary, wife of John Myers, came a year or two before and also that James Haworth, a first cousin, preceded him, but how long before cannot be learned, nor have we any history of them or their descendants. George Haworth spent some time with his sister Mary, then living in Maryland near the line at a place called Hurbell's, after which he removed to Philadelphia and lived for a time with his first cousin, James. A short time later he went to Bucks county, where he purchased forty-five acres of land, on which he passed the remainder of his life. In 1710, or about eleven years after coming to America, he married a Quaker lady named Scarboro, and died Nov. 28, 1724, leaving six children, five sons and a daughter, namely: Stephanus, Absalom, John, James, Mary and George. Later it seems that three or four of these sons moved to Virginia, where at least two of them married.

From James Haworth, fourth son of George, this line descends. James Haworth removed with his brothers Stephanus and Absalom to Opequon, Va., and on the strength of a letter written to England by John Myers, son of John and Mary (Haworth) Myers, in 1745, John Myers himself settled there, but, we believe, that this is questioned by Rev. W. P. Haworth, the historian of the family. James Haworth probably married in Virginia Mary Wood, and of their children Richard was born in Virginia in 1745. There were other children born to them, but the names of all of them have not been preserved. Their third child, or second son, was George, who was born and married in Virginia, and the fourth was James.

James Haworth, son of James, was born in Virginia about 1751 and married in that State Mary Rees, born probably in 1766. She is buried in Hinkle Creek graveyard, Quaker Church. The date of the birth of James is told by the following story, handed down by tradition: When Mary Rees was born, James Haworth went for the midwife who waited on her mother at the childbirth. He was then a boy of fifteen years, and after the child was born he said: "I shall wait for her for my wife," and the story runs that he did wait for her for fifteen years, and that when he was thirty they were married. James Haworth is buried near Danville, Ind., and it is said that his grave is simply marked by a stone with no letters. This, however would only be in line with the customs of the early Quakers, many of the older cemeteries in Pennsylvania having no inscriptions on the small and severely plain headstones.

Mary Rees was of Welsh-Quaker stock, probably born in Virginia, and was own sister to James Rees. Mr. and Mrs. Haworth first removed to Highland county, Ohio, and later to Indiana, settling in Hendricks county, in the Mill creek neighborhood, where Mr. Haworth died in middle life. His widow reached the advanced age of eighty-four years, and died at the home of her son, Levi, in Hamilton county in 1850. His tombstone is marked with name and date. James and Mary (Rees) Haworth were the parents of thirteen children: William; James, who died single; George; Sarah, who married a Mr. Horton; David Jonathan, grandfather of Dr. M. C. Haworth, a sketch of whom appears elsewhere; Charity, who married a Mr. Postgate and settled in Illinois; Margaret, who died single; Rees; Eli, who removed to Iowa and there died; Ann; Levi; Elizabeth, who married a Mr. Bailey; and Nancy, who married Isaac Mardock.

George Haworth, son of James and Mary (Rees) Haworth, was born in Virginia and married Jane Thornburg. They settled in Highland county, Ohio, thence moved to Randolph county, Ind., and finally thence to Marion county, Ind., as did his brother James, and her sister Phoebe, at West Newton. George Haworth had traded a coon skin for a small piece of land on the east edge of West Newton, which had a small log cabin built on it. This was then a wilderness and the land was comparatively of no value. Mr. Haworth is buried at Newton, where he was one of the oldest settlers. For many years he lived in Hamilton county, six miles northwest of Noblesville, in the woods, where he owned 120 acres of land, which he reclaimed from its wild state, but later returned to West Newton, buying a farm just south of that place, and there he lived until over eighty-one years of age, his wife also passing away when about that old. They were members of the Friends Church, which Mr. Haworth would attend in his hunting clothes, which were his customary apparel, he being a great hunter of deer and wild turkeys. He was a heavy-set man, of medium height. Mr. Haworth lived a clean, honest life, and he was greatly respected by his neighbors, who could see and appreciate his many sterling qualities of character. His children were: Phoebe, born about 1813; Mary, born in 1814, died when three years old; John, born in 1815, in Highland county, Ohio; Edward, born in 1817; James, born in 1819; one daughter, name not remembered, married Levi Sumner; Ann, mother of Dr. M. C. Haworth, married her first cousin; Sarah, who married Daniel Fisher, died, leaving eight children, John (who died a soldier in the Civil war), Elizabeth, James (who was city treasurer of Noblesville), Harriet, David, Isaac, Ruth (who married a Mr. Horton) and Mary (who married Joel Mendenhall).

John Haworth, son of George and Jane (Thornburg) Haworth, was born in 1815, in Highland county, Ohio. He received his education in the pioneer common schools. On Nov. 2, 1837, he was married in Hamilton county, Ind., to Charity Rees, daughter of James and Jane (Elmore) Rees, and soon after marriage removed to Quaker Point, on Quaker Hill, in Vermilion county, Ill., living on Mr. Haworth's uncle's farm for one year. He then returned to Hamilton county, Ind., and settled six miles northwest of Noblesville on forty acres in the woods, clearing up a spot on which to build a log cabin, later cleared his farm, and then bought forty acres more, which he also cleared. In February, 1865, he sold his land and removed to Iroquois county, Ill., settling in Ash Grove, where he purchased a farm. Later he removed to the county seat, where he bought eighty acres of land, adjoining the town of Watseka, and this was his home at the time of his death. He was buried March 4, 1885. He was twice married, his first wife dying Dec. 3, 1855, and was buried in the Hinkle graveyard. Mr. Haworth married her sister, Nancy Ann Rees, and to this union there were no children, but the stepmother reared the children of the first marriage as though they were her own, and gave them a mother's care and affection. She had cared for her sister's children for ten years before the first Mrs. Haworth's death as the latter was lying helpless all of that time, and her self-sacrifice proved her a true Christian woman. John Haworth, as well as both of his wives, was a member of the Friends Church, in which he was an elder, and was a man of straightforward character and respected by all who knew him. He was an Abolitionist in his political views, and cast his vote for Abraham Lincoln. His children were: Joel Elmore, born June 12, 1840, in the log cabin six miles northwest of Noblesville; Jane, born June 6, 1842; Caroline R., born in September, 1844; James R.; and Sarah.

Joel Elmore Haworth was born in a log cabin, with puncheon floors, stick chimney and big fireplace, and was reared among the pioneers. When he was a small boy his father built a hewed log cabin, one and one-half stories in height, it being considered a fire house in those days in the neighborhood in which it was built. The first school house which young Joel E. attended was built of logs, had a stick chimney, slabs for seats, and for the writing desk a poplar puncheon split from a big log, supported by pins. A log was cut out to admit light, the space being filled by 8x10 pieces of glass. Joel wrote with a goose quill pen, taking the goose quills to the teacher, who would make them, this being one of the requirements of the pioneer school teacher. He learned the multiplication table by heart, which he has never forgotten, and learned to spell from memory from the old spelling book. He attended school for two terms in West Newton, a common school, going to school for about three months in the winters, the rest of the year being spent in work on the farm. When a very young man he began clearing land, his first contract being with William Pickett, one of his early teachers, for five dollars per acre. When he was eighteen years old his father told him that he could have his time, but that if he remained at home until he was twenty-one years old he would try to buy forty acres of land for him. Joel, however, thought he could do better, and went to work for himself at clearing land in Hamilton county, Ind., where he cleared sixty acres, clearing as much as twenty-two acres on one contract.

Mr. Haworth was married (first) in Hamilton county to Mary Armstrong, born in that county, daughter of James and Elizabeth (Davis) Armstrong, and she died April 15, 1882, at Siloam, Ark., leaving no children. Mr. Haworth was married (second), Nov. 10, 1887, to Mrs. Narcissa L. Holliday, nee Lewis, born in Parke county, Ind., and to this union there have been born two children: Lois Marie, who married Claude Warren, a jeweler of Noblesville; and Charity Ann.

From 1865 to 1868 Mr. Haworth engaged in farming five miles from Noblesville, on Grandfather Rees's old farm, and then engaged in a sawmill business, having a one-half interest, and this venture proved very satisfactory. He moved his mill to Tipton county, and later to Vermilion county, Ill., where he cut the timber for his mills from 100 acres. He then engaged in the black walnut timber business, organizing the East Tennessee Lumber Company, of which he was president. His wife becoming sick, Mr. Haworth was compelled to remove to Siloam Springs, Ark., and this prevented him from giving attention to his business, which, during his absence, although perfectly solvent, became involved. Hon. Joseph Cannon, Speaker of the House of Representatives, was then president of the Vermilion County Bank, and with his brother, William Cannon, had purchased the notes of the concern for $14,000. Mr. Haworth went to them in his emergency, and after an invoice of the property was made, and a careful invoice and estimate made by Mr. Joseph Cannon, the latter advised Mr. Haworth to go back to Tennessee and work out the claim, paying as fast as possible in small sums. This advice Mr. Haworth took, and, returning to Tennessee, in four years he had sold the lumber and disposed of the lands, paid the claims and had a goodly sum left. He was then engaged in the flouring business at Georgetown, Ill., and while there became well and prominently known, serving as a member of the town council for some years. He also engaged in the lumber and lime business, but in 1900 sold out and removed to Noblesville, where he bought his present residence property and a farm of 235 acres in Hamilton county. He is in very comfortable circumstances, owning valuable city property and 120 acres of fine land in Clay county, Indiana.

In political matters Mr. Haworth is a Republican, his first vote being cast for Abraham Lincoln, and he has voted for every Republican candidate for the Presidency since that time. He and Mrs. Haworth are members of the Friends Church, in which both are very active, he having been an elder in the church for many years. He is a good, substantial citizen, and is considered one of the representative men of Hamilton county.

JOHN ARTHUR KAUTZ, a leading citizen of Kokomo, Ind., where he is postmaster, and editor and publisher of The Kokomo Daily Tribune, was born Sept. 26, 1860, in Wabash county, Ind., son of Henry and Eliza (Baker) Kautz.

Henry Kautz was born in Carroll county, Md., March 20, 1833, son of Frederick and Catherine (Secrist) Kautz, the former a farmer of Carroll county, Md., whither he had removed from Pennsylvania. He was a pioneer of Wabash county, Ind., settling about 1840, and cleared a farm from the heavy timber, entering about 300 acres. He first built a log cabin and later frame buildings, and here he resided the major portion of his life, although his death occurred in Huntington county, Ind. Frederick Kautz was a member of the German Baptist Church. His children were: John, Henry, Daniel, Frederick, Rebecca and Margaret. Frederick, the youngest son, died in the hospital at Louisville, Ky., during the Civil war, a member of the 47th Indiana Volunteers. Three of the sons of this family were soldiers in the Union army.

Henry Kautz was seven or eight years of age when his father settled in Indiana, the family coming overland with horse and wagon. He was reared among the pioneers, and received his education in the early district schools. He was married in Wabash county, Ind., to Eliza Baker, daughter of John and Elizabeth (Risser) Baker, and to them were born three children: John Arthur, Mary and Addie. Henry Kautz now resides in Andrews, where he was postmaster for eighteen years. In politics he is a Republican, and in religious connection a member of the Christian Church.

John A. Kautz received his education in the public schools of Andrews, and graduated from the high school and from Butler College, Irvington, Ind., in 1885. The next year he received the degree of A. M., on the completion of a post-graduate course. He was principal of the high school at Andrews for one year, and at Bluffton for a like period, and on May 9, 1887, bought the Tribune, which he has conducted successfully to the present time. He put in an entirely new plant and built a substantial brick building, and has made his paper the leader of the Ninth Congressional District. Mr. Kautz is a former president of the Indiana Republican Editors Association, and was appointed postmaster in 1892. He is a Mason, and an Elk, belonging to those fraternities in Kokomo. He and his wife are members of the Christian Church, of which he has been a trustee for some years.

Mr. Kautz was married Aug. 18, 1886, in Wabash, to Inez Gillen, born in Wabash, Nov. 26, 1861, daughter of Henry H. and Mary Cartmel Gillen, and to this union there have been born four daughters: Bernice, Cordelia, Dorothy and Kathryn. Mr. Kautz was formerly president of the Board of Education of Kokomo, and he has been delegate to the National Republican Convention.

Dr. Henry H. Gillen was born in Mt. Sterling, Ky., in 1818, was educated at the Medical College at Cincinnati, Ohio, and practiced in Franklin county some years, being a pioneer physician of Wabash county, Ind., riding in the saddle for nearly fifty years. He died about 1901 in Florida. Dr. Gillen's children were: Daniel, Richard, Clara, Effie, Inez and Nora.

LEANDER MEAD CRIST was born at Liberty, Ind., Oct. 23, 1837, fifth son and ninth child of James Weller and Mary (LaFuze) Crist.

George Weller Crist, his paternal grandfather, was born in New Jersey Sept. 20, 1770. In 1795, in his young manhood, he came to Ohio and settled on the Miami river. Here it was that he wooed and won a fair maiden by the name of Sarah Bell, who was born in Ireland and who, in her ninth year, crossed the sea with her parents. In 1864, in her ninety-second year, she died at Laurel, Ind. The father of George Weller Crist was of German origin, and he was born on Manhattan Island, where his father had settled at an early date in the history of the Island. Originally the name was spelled Christe, and pronounced Kreest.

James Weller Crist, eldest son of George Weller Crist, was born in the eastern part of Hamilton county, Ohio, July 4, 1803. His father came to Indiana in the fall of 1812, and entered land where Liberty now stands, and soon after hewed down enough trees in the forest to build his cabin home, into which he moved with his young family. He died at Liberty, March 16, 1844. The grandfathers of Mary (LaFuze) Crist—LaFuze and Harper—were both killed in the early part of the Revolutionary war. Samuel LaFuze, her father, was born near Brownsville, Pa., Sept. 17, 1776. In March, 1812, with his wife and nine children, he floated down the Ohio river in a flatboat which he had built, landing at Columbia, above Cincinnati. In the fall of the same year he entered land northeast of Liberty. He died Jan. 11, 1863. His wife, Eleanor (Harper) LaFuze, was born in Pennsylvania Sept. 5, 1777, and died Feb. 17, 1852. The great-grandmother of Mr. Leander Mead Crist was Eleonore Harper Davis Irish, who was born in 1743, and who died in Union county in 1824. The ancestors on both paternal and maternal sides, as far back as the records are traced, were Protestants. They were of true pioneer spirit, energetic, industrious and frugal. In the paternal line there was the blood of the Teuton, Irish and Scotch Dissenter, while on the maternal it was French and Irish.

James Weller and Mary (LaFuze) Crist were married at Liberty, March 2, 1823. They settled, that spring, in the midst of dense timber, about one-half mile south of where the Court House in Liberty stands. Here they endured the hardships and privations of pioneer life, hewed down the forest, built a home, developed a farm and reared ten of their eleven children to maturity. They reaped with a sickle, and threshed with a flail; they carded wool, and spun and wove cloth; and they gave to their children the best advantages the country afforded in church and schools. In their religious belief they were Methodists. Their home was used for church services, and many a pioneer preacher was fed and sheltered there. They were charter members of the first temperance society ever organized in the State. In 1833 they banished the cuspidor, demijohn and cards from their home—at that time a most radical step, for those were the days when the bottle was in nearly every home, and the jug was considered a necessity in the harvest field, at the log-rolling, and at the raising of a cabin, house or barn. In 1833 they built the first brick house in the neighborhood.

In that house Leander Mead Crist was born. He grew to manhood on the farm and was trained in the mills owned and operated by his father. In his twenty-first year it was determined by his father and himself that he should take a collegiate course. Arrangements were made for him to enter college in the fall of 1859, but his father sickened and died on the 14th of September, of that year, so all plans were thwarted and he was not able to enter Asbury—now DePauw—University until the fall of 1863. This was the darkest of the years of the Civil war. Delicate health prevented his being admitted into the army, but he volunteered in the Kirby Smith raid against Cincinnati and John Morgan's invasion of Indiana and Ohio. In this latter raid he rode five hundred miles. By unaided efforts he furnished his own expenses and made the course in college, graduating from old Asbury in June, 1867. His graduation theme was on "Bismarck." In August of the same year he went to Lancaster, Ky., as instructor in a Boys' Academy, remaining in this work and in the study of law until 1870, when he returned to Liberty, Ind., and there entered upon the practice of law. In 1875 he was elected county superintendent of public schools in Union county, and he continued six years in that office, raising the standard of education by a county exhibit of work and the initial movement of graduating the pupils from the grade schools, issuing the first diploma to that effect.

On Oct. 23, 1871, Mr. Crist was united in marriage with Miss Eunice Brown of Liberty, Ind., a graduate in 1867 of Oxford College, Oxford, Ohio. She was the daughter of Walter and Kezia (Laboytau) Brown, early settlers in Union county, Ind. To this union was born Dec. 2, 1872, a son, Mark. On Feb.

25, 1873, the young wife and mother passed away, leaving the babe and young husband in deep gloom. On June 12, 1880, Mr. Crist was again married, to Miss Orpha A. Gath, a graduate in 1866 from Oxford College, Oxford, Ohio, and for years a successful teacher. She was the daughter of Samuel and Mary (Tetley) Gath, of Oxford, formerly of Halifax, England.

In the fall of 1881 Mr. Crist and his wife went to Thorntown, Ind., and took charge of the public schools of that city, as superintendent and teacher, and continued there three years. In the summer of 1884 came the call in Indiana for a temperance political organization. Mr. and Mrs. Crist, both being born with an antipathy against the "Drink Curse," could not resist the call. On July 23, 1884, Mr. Crist went to Indianapolis to participate in the first State Prohibition Convention. He was one among five to join in a call for the first Prohibition Convention in Boone county, Sept. 8, 1884. This action made it necessary for both to retire from public school work, and from all official recognition in the church, to face the opposition, innuendoes and contumely usually bestowed upon those who step out into any new line of action. He became an ardent supporter of the prohibition cause. In 1886 he was candidate for representative of Boone county; in 1888, delegate to the National Convention at Indianapolis; in 1890, candidate for State Superintendent of Public Instruction; in 1892, delegate to the National Convention at Cincinnati, Ohio; in 1894, candidate for Congress in the 9th Indiana district; in 1895, accompanied his wife, who was a delegate, to the World's W. C. T. U. Convention in London, England; in 1896, delegate to the National Convention at Pittsburg, and candidate for Governor of Indiana on the Prohibition ticket; in 1897-98, State chairman of the Prohibition party in Indiana; in 1899-1900, chairman of the Ninth district; and in 1900, delegate to the National Convention at Indianapolis. During the six years from 1891 to 1897 he held a Prohibition meeting every Sunday afternoon at 3:30 P. M. in his grove, entirely at his own expense. This public agitation of a great cause was aided by the publication of "The Twentieth Century," an eight-page reform monthly for the years 1900-01-02. He served as county chairman for several years, rendering valuable service on the platform, a most notable occasion being at Bethany Park, in 1896, when all the candidates for Governor were present on Patriotic Day. Besides this public work along reform lines, Mr. Crist served as director of a national bank at Liberty, Indiana; was secretary of a Turnpike Company there; secretary of the Masonic Order for a number of years; president of County Sunday-School Association, both in Union and Boone counties; became director of the First National Bank upon removing to Thorntown, and then assisted in organizing the Home National Bank there, and served as president for five years; and at this date, in his seventy-first year, he is manager and editor of the Thorntown Argus-Enterprise; is secretary of Co-operative Telephone Company; and treasurer of the school board. He is hale, hearty and faithful, and still enjoys a life of activity and usefulness in public service. It might be said truthfully that in his life of sobriety—for he has never used tobacco or intoxicants in any form—and usefulness he stands an example well worthy of emulation.

ALBERT FOX, former sheriff of Hamilton county, Ind., and a prominent citizen of Noblesville, where he is engaged in the livery business, was born July 12, 1852, son of John and Sarah (Perry) Fox.

The Fox family is of good English stock of North Carolina. John Fox was the son of Baltzer and Abigail (Frazin) Fox, the former of whom was a pioneer of Shelby county, Ind., five miles north of Shelbyville, on the Blue river, where he cleared up a farm from the timber, consisting of 162 acres. He was a respected citizen and died on the farm, aged about sixty-eight years. His children were: Zena, Alfred, Hiram, Melinda, Louisa and John. Mr. and Mrs. Baltzer Fox were Methodists in religion. She was a sister of Rev. Samuel Frazin, a noted pioneer and itinerant Methodist minister.

John Fox was born in Shelby county, Ind., about 1829. He was a farmer, and he died at the early age of twenty-eight years. He was married in Shelby county (first) to Sarah Perry, daughter of Elijah Perry, a pioneer settler, of that county. Mrs. Fox died, leaving a son, Albert. He married (second) Margaret Dennis, by whom he had one daughter, Sarah.

Albert Fox received a common school education, and was reared to the life of a farmer. Until he was eight years old he lived with his grandmother Fox, and after her death he was brought up by his uncle, Hardy Ray, with whom he lived until he was fifteen years old. Young Fox then went out among the farmers to work, at which he continued until he was twenty years of age. On April 9, 1871, in Shelby county, he married Ida L. Boren, born in Hamilton county, daughter of Franklin and Sarah Jane (Spencer) Boren, the former of whom was born in North Carolina, and came with his father, a pioneer of Hamilton county, to Indiana. After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Fox settled in Shelby county, where he engaged in farming. In 1878 they located in Noblesville, where he engaged in various kinds of work for some time and then bought a livery stable, in which business he has since continued. He keeps a full line of vehicles of all kinds, and has a good stable of horses. In 1892 he was elected sheriff of Hamilton county, taking that office Jan. 1, 1893, and he proved to be an efficient and popular county official. Since the expiration of his term of office he has devoted himself to his business.

Fraternally Sheriff Fox is a member of the Knights of the Maccabees. To him and his wife these children have been born: Charles W., who died at the age of twenty-two years; Hally F. and Jessie E. Mr. Fox is well known as a good and substantial citizen.

RICHARD NEPTUNE, a farmer and capitalist of Thorntown, Boone county, had a varied career, and by his uniform success in widely different spheres of activity demonstrated both his versatility and his ability. He was born in Union county, Ind., near Liberty, Feb. 13, 1831, and was one of six children born to Amos and Hetha (Jeffreys) Neptune.

The paternal grandfather was Amos Neptune, of Scotch-Irish lineage, a native of Virginia, in which State he died. He served his country in the war of 1812. By his wife, who died young, he had two sons, and one daughter.

Amos Neptune (2) came to Indiana in the fall of 1830, and settled at first in Union county, where he cleared up two or three farms; later he moved into Franklin county, and was farming there at the time of his death in 1872 at the age of seventy-two. His wife, Hetha Jeffreys, a member of a Virginia family, died Feb. 5, 1866, at the age of three score years and ten. Both were ardent Methodists, and he was an officer in the church for many years. Of their four sons and two daughters none are now living.

Richard Neptune passed the first twelve years of his life in Union county, and attended the subscription schools there. Then the family moved to Franklin county, and he remained at home until he attained manhood. He then began for himself and spent a number of years in farming. His first venture was in renting land and working out by the month, and by such means he acquired sufficient means to buy land. In partnership with his brother-in-law, Moses DeCamp, he purchased 100 acres in Butler county, Ohio, but this interest he disposed of a year later. For the two years following he ran a threshing machine and farmed a rented piece of land, but at the end of that time he again bought property, and settled down on a place of his own. He had selected a location near Mt. Carmel, Ind., and beginning with eighty acres soon added another fifty. He remained there twelve years, but then sold out and in 1868 moved to Boone county and took up his residence in Thorntown. This was the period of his temporary abandonment of farming, and instead for a year or two he was engaged in a carriage business and then took up the manufacture of staves for several years. Soon after he started upon this latter enterprise, he also became interested in the banking line, and helped to organize the State Bank of Thorntown, of which he was president until 1903, having succeeded its first head, John Niven. On leaving the bank he again turned his attention to farming and afterward devoted his time to that. He had meantime acquired large farm holdings, and was the holder of 221 acres adjoining the town of Thorntown on the south and 255 acres in Sugar Creek township. On the former property was his residence, an elegant and completely equipped house, which he built in 1884, and the place is very highly improved in every detail. Mr. Neptune also owned city property in Indianapolis.

Mr. Neptune was married in his early manhood and had more than half a century of domestic life behind him. He was united in 1852 to Miss Rhoda DeCamp, and on June 3, 1902, they celebrated their Golden Wedding anniversary. Mrs. Neptune was one of six children born to John and Margaret (Wilkinson) DeCamp, natives of Butler county, Ohio.

Her paternal grandfather, Ezekiel DeCamp, had a family of seventeen children. The mother's father was Gideon Wilkinson. To Richard and Rhoda Neptune were born three children: Martha, the only daughter and second child, is now Mrs. Howard; the older son, George, engaged in the stove business in Memphis, married Miss Ora Cones, and has six children, Carl, Richard, Joseph, Tyler, George and Mary; John, the third child, a farmer in Sugar Creek township, married Miss Nannie Moore, and is the father of William, Walter, Celine, Helen, Maurice, Catherine and Elizabeth. Mrs. Rhoda Neptune is a member of the Methodist Church which her husband also attended and helped liberally to support. Mr. Neptune was one of the young men who helped to make up the Republican party at the time of its organization, and was ever afterward a loyal party man. He was one of the substantial, conservative men who are the real strength of this country, and in his own region was held in the highest respect. His death occurred Feb. 16, 1907.

ISHAM BENEFIEL, a veteran of the Civil war, pension attorney and real estate man, of Elwood, has had a career with more than the usual variety in it. He is a native of Madison county, born near Perkinsville, Jackson township, Sept. 14, 1837, to William and Cynthia Ann (Kidwell) Benefiel.

The Benefiels are of the Scotch-Irish race. Robert Benefiel, grandfather of Isham, was a pioneer in Kentucky, where he lived near Mount Sterling on a farm which he had cleared from the forest. Later in life he followed his son William to Wayne county, Ind., and made his home with him for the rest of his life. He was the father of six children: William, Mary Jane, Sally, Jane, Lurane J. and John.

William Benefiel was brought up a pioneer farmer and was very successful in life. When a young man he went to Wayne county, and cleared up a farm there which he afterward sold, moving, about 1835, to Madison county. He cleared 160 acres of forest land in Jackson township, and made one of the best improved farms in the Pipe Creek bottoms. He added to his holdings until he had about 400 acres, and was one of the substantial and well-to-do farmers and pioneers of the place. He was physically very strong and rugged, and never had a day's illness till the last week before his death, which occurred at the age of sixty-five. In religious matters he was a Universalist and very independent in his views. A strong Union man he was originally an old-line Whig, and later he joined the Republicans, voting for Lincoln.

William Benefiel was married in Wayne county to Miss Cynthia Ann Kidwell, daughter of Rev. Jonathan and Rebecca Kidwell. Children were born to them as follows: James M.; Robert Stewart; Jonathan D., who enlisted for three years in Company G, 47th Ind. V. I., served six months and died of disease at New Iberia, La., just after receiving an appointment as wagon master; Levi; Rebecca Ann; William H. H., who served three years as a private in Company G, 47th Ind. V. I., and took part in several battles; Lurane J.; and Isham. Mrs. Benefiel belonged to a Virginia family. Her father, Rev. Jonathan Kidwell, was a Universalist minister and was widely known for his teaching of liberal doctrines. He founded, edited and published at Philomath, the Philomath Encyclopedia, a Universalist newspaper, which he conducted until his death. He passed away at an advanced age in Wayne county. His children were: Cynthia Ann, Laura Jane, Starling, Hezekiah and William.

Isham Benefiel acquired his education in the old log cabin school house near his home in Madison county, but he made the most of his limited opportunities, and received one of the first licenses to teach issued in that county. He was then only seventeen years of age, and taught but a single term at Bossner's Corners, his home district. In 1858 he went to Minnesota, and spent a winter in Fillmore county with his brother Robert, who had settled there. He returned to Indiana, and there, Sept. 14, 1862, he enlisted at Anderson as a private in Company E, 34th Ind. V. I., for three years. He nearly served out his time, doing duty in Kentucky, and was a faithful and efficient soldier, but became ill, and at Camp Wickliffe, Laurel county, he was honorably discharged Feb. 6, 1864, on account of disability. He was never in the hospital, but contracted chronic diarrhoea, and was a great sufferer for years. When discharged he was unable to walk without assistance, and would have died in a short time, if he had not been sent home for treatment.

For six months after returning to the old homestead Mr. Benefiel was too ill to work, but afterward he engaged in farming in Madison county, also carrying on a butcher business. In 1870 he inherited from his father's estate sixty-six and two-third acres of land, which he farmed until 1880. In that year he moved to Elwood, and served very efficiently as marshal of that town until 1881. He then bought land which is now within the corporate limits of Elwood, and ran a vineyard. Later he was appointed pension attorney and a notary public, and in addition turned his attention to the real estate business. This he continued until November, 1892, when he removed to Tennessee, and was in the real estate line at Harriman until 1904, when he returned to Elwood and resumed his work as pension attorney.

Mr. Benefiel has been married several times. His first wife was Miss Elizabeth Cannon, who was born in Hamilton, Ind. They were united in Perkinsville, in May, 1854, and became the parents of George L., Mary, Jane, Annie and Louisa. Mrs. Elizabeth Benefiel died in Hamilton county, in 1866, and in 1867 Mr. Benefiel was married to Miss Sarah Genevieve Baldwin, who also died, leaving four children, Laura E., Minnie A., James M. and Catherine. The third wife was Mrs. Barbara A. (Brower) Frazer, who had no children. The present Mrs. Benefiel was Mrs. Elizabeth (Stokes) Miner. She was born in Franklin county, where her father, Jesse Stokes, was a pioneer, and a cabinet-maker by trade. She was first married to Jabez E. Miner, by whom she had three children, Clarence, Nonie and Elbert. To her and Mr. Benefiel has been born one child, Ermel F. The Benefiel family resides in a pleasant home in Elwood. Both Mr. and Mrs. Benefiel are members of the Methodist Church, connected with the organization at their former home, Harriman, Tenn. Mr. Benefiel also retains his membership in the G. A. R. Post at that place, although he was previously one of the founders of a post at Elwood. Before the war he was a Democrat, and voted for Stephen A. Douglas, but at the next election he cast his vote for Lincoln and he continued to support the Republican party ever after until 1888. Since that time his strong temperance ideas have led him to join the Prohibition party. His deep interest in that cause may be inferred from an incident of his earlier residence in Elwood. While in the real estate business he sold a tract of forty acres to John F. Rodfer, who laid it out as an addition to Elwood. He gave Mr. Benefiel the exclusive rights for the sale of the lots, and the latter inserted in each deed a clause prohibiting the sale or manufacture of liquor, so that at the present day there is no saloon within that district. While in Tennessee Mr. Benefiel was a candidate for the State Legislature on the Prohibition ticket.

FRED L. KINNAMAN, ex-county recorder of Hamilton county, Ind., and now successfully engaged in the livery business at Noblesville, is a native of that county, where he was born Oct. 16, 1859, son of Napoleon J. and Margaret A. (Dickerson) Kinnaman, and a grandson of John C. and Elizabeth (Mingle) Kinnaman.

The Kinnamans are of English and Irish stock, and were early settlers near Dayton, Montgomery county, Ohio. Thomas Kinnaman, great-grandfather of Fred L., was a Virginian, and his son, John C., was also a native of the Old Dominion State. The latter settled in 1832 in Fall Creek township, Hamilton county, Ind., where he entered 160 acres of land. This he cleared and added to by purchase until he was the owner of 240 acres of fine farm land. He was an honored pioneer, and was trustee of Fall Creek township for twenty years, also being on the board of county trustees in the early days. His children were: Napoleon J., George W., Julia and Ann, the latter of whom married Calvin F. Helme, and died aged twenty years. John C. Kinnaman died April 3, 1879. He was an intelligent and well-read man for his day, was a member of the Christian Church, being one of the founders of that organization in his community, and was a substantial citizen, his estate being valued at $20,000.

Napoleon J. Kinnaman was born Dec. 22, 1829, in Montgomery county, Ohio, near Dayton, where his father lived for a time. He came to Indiana when three years old with his parents, and was brought up among the pioneers. He received little schooling, but was self-educated, and he taught school in Fall Creek township in pioneer days, being excellent in arithmetic and very well read for his time. For a short time he was clerk in Wainwright's store, in Indianapolis, Ind., but later returned to farming. While in Indianapolis he married Margaret A. Dickerson, born in Indiana, but early left an orphan and reared by her sister, Mrs. Hulda Wainscott, who resided near Palestine, Hancock county.

After marriage Napoleon J. Kinnaman and his wife settled on forty acres of land which his father had given him, and to this he added forty more acres, finally settling on the old Kinnaman homestead of 200 acres, and became a practical and successful farmer. In politics he was a Republican. To him and his worthy wife were born these children: Amanda, born Dec. 22, 1852; George C., May 24, 1854; Amos F., Jan. 19, 1856; Sarah E., Sept. 9, 1857; Fred L.; Ira M., July 25, 1861; Peter A., Jan. 21, 1863; and Mary L., Oct. 14, 1864. Mr. Kinnaman died Oct. 8, 1879, aged about fifty years. He was an industrious and respected pioneer citizen and reared an excellent family.

Fred L. Kinnaman received the usual common school education, and was reared to an agricultural life. He was married March 20, 1881, in Fall Creek township, to Anna G. Bennett, born in that township, Feb. 28, 1862, daughter of M. M. Bennett, a farmer of that township. In 1891 Mr. Kinnaman located in Noblesville and engaged in teaming, and then entered the employ of the Noblesville Milling Company. On March 26, 1896, occurred the accident that has made Mr. Kinnaman a life-long cripple. He was caught in the cable rope running from the dummy cars, and both hands were so badly mangled that they had to be amputated. On recovery Mr. Kinnaman engaged in the timber business, at which he did fairly well, and in November, 1902, was elected recorder of Hamilton county, taking the office Jan. 1, 1903, for a term of four years. Mr. Kinnaman proved a highly efficient official, capable and obliging. His misfortune compelled him to employ capable office assistants, but the people of Hamilton county could not have made a better choice for the office than they did. In spite of his misfortune Mr. Kinnaman has prospered and owns some valuable real estate, beside his farm in Fall Creek township. Since his term as recorder expired he has devoted all his attention to the livery business.

Children were born to Fred L. Kinnaman and his wife as follows: Linnie M., born Feb. 4, 1882, in Fall Creek township, died Jan. 22, 1884; Belvia E. died aged seven years; Mabel G., born May 13, 1886, died aged seven years; Flossie V. was born June 5, 1892—all born in Fall Creek township; Joyce N. was born June 3, 1894, in Noblesville. Mrs. Kinnaman died April 2, 1903, aged forty-one year, in the faith of the United Brethren Church. She was an affectionate and loving mother.

GEORGE C. KINNAMAN, brother of Fred L., received a common school education, being engaged in farming until thirty years of age. He then became a mechanic and carpenter, in which work he has spent the last decade. He was in the life insurance business in Anderson and Indianapolis for some time, and also in the mercantile business in Ohio, Ind., where, for three years, he was postmaster. Mr. Kinnaman located in Noblesville in 1903, where he is now engaged in mechanical work.

Mr. George C. Kinnaman was twice married. His first marriage occurred Aug. 16, 1874, in Hamilton county, Ind., where he married Elnora Moon, born Sept. 1, 1852, in Fall Creek township, on the farm adjoining that of the Kinnamans, daughter of Samuel and Sarah (Thompson) Moon. Samuel Moon was of Pennsylvania-German stock, and settled as a pioneer in Fall Creek township in 1833, on eighty acres, which he cleared and made into a good home. His children were: William, Henry, Elizabeth, Rebecca, Barbara, Charles, Catherine, Lucinda, Orpha, John and Elnora. Samuel Moon died on his farm, a respected citizen, while his wife died in 1899, aged ninety-seven years. It was Mrs. Moon's boast that she had employed no physician for forty years prior to her last sickness. Mrs. Kinnaman died at the age of thirty-one years, leaving these children: Linna L. and Leonidas C. Mr. Kinnaman's second wife was Mattie Lane. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., of Anderson, and is a respected and industrious citizen. The brothers, George C. and Fred L., live together.

JAMES A. TAYLOR, a highly respected citizen of Anderson, Ind., and a prominent member of the old pioneer Taylor family, who owns three large farms located two miles west of the city, was born April 14, 1822, in Greenbrier county, Va., on the Greenbrier river, near where the Big Bend tunnel has been constructed. The old log house in which his birth took place still stands. His parents were John and Mary (Magart) Taylor).

Mr. Taylor, in looking back to the days of his boyhood, recalls the meager opportunities that were then offered to the most ambitious children. In order to secure any schooling at all he was obliged to walk four miles, and school then was held but three months of the winter. This was a subscription school and he did not start until he had already been taught to read and write at home. He was reared to hard farm work, and when he was only thirteen years old he was hired out for three dollars a month. Perhaps these conditions had something to do with his leaving Virginia, and coming to Indiana, a distance of 500 miles, the trip necessarily being made on foot. Mr. Taylor's oldest brother, Henry, remained on the homestead, but the next one, Armstrong, was the first to leave for Madison county, Ind. He had been crippled by the fall of a tree when a small boy, and always was obliged to carry his arm in a sling. In 1836 he came on horseback to Indiana, and never returned to the old home in Virginia. In 1838, the next brother, Andrew B., also came on horseback to Madison county, where he remained one year, and then made the trip again, in company with his brother, James A., on foot. Together they reached Pendleton, Sept. 27, 1840. The brothers took only fourteen days to make the journey, sometimes making as much as forty miles a day, and frequently walking four miles an hour. In passing through the Cumberland mountains, on account of dangers from wild animals, they had great difficulty in finding places to sleep. Mr. Taylor remembers one night in particular, when, having been overtaken by darkness, they found a small stone house built in the side of a hill in which lived a venerable old couple. The old people did not like to take strangers, giving their age as an excuse, but when the Taylors insisted that they must have some place to sleep on account of their great fatigue, they were made welcome, and were offered corn bread, bacon and milk. It may be explained that the old couple were also natives of Virginia, and in spite of their reluctance had the old Virginia idea of hospitality. After feeding the travelers the old householder brought forth some old peach brandy and they were then given a comfortable bed. In those days in the inhabited parts of the country, a still house was near almost every good spring in the settlement, and the liquors made here were entirely different from those now dispensed. A whiskey barrel was kept on tap in all the country stores, and in many of the houses, and a tin cup was hung near by, while hospitality made it necessary that each visitor should partake.

The brothers on this journey passed Hawk's Nest, a high mountain overlooking the Big Kanawha river, near the Falls, and from this great height it seemed a long distance to their destination. They crossed the Ohio on a ferry at Huntington, Va., then passed through Columbus, Ohio, Richmond and Cambridge, Ind., and thus reached Pendleton. James A. Taylor was then a tall young man, over six feet in height, although only eighteen years old, and weighed about 165 pounds. In Madison county he soon found farm work in the summer, and spent the winter in splitting rails.

The same fall the father and mother with the younger children followed, they coming down the river from Charleston, W. Va., to Cincinnati, and then by team to Pendleton. Until he was twenty-one years old the father of James A. drew the latter's wages, in the meantime providing his son with a good home and clothing him. As it was the custom of the times James did not object, and always performed the part of the dutiful son.

After his marriage, in 1844, James A. Taylor settled in a log cabin on Andy Shanklin's place in Green township, and lived on rented land for about four years. In 1848 he purchased eighty acres which was then covered with green woods and on which his fine residence now stands. There he cut down the first tree in the virgin forest and cleared a place large enough on which to build a hewed log house. It was a comfortable two-story residence, and remained the family home until the summer of 1861, when he erected a modern two-story residence of nine rooms, which was considered the finest house in the township at that time. It was destroyed by fire in 1883, and later he replaced it with his present commodious two-story frame house. Mr. Taylor kept adding to his land until he had acquired 400 acres in the home farm, which he still owns, together with two other farms. The greater part of his land he has cleared by his own efforts.

In August, 1844, in Green township, Madison county, Mr. James A. Taylor was married to Mary Radford, born in Lincolnshire, England. Her father died in England, and her mother, Ann Robinson Radford, later married William Gee. Mrs. Taylor had one sister who died in infancy. There was no issue to Mrs. Radford's second marriage. In 1834 William Gee and wife and Mary Radford came to America, landing in New York, whence they came to Madison county, Ind.

Mr. Gee brought with him some $2,000 in gold, some of which he invested in land in Green township, Madison county, and some in Hamilton county, where he died. To James A. and Mary (Radford) Taylor were born the following children: William Henry, Martha Ann, Virginia Alice, John Radford, Mary Louisa, Emma Eletha, Jesse Elmer, Ida Edella, Carrie Maud, Lettie Irene, Theresa Jane, and Edgar Allen, of whom Mary Louisa married Larry Ford, a farmer near Pendleton, and has three children; Emma Eletha married James M. Williams, a farmer near Lapel, and has two children; Carrie Maud married Charles Williamson, a son of George Williamson, a farmer, and they reside near Pendleton; Lettie Irene married Jacob Woodward; and Virginia Alice died in young womanhood. On Dec. 24, 1886, Mr. Taylor was married (second) at Anderson, Ind., to Mrs. Margaret E. Doney Harris, born at Anderson, daughter of John and Margaret Doney.

Mr. Taylor cast his first Presidential ballot for Henry Clay, but in 1856 he voted for John C. Fremont, later for Abraham Lincoln, and has been identified with the Republican party ever since. Although he has reached what is considered a venerable age, his memory is still excellent, the incidents herein described were given by him, and have been as closely followed as possible. Like other members of his family, he is a man who is worthy of the high esteem in which he is held in this section of Indiana, where to mention the name is to recall valued pioneers.

THOMAS M. BUSBY, postmaster at Lapel, Ind., and an enterprising citizen, engaged in a flourishing drug business, was born July 1, 1865, on the Busby farm north of Lapel, son of Isaac H. and Sarah A. (Conrad) Busby.

Isaac H. Busby was a son of Thomas and Isabella (Guinn) Busby, the former of whom was a son of the first Isaac Busby, whom, it is said, came from England and settled in Kanawha county, W. Va., at a very early period. The Busby family is an old and respected pioneer one of Madison county, and an extensive mention of it will be found elsewhere.

Isaac H. Busby, father of Thomas M., was born Dec. 30, 1825, in West Virginia, and he accompanied his father, Thomas, to Madison county, Ind., in 1833. He received the usual pioneer education in a log schoolhouse, was reared among pioneer surroundings, and he followed agricultural pursuits all his life. In Hamilton county, Ind., near Lapel, he married Sarah A. Conrad, born Dec. 7, 1832, daughter of Charles and Mary (Huffman) Conrad. After marriage they settled on land four miles north of Lapel, partly clearing the same during their residence there, and then moved to another farm of eighty acres, on which ten acres had been cleared and a log cabin built. Here Isaac H. Busby and wife made their permanent home, cleared up the original tract of land, added another eighty acres, and made a great many substantial improvements. Here all the children were born except the eldest son, who was born on the farm on which they had originally settled. In politics Mr. Busby was identified with the Republican party. During the time of Morgan's raid he served as a soldier. His death occurred April 9, 1878, and he is remembered as a straightforward, honorable man, who was highly respected by all who knew him. Mrs. Busby still survives, and resides in a pleasant home in Lapel, where she has many appreciative friends. Their children were: Mary J., born Feb. 21, 1852; Missouri and Indiana, twins, Dec. 9, 1853 (the latter of whom died March 18, 1854); Sarah J., Dec. 24, 1855; Jonathan, in November, 1858; Wade P., Jan. 27, 1861; William E., Jan. 20, 1864; Thomas M., July 1, 1865; and Ida M., Dec. 29, 1870.

Thomas M. Busby obtained his education in the common schools of Stony Creek township, and remained on his father's farm until he was twenty-six years old. In 1892 he bought out the drug business of E. S. Myrick, of Fishersburg, Madison county, which he conducted for one year, when his property was destroyed by fire. In 1894 he came to Lapel, and ever since has been conducting a drug business at this place. He received his first appointment as postmaster during the first administration of President McKinley, and has proven so efficient and popular an official as to have been re-appointed during succeeding administrations. He has been instrumental in establishing two rural mail routes in this vicinity.

On Dec. 16, 1885, Mr. Busby was married (first) to Maggie Ford, born in Stony Creek township, daughter of William Ford, a pioneer farmer and substantial citizen of that township. Mrs. Busby died Nov. 25, 1890, leaving one daughter, Greta, born Sept. 1, 1890. Mr. Busby was married (second) to Edna Ellen Gaines, born Dec. 28, 1875, in Arlington, Ind., daughter of Theophilus A., and Ellen M. (Bebout) Gaines, and to this union one son has been born, Laurence, in Lapel, June 6, 1898.

In politics Mr. Busby has always been identified with the Republican party. Fraternally he belongs to the I. O. R. M. and K. P., of Lapel, in both of which orders he is very popular. In the Busby family and kindred are included some of the finest pioneer names in Indiana, those who have been identified with the progress and development of various sections of this great State. Their deeds are pleasant to recall and their virtues should be perpetuated.

The Gaines family is of old Colonial ancestry. James Gaines, grandfather of Mrs. Busby, was born at Gaines Mills, Va., where one of the great battles of the Civil war was fought. The family was of some prominence in Virginia, and the name has been given to several towns in various parts of the State. The great-grandfather of Mrs. Busby owned a plantation and sawmill, and many slaves. In his younger days he was a school teacher. James Gaines, the grandfather, married Mary Barr, and their children were: Frank, Philip, John, Jesse, Theophilus A., Samuel G., Greensbury, James Casker, Marv Jane, Ellenora and Emeline. James Gaines was a lumberman and operated a lumber mill in Virginia and later at Columbus, Ohio, to which point he removed after the birth of three of his children. He was a member of the Christian Church. In politics he was a Democrat. He died at the age of forty-two years, near Columbus, survived by his widow until the age of sixty-five years, she dying at Bainbridge, Indiana.

Theophilus A. Gaines was born Dec. 7, 1842, near Columbus, Ohio. The family occupation was lumbering, his father and five of his brothers being in that business, which he also adopted. Two of his brothers, Samuel G. and James C., still carry on the same business. During the Civil war, Theophilus A. Gaines was a member of Company G, 43rd O. V. I., enlisting as a drummer boy, and serving nearly two years. He was taken sick with typhoid fever at Camp Chase, Ohio, but was transferred to Lexington, Ky., before sufficiently recovered, which resulted in a severe stroke of paralysis that made him helpless for seven months, and he was subsequently taken home by his brother, and the war closed before he was able to complete his enlistment. In 1865 he removed to Shelby county, Ind., where he worked in a sawmill until his marriage, when he removed to Morristown, Shelby county, and settled on a farm for several years. The family then moved to Rush county, Ind., and in 1880 to Noblesville, where for fifteen years he was connected with the lumber business of H. M. Calor. His death occurred at his home in Noblesville, Sept. 23, 1892. He was a member of the Christian Church, and in politics was a Democrat.

On June 25, 1866, Mr. Gaines was married at Shelbyville, to Ellen M. Bebout, and they had the following children: Alma Catherine, born Oct. 1, 1868, died at Noblesville, Sept. 25, 1881; Amanda Elizabeth, born Oct. 1, 1870, in Morristown; Theophilus W., Aug. 3, 1873, in Arlington; Edna Ellen, Dec. 28, 1875, in Arlington; and Mary L., Jan. 5, 1880.

Mrs. Ellen M. (Bebout) Gaines has lived to see all of her surviving children happily married and settled in life. She was born in Rush county, Ind., Sept. 7, 1850, daughter of Daniel P. and Cynthia Ann (Jefferson) Bebout. The Jefferson family is of Welsh and Scotch stock, and the Bebout of Scotch-Irish. Daniel P. Bebout was probably born in Virginia about 1779, son of Daniel, who was also born in Virginia, where he died, but his widow died in Rush county, Ind., at the home of her son, Daniel. Daniel P. Bebout was of a very hardy and venturesome disposition, and in early days spent much time on the border, working on western rivers as a boatman, and at the cordelle, by which the boatman hauled their boats laden with produce for trading with the Indians, these boats traveling for hundreds of miles up and down the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. On one of these trips he was bitten by a rattlesnake on the leg, and was saved from death by an old Indian, who bound what he called rattlesnake weed on the wound. By the following morning the swelling of his leg was greatly reduced, and he never felt much effects of the accident until old age, when this leg was greatly affected by rheumatism. After this he carried mail across the Western plains and the Rocky Mountains for five years for the U. S. Government, making many journeys on foot. He was well and favorably known to the Indians, who treated him in a friendly way, admiring his bravery and endurance, and on many occasions he found food and shelter in their wigwams. Later he settled in Rush county, Ind., where he followed the trade of carpenter, and here he married Cynthia Ann (Jefferson) Hyfield, daughter of Thomas and Sallie Jefferson. Thomas Jefferson was a pioneer who settled near Lexington, Ky., in the early days of Indian warfare. He was a first cousin of Pres. Thomas Jefferson, and was in the fourth generation from Thomas, the ancestor, who had come from Snowdon, Wales, in the early settlement of Virginia. Thomas Jefferson, of Kentucky, was killed by the Indians during one of their outbreaks. His children were: John, Cynthia Ann, George and one son, who was captured by the Indians and never heard from afterwards.

Daniel P. Bebout, the father of Mrs. Gaines, settled on land near Rushville, acquiring 260 acres, which he partly cleared, but later removed to Morristown, Shelby county, where he died aged eighty-four years. He was a member of the Baptist Church; in politics he was a Democrat. The children of Daniel P. Bebout were: Benjamin, who resided five miles east of Elwood in Madison county, and died in 1907; Cynthia Ann, wife of Jacob Bickner, of Anderson; Phoebe Jane, wife of Jerry Eaton; and Ellen Minerva. By her previous marriage to Benjamin Hyfield, Mrs. Bebout had four children: Priscilla, Domminee, Elizabeth and Mary F.

ANTHONY JOHNSON, formerly a prominent farmer on Section 31, Franklin township, Johnson county, now a resident of Franklin, was born March 26, 1851, son of Thomas and Nancy (Jenkins) Johnson, natives of Kentucky.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. Johnson was a native of Virginia, who located in Kentucky at an early date, and engaged in farming. His wife, Susan Johnson, died at the remarkable age of one hundred and two years. The children born to these estimable people were numerous, and their descendants are among some of the most substantial people of Kentucky, Indiana and adjoining States.

Anthony Jenkins, the maternal grandfather of Mr. Johnson, was also a native of Virginia, and an early settler in Kentucky, where he was a distiller and farmer, residing in Mercer county until his death, which occurred at an advanced age. His family was also a large one.

Thomas Johnson always following farming, and he died on the old homestead in Mercer county, when about sixty-three years of age. His wife still survives, and is now seventy-seven years old. They both belong to the Christian Church, in which he was an elder. Seven children were born to them: Sarah Jane, deceased wife of James Adkins; James A., of Kansas, who married Cis Farmer, of Illinois; Anthony; John T., of Franklin, who married Lou Million, of Kentucky; Nancy Belle, wife of E. R. Norton, who resides near Mayo, Ky.; Susan Jane, wife of William Roach, of the same locality; and William J. D., who married Miss Alice Johnson, of Mercer county, Kentucky.

Anthony Johnson was reared upon his father's farm in Mercer county, Ky., attending the district schools, and he remained at home until he was twenty-four years old. At that time, he rented a farm, operated it for some years, and then purchased sixty acres of land in Mercer county, which he partly improved and to which he added eighty acres, residing there until 1890, when he sold his property and removed to Johnson county, Ind. He rented until 1896, when he purchased a farm of 180 acres of finely improved land on Section 31, Franklin township. In 1900, he purchased 100 acres in Nineveh township. This property is all very desirable and he kept it in an excellent state of cultivation, thoroughly understanding his calling, and employing modern methods and machinery. He has since sold his Franklin township farm, and moved into Franklin.

On Oct. 29, 1874, Mr. Johnson was married to Miss Jennie Woods, daughter of Andrew A. and Lavina (Smithy) Woods. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Johnson: William J. is a farmer; Nannie Lou married Judson Forsythe, now resides in Indianapolis, and has one child, Grace Marie; Andrew C. resides at home, engaged in farming. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson are members of the Christian Church, in which they take an active part. Fraternally he is a member of Franklin Lodge, F. & A. M. His political affiliations are with the Democratic party, and while residing in Mercer county, Ky., he served as a magistrate for about twelve years.

Mrs. Johnson's parents were natives of Kentucky, and to them were born four daughters, and two of them are now living: Mary Thomas, wife of John Wheeler, of Mercer county, Ky.; and Mrs. Johnson. Mr. Woods, born Aug. 24, 1832, is a farmer and blacksmith, and a most estimable man. Mrs. Lavina (Smithy) Woods, mother of Mrs. Johnson, was born July 8, 1837, and died Nov. 29, 1869.

She married Mr. Woods Sept. 21, 1854. In her religious belief, she was a stanch Presbyterian. For his second wife, Mr. Woods married Oct. 18, 1871, Mrs. Paralee Bowen, born Aug. 11, 1841. Mr. Woods is a member of the Presbyterian Church, while his wife is a member of the Christian Church.

The paternal grandfather of Mrs. Johnson, was Archibald Woods, a farmer and blacksmith of Kentucky, where he died when nearly eighty years of age. His family was a large one, and he lived to see his children and their children after them, grow to honorable and useful manhood and womanhood. The maternal grandfather of Mrs. Johnson was Thomas Smithy, a farmer of Kentucky, who died in his native State when eighty-six years of age. He, too, had a large family, and he was a substantial man who stood well with his fellow-citizens.

Mr. and Mrs. Johnson are highly esteemed in their neighborhood, and are recognized as most excellent people. Mr. Johnson is a successful farmer, a good neighbor and a worthy citizen. The success which has attended his efforts is well deserved, and in his undertakings he has been most ably seconded by his wife, a lady of excellent qualities, noted for her housewifery and her devotion to her home and family.

WILLIAM W. CLIFFORD, a prominent citizen of Anderson, Ind., and a veteran of the Civil war, was born March 25, 1842, in Fayette Co., Ind., son of Joseph and Jane C. (Allison) Clifford.

William Clifford, grandfather of William W., was a farmer of the Green mountains, Vermont, and of old Colonial English stock. He moved with his family to Indiana in 1820, coming down the Ohio river and settling in Fayette county in the woods, where he cleared up a good farm. He was the father of thirteen children: Luther; William; John; Mary; Ephraim; Sarah; Isaac; Esther; Benjamin; Joseph, the father of our subject; Amy, who died young; and two whose names are not known, who died young. Several of the sons of this family entered and bought land for themselves, and altogether the family owned large tracts in Fayette and Rush counties. William Clifford died on his farm, aged about sixty years, while his widow lived to be eighty-two years old. He was a substantial pioneer citizen, very industrious and a man of quiet disposition. He was a Universalist in religious belief. In politics he was an old-line Whig.

Joseph Clifford was born in the Green Mountains in Vermont, in 1815, and when he was a small boy the family trading was done in Boston, the journey of 100 miles to that city, being made by wagons. He came with the family to Indiana, when a lad of eight years, and was brought up on the farm, receiving a pioneer common school education. About 1839 he married in Rushville, Ind., Jane C. Allison, born in Preble county, Ohio, daughter of William and Sarah (Crane) Allison. The Allison family were of English stock, but the wife of William Allison, whose mother was a Carnahan, was of Scotch-Irish stock. William Allison was a hotel keeper in Ohio, and moved to Indiana in early times, settling in Rushville. By trade he was a cabinet maker, and located in Cicero, Hamilton county, where he operated a hotel and cabinet shop. In 1855 he moved to Knightstown, Ind., where he died during the Civil war, an aged man. His children were Jane C., John, Robert, Charles, Catherine, Alice, Duncan, Leonidas L. and James R. (twins), Mary, Clara, and two who died young. The family were Presbyterians in religion. Of this family who took part in the Civil war were Captain Robert, of the 57th Ind. Infantry; and Leonidas, a fifer in an Indiana infantry regiment.

Joseph Clifford, in his younger days, followed the buying of produce and shipping it on a canal boat, in company with his brother John. He was also a clerk in a mercantile house on Second street, Cincinnati, and moved there with his family. In 1848 the cholera became so dangerous that he removed to Edinburg, Ind., with his family, where they resided while he made a trip to Louisiana with poultry. He also kept a hotel in Rushville in 1839-1840 and 1841, and afterward removed to Kokomo, Ind., where he worked at the carpenter's trade. He located in Anderson in February, 1859, where he also followed carpenter work. In 1863, he bought eighty acres of land in LaFayette township, Madison county, on which his sons engaged in farming, and here he died in October, 1867, aged about fifty years. He was a Universalist in religion, and a hard working, industrious man. His wife died in her eighty-first year in the faith of the Presbyterian Church. Joseph Clifford and his worthy wife were the parents of the following children: Augusta, who died aged fifteen years; Luther, who served in Wilder's Brigade, 17th Ind. V. I., and died from the effects of army life in 1869; William W.; Eliza, who died young; Duncan; Clara, who died young; Charles, who died at the age of thirty-four years; and Luella, still living.

William W. Clifford received his education, which was somewhat limited, in the common schools of his native place. He went with his parents to Cicero where they resided one year, then moving to Tipton, when he was eight, lived there nine years, then locating in Madison county. This was in 1859 and in 1862 he enlisted in Anderson, Ind., as a private of Company K, 16th Ind. V. I., to serve three years or during the war. He served his time and was honorably discharged at Indianapolis, Ind., July 20, 1865. Among the battles in which Mr. Clifford participated were: First at Richmond, Ky.; then Chickasaw Bayou; Arkansas Post; Magnolia Hill; Port Gibson; Raymond, Miss.; Champion Hills; Big Black River; Richmond, Ky.; the battles before Vicksburg; Jackson, Miss.; Sabine Cross Roads; Wilson's Landing; Yellow Bayou; Atchafalaya River; Alexandria; Pleasant Hill; New Iberia, and smaller battles and skirmishes too numerous to mention. Mr. Clifford took part in all of the movements and engagements of his regiment, except the battle at Bayou Pigeon, at which he was not present on account of sickness, having lung trouble. He was wounded at Richmond, Ky., Sept. 30, 1862, being shot through the right arm, and was in the hospital twelve days. He was also sick with lung fever at Camp Carrington, Indianapolis, and was sent home to recover, reporting for duty two months later.

After the war Mr. Clifford returned to Indiana and engaged in farming near Anderson. On Sept. 24, 1868, in Anderson, he married Amelia Jane Davis, born Aug. 19, 1848, in Fayette county, daughter of Marion and Nancy (Denman) Davis. Marion Davis was born in Fayette county, Ind., son of George Davis. George Davis was born on the line between North and South Carolina, and locating in Fayette county, entered land near Connersville in the early times. He bought about 400 acres here, also owning land in Madison, Marion and Delaware counties, and was considered one of the substantial, reliable farmers of his time. He gave his children eighty acres of land each. He died at the home of his son, Marion, in Madison county, at the age of eighty-five years.

Marion Davis was married in Fayetteville, to Nancy Denman, and they settled in Fayette county, removing to Madison county in about 1842. Here he cleared up his eighty-acre farm, and bought sixty-four acres in Delaware county. Mr. and Mrs. Davis were the parents of the following children: Meredith, Matilda, Madison, Axeline, Melvina, Amelia J., Nancy and Corwin. Marion Davis died on his farm aged about sixty years, his wife having passed away in her fifty-sixth year, in the faith of the United Brethren Church. Mr. Davis had served one year as a soldier in the 47th Ind. V. I., and participated in the battle of Island No. 10. He was disabled by sickness and was discharged. He had two sons in the Civil war: Meredith, a sutler; and Madison, who was a private of the 5th Indiana Cavalry, who died of small pox in 1863, at Lexington.

Mathias Snelson, brother-in-law of Mr. Clifford, was also in the Civil war, being a member of Company G, 47th Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

In 1875 Mr. Clifford located in Anderson, where he drove a delivery and express wagon, until 1884, when he retired from that line. He is now interested in the Anderson Steam Dye Works, located at No. 7 West Eighth street, Anderson, in partnership with Mr. Musser. He is a reliable citizen of Anderson. In politics he is a stanch Republican. He is past commander of Major May Post, G. A. R., of Anderson. Mrs. Clifford died April 18, 1902, in the faith of the Christian Church. She and her husband were the parents of the following children: Olin L., who died at the age of two years; Mary E., who died aged fifteen years; Nettie, who died at the age of six; and Ada, Clara, Alice, William and Lettie B., all living.

THOMAS HIDAY, a highly respected citizen and substantial farmer of Green township, Madison Co., Ind., a member of a pioneer family, was born on his present farm, the old Hiday homestead, Nov. 29, 1828, son of Henry and Mary (Wynn) Hiday.

DR. JACOB HIDAY, grandfather of Thomas, was born in Germany and after emigrating to America, served through the War of 1812. From Ohio he went to Kentucky and blazed a trail through to Madison county, Ind., to a point three-quarters of a mile west of the present Hiday farm and afterward settled on the present location, made a clearing and built a log house. He had studied medicine in Germany, where it requires eight years to become a physician, and he practiced medicine the remainder of his life through Madison and surrounding counties. Dr. Hiday was the first physician in this section of the country, no other medical man settling here for years. He was a man honored and trusted, was a justice of the peace, and he took the part of leader in all public matters. In politics he was an old-line Whig. He died aged about eighty years, and was survived but a few years by his widow, whose maiden name was Sarah Fruit. Their children were: Henry, Mary, Catherine and Susan.

Henry Hiday, son of Jacob and father of Thomas, was born in 1797, in Bourbon county, Ky., and while very young he enlisted as a light horseman in the War of 1812, and was subject to orders, but was not called out. He came to Green township in 1818, when this locality was but a wilderness, no trace of the great city of Indianapolis having yet taken form. He built the first hewed log house in Green township, located between Fall and Lick creeks. He cleared up the land mainly through his own efforts, as his father was occupied with his professional duties. In politics he was an old-line Whig, and afterward one of the early Republicans. His life was confined to agricultural pursuits, and he died at the age of seventy-six years, his wife, Mary Wynn, passing away aged sixty years. Their children were: Nancy, Jacob, John, Thomas, Joseph, Archibald, Margaret, Betsy J., Mary and Sallie Ann. Of these children, all five of the sons were soldiers in the Civil war, in the three years service, and all lived to return home, although two were wounded.

Jacob served in Company G, 12th Ind. V. I., for three years, and was shot through the muscles of his arm, at the battle of Missionary Ridge. He took part in twenty-two engagements. He died in 1885.

John Hiday was also a member of Company G, 12th Ind. V. I., serving three years, but was disabled by sickness and was in the hospital for some time, but took part in numerous battles. He also died in 1885.

Joseph Hiday was a member of the 22nd Iowa V. I., for three years and participated in seventeen battles. This brave soldier died at his home in 1874.

Archibald Hiday was a member of the 11th Ind. V. I., and took part in many battles before he was seriously wounded in the hip, at the battle of Jackson, Miss. The ball was extracted at the knee and he still survives, a member of that noble band of patriots, who were the hope and help of the Nation in its day of need.

Thomas Hiday was reared in the pioneer days in Indiana, and his education was the best that could be secured in the indifferent schools of the locality, which he attended for so short a time that it did not materially benefit his acquaintance with books. The hardest kind of farm work fell to his lot, while the deprivations to which he was subjected read almost like tales of some foreign land. Like many another pioneer boy he went barefoot, and he never possessed a pair of shoes until he was fifteen years old. In those days, the traveling cobbler visited the various farms at long intervals, and made up the allotted number of shoes during his stay. There was an abundance of game in the woods during Mr. Hiday's boyhood, and he shot a great many turkeys, but killed only two deer. His father, however, was a great hunter, and killed eighteen deer in one week in the winter season, by using the following method: He employed a man to follow the deer on horseback, a bell being attached to the horse. The deer would move slowly along, keeping a short distance in advance, and Mr. Hiday would circle around and shoot them as they came up.

Thomas Hiday was married Oct. 17, 1850, in Green township, to Sarah J. Doty, born Nov. 22, 1828, in Green township, daughter of John and Jane P. Doty. John Doty was an American and a pioneer in Green township. He built one of the first mills on Lick creek, three quarters of a mile from where Mr. Hiday now lives, and also cleared up a good farm of eighty acres, where he lived and died aged about sixty years. To John and Jane Doty were born the following children: Sarah J., Cyrus, Barbara, Charles, Harriet, Margaret, Thomas and John, of whom John and Thomas served in Indiana regiments in the Civil war, the former in the three months' service, and the latter in the three years.'

After his marriage, Thomas Hiday settled on a farm, where his two children, Charles and Angelina were born. It required a great deal of patriotism to leave this dear domestic circle and offer his services in behalf of his country, but this our subject did, enlisting at Fortville, Ind., Aug. 16, 1862, as a private of Company B, 12th Ind. V. I., to serve for three years or during the war. This compact he faithfully filled, and was honorably discharged June 8, 1865, at Washington, D. C. He took part in twenty-two separate engagements, the most important ones being: Vicksburg, Jackson, Missionary Ridge, Dalton, Resaca, Kennesaw Mountain and the battle of Atlanta. He also was in the battle of Jonesboro, which concluded the great Atlanta campaign, in which the Union troops had been under fire, night and day, for four months. Mr. Hiday also participated in that great march to the sea the story of which will always ring out in the hearts of his fellow countrymen as long as loyalty lives, as one of the supremest efforts of strategy and military ability. His last battle was Bentonville, and then commenced the march back to Washington, and the Grand Review there. The 12th Indiana led the celebrated march which was reviewed by General Grant, and other great leaders in the war. Although Mr. Hiday escaped being wounded in battle, he was thrown down by the concussion of an exploding shell at the battle of Missionary Ridge, and this has produced deafness. His hospital experience was of but one and a half days' duration, and he was a prisoner for the same length of time, when his regiment was captured by Gen. Kirby Smith, at the battle of Richmond, Ky., but was paroled. No soldier of the Civil war ever performed his duties more faithfully than did Thomas Hiday of the 12th Indiana. Like many others of the Union soldiers, he enlisted from pure motives, loyalty to his country leading every other consideration. After his services he returned home and bought out the interests of the other heirs in the Hiday homestead. By industry and economy he improved the farm, erecting a substantial two-story brick house and excellent farm buildings. The homestead consists of 162 acres, and is pleasantly located between Lick and Fall creeks. The old hewed log house built by his father, is still standing, kept as an interesting relic of pioneer days.

Mr. Hiday is township superintendent, a worthy selection. In politics, originally he was a Jacksonian Democrat, but early in the days of the Republican party, he became a convert and voted for Abraham Lincoln both terms. He is a member of Sol. D. Kempton Post, G. A. R., at Fortville, Indiana.

Mrs. Hiday died Aug. 29, 1902. She was a woman of more than ordinary strength of character, a devoted wife and mother, who lived to see the children she cared for so well during the father's absence in those days of war and bloodshed have happy homes and children of their own. The son, Charles, married Martha J. Hunter, born in Madison county, daughter of John and Eliza (Werthel) Hunter. John Hunter was son of James Hunter, who had three sons in the Civil war: John, Washington and Melville, all in Indiana regiments. Washington belonged to the 11th, and John and Melville to the 12th regiments. John served three years and was in many battles, subsequently became a farmer in Green township and died aged sixty-six years. His children were: Albert, Martha J., Melville, Cora and Claude. Although he returned from the war alive, John Hunter never really recovered from the hardships endured during that time. Charles Hiday and wife have one daughter, Lora, who married Jesse Bell, a farmer on the home farm. The daughter, Angelina Hiday, married John F. Cottrill, a farmer of Green township, and they have six children: Thomas, Charles, Fannie, Myrtle Pearl, Earl and William.

The Hidayes are one of the pioneer families of the State of Indiana, and since the formation of this county, have maintained a rugged independence as substantial farmers.

JOSEPH M. ROGERS, one of the highly respected citizens of Pendleton, Ind., was born in Madison county, three miles north of Pendleton, April 23, 1839, son of Charles and Sarah D. (Umstead) Rogers, of Welsh and Colonial Pennsylvania Quaker stock.

Jonathan Rogers, the first of the family of whom there is record, was a farmer in Chester county, Pa., born there Aug. 20, 17—, son of Jonathan.

Joseph Rogers, son of Jonathan, was born in Chester county, Pa., and in 1834 he moved with his family to Madison county, Ind., and settled three miles east of Pendleton, where he bought a timber claim on which a log house had been built, and a small clearing made. He improved it, built a double log house, and prospered, and in time became the owner of 320 acres of good land. On Dec. 24, 1788, he married in Chester county, Pa., Elizabeth Reece, of Welsh stock. Their children were: Sarah, Hannah, Mary Ann, Joseph Reece, Charles, Elizabeth and Margaret, all born in Pennsylv-vania. Joseph Rogers and his family belonged to the Fall Creek Meeting of Friends.

Charles Rogers, son of Joseph and father of Joseph M., was born in Chester county, Pa., Jan. 11, 1816. He accompanied his parents to Indiana, but returned to Chester county where Dec. 29, 1836, he married Sarah D. Umstead, born in Chester county Aug. 19, 1815, daughter of John Umstead (born Jan. 14, 1773) and Susannah (Morgan) Umstead (born Nov. 14, 1776), farming people of that locality. After his marriage Charles Rogers and his wife came in wagons to Madison county, Ind., and settled in Spring Valley where his father gave him eighty acres of land in the woods, partly cleared. This he improved, and in time built a good frame house. He lived on this farm until his death Jan. 4, 1882, when he was aged sixty-six years. His wife, Sarah D. died Jan. 8, 1848, and he married (second) Nov. 22, 1849, Rebecca B. Fussel, born of an old family. To the first marriage were born: Susan N., born March 22, 1838; Joseph M., April 23, 1839; Ann Elizabeth, Dec. 15, 1840; Elmina F., Jan. 13, 1843; and John U., March 20, 1845. Of the children of the second marriage, all died small, except Sarah D., born Nov. 19, 1851, who is still living. Charles Rogers was a prominent member of the Friends Church, and was a constant attendant and held the office of overseer. He was a man of quiet disposition, and was much respected.

Joseph M. Rogers, son of Charles, received his education in the district schools, attending in the winters three months, while in the summers he worked on the farm. The old log school had puncheon floors, and the window was only a log cut out, the hole filled with glass. He continued at school until he was twenty years of age, and remained at home until he was twenty-one, when he began to learn the carpenter's trade, and at the age of twenty-three he left the work bench to become, Aug. 6, 1862, a private in Company B, 89th Ind. V. I., enlisting to serve three years or during the war, and he served until mustered out at Indianapolis, Ind., July 19, 1865, and honorably discharged Aug. 8, 1865. He served in Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, Alabama and Florida. He participated in the following battles and skirmishes: Munfordville, Ky. (where he was captured with his entire regiment by Gen. Bragg, and paroled ten days later), Memphis, Tupelo, Miss., Meridian, Miss., Red River, Fort De-Russel, Pleasant Hill, Yellow Bayou, Moore's Plantation, Marksville Prairie; and he was in the skirmish with Price in Missouri, later taking part in the battles of Nashville, Tenn., Fort Blakely, Fort Spanish, La., the latter stronghold being captured the day that Lee surrendered. Mr. Rogers spent one month in the hospital at Memphis, and later, at the same time as Conrad Zeublin, he suffered with bone erysipelas. His right hand was greatly injured permanently, and he was laid up in his quarters at Memphis for three months, suffering terribly, and barely escaping the loss of his hand. He was promoted to be corporal, and in February, 1863, became duty sergeant.

After the close of the war Mr. Rogers returned to Indiana, married and settled on his father's farm, where he remained nine years, and in 1875 moved to Pendleton. He then began work at his trade and as a millwright, at which he worked eight years, building several mills. He has built many of the best residences in Pendleton and vicinity, especially on the pike east of Pendleton.

Mr. Rogers is a member of Madison Lodge, K. P., of which he has been chancellor commander; of the Masons; and of Major Henry Post, G. A. R., in which he has been commander. In politics he is a Republican, and has been a member of the Pendleton town council; has been assessor for six years in Fall Creek township.

On Nov. 9, 1865, Mr. Rogers was married to Rebecca Schooley, who was born Oct. 9, 1844, daughter of James L. and Mary A. (Davis) Schooley. Their two children are: George and Roger. Mr. and Mrs. Rogers are members of the Fall Creek Meeting of Friends, in Spring Valley. Mrs. Rogers was one of the founders and first president of the Reading Conference of Pendleton. She also belongs to the Rathbone Sisters.

The Schooleys were of Welsh stock. Samuel Schooley, the great-grandfather of Mrs. Rogers, was a farmer in Grayson county, Va., and was a member of the Society of Friends. His family was among the earliest in Virginia. Mrs. Rogers has a letter written by Samuel to his son Benjamin in Indiana. This letter shows him to have been a man of education, and is penned in a plain clear hand. His wife was Elizabeth, and their children were: Benjamin, Nathan and Margaret (who married a Mr. Horrell).

Benjamin Schooley, son of Samuel, was born in Grayson county, Va., and there Nov. 29, 1809, at Mt. Pleasant Meeting, he married Rebecca Johnson, daughter of Thomas and Ann Johnson. A few years after they moved to Wayne county, Ind., and then came to Henry county, settling near Spiceland, belonging to that meeting. He cleared a farm, and lived there until his death. His first wife died, and he married (second) Feb. 2, 1834, Sarah Davis, formerly of Carteret county, N. C. By the first marriage were born children as follows: William, Aug. 20, 1810; Eliza, March 7, 1813; Rachel, Jan. 23, 1816 (died Aug. 13, 1816); Wilson, June 20, 1817; Samuel, Sept. 16, 1820; James L., June 14, 1822; Milton, Sept. 5, 1827. No children were born to the second union. Both Benjamin and his wife were members of the Salem Friends. Their home was a station on the Underground Railway. Benjamin Schooley was a staunch Abolitionist, and an old negro "auntie" cook, Aunt Jemima, still lives among the Friends, and she named Mrs. Rogers.

James L. Schooley, son of Benjamin and father of Mrs. Rogers, was born in Wayne county, Ind., June 14, 1822. Three miles east of Kingstown, he married Mary A. Davis, born in Waynesville, Ohio, Nov. 19, 1824, daughter of Thomas and Rachel (Stanbrough) Davis. After their marriage the young couple settled on his father's farm near Spiceland, where he carried on carpentering, shoemaking and the making of coffins. Two years later he moved to Ogden, Ind., and lived there until March, 1855, when he settled east of Pendleton, and made his home. After some time he moved to Vermilion county, Ill., and near Hoopeston bought property, there living until his death. He was a birthright member of the Orthodox Friends. His first wife died aged forty-one, and he married second, Sarah Johnson. His children by his first wife were: Rebecca, Martha Ellen, Thomas, Adaline, Eliza, Ann, Sarah, Wilson, Amanda, Ann (2) and Elizabeth. To the second marriage were born Benjamin and Charles.

Thomas Davis, father of Mrs. Mary A. (Davis) Schooley, was born in Clearfield county, Pa., Aug. 4, 1798. He settled first in Ohio, but finally moved to Indiana, locating in Henry county, where he cleared up a farm. About 1853 he moved to Madison county, and about two miles east of Pendleton bought land partly improved and with a good house. Here he made a good farm of eighty-two acres, now owned by his grandson Washington Davis. Thomas Davis died suddenly on his farm. He married Rachel Stanbrough, born April 13, 1802.

SAUL MERRYWEATHER, one of the highly esteemed residents of Anderson, Ind., who resides at No. 2115 South Main street, was born March 31, 1838, in Retford, Nottinghamshire, England, son of John and Christiana (Saul) Merryweather.

John Merryweather was born June 21, 1816, in East Retford, Nottingham, England, and was reared in that place, receiving a limited common school education. He served a seven years apprenticeship as a paper-hanger, learning the trade in good old thorough English way, becoming a skilled hanger, grainer and marbler. He was married March 28, 1837, by Thomas Beckwith, in the East Retford Corporation Church, to Christiana Saul, born in West Perry, Lincolnshire, England, June 6, 1815. On her mother's side she was related to the Waterhouses, farmers of Ouston, Lincolnshire, England, and William Waterhouse of that parish, her uncle, in 1838 left her $500 in his will, the interest on which was sent from England to her home in America until her death, Oct. 6, 1864, in Orange county, Fla. Later the original bequest with added interest, the whole amounting to about $897, was collected by Saul Merryweather, as administrator of her estate, through the American Consul, John C. New. In 1840 John Merryweather came with his family to America, sailing from London, England, in March, and the morning before embarking took his wife and son, Saul, to visit the famous Tower of London. The voyage was made in a sailing vessel, and they were six weeks on the passage to New York, the weather being so stormy that for one week the chief officer lost his reckoning and knew not where they were. John Merryweather left his wife and child with a cousin, Jonathan Saul, in New York, and went to Piqua, O., where he had a brother, Ben, living on a farm ten miles from the village. Mr. Merryweather soon obtained work at his trade in Piqua and sent money to his wife who came on to Piqua, where they resided about nine years, purchasing a lot and a frame house. This they afterward traded for a farm in Putnam county, Ind., ten miles west of Greencastle. Mr. Merryweather purchased eighty acres of land, ten of which he cultivated, built a round-log cabin with stone chimney, and here the family lived for about three years, finally trading the farm for 217 acres most of which was cleared. Here he built a new hewed log house, a fifty-foot square barn and a number of sheds, and lived on this farm for seven years, selling out finally for $5,000 cash. Mr. Merryweather and his family then located in Greencastle, building a house opposite the old Asbury University, but about 1869 he went to a farm southwest of Greencastle two and one-half miles, consisting of 180 acres. After several years he removed to Gosport, Ind., and bought property, but sometime later located at Hammond, dying in that vicinity in 1892.

The children born to John and Christiana Merryweather were as follows: Saul, born March 31, 1838; Harriet, born Feb. 9, 1839, died Sept. 9, 1839, in East Retford, England; Harriet C., born Oct. 17, 1840, in Piqua, O., was the wife of Isaac Anderson, of Terre Haute, Ind., and died aged about thirty-two years; William Henry, born in Piqua, O., July 6, 1843, died Jan. 6, 1846; Samuel born July 6, 1845, died Feb. 6, 1846; Elizabeth Hannah, born May 10, 1846, died Aug. 1, 1849; Mary Catherine, born March 27, 1848, died April 14, 1848; Elsie Jane, born in Putnam county, Ind., July 23, 1849, died the same date; Elizabeth Hannah, born Aug. 8, 1850, died March 4, 1852; John, born Nov. 9, 1852, at Greencastle, died at Terre Haute, Ind., leaving a family; George Washington, born Dec. 19, 1854; Alice Jane, born in September, 1856, died on the 27th of that month; and Clara Ann, born in 1857, died Dec. 7, 1887, in Putnam county, Ind. Of the surviving sons, Saul lives in Anderson, and his brother in Orange county, Florida. In England John Merryweather and his wife were members of the Church of England; on locating in this country, however, they became Methodists. He was one of the early justices of the peace at Gosport, Indiana.

The name Saul was given to Mr. Merryweather by his parents, but at the time of his enlistment by some mistake he was enrolled as Samuel Merryweather, by which name he is known among Grand Army men, although his old acquaintances know him by his right name. He has made efforts to have the records corrected, but in this he has been unsuccessful. Mr. Merryweather was about twelve years of age when he came with his parents to Putnam county, Ind. He had attended school in Piqua, O., and there learned to read and write, but as there were no schools in his section of Indiana at that time, he could not continue his education. After the removal of the family to Greencastle, however, he attended school for about nine months, assisting in the farm work, and when a young man started to learn the paper hanging trade with his father, becoming very efficient at this kind of work. He has often hung as many as fifty rolls of paper in one day, an accomplishment that is seldom equalled. In Terre Haute, Feb. 13, 1865, Mr. Merryweather enlisted as a private in Capt. Estes H. Layhman's Company C, 149th Ind. V. I., to serve one year or during the war, and served several months, being honorably discharged at Nashville, Tenn., Sept. 27, 1865. His services were in Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia and Alabama, his company being stationed at Decatur, Ala., on guard duty for about several months, and here Mr. Merryweather contracted neuralgia and rheumatism, caused by his exposure to the elements, from which he has never fully recovered. He had an honorable war record, and was ever a faithful soldier. After the war he returned to Greencastle, where he worked at his trade for many years, later engaging in the restaurant business with his son, John, and for three years also engaged in the bottling of soft drinks. In 1891 he sold out and came to Anderson, and since that time has been engaged in the plumbing business.

On June 24, 1858, in his twenty-first year, in Greencastle, Ind., Mr. Merryweather was married to Elizabeth Thornburgh, born in Greencastle, July 3, 1840, daughter of Capt. William H. and Elizabeth (Gardner) Thornburgh, and to them were born the following children: John, James M., Nelly M., Eva, Fred, Charles, Henrietta, Lula, Bessie, Frankie and Eva (2). The following is a copy from Mr. Merryweather's Bible: "Births: John, Sept. 28, 1859; James M., Feb. 1, 1861; Nelly M., July 6, 1864; Eva, Nov. 19, 1869; Fred, Nov. 3, 1878; Charles, Oct. 18, 1871; Henrietta, Oct. 28, 1873; Lula, Feb. 17, 1875; Bessie, March 17, 1882; Frankie, Nov. 4, 1884; and Eva, Jan. 4, 1888. Deaths: Eva, Feb. 8, 1872; Henrietta, May 25, 1891; Frankie, Sept. 14, 1891; Charles, Sept. 29, 1902 (meeting his death by a fall from the Union Block, Anderson, four stories, and dying a few hours afterward). Marriages: Nelly, married Jan. 10, 1883, James Farlow, an engineer in Anderson, and they have three children—John, Edmond and Walter; James married, Nov. 16, 1884, Amanda Mark, of Greencastle, Ind., has been fire chief of Greencastle for fifteen years and has four children, Velma, Harry, Ethel and Marie; John married, Nov. 25, 1885, Mary Powell, of Danville, Ind., and has one son, Oscar; Lula married, Feb. 18, 1896, Daniel E. Cripe, and they have two children, Edith and Earl; and Charles married May 16, 1900, Lillian Coll, and has one child, Paul."

Mr. and Mrs. Merryweather are members of the Spiritualist Church, and he has been a close student of spiritualistic phenomena and the occult for the past twelve years, attaining a state of high perfection. He is a member of Major May Post, G. A. R., and was a charter member of the post at Greencastle. He is a staunch Republican and voted for Abraham Lincoln both terms and every Republican Presidential candidate to the present time.

Capt. William H. Thornburgh was born in Kentucky, son of Richard and Mary Thornburgh. The Thornburghs are of Scotch-Irish stock, and descendants of old Colonial Virginia settlers. Capt. William H. Thornburgh was reared to the life of a farmer but for many years was a steamboat captain on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. He made his home for a long time in Louisville, Ky., and his brothers, John Monroe and William, who were also steamboat captains and pilots, were also residents of that city. Captain Thornburgh was married near Greencastle, before his twentieth year, to Elizabeth Gardner, born in Maryland, daughter of Thomas and Mary Gardner, and to them were born the following children: Mary, Lydia, Henrietta, Letitia, Elizabeth and James. Captain Thornburgh was president of a bank at Terre Haute, Ind., but later in life removed to Greencastle, where he died aged seventy-three years. He was a member of the Methodist Church, in which he was class leader, and, having a fine voice, sang in the church choir. He was an active business man in his day, and had the reputation of being a substantial, reliable citizen. His one son, James, served as a private in Company H, 43d Ind. V. I., enlisting at the age of seventeen years, and serving throughout the war, a term of four years. He is now physically disabled from the effects of army life.

JEREMIAH LAUGHLIN, a highly esteemed citizen and retired school teacher of Elwood, Ind., who was a sergeant of the Union army during the great Civil war, was born Sept. 25, 1845, in County Kerry, Ireland, son of John and Mary (Buckley) Laughlin, the latter the sister of Col. Henry Buckley of the 5th Kentucky Infantry. Mrs. Mary (Buckley) Laughlin died when her son Jeremiah was six months old, and the father married (second) Kate Mahoney. They came to America in 1852, and shortly afterward John Laughlin sent for the rest of his family. He bought 190 acres of land in Rush county, Ind., and through industry and good management became a well-to-do citizen.

Jeremiah Laughlin came to America in 1853 when he was about seven years of age, and remained with his father in both Franklin and Rush counties. He had no early educational advantages whatever, his time being entirely taken up with hard work. When seventeen years of age, at Louisville, Ky., in 1863, he enlisted as a private in Company C, 3rd Battery, Light Artillery, for one year, and at the expiration of his first term of service, re-enlisted in the same organization, at Lebanon, Ky., for three years or during the war. He was honorably discharged at Louisville, July 27, 1865. About six months after his enlistment he was promoted to corporal, and on re-enlistment to be sergeant. His services were in Kentucky, Tennessee and Virginia, and he endured many privations and much suffering. At the battle of Mount Sterling, Thursday, June 9, 1864, he was shot under the left shoulder, the ball passing through the top of the left lung, which necessitated his entering the hospital at that place. A few weeks later he was sent to Lexington and placed in a hospital which had been fitted up in the Transylvania University, and in November, 1864, he returned to his command. He was in the battle at Preston Salt works, W. Va., and also at Beaver's Station, Tenn., and Abingdon, Va., and numbers of skirmishes. Mr. Laughlin was also in the greater number of raids and small fights, in which his command took part. On account of his bravery and cheerful attention to duty he was commended by his captain, R. W. McReynolds.

After the war Mr. Laughlin returned to Rush county, Ind., and worked until the spring of 1868 on the farm of H. B. Cowan. He had then reached the age of twenty-one years, and this was his first opportunity to attend school, when he learned to read and write. He was an attentive student and learned rapidly, and for fourteen years taught school in Richland township. In 1883 he entered the Indiana State Normal at Danville, and there he continued for seventeen months. Mr. Laughlin next attended the Northern Indiana Normal College at Valparaiso, Ind., for eleven terms, retiring from the same with a well-balanced education and trained mind.

Going to Kansas, Mr. Laughlin took up a homestead of 160 acres in Thomas county, and while it was not very valuable at that time, it has now become exceedingly so. During the winter of 1887-8 he taught school there, and then returned to Rush county, and took charge of the same schools he had taught previously. About 1890, Mr. Laughlin bought a lot at Elwood, which is now a part of his present property, and in 1892 he built his comfortable residence.

On June 7, 1893, Mr. Laughlin married Emma C. Rickett, born at Malta, Morgan Co., Ohio, March 3, 1852, daughter of Abel and Rachel (Minshal) Rickett, and granddaughter of Michael and Mary (Clark) Rickett. After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Laughlin settled in the present residence, and as an occupation he took up gardening. He owns other property, including a residence on F street, and is regarded as a substantial citizen. In politics he is a Democrat. He is a member of Elwood Post, No. 61, G. A. R., of which he is one of the trustees. Mr. Laughlin stands very high as to citizenship, and is a true example of a self-made man.

Mrs. Laughlin received her early education in the district schools of Perry county, Ohio, and became a teacher when but sixteen years old. She taught in Perry county for twenty-one years, beginning in 1868, and for six years was a teacher at Oakfield. During the winters of 1872, 1874 and 1875, she attended the National Normal school at Valparaiso, Ind., and again in 1885 and 1886, and also attended the regular course at Valparaiso for one year.

To Mr. and Mrs. Laughlin have been born two children: Julius R., born April 10, 1894; and Ferris R., Nov. 23, 1895.

CHARLES T. SANSBERRY, prominent among the younger generation of successful business men of Madison county, is actively engaged in the practice of law in Anderson, where he was born March 22, 1874, son of James W. and Margaret (Moore) Sansberry.

Mr. Sansberry comes of French Huguenot stock of South Carolina, where his grandfather, James Sansberry, was born. The latter was a pioneer of Ripley county, Ohio, where he died aged seventy years. James W. Sansberry, father of Charles T., was born Sept. 28, 1824, in Ripley county, Ohio, and came to Indiana when a child of six or seven years, with his uncle, Daniel Sherry, a pioneer of Delaware county, Ohio. In this State he was reared and educated, and he became a school teacher, teaching in Muncietown, Delaware county, Ind., as Muncie was then called. He was also engaged in teaching in Anderson during the winter of 1850-51, when that now flourishing city was a small village. While teaching school in Muncie, Mr. Sansberry began the study of law, and he began practice in Anderson in about 1854. He soon established a large and profitable law practice, becoming noted as a criminal lawyer, and was a prominent figure in all cases of importance then in the courts. He was a strong Jeffersonian Democrat, taking an active interest in the success of his party. He was one of the early members of the Masonic fraternity at Anderson.

James W. Sansberry was twice married, first to Mary Jones, born in Anderson, by whom he had two children, James W. and Anna Laura, the latter of whom married Isaac E. May, of Anderson. Mr. Sansberry's first wife died, and in Wayne county, Ind., he married Margaret Moore, born in Wayne county, daughter of Samuel and Sarah (Boone) Moore. Sarah Boone was born in Kentucky, a niece of the great pioneer explorer, Daniel Boone. Samuel Moore was born in about 1815, in Wayne county, six miles south of Richmond, on a farm. His father was a Quaker, and was one of the original pioneers of Wayne county. Samuel Moore was a well known citizen, and owned a fine farm of 200 or 300 acres, and like his parents was a Quaker. He and his wife were the parents of these children: Margaret, Kate, Jane, Thomas, Alice and Minnie. Samuel Moore died in November, 1892. James W. Sansberry died Dec. 6, 1901, well known throughout Central Indiana, and one of the most prominent lawyers of his day.

Charles T. Sansberry received his preliminary education in the public schools of Anderson, including the high school. He then attended the Michigan Military Academy at Orchard Lake, and Wabash College at Crawfordsville, and graduated from the Indiana

Law School in 1898. Mr. Sansberry immediately began the practice of his profession in Anderson, and established a good legal business. In politics he is a staunch Democrat, and has taken an active part in the politics of his section, especially in national campaigns, being well known as a stump speaker. Fraternally he is a member of the Elks at Anderson.

Mr. Sansberry was married in March, 1895, in Crawfordsville, to Maud V. Mahorney, born in Crawfordsville, daughter of Alexander and Elizabeth (Epperson) Mahorney. The Eppersons are of old Virginia Colonial stock, and pioneers of Madison and Crawfordsville, Ind. Mr. and Mrs. Sansberry have had one child, James C., born June 1, 1896, in Anderson.

WILLIAM C. HARTMAN, one of the prosperous farmers, good citizens and self-made men of Warren township, Marion County, was born Nov. 13, 1853, son of Charles and Henrietta (Ruschhaupt) Hartman. The father was born in 1825, in Preussisch Minden, Germany, and the mother, in 1820, in Holzhausen, Germany.

Charles Hartman and his father came to Marion county in 1837. The country was so heavily timbered at that time, that they had to cut down trees in order to find space on which to erect a cabin. The grandfather died in Marion county. Charles Hartman had three brothers and two sisters, one sister remaining in Germany and the other, Mrs. Fisleck, of Terre Haute, Ind., is the only survivor. Mr. Hartman, in 1837, was one of the earliest settlers in Warren township, and he lived through many pioneer hardships. He was a man of excellent judgment, and early became of consequence in the new settlement, and all his life supported the movements intended to be of substantial benefit to the township and county. A Democrat but not an office seeker, he was one of the most useful citizens of his locality. He was a consistent member of the Evangelical Church.

Charles Hartman was married twice, (first) to Henrietta Ruschhaupt, and the children of this union were: Mary and Louisa, deceased; William C.; A. W., who married Alice Thompson, deceased; and Charles F., deceased. The second marriage was to Mrs. Hoeltke, no children being born, but she had four children by her previous marriage, namely: Mary, Louisa, Ada and William.

Mr. William C. Hartman and his brother

own 200 acres in partnership, and he has a small farm of forty acres as his home place. This he has brought to a high state of cultivation, while seventy acres of the other land have been cleared by himself and A. W. Hartman. He raises considerable fine stock and Jersey cattle, doing some dairy farming. He has made many substantial improvements here and owns much modern machinery. Mr. Hartman well recalls the advent of the old McCormick binder, and later the Wood binder, and owns, as a curiosity, one of the old swinging cradles which has served to try the muscle of many a farmer through a long day's harvesting of wheat.

In 1889 Mr. Hartman was married to Frances Huber, daughter of John M. and Mary C. (Bailey) Huber, of Ohio, the father being a second cousin to the inventor of the Huber threshing machine. On the father's side the family was of Pennsylvania German extraction. Mr. and Mrs. Hartman have had five children, namely: Charles F., August H., Edward W., Hazel Henrietta, and Bertha (who died when four months old). The family attend the Evangelical Church.

Mr. Hartman belongs to no secret society, but his brother belongs to the Masonic lodge in Indianapolis. In politics he is a Democrat, and always takes an intelligent interest in public matters, but he has neither time nor inclination to hold office. He has met with much deserved success in his farming operations, through close attention and industry, and is not only one of the substantial men of this locality, but also one of the most highly respected.

JAMES LANDIS MOORE, a substantial farmer living near Anderson, Ind., is one of the survivors of the Civil war, in which he served throughout the whole period, and was in many fierce battles, risking his life again and again for his country.

The origin of the Moore family in America is buried in oblivion, but they have a tradition that three brothers of Scotch-Irish stock came to this country. The first of whom there is any definite record is the grandfather of James L. Moore, by name John. He was born in Pennsylvania and was a life-long farmer there in Franklin county. He married Miss Jane Martin, a native of the same State, of German descent, and their children were: William, John, James, Margaret, Joseph, Mary, Elizabeth, David and Susan.

John Moore, son of John, was born in Franklin county in 1814, and grew up there, marrying Miss Elizabeth Bricker, born in the same county in 1817, daughter of George Bricker, a farmer. After his marriage he remained some time in Franklin county, but in the spring of 1847 moved to Middletown, Henry Co., Ind., and remained there two years. He then went to Mt. Carroll, Carroll Co., Ill., for six months, working at his trade, but at the end of that time he returned to Indiana, and spent three months in New Castle. Finally he bought a homestead in Richwoods, Delaware county. He built a house and blacksmith shop on the farm, and spent six years there. In 1855 the family moved westward again, going to Dyersville, Dubuque Co., Iowa, but on October 15th of that same year, John Moore died and his widow returned with her family to Pennsylvania. Mr. Moore was a hard-working, industrious man, straightforward and honest. In politics he was a Republican, but he was not connected with any church. His wife was a member of the Methodist denomination. Their children were: Eliza Jane, who died in infancy; James L.; Margaret C.; Mary J.; Sarah Elizabeth; Charlotte; Martha Ellen; William; Emma Frances; John Wesley; and one who died in infancy.

James L. Moore was born in Franklin county, Pa., Jan. 13, 1838, and was nine years old when his parents went to Indiana. He attended school in the different places where the family lived, in Richwoods going during the winters, while he helped his father on the farm during the summers. After his father's death the family remained in Pennsylvania one year, and in November, 1856, returned to Middletown, Ind., where Mrs. Moore had many friends. There our subject enjoyed one more winter in school, and then learned the carpenter's trade as a preliminary to starting out in the world for himself.

When the war broke out, however, Mr. Moore responded to the call for troops, and enlisted Sept. 5, 1861, in Company E, 8th Ind. V. I., under Capt. Frederick Tykle, to serve three years or during the war. He was honorably discharged in order to re-enlist Jan. 1, 1864, at Indianola, Texas, as a veteran for three years more. He served his country faithfully for four years and twenty-three days, and was a second time honorably discharged Aug. 26, 1865, at Darien, Ga., at the close of the war. In 1863 he was promoted for meritorious conduct to be corporal. He was never taken prisoner but was an active soldier throughout, save when invalided, and was with his regiment in all the marches, skirmishes and battles in which it participated, doing his full duty, promptly and efficiently. When on the march he came into camp with the regiment every night, though often there were many stragglers. The battles in which Mr. Moore took part were numerous, and included Warrensburg, Mo., when 1,300 Confederates were captured; Pea Ridge, Ark.; Magnolia Hills, Champion Hills, Black River Bridge, Vicksburg (including the charge made May 22, 1863), and Jackson, all in Mississippi; Matagorda Island, Texas; Opequon Creek, Va., near Winchester, Fisher's Hill and Cedar Creek.

In so long a period Mr. Moore naturally met with some disasters. While at Helena, Ark., he was given an extra large dose of calomel by a physician who failed to caution him as to any danger. Being very thirsty, Mr. Moore drank freely of water and vinegar and became so badly salivated that his life was despaired of. His neck was swollen out even with his chin, most of his teeth came out and his gums sloughed off, but eventually he recovered. At the battle of Fisher's Hill, Va., he was shot through the clothing on the left side, but though the bullet burned the skin it did not bring blood. His most serious injury was received in the charge at Vicksburg, when he was shot through the head from the right side, close by the hinge of the jaw, which was slightly hurt. The ball passed downward and out about an inch and a half below the left ear, going through the muscles at the back of the neck and missing the jugular vein by the eighth of an inch only. At its exit there was left a large hole. At the moment Mr. Moore was stooping down to crawl under a small sapling, and so fell on his hands and knees. He did not lose consciousness, but was almost suffocated by the blood, as the wound bled internally into his throat. Aided by two comrades he walked back to the rear, where the wound was treated simply with cold water. For nine days he lived in the field hospital, under an arbor made of boughs, and continued the cold water treatment himself. For a week he could not speak intelligibly and could swallow only soup taken with a teaspoon. Contrary to all expectations Mr. Moore survived the injury and as soon as he was able was sent by steamer to the hospital at Memphis, whence he was sent on, two days later, to Evansville, Ind., where he stayed in the hospital a month. After another week in Indianapolis, he was sent home on a furlough for twenty days, this being afterward renewed to twenty days more before he joined his regiment.

After the war Mr. Moore engaged in farming on rented land six miles north of Middletown, where his mother kept house for him. The property belonged to his sister, the widow of Joseph Kennedy, a private in Company K, 140th regiment, Ind. V. I., who had died of disease in North Carolina. Mr. Moore lived there six years, spent two years more on a rented farm half a mile from his present abode, and then moved to another on the Alexander pike, where he stayed one year. From there he went to the Richardson farm in Union township, for a year, then to the Jacob Huff farm in Henry county, near Middletown, for one year, when he moved to a farm north of Anderson for a fourth. His present farm he bought in the fall of 1878, settling on it the next spring. It consists of fifty-eight acres, somewhat improved and partly cleared. Mr. Moore finished clearing it, drained it well and put up several good farm buildings and two farm dwellings. He has added to his land until he now has ninety-eight acres close to Anderson, all in a high state of cultivation.

During his first residence in Anderson Mr. Moore was married in Middletown to Miss Lucinda Huff, the ceremony taking place March 26, 1872. Mrs. Moore was born in that place on her father's farm April 16, 1841, daughter of Jacob and Phoebe (Scothern) Huff. To this union two children were born: Charles Wesley, Feb. 8, 1873; and Mattie May, born Sept. 19, 1876, who died Aug. 19, 1877. Charles Wesley, the son, married Miss Bessie Thornbury, of Anderson, and has children: Margaret Lucile, Raymond Jacob, Mildred, and Mary Belle. Mr. and Mrs. Moore are both members of the Methodist Church. Mr. Moore is a strong Republican in politics, and cast his first vote for Lincoln, and he has voted for every Republican Presidential candidate ever since. He is an ex-member of Major May Post, G. A. R., and an unaffiliated member of the I. O. O. F., of Middletown. Mr. Moore inherited his father's industrious and frugal character, and by his untiring efforts has made a success of his farming, having now amassed a comfortable competence. He is one of the well-known and influential men of his community.

The Huff family, to which Mrs. Moore belongs, is of German stock, and came to Indiana from Rockingham county, Va., where her grandfather, George Huff, died at an advanced age, the owner of a large farm. His children were: Daniel, George, John, Lewis, Jacob, Sarah and Katie.

Jacob Huff was born April 22, 1811, on the homestead, and when he grew up made farming his occupation also. In Shenandoah county he married Miss Phoebe Scothern, born there Aug. 12, 1811, and descended from one of the old families of Virginia, of English and Scotch-Irish stock. Their children were: Sarah Catherine, born in 1835; Martin; Mary Ann; Lucinda; George, who died aged twenty; Elizabeth; Martha; Amanda, who died at the age of six years; Anderson, who died aged twenty-five years; Dorilas, who died at the age of six and one-half years. Mrs. Phoebe Huff died April 9, 1864, aged fifty-two years and seven months, a devout member of the United Brethren in Christ Church. For his second wife Mr. Jacob Huff married Miss Pamela Meeker, by whom he had one daughter, Mary.

A year after the birth of the first child, Jacob Huff moved his family to Indiana, and settled a mile and a half from Middletown, where he bought 157 acres of land, most of it uncleared. They lived at first in a log house, which was on the land when he bought it. Jacob Huff prospered and bought more land till he owned several hundred acres, so that at his death, May 1, 1904, he was able to leave each of his children a farm of 160 acres and some money besides. His success was all due to his own hard work, although he increased his wealth in his later years by loaning money, for which he received ten per cent. He left an estate valued at over $50,000. He was a very strong man physically, as is indicated by the fact that he lived to be over ninety-three years old. He belonged to no religious sect, but inclined toward the Dunkard Church. Mr. Huff was one of the substantial and respected citizens of Middletown.

JOHN WESLEY GOUL, one of the substantial agriculturists and highly esteemed citizens of Pendleton, Ind., is of German descent, his ancestors having been early Pennsylvania settlers. He was born May 20, 1840, in Champaign county, Ohio, son of John W. and Martha J. (McManaway) Goul.

Adam Goul, the grandfather of John Wesley, was probably a Pennsylvania German, as he spoke both the German and English languages. He came from Rockingham county, Va., to Champaign county, Ohio, in the early days, and, clearing a farm from the woods, he spent all of his life there. He and his wife were the parents of three children: William, John W. and Polly.

John W. Goul was born in Rockingham county, Va., in 1802, and when a boy accompanied his parents to Champaign county, Ohio. As a youth he learned the shoemaker's trade, which he followed, in connection with farming, all of his life. He sold his farm in Champaign county, Ohio, in 1852, and came to Madison county, Ind., settling on eighty acres situated west of Pendleton, and on this land, which was but little cleared, he resided for two years. Then selling out, he purchased a 202-acre farm north of Pendleton, half of which was cleared, and moved into the frame cottage which is still standing and in a good state of preservation. He was first an Old Line Whig and later a Republican, and he and his wife were members of the Methodist Church. He was a substantial and honored citizen, and died on his farm at the age of eighty-two years, his wife passing away in 1855. Their children, all born in Ohio, were: Mary Ann, Evelyn, Melissa, Jane, Ruth, William and John Wesley.

John Wesley Goul was but twelve years of age when he accompanied his parents to Indiana, but he still remembers the journey, which was made by horse and team, the household goods having been shipped the previous winter by sleds. He received the education common to the pioneer farmer's boys, attending school for about three months in the winters until eighteen years of age, the rest of the year doing hard work on the farm.

On Sept. 16, 1861, at Pendleton, Mr. Goul enlisted as a private in Company D, 34th Ind. V. I., to serve three years or during the war, and was sworn into the United States service at Anderson in October of that year. He served his term, and was honorably discharged at Indianapolis, Ind., in October, 1864, his service having taken him through Indiana, Kentucky, Missouri, Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, Texas, and Arkansas. He participated in many skirmishes and twenty-two battles, including Ft. Madrid, Mo.; Island No. 10, Miss.; Memphis, Tenn.; De Valls Bluff, Ark.; Magnolia Church, Port Gibson, Champion Hills, Black River, Siege of Vicksburg, Jackson, Miss., etc. Mr. Goul had several narrow escapes from death, being wounded in the scalp by a minie ball, which penetrated to the skull, and at Vicksburg a bullet came so close to him as to burn the back of his neck. He was confined to the hospital for four days at Vicksburg, but as soon as able returned to camp, refusing to remain in the hospital. Throughout his term of service Mr. Goul proved himself a brave, willing, cheerful soldier, discharging his duties faithfully.

After the close of the war Mr. Goul returned to his home in Madison county, Ind., and was married Sept. 16, 1866, in the Anderson Methodist Church, by the Rev. Mr. Hill, to Mary Eliza Bell. Mr. and Mrs. Goul rented a farm adjoining that of Mr. Goul's father, but one year later settled on the latter place, this having since been their home, with the exception of eighteen months spent in Henry county. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Goul, namely: Lottie, married William N. Crawford, a railroad man of Chicago. Jesse L., who married Alice Edna Rogers, resides in Pendleton and has three children, Ward Lester, Charles Alfred and Earl Willits. Adam M., who married Ellen Campbell, of Anderson, has one son, Walter. On the death of his father, Mr. Goul received six acres of land by inheritance, purchased thirty-seven acres and also bought the property of several of the heirs and now owns seventy-nine and three-quarters acres, all of this being well improved land. He built a two-story, commodious, modern frame residence in 1901, having built a good barn in 1896, and the property is supplied with the latest and best farm machinery. Mr. Goul is a Republican in politics, having cast his vote for Abraham Lincoln, and has been supervisor of his township. He is a member of the G. A. R. at Pendleton.

Mary Eliza (Bell) Goul was born near Fort Thomas, Ky., May 1, 1850, daughter of Alexander and Isabel (McGifford) Bell, and granddaughter of John Bell, a farmer of near Belfast, Ireland. Alexander Bell was born near Belfast, Ireland, and there married Isabel McGifford, daughter of Robert McGifford, and after the birth of one daughter, Ellen Jane, they came to America in a sailing vessel, landing after a nine weeks' voyage at New Orleans, from whence they came by steamboat up the river to Cincinnati, locating near Fort Thomas, Ky. Later they removed to Liberty, Monroe county, settling on a farm, but sold out to remove to Adams county, Ind., Mr. Bell purchasing a farm of eighty acres. His next location was Hamblton county, settling near Noblesville, but finally he went to Anderson, having a forty-acre farm near that city, on which he died. Alexander Bell was a soldier in the Civil war, enlisting at Pendleton in the nine months' service in the latter part of 1864 and serving until the close of the war. He died in November, 1896, honored and esteemed by all who knew him. He was a straightforward, hard-working man, and made a comfortable home for his large family. He and his wife were Scotch-Irish Presbyterians in their native country, but after coming to America became connected with the Methodist Church, in the faith of which they died. In political matters Alexander Bell was a staunch Republican, although he took only a good citizen's interest therein. To Mr. and Mrs. Bell were born the following children: Ellen Jane, Mary Eliza, Anna Maria, Parmelia, Samuel Topper, James Alexander, Sarah, Annie Margaret, Amos C. (who died aged about five years), Abraham Lincoln and Hattie May.

MARK PATTERSON, a respected and substantial citizen of Anderson township, Madison county, Ind., who is engaged in improving his fine twenty-acre farm, was born in Greene county, Pa., July 17, 1841, son of Thomas and Margaret (Hopkins) Patterson.

Mark Patterson, his grandfather, was born in County Down, Ireland, and came to America as a stowaway on a sailing vessel, to escape military service in the British army. He and a companion, Jason Payne, were secreted by a woman on ship board, whose name is now unknown. After reaching America, Mr. Patterson located in Greene county, Pa., where he married Ann Gregory, of Irish descent. He then entered land in Morris township, Greene county, Pa., consisting of 165 acres, which he cleared from the woods. The land was covered with fine but very heavy timber of the very best quality. He cleared up his land and made a good farm, and here his children were born as follows: Thomas, John, Samuel, Mark, Katie, Rebecca, Nancy, Mary and Bettie. Mark Patterson sold his farm to his son, Thomas, and again as a pioneer removed to Guernsey county, Ohio, where he settled on 206 acres of timber land, on which there was a little log cabin in the center of a small clearing. Here he made a fine farm—one of the best in Richland township, and here Mr. Patterson and his wife died, both having lived to a ripe old age. They were both early members of the Methodist Church in their community.

Thomas Patterson, son of Mark, was born in 1809 in Greene county, Pa., on the old homestead, and his entire life was devoted to farming. He married Margaret Hopkins, born in Maryland, in the locality known to the pioneers as the "Glades," daughter of Daniel and Easter (Johnson) Hopkins. The Hopkins family were of English and Welsh descent, of Episcopal faith, and were Colonial settlers of Maryland. Daniel Hopkins settled in Greene county, Pa., as a pioneer, where he cleared up a fine farm of 200 acres, and became a substantial farmer. Thomas Patterson and his wife settled on the Patterson homestead in Greene county, which he had purchased from his father. Here he passed his remaining days and died at the age of sixty-seven years, his wife surviving until seventy-nine years of age. They were both members of the Methodist Church. Mr. Patterson was an industrious and hard-working man, and added greatly to the homestead, which is still owned by a member of the Patterson family. The children of Thomas and Margaret (Hopkins) Patterson were as follows: Daniel, Levi, Nancy, Esther, Mark, Eliza, Catherine, Mary, John, Margaret and Samuel.

Three sons of this family were in the Civil war, Daniel, Levi and Mark. Daniel was in the 5th Ind. Cav., and he served about three years, participating in many battles, and being promoted to quartermaster sergeant, and afterwards to second lieutenant. Levi was a member of the 22nd Penn. Cav., and served about two years. He was taken prisoner in the Shenandoah Valley, and escaped a short time after his capture. Having been confined with some of his comrades in an old mill, he escaped through the mill race. After many trials, and a hard tedious journey, part of which time he had to pick huckleberries in the mountains as a means of sustenance, he reached the Union lines.

Mark Patterson, our subject, was reared a farmer, and obtained a common district school education. When twenty-one years of age, Mark Patterson, a tall, stalwart boy, 6 feet 1 inch tall, on Aug. 13, 1862, was mustered in as a private of Co. K, 16th Pa. Cav., to serve three years or during the war, and served until honorably discharged, Aug. 13, 1865, the war having closed. He was a participant in the battles of Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Spottsylvania Court House, the battles of the Wilderness, and took part in Sheridan's famous raid in the Shenandoah Valley. He was also at Petersburg and in the battles around Richmond. Mr. Patterson thinks that the hardest battle of his army experience was at Sailor's Creek, Va. He was at the battle of Winchester, when Sheridan made his famous ride, and saw the intrepid general on his famous black horse as he cheered the soldiers with his now famous "Turn, boys—turn—we're going back." General Wright commanded the 6th Army Corps, and he held his ground while the 19th Army Corps, under General Emory, fell back and retreated through his line. General Wright's corps was ready for duty and in good order when General Sheridan rode up, and the former deserves the greatest credit for his soldierly conduct and good generalship. Mr. Patterson was in many engagements with Mosby's famous guerrillas. He was slightly wounded on the left hip by a minie ball, in the battle of Shepherdstown, and was slightly wounded on the right hand and again on the right knee. He was not in the hospital, except for examination for his wounds, and was always an active soldier. He took part in every battle, skirmish and engagement of any kind, in which his regiment figured.

After the war Mark Patterson returned to his home in Pennsylvania. He was married in Jonesburg, Montgomery county, Mo., Aug. 8, 1868, while on a visit to one of his comrades, to Rebecca Patterson, born Sept. 24, 1848, daughter of Samuel and Elizabeth (Payne) Patterson. Samuel Patterson was the third son of Mark and Ann (Gregory) Patterson, and was born in Greene county, Pa., on the old homestead in 1817. He was always a farmer, and was married in Morgan county, Ohio, to Elizabeth Payne, born June 2, 1827, in the same county, daughter of Jason and Hannah (Truesdell) Payne. Jason Payne was born in County Down, Ireland, and was the companion of Mark Patterson, Sr., on their trip to America on the sailing vessel, as before mentioned. Jason Payne belonged to a wealthy Protestant family in Ireland, and tradition says that a large estate, still unsettled in Ireland, belongs to the Payne heirs. Jason Payne first settled in New York and there married. He then removed to Morgan county, Ohio, where he cleared up a good farm of 180 acres from the woods. When he first settled he had to blaze a way to his little log cabin, but before he died he owned one of the best improved farms in the county, on which he built a substantial two-story brick house. He was a wealthy and well-known pioneer.

Samuel Patterson, after marriage, settled on 206 acres of land, an improved farm in Guernsey county, Ohio. He had inherited land also through his wife in Morgan county, Ohio. Samuel Patterson and wife were the parents of the following children: Hannah, Ailey, Rebecca, Mary Elizabeth, Ann, Samuel, Jane, Thomas, Noble, Emma and Melvin, the latter of whom was a teacher in the Philippines in the employ of the Government, and afterward became superintendent of schools at Harrisonville, Mo. He was educated in the Ada (Ohio) Normal College and afterward took a course in the Chicago University. Samuel Patterson spent his remaining days on his farm, where he died at the age of eighty-three years, in December, 1900. His wife is still living on the homestead at the age of eighty. Mr. Patterson was a devout member of the Methodist Church, in which he was a class leader at the time of his marriage. He was one of the founders of the Methodist Church in his community, of which he was a trustee, and a liberal supporter. In his political opinions he was always a stanch Republican, and was one of the original Abolitionists. He was a strong Union man during the war, and was a respected citizen.

After his marriage Mark Patterson settled in Montgomery county, Missouri, on a farm, where he and his wife lived two and one-half years. In 1871 they left Missouri for Anderson, Ind., where for years Mr. Patterson followed his trade of carpentering. While in Anderson Mr. Patterson built three substantial residences, which he still owns. In 1895 he bought eight acres of land about two miles west of Anderson, where he built a good brick house and improved his place, setting out an abundance of fruit. He sold this place in 1897, and bought his present homestead of twenty acres, which he is now improving, and on which he has erected a handsome modern brick residence. Both Mr. and Mrs. Patterson are members of the Methodist Church. In politics he is a strong Republican, and cast his first vote for Abraham Lincoln's second term, and has voted for every Republican Presidential candidate since. While in Anderson he was a member of the G. A. R., Major May Post, of which he was one of the charter members, and he has always taken an active interest in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the veterans.

Mr. and Mrs. Patterson have had no children, but are making an attractive home for their niece, Grace Brokaw, who is attending the excellent school in the neighborhood of the Patterson home. Mrs. Patterson is a charter member of the W. C. T. U., of which she has been a popular member for the past twenty-five years, and which she presided over as president for some time. From her youth Mrs. Patterson has been an active church and Sunday-school worker, and for fourteen years was a teacher in the Methodist Sunday-school. Mr. Patterson has a military record, of which anyone might be proud, and he has always been a straightforward and industrious citizen.

CHRISTIAN DIETZ, who is justly numbered among the leading farmers and stock raisers of Warren township, Marion county, Ind., is a man who has attained to his present success through his own efforts, and was born in Marion county, Dec. 10, 1863, son of John and Lizzie (Welter) Dietz, natives of Prussia, Germany, born in 1813 and 1834, respectively. The following children were born to John Dietz: Christiana, born in Indiana; Lizzie, born in Marion county, Ind.; John, born in Marion county, Ind.; Christian; Emma, who married Oscar Borthel, a butcher on East Washington street, Indianapolis, Ind.; Anna, who married John Schneider, a machinist.

John Dietz, Sr., with his father and brother-in-law, Jacob Wagner, came to this country and lived for a year in Pennsylvania, and then came to Indianapolis. Mr. Dietz cleared 160 acres of land and was a very hard-working man. In politics he was a Democrat, but did not desire office. He and his sons are members of the German Reformed Church.

Christian Dietz was married, in 1889, to Lillie Blake, daughter of John and Laura (Linder) Blake, of Ohio, who came to Indiana in 1885, and lived at Irvington, the father being a railroad man. Both are still living, and are very highly respected people.

The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Dietz are: Lillie V., Irene L., Dorris J. and Mary C.

Mr. Dietz has ninety-three acres of excellent land, all under the plow except seven-teen acres of good timber land. He raises good cattle, Jerseys and preferably Short-horns, also hogs, and is very successful in his operations. Mr. Dietz has remodeled his residence, making many improvements, and now has one of the most comfortable in the township. Much of his land was marsh land, but by introducing tiling, he has drained it, and made of his swamp rich growing land. In his drainage operations, he used some 800 rods of tiling, but has been amply repaid for his trouble. Although not a member of any lodge, Mr. Dietz is social in his habits, and he and his wife warmly welcome visitors to their pleasant home, where they dispense a most generous hospitality.

RALEIGH BOWDEN, a respected citizen of Muncie, and a soldier of the Civil war, was born Jan. 19, 1845, in Jay county, Ind., son of Enoch and Delilah (Hughes) Bowden. The name, of Irish origin, was originally spelled Bowdown. The Hughes family was of Scotch-Irish descent.

Josiah Bowden, grandfather of Raleigh, lived in North Carolina, whence he entered the Continental army, serving seven years. Frank Hughes, the maternal grandfather, also spent seven years in service during the war of the Revolution, under Gen. Washington, and was present at the battle of King's Mountain, and others.

Enoch Bowden, father of Raleigh, was a pioneer in Randolph county, N. C. He left the old home when sixteen years of age. His marriage took place at Knoxville, Tenn., and it was after the birth of the third child that he settled in Jay county, Ind., being one of the earliest settlers in that locality, Obadiah Hawkins claiming the distinction of being the first settler in the woods. They settled where Liber College formerly stood in Portland. Mr. Bowden sold part of his land and moved to Beaver Creek township, where he bought 160 acres of timber land and began to lay out a village named Bloomfield, now extinct. For eight years he was judge of the court; he was a man very tenacious of his opinions, and he was very determined about doing exactly as he thought was right. He left North Carolina because of his disbelief in slavery. His death occurred on his farm in Jay county, seven miles north of Portland (where he had settled in later life), when he was aged ninety-seven years. He was a member and class leader in the Methodist Church, and in the early days his home was always the stopping place for the itinerant preachers. In politics he was an old-line Whig, but he voted for John C. Fremont. In the latter campaign a platform was built on a wagon, and drawn by 25 yoke of oxen, 100 voters went to Portland to cast their votes. John Stowe, an old-time character, was the head driver. Enoch Bowden married Delilah Hughes, born in Knoxville, Tenn., daughter of Frank Hughes, above mentioned. Their children were: Jane, married John Sullivan; William, deceased; Martha; Richard; John; Rebecca Ann, married George Manos; Josiah; Enoch Elzy; Ellen, married Harrison Cheniworth; Ruey Ann, married Isaac C. Guncle; James; and Raleigh. Mr. Bowden was a strong Union man, and his wife of good patriotic stock, and from their family there went forth to battle for the nation in the Civil war, seven sons—William, John, Josiah, Richard, Elzy, Raleigh and James (the last named being quite young, ran away and joined his brother Raleigh)—three sons-in-law, John Sullivan, Harrison Cheniworth and George Manos—and two grandsons, Peter Bowden, son of William, and Thomas Sullivan, son of John. This made a total of twelve soldiers from the one family. Of these Raleigh was the only one to receive a wound; all served in Indiana regiments, and all were strong, hearty men.

Raleigh Bowden attended school, but did not learn to read or write. He was reared on a farm in Jay county, and was but a mere boy when he enlisted in the 11th Indiana Cavalry, in October, 1862. He was promoted to be corporal, and was discharged at Louisville, Ky., in July, 1865. His service was principally in Kentucky and Tennessee, his regiment being mounted in Kentucky. He participated in the second battle of Franklin, one of the hardest fought battles of the war, for its duration, lasting but two hours just before night. His regiment had no shelter and the enemy made six or seven heavy charges. He was wounded in the battle of Nashville, being shot through the left hand, and was in the field hospital sixty days, and on his reporting at the hospital at Jeffersonville, Ind., the war had closed, and he was not permitted to go again to the front, but was detailed as a nurse, serving as such until July, 1865, when discharged. He was hearty and endured the service well, although the effects of the hardships endured are now beginning to tell upon him. After the war he returned home, his parents being alone on the farm. His brother John was the first lieutenant of his company.

After the war Mr. Bowden attended school at Liber College for three months, and then traveled as advertiser for the shoe business for two years. The next fourteen years were passed in selling Singer Sewing Machines, the next three reapers and mowers, and then he traveled as salesman for some time.

In Muncie, Ind., Aug. 18, 1869, Mr. Bowden married Ruhama Hurley, born in Salem township, Jan. 21, 1848, daughter of Joannan and Arbena Catherine (De Boy) Hurley. In 1880 they moved to Muncie and bought property. They are members of the U. B. Church, he being one of the trustees. In politics he is a Democrat, but he voted for President Grant. He formerly belonged to the G. A. R. at Anderson, Ind., and he is a member of the Sr. O. U. A. M. To Mr. and Mrs. Bowden have been born children as follows: Elder Grant, an iron man of Marion, who married Mary Hipskin, and has two children, Charles and Helen M.; Charles Fenton, a photographer, who married Elizabeth Rotig; and Joseph Elwood, who died aged two years. They have also reared, from the time she was seven years of age, Nettie C. Tucker, now Mrs. L. G. George, of Muncie, who has one child, Mary Elizabeth.

John Hurley, grandfather of Mrs. Bowden, came to Indiana in pioneer days, making the journey with horses and wagons. He settled in Madison county, on Fall Creek, cleared a farm, and made a good home in the wilderness. He lived to a good old age, and died on his farm, and was buried there. His children were: Joshua, Eli, Joannan, Mary, Emma, Nancy and Jane, and possibly others.

Joannan Hurley, son of John and father of Mrs. Bowden, was a good-sized boy when he came to Indiana. He was a carpenter and worked much at his trade in connection with the clearing and cultivating of eighty acres of land. He lived on his farm until his death at the age of sixty-two years. In Henry county, Ind., he married Arbena C. De Boy, who was born near the Natural Bridge in Virginia, Sept. 17, 1822, daughter of Abraham and Rosana (Doubt) De Boy, the latter of whom was brought from Germany by her parents when she was six months old. Mrs. Hurley made her home at Daleville until her death, March 11, 1906. She was a member of the New Light Church. To Mr. and Mrs. Hurley were born children as follows: Phoebe, Jane, John (who served in the Civil war), Sarah Ann, Arbena, Ruhama, William H., Harriet, Emeline, Theodore, Franklin, Milton M., Homer and Marietta.

JAMES L. MARTIN, a well-known agriculturist of Delaware county, Ind., who is engaged in cultivating his fine property near Eaton, is a survivor of the Civil war. He was born Dec. 21, 1847, in Delaware county, son of William and Rachel (Long) Martin, and grandson of Isaac Martin, who, it is believed, was the son of the emigrant who came from the North of Ireland, and, settling in Cincinnati, built the first frame house in that city.

Isaac Martin, who was a soldier of the War of 1812, was born in Virginia, and when young went with his father to Ohio, where he married Elizabeth Wilson. He was a farmer by occupation and removed with his family to Indiana, settling in Niles township, Delaware county, being one of the first settlers of that section. He was accustomed to show new settlers the land and obtain the patent thereto from Fort Wayne, his own home being a tract of 160 acres which he cleared from the woods, on which descendants of his still reside. He and his wife were members of the Baptist Church, in the faith of which both died when about seventy years of age, and they are buried on the farm. Their children were: Samuel, Josiah, Vinton, William, Isaac, Susan, Catherine, Martha, and Lydia, the last named being accidentally killed when a child.

William Martin, father of James L., was born in Clinton county, Ohio, and he came when a boy of fifteen years to Delaware county, Ind., being reared in Niles township, where he received a common school education. He was married in Union township, Delaware county, to Rachel Long, born in Clinton county, Ohio, daughter of Robert and Jane (Block) Long, the former a pioneer of Union township, whither he had removed from Clinton county, Ohio. Robert Long entered 160 acres for himself, and a like number for each of his sons, built a hewed log house, and later a brick house, which is still standing and the property of William Props, and he became a substantial, representative citizen. After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Martin settled in Union township, on forty acres, partly cleared, which Mr. Martin later sold to purchase 170 acres in Blackford county, Ind., of which five acres were cleared, and the rest of which Mr. Martin cultivated himself. There he died at the age of sixty-nine years, his wife being about sixty-eight years old at the time of her death. Their children were: James L., born Dec. 21, 1847; Leander, July 4, 1849; Caroline, in March, 1851; Mary Jane, in October, 1852; Liberty G., in February, 1854; and John C. and Amos W., who died young. Mr. and Mrs. Martin were members of the Christian (or Disciples) Church, and Mr. Martin built the church at Eaton, superintending the carpenter work thereon. In political matters he was a Republican.

James L. Martin attended the district schools, the first school being built of logs, with a large fireplace, stick chimney, and puncheon floor and benches. Later he attended a frame schoolhouse, which had been erected by his father, who had built the first five frame schoolhouses in Union township. James L. Martin worked on the farm in the summer months, and at his father's home in Union township he enlisted Feb. 20, 1864, to serve three years or during the war, as a private of Company B, 84th Ind. V. I., being but sixteen years, two months old. The recruiting officer was First Lieutenant Noble Gregory, of Company K, of the 84th. Mr. Martin served in Tennessee, Georgia and Indiana, participated in the great Atlanta campaign, and in the battles of Dalton, Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca and Peach Tree Creek, and in numerous skirmishes. He was disabled by sickness at Kingston, Ga., and sent to the field hospital at Nashville, Tenn., and thence to New Albany, Ind. He was transferred to the veteran reserve corps at Indianapolis, and guarded prisoners at Camp Morton until discharged. He was at Camp Douglas, Chicago, and assisted to transfer prisoners to Richmond, Va., in the spring of 1865. Mr. Martin had an honorable war record, and although so young bore all the hardships of the great struggle uncomplainingly.

After the war Mr. Martin returned to Indiana and engaged in farming on his father's place. He attended school until twenty-two years old, and on Oct. 8, 1870, he was married in Union township to Jane Ray, born July 26, 1853, in Niles township, Delaware county, Ind., daughter of Patrick and Rachel (Harris) Ray. Patrick Ray was born in Fayette county, Ind., son of Lewis and Jane (Lee) Ray, who former a pioneer of Niles township who settled in the woods, where he had a farm of 160 acres. After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Martin located on Patrick Ray's farm, where they remained two years, and then went to Blackford county, Ind., where the next two years were spent in agricultural pursuits. After this they returned to the old Ray farm, Mrs. Martin having inherited thirty-nine acres, and here they have resided ever since, Mr. Martin having added forty acres to the original tract and improved the place with fine, substantial buildings. This farm is one of the excellent ones of the community and bears a most pleasing appearance, being decorated with many flowers, set out by Mrs. Martin, who takes a great pleasure in them. In political matters Mr. Martin is a Republican, and he has served as supervisor for five years. He is a member of the G. A. R. at Granville, Ind. He and his wife are members of the Christian Church, which they assisted in building in this locality.

To Mr. and Mrs. James L. Martin have been born the following children: Florence A., born July 5, 1871; William P., Jan. 31, 1873; Ida L., April 4, 1875; Franklin L., Aug. 26, 1877; Bertha A., July 21, 1879; Walter V., May 30, 1882; and Clyde R., Nov. 9, 1886. Florence A. married Luther C. Harris, a bookkeeper at Matthews, Ind., and they have one daughter, Varnie. William P. married Vila Coulter, was a bookkeeper with the Sun Glass Company for six years, but is now employed at Clarksburg, W. Va. Ida L. married (first) John Hayes, deceased, by whom she had one son, Walter V., and married (second) John Ferguson, and they reside in Wabash, Ind. Bertha A. married Edward Bart, and resides in Hamilton township, Delaware county, where Mr. Bart is carrying on agricultural pursuits. Mr. and Mrs. James L. Martin are well-known in their community, where they have a wide social circle.

LEONARD WILD, a man of energy and enterprise, who in his day has had a marked influence in various enterprises, and especially in the erection of substantial buildings, was born in Ulm, Wurtemberg, Germany, Nov. 2, 1834, son of John and Katherine (Fisher) Wild.

John Wild, father of Leonard, was born in Bernstadt, Wurtemberg, Germany, Jan. 8, 1808, and became a farmer. He married in Bernstadt, Katherine Fisher, who bore him these children: Leonard; Rosa, who married John Bart; Mary, who married Joseph Frank; and Katherine, who married Frederick Bachman. John Wild lived in his native town until 1867, when he came to America, being brought here by his son, Leonard, who made the trip back to the old country to bring his parents to his home in Noblesville, Ind., and here they both died, the father in his eighty-fourth year and the mother aged seventy-three. Both were members of the Lutheran Church.

Leonard Wild received a common school education in his native village, attending until he was twelve years old. He worked on the farm, assisting his father, and was reared to hard work. He remained at home until nineteen years old, and in February, 1854, left for America, sailing on the vessel "Helfatha." The voyage consumed thirty-seven days, and he arrived in New York March 4, 1854. His oldest sister, Rosa, accompanied him, she being then a young woman, and they went immediately to Niagara Falls, where he worked on a farm, six miles east, for eighteen months, receiving ten dollars per month salary. He then came to Noblesville, via Indianapolis and the old flat-iron railway, and arrived here Nov. 12, 1855. He worked at farm labor one and one-half miles northeast of Noblesville for A. R. Candow, a farmer, for six months, and for George F. Connor. Later he worked in a grain warehouse for David Gibson, the agent for T. & J. W. Goff, extensive grain buyers, millers and dealers of Aurora, Ind. Mr. Wild rented their warehouse in 1858, and bought corn and wheat for the firm, and remained with them four years. He then engaged in milling with Levi Sohl, of Indianapolis, buying the bank mill of J. L. W. Evans. Mr. Wild remained in the milling business until 1867, and then purchased the old Connor farm, where he had worked on first coming to the county. This farm, adjoining Noblesville, was a fine property, and consisted of 220 acres. Mr. Wild laid out this land and sold it in parcels for factory purposes.

Mr. Wild has been an extensive builder. He erected his first house in Noblesville, a fine residence, at that time the finest in Noblesville. In 1867 he built a large two-story brick residence, costing nearly $10,000, near the railroad depot, and has since built several other residences in that neighborhood. He was elected school trustee in 1870, and built the Second Ward schoolhouse, still the best schoolhouse in Noblesville, constructed solidly of brick and stone. It cost $26,800, furnished.

He also built the block adjoining the Citizens Bank, and superintended the building thereof, the State Bank being located in this block. In 1880 Mr. Wild built the stone front block now occupied by A. W. Truitt and Samuel Test-scher, and also built, in 1888, the block where the Wainwright Trust Company is now located. Mr. Wild located the first factory in Noblesville, the Strawboard Works, taking $15,000 in stock, besides giving the company twenty acres of land. He also superintended the erection of the American Strawboard Works, which is now the best factory in Noblesville. In 1895 Mr. Wild built Wild's Opera House, one of the best for the time in the State of Indiana. He also erected fifteen smaller dwelling houses, all of good construction, and, of their class, the best in Noblesville. Mr. Wild may be well called the largest builder in the city.

This is a wonderful record of a poor boy from Germany, of very limited education, who, when he came to America, did not understand a word of the English language. He began life in Hamilton county at the age of twenty-one years, as a farm hand, with no knowledge of business. He has also lost between $40,000 and $50,000 through his confidence in human nature, and his kindness in assisting his fellow-men. In 1903 Mr. Wild built on East Connor street the first residence in Noblesville built in the modern style of architecture, for his new home. He has sold much of his property, but still owns the opera house and a block of land built up with a row of fine residences, a business block on East Connor street, and six residences and twelve acres of land in the corporation.

In political opinions he was originally a Jacksonian Democrat. In 1856 he voted for James Buchanan, and later for the war Democrat, Stephen A. Douglas. He voted for Abraham Lincoln on the occasion of his second term, and since that has voted the Republican ticket. He has been too busy a man to take any interest in politics so far as being a candidate for any official position.

Mr. Wild was married (first) in Noblesville, March 3, 1858, to Margaret Barth, born in Baden, Germany, Aug. 2, 1839, daughter of Bernard Barth, who came to America with his family and settled on a farm in Jackson, Hamilton county. Here both he and his wife died. Their children were: Christina, Caroline, Elizabeth, Margaret, Rhinehart, Charles and Louis. Mr. Wild, by his first wife, was the father of: Emma S., born Nov. 28, 1858; John F., Sept. 9, 1860; Dorothy K., in 1864; Leonard G., in September, 1868; and Margaret, in 1872. The first wife of Mr. Wild died March 23, 1878, and he married (second), Aug. 20, 1885, in Noblesville, Mrs. Martha H. Pontious, daughter of Dr. B. F. and Emily (Harlan) Coffin. Mr. Wild is a member of the Masonic fraternity, of Noblesville, having joined that order in 1857, and he has attained the thirty-second degree. He is also a member of the I. O. O. F. In religious belief he is a Lutheran, and is a consistent attendant of that church.

TAYLOR E. MCCOY, a well-known farmer of Anderson, belongs to a family of pioneer stock on both sides, and one that has been connected with practically the whole period of development for the State of Indiana. He was born in Butler county, Ohio, son of John and Lydia (Clendenning) McCoy. Both families were of Scotch descent.

Alexander McCoy, grandfather of Taylor E., accompanied his father from Pennsylvania to Butler county, Ohio, about 1808-10, when he was a boy. When they passed through Cincinnati, then a mere hamlet, they were offered a strip of land where the city now stands, in exchange for a yoke of oxen, but refused. They settled in Butler county, where Alexander grew up, married Miss Elizabeth Long, and cleared up a good farm of 120 acres. His wife was born in Pennsylvania of Dutch stock, in 1791, and her father was one of the Ohio pioneers. He and Alexander McCoy built the first log house on Indian Creek, on the uplands, five miles west of the Indian trading post, Hamilton. Both Mr. McCoy and his brother-in-law, Minor Long, were in the Indian wars and they started on the march for Tippecanoe to take part in that battle, but were prevented from reaching there by a swollen stream. Alexander McCoy reached but middle life, but his wife lived until 1871, dying aged eighty years. They were members of the United Brethren Church. They were the parents of four children: Margaret, unmarried, who reached the age of eighty; John; Theodore; and Alexander.

John McCoy was born on the old homestead in Butler county, April 5, 1824, received a limited education in the schools of that day and at the age of fourteen he had to take the responsibility of the family on his shoulders, after his father's death. He did much of the clearing on the new farm, and supported the family until he was twenty, when he married and made his own home. His worldly possessions then consisted of seventy-five cents and a horse, and he sold the horse for enough to build and furnish a log cabin on his mother's farm. He lived there some years, then rented a farm near by for three years, and in 1856 moved to Indiana. He settled in Springfield township, Franklin county, and although it was but eighteen miles, it was considered "way out in Indiana." He moved his effects in wagons, and made his home on a tract of eighty-two and one-half acres, which he bought and cleared. This he added to until he had a good farm of 160 acres.

During the Civil war John McCoy raised a company at Mt. Carmel, which became Company H, 37th Ind. V. I., and of this he was captain, but after four months' service he was obliged to resign, as he could not stand the marching, owing to his great weight; he was six feet four inches tall, and weighed 300 pounds. Returning home he became a stock raiser and dealer, buying cattle, which he drove to Cincinnati for sale. He was also in the butcher business at Mt. Carmel for several years. Mr. McCoy was prosperous, and at his death left a good property and no debts. In politics he was one of the original Republicans, and was an active politician, although he held no offices.

John McCoy was married in 1846, to Miss Lydia Clendenning, who was born in County Fermanagh, Ireland, Feb. 3, 1828. Her parents came to America in 1833, for their health, and settled at Springfield, Ohio, but both died three years later of consumption. They passed away within a week of each other, and were buried in the same grave. There were four children left, John, Thomas, James and Lydia, and the two latter were brought up by an uncle, John Clendenning. Mrs. McCoy remained with him until she was sixteen years old. Both Mr. and Mrs. McCoy were Methodists, and assisted in the support of their church, and contributed $200 for a new building. They were the parents of eight children: (1) Ann Eliza married Arthur Clarkson, of State Line City, Ohio. (2) Thomas Alexander served six months in the 86th O. V. I., was three months in the 134th Ind. V. I., and then being wounded in the knee in a skirmish, was discharged. He has never recovered from the lameness. (3) Taylor E. is mentioned below. (4) Elizabeth married the late Samuel Sering, and resides in Anderson. (5) Amanda Jane became Mrs. Francis M. Gates, of Anderson. (6) Margaret died at the age of eighteen. (7) James. (8) Emma married William Coulthard, of Ohio.

Taylor E. McCoy was born in Butler county, Ohio, Oct. 17, 1848, and was six years old when his father settled in Franklin county. He was educated there, going first to school in a little log cabin, and then in a large frame school house, but he received little instruction as he could attend but in the winter months. In the summer time he worked on the farm and drove cattle for his father. At the age of sixteen, in April, 1865, he enlisted at Brookville, and was mustered in at Indianapolis as a private in Company F, 146th Ind. V. I., to serve three years or during the war. He was mustered out Aug. 29, 1865, at the end of the struggle, after nine months' service in Hancock's Corps in the Shenandoah Valley, and around Baltimore, thus seeing the fearful devastation of that beautiful region. Except for one week in an accommodation hospital, Mr. McCoy was in active service all the time. He was the youngest man in the regiment who carried a musket, being just over sixteen years old. At that time he was five feet eleven inches in height, and weighed 150 pounds, while now he stands six feet one and three-fourths inches bare-footed.

After the war Mr. McCoy returned home, worked on the farm and ran a butcher's shop until 1871, when he married. He then settled at Thorntown, Boone county, Ind., where he was in business as a butcher for fourteen years, and then returned to take charge of the homestead for five years. Another year he spent at the William Seal farm, and in 1892 bought his present home, which he has greatly improved. He has repaired the house, built a new barn, drained the land, set out a quantity of small fruits, and made it into a beautiful place. It is situated just four and one-half miles from Anderson. Mr. McCoy is a straight-forward, upright man, highly esteemed for his fine character. He is a Republican and cast his first vote for U. S. Grant for his first term. He is an unaffiliated member of the I. O. O. F. Both he and his wife belong to the First Presbyterian Church.

Mr. McCoy was married March 6, 1871, in Franklin county, to Miss Martha A. Seal, who was born there in Springfield township, Oct. 25, 1851, to William and Rebecca (Varner)

Seal. The Seal family is of English descent, and settled first in Virginia.

William Seal, Sr., grandfather of Mrs. McCoy, came from Virginia, and is thought to have settled in Springfield township, Franklin county, as early as 1809. He was accompanied by his wife, whose maiden name was Eliza Owen, and his oldest son is said to have been born the year of their arrival in Indiana. William Seal entered a large tract of land and finally became so extensive a land owner, that he had three farms adjoining, each of 160 acres, beside 220 acres in Brookville township, where his son Herman lived. He had also given 160 acres near Mt. Carmel to his son, James. He had one of the first stills in that region, and later erected a larger one. He became very wealthy, built a large two-story brick house on Big Cedar Creek, and bought the first cooking stove in the county. His wife, Eliza (Owen) Seal, was noted among the pioneers for her healing skill, and would ride miles on horseback to visit the sick through the surrounding country. She delighted to recount her experiences among the pioneers. Indians frequently came about her cabin to beg, and on one occasion an Indian came for bread. She told him she had none, but showed him a loaf baking in the oven which she intended to give him when it was done. He did not understand and was very angry and knocked over the oven. When her son Harrison was three weeks old, he was stolen and carried away by the Indians, but some time after he was rescued near Lafayette. The children born to William and Eliza Seal were: Harrison, James, John, William, Eliza, Harriet and Hannah. The parents both lived to extreme old age, and died at their home, Mrs. Seal reaching the age of eighty.

William Seal, Jr., was born in Franklin county, Oct. 5, 1822, and was brought up to be a farmer. His father gave him 160 acres and he bought 120 more, becoming a wealthy and respected citizen. He married Miss Rebecca Varner, daughter of Joseph and Martha (Drum) Varner. Her parents were both of Pennsylvania Dutch stock, and were pioneer settlers in Washington county, Ohio. The children born to William and Rebecca Seal were: Martha A., George Franklin, John Wilford, Emma, Alice and Ida Bell. William Seal, Jr., was a Jacksonian Democrat in politics, and active in local matters, serving as constable in his town and in other minor offices. During war times he was editor of the Franklin County Democrat, in Brookville. Mr. Seal lived until December, 1890, passing away at his home at the age of sixty-eight years.

ELDER ANDREW YOUNCE, who is well known in Eaton, Ind., for the great and good work he has done as a minister of the Christian Church, as well as an honored veteran of the Rebellion, was born March 19, 1831, in Miami county, Ohio, son of John and Nancy (Knife) Younce.

John Younce was born in 1809, in Kentucky, son of Philip and Peggie (Burkett) Younce, the former a native of North Carolina. Philip Younce took part in the Indian wars and assisted in building the fort at Fort Wayne. He first, however, settled in Kentucky, and thence removed to Miami county, Ohio, where he cleared a farm and where all of his children were born: John, Joseph, George, Abraham, Eli, Davis, Katie and Polly. He was a member of the Dunkard or German Baptist Church, and preached for many years in Miami county.

John Younce, father of Elder Andrew, went as a child to Miami county, Ohio, where he received a common school education and was reared to the work of the farm, also learning the carpenter's trade. He was married near Milton, Miami county, Ohio, to Nancy Knife, born in Pennsylvania. After marriage they lived at the home in Miami, but later removed to Indiana, and here six of the children were born: Philip, Benjamin, Mahala, Andrew, John F. and Margaret. Amy, Catherine, Joseph and Eli were born in Delaware county. The journey to Indiana in 1840 was made by John Younce in a two-horse wagon, the trip consuming three days. He settled one mile west of Eaton, buying between 500 and 600 acres, for which he paid but five or six dollars an acre. He cleared 160 acres of this land, and first built a log house and later a frame one, in the latter of which his death occurred in his fifty-sixth year. He was a well-known Dunkard minister, beginning to preach in Miami county, Ohio, and later he organized the Dunkard Church in the vicinity of Eaton. The first church was one of logs in the woods, but later a frame church was erected.

Andrew Younce was ten years of age when he came with the family to Delaware county, Ind., and he can well remember the journey and the camping by the roadside at night. In Ohio he had attended the district school and after coming to Indiana he attended a log school house with slab seats and a six-foot chimney of stick and clay and a large open fireplace. Mr. Younce can remember many amusing incidents of his school days, one of which occurred at a Christmas time. The boys who attended the school were sons of German Baptist people, and their teacher, George Babb, was a minister of that church. At this Christmas time, the lads barred their teacher out in order to force him to treat, but instead he went and got the directors, James and Samuel Galbraith and James Younce, who climbed in and opened the door for him. At another time the boys caught Mr. Babb and tied him to a tree, but he could not be made to stand treat. After completing his education, Mr. Younce worked on the farm for some time and learned the cooper's and carpenter's trades. He was fifteen years of age when he went with his father to Madison county, and there he was married Aug. 25, 1849, to Anna Maria Ridenour, born in Indiana about 1830, daughter of Joseph Ridenour, a pioneer of Fall Creek township. After marriage Mr. Younce settled in Huntsville, Madison county, Ind., where he worked at the cooper's trade until 1865, when he enlisted at Pendleton, Ind., as a member of Company F, 147th Ind. V. I., for one year or during the war, and served until honorably discharged at Indianapolis, Ind., in August, 1865, having been mustered out at Harper's Ferry, Va. His services were in the Shenandoah Valley, mostly consisting of guard duty, and he was promoted to be corporal and duty sergeant. He was never wounded, nor was he in the hospital, but he contracted lung trouble from which he has never fully recovered. He was a brave, cheerful soldier, and did his duty faithfully and well. After his return to Indiana he located in Delaware county, settling southwest of Eaton, buying twenty acres of land. There was a hewed log house on the place, and there he lived for two years, at the end of which time he located in Eaton, where he has lived ever since. For many years he was engaged at cooperating and carpentering, and had his shop at his home, employing four men, making barrels, and assisting in erecting many of the houses of the locality, as well as farm buildings. He began preaching in the Christian Church in 1866, and was ordained at Royertown that year, organizing a congregation at that place, where he built a church, as well as one at Red Key. He also assisted in building a church near Mill Grove, one near Hartford, one two miles east of Muncie, one five miles west of Muncie, and one at Eaton. He is a man whose earnestness and piety have made him a power in the community. Not only is he a clear and convincing preacher and spiritual teacher, but he is also an able administrator, as the material prosperity of his congregation shows.

Mrs. Younce died May 15, 1872, the mother of these children: John, Joseph, Emerillis (who died in 1865), Sarah Alice, Eliza Jane, Alonzo, Benjamin Franklin, Ida May and Ardena Christmas. Elder Younce was married (second) to Rebecca Roe (nee Beekman), a widow of Jay county, Ind. By her former husband, Wesley Roe, she had two children: Margaret and Mamie.

NATHANIEL HARRIS JONES. In Clark township, Johnson county, there was probably no man who had a more unique and interesting history than Nathaniel Harris Jones. Not alone in events, but also in the personality of the individual, there is much of interest. His career throughout was marked with originality, and environment and associations—instead of molding the man—as is commonly the case—seemed to have but little influence over him. He rose superior to the conditions which surrounded him in early life, and seemed wholly unmindful of the strong bands and ties which shaped the after lives of his childhood's friends.

Born in Smyth county, Va., Aug. 31, 1830, he was one of eleven children born to Joseph Glasgow and Jane (Massey) Jones, both natives of Virginia. There were seven sons and four daughters in the family, of whom, however, but two are now living, Nancy Jane, widow of James Netherly, of Smyth county, Virginia; and George Washington, of Rockcastle county, Kentucky.

Joseph Jones, the father, enlisted in the War of 1812, when but eighteen years old, and served with great devotion to the cause. Upon leaving the army he learned the blacksmith's trade, which he followed for the next twenty years in connection with the business of farming. He also did considerable wagon making, in which business he was highly proficient. He died in Grayson county, Virginia, in March, 1882, in his eighty-seventh year; his wife died in 1854 at the age of fifty-four years. Both were devoted Methodists, and highly esteemed by all who knew them.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. Jones was Lewis Jones, who claimed bonnie Scotland as the country of his nativity, and he was an early settler in Virginia, following farming as an occupation. He was married in the State of Pennsylvania, whence he removed, his wife's given name being Katie. She was of German descent, and remembered hearing the famous salute fired at the close of the Revolutionary war. He died in Smyth county, Virginia, the father of two daughters and seven sons.

The maternal grandfather of Mr. Jones was a native of Virginia, of English descent. His daughter Jane was left an orphan when but a child, and hence was unable to give much, if any, history of the family.

Mr. Jones was reared upon a farm in the historic old state of Virginia, and when he had reached the age of eighteen, he began learning the tanner's trade, an occupation he followed for the ensuing nine years. In 1857 he came to Indiana and located in Franklin township, Johnson county, and remained there until 1861. He then purchased a farm of forty acres in Clark township, which he partly cleared, improved and sold, and with the money purchased another farm of eighty-one acres, on the line of Clark and Franklin townships, where he lived for four years. Having an opportunity to dispose of this farm at a handsome profit, he sold it, and purchased his late home and farm of 159 acres, located about five and a quarter miles northeast of Franklin, and there he lived until his death, Oct. 6, 1906.

On March 31, 1859, Mr. Jones was married to Fannie E. Dungan, the daughter of Elisha and Lurana (Tilson) Dungan, and to them four children were born: Melissa Kate, Ralph Waldo, William Payne, and Livingston. Melissa Kate (now deceased) married C. L. Van Nuys, resided about three and one-half miles from Franklin, and had two children, Cornelius La Mark and Jeannette Hellene Elizabeth. Ralph Waldo, formerly a successful teacher, and principal of the schools at Chatham, N. J., is now studying for a degree in Chicago University, and is held in high esteem. William Payne, who married Olive Winship, lives in Clark township, and has two sons, Charles Winship and Nelson Davis. Livingston, conducting a prosperous business as an undertaker in South Bend, Ind., married Angie Hobart, of Pemberville, Ohio, and has two sons, Nathaniel Hobart and Nelson Lee.

On Sept. 16, 1857, Mr. Jones left his occupation of tanner, in which he had been engaged at Marion, Va., and commenced a long journey by foot, going through Cumberland Gap, by way of Louisville and Indianapolis, to St. Louis. From there he traversed five or six counties in Northeastern Missouri, and then walked back to Indianapolis, in the winter of 1858, a distance of one thousand miles. He accepted employment from an old gentleman by the name of Stephen Tilson, and worked for him by the month, until Oct. 13, 1858, when he returned to Lexington, Ky., this time by rail, and from there he walked back to Marion, Va., a distance of five hundred miles. Few men would have dared attempt this long journey afoot, but Mr. Jones greatly enjoyed the freedom and outdoor life, and profited greatly in his physical condition as the result of his arduous exercise. On his arrival in Marion, he purchased a little gray mare, and with a neighbor boy named Watson, rode and tied all the way back to Franklin, Ind., in the year 1859. This faithful mare was four years old at that time, and Mr. Jones worked her for twenty-nine years afterward, and she was the first horse he had die among about forty horses that he owned.

Mr. Jones was a long a faithful member of the Methodist Protestant Church, in which he held a prominent place, and was much beloved, as is his widow. He was a member of the quarterly conference, and served on various church boards in the Indiana conference. He could always be counted on in prayer meeting and Sunday-school, and was an inspiration to his pastor. In his political affiliations he long supported the men and measures of the Republican party, and in the early sixties served for four or five years as trustee.

Though well past the three score and ten mark, with a long life of usefulness crowned with success unfolded before him in memory's record, his experiences of earlier days must have afforded him a high degree of satisfaction. At any rate, those who long knew him, recognized his worth, his power or originality and freedom from the commonplace restraints, and held him to be one of the best representatives of the county, an exemplary Christian gentleman, respected by all, and known affectionately as "Uncle Jones."

CHARLES ROY ARMSTRONG, M. D., a rising physician and surgeon of Thorntown, Boone county, when he began his professional career chose as his sphere of action his native town, for he was born in Thorntown, April 20, 1874, son of George and Sarah A. (Haworth) Armstrong, natives of Indiana.

The Armstrong family is of Scotch-Irish descent. Dr. Armstrong's grandfather, Isaac N., was a native of Maryland, who came to Indiana at an early day and settled first in Franklin county, and in 1866 in Boone. He was a blacksmith by trade and always followed that calling together with farming, until 1903, when he left his farm and took up his residence in Thorntown. By his wife, Mary Ann Sparks, he had four children, but two died in infancy, and a son, Francis N., is the only one now living. On the maternal side Dr. Armstrong is of German descent. His grandfather, Warner A. Haworth, was a farmer from Pennsylvania, who moved first into Ohio and then in 1854 into Indiana, where he settled about four miles northwest of Thorntown and lived until shortly before his death, which occurred in 1904, when he was eighty-eight years old. By his first wife, Sophia Sill, he had three children; but by his second wife, Susan, he had none.

George Armstrong was always a farmer. Reared in Franklin county, he accompanied his father to Boone county in 1866, and lived on the farm there which his father purchased, all the rest of his life. He was killed by lightning in 1892. He and his wife, who is still living, were both Methodists. The children born to them were: Charles Roy; and Laura, the wife of Bert Aldridge, of Thorntown.

Charles Roy Armstrong was brought up on the family homestead in Boone county, attended first the district schools, then the Thorntown high school, and in the latter won by his admirable work a scholarship in Wabash College, which he entered in the fall of 1891, having graduated from the high school the preceding June. When he decided to take up the study of medicine, he chose the Homeopathic Medical College of Missouri, and received his diploma therefrom in 1896. The young doctor immediately returned to Thorntown and opened an office, where from the very first his success has been most gratifying. He is a brilliant student in his profession, a most skillful physician and surgeon, and a popular practitioner. He keeps thoroughly abreast of the times and belongs to the County, State and National Medical Societies. He owns not alone his fine home in Thorntown, but also his office building, which latter he erected in 1899. Since then he has acquired a farm of 160 acres. In 1907 he took a course in the Post-Graduate Medical Department of the University of New York.

Dr. Armstrong has been married since 1899, when he was united on the 26th of April to Miss Britta M. Jacks, daughter of Frank and Grizella (Baird) Jacks. Two children have been born to them, a son who lived only a short time and a daughter, Mary Louise. The Doctor and his wife both belong to the Presbyterian Church, in which he is an elder. In politics he is a Democrat, and served one term as coroner of the county. Fraternally he is a thirty-second degree Scottish Rite Mason, is master of Thorntown Lodge, No. 113, A. F. & A. M., and belongs to Osceola Lodge, No. 173, I. O. O. F.

PERRY MILLER, a substantial farmer of Mount Pleasant township, and a veteran of the Civil war, is one of Indiana's own sons, born near Middletown, Feb. 15, 1844, son of Peter and Mary (Hayes) Miller.

Mr. Miller's ancestors on both sides came from West Virginia. His maternal grandmother was a Fleming, and belonged to a pioneer family of that State. His paternal grandfather was born in that State, and represented old American stock. He was a farmer by occupation and died in Fairmont, Marion county, about 1807.

Peter Miller, father of Perry, was born in West Virginia in 1820. He remained in his native State until after his marriage to Miss Mary Hayes, but before 1840 he moved his whole family to Indiana, making the trip in wagons. He rented land for a while, occupying forty acres of wooded land in Mount Pleasant township, adjoining the present Miller homestead. He cleared this and built a cabin, but later moved to an eighty-acre tract also in the woods, which necessitated his beginning anew the clearing of a farm. On his place he built a frame house and remained there until the death of his first wife, when he sold out. In 1859 he married again, but died a few years later in Mount Pleasant township, when between sixty and seventy years of age. His children all by the first union were: Eliza, Harriet, Henry, Jackson, Alexander, Simon, Perry and Noah.

Perry Miller's home life ended when he was fifteen years of age, for after his father's second marriage he made his own way in the world, going off to do farm work. Previous to this he had worked at home much of the year, but attended school three months each winter, his only opportunity for an education. On July 4, 1861, he enlisted at Muncie, Ind., in Company E., 19th Ind. V. I., under Capt. L. B. Wilson, a part of what later became known as the "Iron Brigade." On July 13, 1864, at the end of his three years term he was honorably discharged, but in less than a year, on April 5, 1865, he re-enlisted in Company I, 8th U. S. Vet. Inf., and served until discharged at Washington, D. C., April 6, 1866. He was on duty in Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New York, and participated among other battles in those of Gainesville, the second battle of Bull Run, South Mountain, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Fitzhughes Crossing, Gettysburg and Chancellorsville. At the last one he was on the picket line, close to the Confederate forces where he heard in the darkness of the night the single exchange of volleys during which Stonewall Jackson was killed. At the battle of Gettysburg the Iron Brigade made the first bayonet charge in the engagement, receiving the cavalry. They were so completely concealed by a field of ripe wheat that they were within a few feet of the Confederates when they rose for the charge and the whole of Gen. Archer's brigade was captured. The Confederates fired only a few shots, many of their guns being still loaded when they were taken. Not one of the enemy escaped. Later the Iron Brigade was outflanked by a Confederate battery of six pieces and they were obliged slowly to retreat. Three times they made a stand but in vain. They in their turn suffered fearfully, the 19th alone losing in killed, wounded or prisoners, all but fifty out of 250 men. Mr. Miller fired about 100 shots and then fell, wounded in the right thigh, by a minie ball. Only a few minutes later, a party of stretcher bearers in charge of a doctor came along, but went by without heeding his entreaties. Mr. Miller called after the Doctor. "If you are not a damn coward, you will take me off the field," at which the doctor stopped and ordered his men to return, but they kept on, and it was only when they were threatened by his revolver that they obeyed his order and picked up Mr. Miller. After nearly a week in the hospital, during which his wound was dressed, after he himself had pulled a piece of clothing from it with a pair of forceps, he was taken to a Baltimore hospital for a week, and then removed to Howard hospital in the city of Washington. On leaving there nine months later, he was placed in the Veteran Reserve Corps, and served at Point Lookout two months, then at Trenton for three months, while the New Jersey troops were being mustered out, and for two months at Hart Island, Long Island Sound, when the New York troops were mustered out. He was then stationed at Washington doing guard duty at the War Department, and during this time attended the trial and execution of Capt. Wirz, commandet of Andersonville Prison, and was also one of the prison guard of Mrs. Surratt, tried and executed for complicity in the assassination of President Lincoln.

Returning to Indiana Mr. Miller soon left again, this time going to Vermilion county, Ill., where he worked for one season, and then went back home. In 1869 he married and settled on a rented farm west of Yorktown, but after only one year there, he moved and occupied a log cabin for a time, while he built a frame house in the town proper. He had previously had some experience as a carpenter, a part of it during his early days in the army in 1861, when he helped to build Fort Craig on Arlington Heights, and a boat and chain bridge above Washington, and now in Yorktown he followed that calling for a while, and also did some work on the railroad. In 1873 he returned to farming again, bought forty acres in Mount Pleasant township, and settled down permanently. As he got his land clear and under cultivation, he added more, until he owned 160 acres, now occupied by himself and sons. At first he built a frame house, but in 1893 he put up a substantial brick residence, constructed almost wholly from material on the farm. Having clay on his land he had previously rented a tile mill where he made and burned hard pressed brick. These he used for his home, making the walls hollow. The timber, much of it oak and cherry, came from his farm, and only part of the woodwork finishings had to be procured elsewhere. The farm is well drained and ditched, more than $700 having been spent in drainage. The place contains several fine springs, and Mr. Miller also has a fish pond. A Republican in politics, Mr. Miller has not taken a specially active part, but has done a good citizen's service on both grand and petit juries. His prosperity is due solely to his own efforts, aided by his wife, for he inherited no property whatever, and has made his way against obstacles. But industry and economy have won their just reward, and to-day Mr. Miller owns, besides his farm, a livery and one dwelling in Yorktown and two lots in Muncie. He and his wife are both members of the Christian Church, in which he has been a deacon.

The helpmate to whom Mr. Miller owes so much was Miss Isabella Warfel, born in Center township, Delaware Co., Ind., daughter of Jonas and Samantha (Baxley) Warfel. They were married in Mount Pleasant township March 11, 1869 and nine children have been born to their union: (1) Elmer E. married Miss Harriet Kirby, and lives in Yorktown. (2) Joseph was accidentally killed in Anderson by a train. (3) Spencer married Miss Jane Relford, lives on the homestead and has two children, Herman Dale and Mabel. (4) Samantha married M. Z. Rudy, a horse-dealer in Yorktown. (5) Edmund married Miss Nora Kohn, and is a glass worker in Yorktown. (6) Oliver P. married Miss Bessie E. Richmond, and lives on the home farm. (7) William E. (8) Raymond and (9) Carl W. are all at home. The whole family have received good educations, and the eldest son is a graduate of the Commercial College in Delaware, Ohio.

The Warfel family, to which Mrs. Miller belongs, is of Dutch stock, and came to Indiana from Pennsylvania. Daniel Warfel, grandfather of Mrs. Miller, was a farmer of Lancaster county, Pa., in which place he was born, and remained there until 1840. In addition to his farming he was a skillful stoneworker and was so engaged for many years, both in the east and in the west. He married Miss Fannie Warfel, also of Pennsylvania, and they had nine children as follows: Amelia; Jonas; Emanuel; Tobias and Adam, deceased; Andrew; Daniel and Elizabeth, deceased; and Jacob. When he brought his family to Indiana, he settled in Delaware county and eventually became the owner of between 300 and 400 acres. He built a large two-story brick house, had a well improved farm and made it his home until his death in 1860. His wife survived until 1870. They were Mennonites in their religious views.

Jonas Warfel was born in Lancaster county, June 19, 1819, and reared to agricultural pursuits. His tastes, however, inclined him to the teacher's profession, and though he enjoyed few facilities for getting a regular education he accomplished so much alone that he was quite well equipped for teaching. In all he taught eleven terms, mainly during the winters. He was about twenty years old when he accompanied his parents to Indiana, and after his marriage there he bought eighty acres in Harrison township, and clearing it of timber, made a good farm of it, while he also found time to do considerable work for his father. Later he bought 100 acres in Mount Pleasant township, and lived there till late in life, when he retired and took up his residence in Yorktown. There he died at the age of eighty-one, occupied to the last in his own business affairs and interested in current events. Beginning with nothing, he made his property entirely by his own hard work and skillful financial managing. He was one of the parties interested in the Yorktown Corporate Company.

Mr. Warfel was married July 14, 1842, to Miss Samantha Baxley. She was born April 28, 1822, in Greene county, Ohio, daughter of Julius and Catherine (Turner) Baxley. The father was a pioneer of Mount Pleasant township, where he took up 160 acres in 1839. He was a native of Tennessee, while his wife was born in Ohio. He died May 31, 1862, and his wife died Oct. 21, 1887. They were the parents of: Samantha, Susannah, Mary, Elizabeth, Jane and Hiram. To the union of Jonas and Samantha Warfel were born thirteen children: (1) Alfred enlisted for the Civil war in Company E, 19th Ind. V. I., and served two years. After being ill with both measles and smallpox he was honorably discharged and went home, where he died six weeks later. (2) Catherine married James A. Jester. (3) Fannie is deceased. (4) Isabella became Mrs. Miller. (5) David is deceased. (6) Adam. (7) Dottie is deceased. (8) Jonas. (9) Lizzie is deceased. (10) William and (11) Samantha were twins. (12) Mark and (13) Daniel completed the family. The family were Methodists in religious belief, and the father served as class leader of that church, which he had joined in 1837. In politics he was a Republican, and for some time served as justice of the peace in his township.

RUFUS WILLIAMS, one of the most prominent churchmen of Indiana, is also one of the most successful farmers of his section of the country. Years of faithful labor, joined with his unquestionable integrity, have placed Mr. Williams in a position where he is implicitly trusted by many churches and fraternal organizations, and have given him a most enviable prominence among his fellow men. Beginning life's voyage unaided, he has managed so well that now, just passing his prime of physical strength, he has gained the port which his desires of many years have fixed as his goal, and withal has accomplished more than most men who run the full course of earthly existence. He was born in Clark township, Johnson Co., Ind., the place of his present residence, April 2, 1837.

Jackson Williams, father of Rufus, was a native of Tennessee, and his wife Sarah (Parr) Williams, was born in the same State. Of this union thirteen children were born, nine sons and four daughters, of whom eight are now surviving, as follows: Delilah, wife of Daniel Britton; Joel; Clayborn; Carrie, widow of Lee Trout; Elihu; David; Eva, wife of W. B. Kerlin; and Rufus. Jackson Williams, the father, was a farmer all his life, and came to Indiana with his parents in the year 1816, locating in Wayne county, where they took up government land. From this place they came five years later to Johnson county, settling in Edinburg, where they again took up government land. In 1830 the family removed to Clark township, where Jackson Williams lived until his death, which occurred in 1877, at the age of about sixty-two years, his wife surviving him and reaching the age of seventy-five years, her demise occurring in the year 1891. Both were members of the Methodist Protestant Church, in which he served long and ably as trustee.

The paternal grandfather of Rufus Williams was Allen Williams, who claimed the State of North Carolina as his birth place. He first moved to Tennessee, where he married, and from there came to Indiana in 1816. He died in Clark township at the age of about seventy-two years, leaving a large family. He was a genuine pioneer both in Tennessee and Indiana, and was noted for his ability in all the varied work of the early settler and also for his undaunted courage. He was with General Jackson at Horseshoe Bend, where he rendered valiant service. His father was Amos Williams, a Quaker, who settled in Pennsylvania with William Penn, and Linear Williams, father of Amos, came from Wales, in very early days and settled in Pennsylvania.

The maternal grandfather of Rufus Williams was David Parr, a native of Tennessee, who also was a pioneer in Johnson county, setting at Edinburg, where he entered land from the government, proceeding to clear and cultivate same. He moved into Clark township early in the thirties and died there, at about the age of sixty-five years, leaving a large family. He served with distinction at the battle of New Orleans in the war of 1812.

Rufus Williams has passed all of his life in the township where he was born, with the exception of about four years, during which he was located in the City of Franklin. His occupation has always been that of an agriculturist, in which he has shown decided ability. His early education was obtained in the old fashioned subscription schools, he having lived at home until about the time of his maturity, when he started his independent work by operating his father's farm for one year, and then that of his father-in-law, which is the place of his present residence, and which he bought at the death of Mr. Knapp. This farm consists of 160 acres, and originally there were no buildings upon it except a small log house and log out-buildings. These he has replaced with buildings of modern design and exceedingly beautiful and home-like. He also acquired forty-one acres adjoining, so that he now has a highly productive and valuable farm.

On March 13, 1856, Mr. Williams was united in marriage to Emerine H. Knapp, daughter of Milton and Lucy (Yates) Knapp. Both of Mrs. Williams parents were born in the State of Kentucky and were there married, removing to Indiana in the year 1834, where they entered the farm which, as above stated, Mr. Williams now owns. Here they lived for ten years, moving to Spencer county, Ky., in 1863, where his wife Mrs. Knapp, who was born in 1810, lived until her death, May 8, 1904, aged ninety-four years. Mrs. Williams was one of five children, two sons and three daughters of whom only one is now living besides herself, Lyman Beecher Knapp, of Spencer county, Ky., who resides on the home farm. Milton Knapp was always a farmer, and died on the farm where he was born, which was entered from the government by his father George Knapp a native of Virginia. The maternal grandfather of Mrs. Williams was James Yates, also of Virginia, and an early settler in Spencer county, Ky., where he entered land, afterward dying at the age of sixty years, leaving a family of about eight children.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Williams are members of the Methodist Protestant Church in which they have occupied a prominent place for many years. Mr. Williams is a member of the Franklin Lodge No. 107, F. & A. M., and in politics he supports the men and measures of the Democratic party. He is now treasurer of the Preacher's Aid Society of the Methodist Protestant Church of the Indiana Conference, and has for a great many years held positions in the Church, being treasurer and steward for considerable periods, and also a delegate to the annual Conference a number of times, and class leader for a term or so. From this brief review it will be seen that he found time in his busy life to labor for others, and, moreover, to good advantage, as many of his brethren in the Church will testify. For this his reward has come in the high esteem in which he is held by one and all and in the satisfaction which comes to the honest man endeavoring to uplift and benefit his race.

HIRAM H. PALMER, one of the highly esteemed citizens of Anderson, Ind., belongs to an old English Puritan family of North Carolina. He was born Jan. 21, 1844, in Canton, Ohio, son of George and Catherine (Hoover) Palmer.

Christopher Palmer, grandfather of Hiram H., was a native of Lancaster county, Pa., but after marriage he removed with his family to Stark county, Ohio, near Canton, where he cleared up a farm of 250 acres, becoming one of the substantial citizens and good, practical farmers of that section. He served during the Mexican war. His children were: Christopher, John, Henry, George, Christina and Rebecca. The father of these children died on his farm in Ohio, an aged man.

George Palmer, father of Hiram H., was also a native of Lancaster county, Pa., and as a boy removed with his parents to near Canton, Ohio, where his agricultural operations were commenced, but in 1844 he removed to near Auburn, in the woods of DeKalb county, Ind., making the trip by horses and wagons. There he cleared 120 acres of wild land, and he died on his farm aged seventy-two years. A Presbyterian in religious belief, he was a good and pious man, and assisted in building the church of his denomination in that section. In politics he was a Democrat.

Mr. George Palmer was twice married, and his first wife, who died in Ohio, left him these children: John, Elizabeth and Mariah. He married (second) Catherine Hoover, daughter of Judge Jacob Hoover (whose wife was a Nusbaum), for many years Judge of the Common Pleas Court of Stark county. To this union there were born: Elias, Lucinda, Margaret, Matilda, Lewis, Hiram H., Mary, Anthony and Ferdinand.

Hiram H. Palmer was four years of age when the family located in Indiana, and he was reared amid pioneer surroundings in DeKalb county, attending the district school in the winter months and working on the farm during summers, as was the custom of the pioneer Indiana farmers' boys. He went to Auburn when about seventeen years old, and had worked for about one year at the trade of bricklayer, when, Aug. 6, 1862, he enlisted as a private of Company A, 100th Ind. V. I., to serve three years or during the war, his term of service expiring after two years and nine months. He was mustered out at Washington, D. C., June 8, 1865, receiving his honorable discharge at Indianapolis, Ind. He participated in the battles of Vicksburg, Jackson, Colliersville, Stockdale No. 4, Holly Springs, Corinth, Chattanooga, Missionary Ridge, Marietta, Atlanta Campaign, New Hope Church, Kennesaw Mountain, the last battle of Atlanta, Sherman's March to the Sea, Savannah, Goldsboro and Cumberland Gap. He took part in the Grand Review at Washington. At Missionary Ridge he was called by a Confederate soldier, who was wounded, and asked for a drink of water. As he was about to go, after having given his enemy all the water in his canteen, the Confederate raised his gun and attempted to shoot him, but the quick action of Lieut. Vesey of the 6th Iowa, who struck the Confederate on the head with his sword, probably saved Mr. Palmer's life. He received a scalp wound in the charge at Missionary Ridge, and was also slightly wounded in the left shoulder, which necessitated his confinement in the hospital at Memphis, Tenn., for one month. He was also in the hospital at Grand Junction, Tenn., for three months, suffering from typhoid fever with complications. He was ever a faithful, brave and active soldier, and earned promotion to the rank of duty sergeant, serving for about two months on the staff of General Grant, at Washington, about the time of the close of the war.

After the war was over Mr. Palmer returned to Auburn, Ind., and later worked at the slater's or roofer's trade in Toledo, Ohio, but again engaged in bricklaying, at which he continued for five years. In 1872 he went to Chicago, where two years were spent, at the end of which time he returned to Auburn for one year, then going again to Toledo, he remained there three years, and the next eighteen years were spent in Auburn in contracting. He has also resided in Fort Wayne, Muncie and Indianapolis, following contracting at all of these places, but in 1899 he came to Anderson, where he is still in active business, having erected many fine buildings here.

Mr. Palmer was married (first) July 23, 1871, at Fort Wayne, Ind., to Cordelia Worley, born near Massillon, Ohio, daughter of Samuel T. and Rebecca (Dickerkoot) Worley, and to this union there were born: George W., who served two years in the U. S. regular army; Milford S.; Harry W., who served in the Spanish-American war in Cuba with a good record; and Maggie A. The mother of these children died in December, 1886, in Fort Wayne. Mr. Palmer was married (second) at Fort Wayne, Ind., Aug. 14, 1893, to Mary C. Walker (nee Daly), born March 11, 1847, in Franklin county, Pa., daughter of William G. and Mary C. (Bowen) Daly, the former of Irish and the latter of German descent.

William G. Daly was born June 30, 1825, and died March 8, 1877. He was the son of William Griffith and Mary (Locke) Daly, natives of Ireland, who came to America and settled in Pennsylvania, the son being born in Franklin county. He owned a farm in that county, but sold it and located in Indiana Dec. 25, 1857, purchasing a farm of eighty acres in the woods of Noble county, half of which property he cleared. He sold this and soon after located in Whitley county, near Columbia City, where he was living in August, 1862, at the time of his enlistment in Company B, 74th Ind. V. I., for three years or during the war. He served until the close of the struggle, being honorably discharged at Washington. For eight months he was color bearer of his regiment, two other color-bearers having been shot, and while thus serving his country he received a wound from which he never fully recovered. He participated in the battles of Chickamauga, Bull Run, Chattanooga, Burnt Hickory, Cumberland Gap, Lookout Mountain, Raleigh, and the Atlanta Campaign, including Sherman's March to the Sea. He was married in Pennsylvania to Mary C. Bowen, born in 1827, in Germany, daughter of Jacob and Ann Mary Bowen, and she died Feb. 19, 1899, in the faith of the Dunkard Church. Mr. Daly was a Presbyterian. Jacob Bowen was educated in Germany for the Catholic priesthood, but on coming to this country became a weaver which trade he followed for some time, but later he engaged in agricultural pursuits in Noble county, Ind., where he died.

Mrs. Palmer's first marriage was at Columbia City, Whitley Co., Ind., Sept. 27, 1866, to Lewis J. Walker, a farmer of that county, and to them were born these children: John A., whose death occurred in his twenty-sixth year; Cora J., who died when twenty-one years of age; Ella S., who died aged fifteen years. Lewis J. Walker died in Columbia City, Ind. No children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Palmer.

Mr. Palmer is connected with the G. A. R., as officer of the day of Major May Post, of Anderson. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, at Muncie, and the I. O. O. F., at Fort Wayne. Mrs. Palmer is a member of the Woman's Relief Corps, and active in the proceedings of that organization. She and her husband are both active in the work of the Catholic Church in Anderson, of which they are consistent members and liberal supporters. They are very well known in society circles of the city, and have a large number of warm personal friends. Mr. Palmer is a Republican in his political belief, but takes only a good citizen's interest in public matters.

AARON RINKER. In the dark days of the Civil war, no section of the country made a more general response to the call for volunteers than did Indiana whose loyal sons made sturdy by their struggles in the wilderness proved themselves fine soldiers. One veteran of that conflict, now residing in Daleville, is Aaron Ricker, who was born in Henry county, east of Middletown, near Forest Hill, April 16, 1842, son of John and Jane (Clevenger) Rinker.

The paternal grandfather, George Rinker, of German stock, spent his early life in the Shenandoah Valley, Va., but joined the pioneers of Tennessee and settled at Shields Mill in the eastern part of that State, near Boulder Gap. As the tide of immigration flowed northward, the family moved on to Ohio, stopping near Urbana, and from there to Indiana, where they settled near Hagerstown, in Wayne county. But this, too, proved only a temporary residence, and George Rinker made his final settlement in Henry county, where he bought and cleared a farm lying about two miles east of Forest Hill. There he died when advanced in years. His children were as follows: John; Philip, who married Miss Betsey Dryer; Jacob; Katie, wife of a Mr. Stanley; and Rebecca, Mrs. Christian Painter. George Rinker and his wife were both members of the United Brethren Church, and earnest in its work. Either he or his father, it is uncertain which, served in the Revolution.

John Rinker was born before his father left Virginia. In Wayne county, Ind., he married Miss Jane Clevenger, who was probably born in Ohio. Mrs. Rinker came of a sturdy race, tradition telling that her grandfather Clevenger walked through Urbana, Ohio, when he was 104 years old. At Forest Hill John Rinker bought an unimproved farm of 160 acres, where he built a good cabin and partly cleared the land, after which he traded it in 1843 for other property east of Daleville. In this latter section he owned two wooded tracts of eighty acres each, which he cleared and developed into good farming property. He built a frame house and afterward a brick house, and resided there till his death in 1874, at the age of seventy years and ten months. Devoted members of the United Brethren Church, he and his wife welcomed every itinerant minister of that faith who visited that section, and their home, in which services were often held, was the Mecca of every such worker. In politics Mr. Rinker was a Democrat.

Aaron Rinker, son of John, was reared among pioneer surroundings and received only such education as the frontier offered. The only school near enough for him to attend was conducted by an old-time teacher who tried to make him learn by whipping him. Most of his youth was spent in work on the farm. When twenty years of age he volunteered, and March 27, 1862, at Muncie, Ind., became a private in Company B, 36th Ind. V. I., enlisting for three years, or for the war. Later he was assigned to Company K and afterward transferred to the 30th Ind. V. I. Except when invalidated, he was in active service for the full period, participating in the battles, skirmishes and marches of his regiment and was never captured by the enemy. His services extended over Tennessee, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Georgia and North Carolina, and he was in the battles of Corinth, Jonesboro, Franklin and Nashville as well as in the two great battles at Atlanta, besides all the skirmishes of that long campaign. While in Georgia Mr. Rinker made a 450 mile march from Athens, in that State, to Nashville, Tenn., and the very day after arriving there was sent on forty-two and a half miles further, lying in line that night on the pike between Nashville and Murfreesboro. He was wearing a new pair of shoes too small for him and these injured his feet and made the veins of his leg swell, resulting in permanent injury from which he has suffered greatly. For a week he lay in the hospital, in the old Female College there, and then spent a month in the convalescent camp at Nashville before rejoining his regiment. He was next assigned to the invalid corps at Louisville, was then detailed for prison hospital work at Dalton, and Camp Chase, Ohio, but finally rejoined his regiment at Louisville for active service. He was honorably discharged at the end of his term, March 29, 1865, at Shields Mill, Tenn., the old home of the family.

On Jan. 25, 1866, Aaron Rinker was married to Miss Wilhelmina Schlegel, who was born in Germany, June 1, 1846. In October of that year they settled on their present home, a place of some eighty acres, which Mr. Rinker bought at that time. There was a cabin on the place, which is still standing, and thirty acres had been partially cleared. It has all been cultivated now for many years, and Mr. Rinker has added forty acres to the property. Mr. and Mrs. Rinker have had three children, viz.: Clarence, who died at the age of nine years; Henry; and Maggie. The former, born Dec. 10, 1870, married Miss Josie Hopp, born in Delaware county, daughter of John and Emma (Myers) Hopp. They live on a farm near her father's home and have two children, Raymond and Fay. Miss Maggie Rinker married Charles Painter, a farmer living east of Midgetown, and they have one child, Elson. Mr. Rinker and his wife are members of the United Brethren Church and active in its work. In politics he is a Republican. A member of the G. A. R., he attended the national reunion at Washington, and he also visited the Buffalo Exposition, at both places taking a deep interest in the historical matter at hand. While on a visit to Canada the mementoes of the War of 1812 proved of equal interest. Mr. Rinker presents one of America's best types of loyal and honest citizenship, and his community may justly be proud of his record in war and peace alike.

Mrs. Rinker's parents were Henry and Margaret (Busch) Schlegel, the former born at Osler, Germany, Nov. 7, 1814. The family were of the farming class, but owned considerable property and were in good circumstances.

In 1838, Mr. Schlegel married Margaret, daughter of Frederick and Magdalena (Brightenstein) Busch, and remained in Germany farming till 1850. In that year he came to America with his family, sailing from Bremen for New York, the voyage lasting thirty-six days. The first two years the family lived at Chambersburg, Pa., after which they went to Indiana and lived five years on the State road, a mile west of Chesterfield. They finally located north of Daleville on an eighty-acre tract, partly cleared, where Mr. Schlegel made a good home. He died there, aged fifty-seven, while his wife lived to be eighty-four years, passing her last days with her daughter Johanna. They were members of the Dutch Protestant Church, Reformed. Mr. Schlegel was a good representative of his people, honest, straightforward, frugal and industrious. In his youth he served in the German army. There were five children in the family, Johanna, Henry, Wilhelmina, John Jacob and Carl.

NOAH MOCK, a leading agriculturist of Lawrence township, Marion county, Ind., who is engaged in operating his farm of thirty-nine acres, was born April 16, 1841, in Lawrence township, son of Henry and Irene (Bolander) Mock, and grandson of Michael Mock, the original Indiana pioneer of the family.

Henry Mock was born May 2, 1810, and was a boy when he came with his parents to Indiana. He was married in Lawrence township to Irene Bolander, born Jan. 11, 1818, in Clermont county, Ohio, daughter of John and Elizabeth (Fronk) Bolander, who were members of Pennsylvania Dutch families. After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Mock settled on an eighty-acre tract in the woods of Lawrence township, where he built a hewed log house, and there he died, July 29, 1849, aged thirty-eight years. His children were: Elizabeth, born Aug. 20, 1837; Noah, April 16, 1841; John, Dec. 8, 1843; Sarah Catherine, Aug. 31, 1849. After the death of her husband Mrs. Mock married (second) Henry Hoss.

Noah Mock received but few educational advantages, as he was obliged to leave school in order to assist in the work on the farm at the age of thirteen years. He was married when he was twenty-one, and settled on the home place of eighty acres, in which he owned an interest, living in a small frame house. The original hewed log house is still standing. On Jan. 1, 1862, Mr. Mock married, in Lawrence township, Sarah Catherine Apple, born in Lawrence township, not far from the present home of the family, Sept. 8, 1841, daughter of Solomon and Phæbe (Crumbaugh) Apple, and granddaughter of John Apple. Solomon Apple was born in Ohio and there married, and after the birth of two of his children, came to Indiana, and located on the farm now occupied by Lieutenant Apple. This farm he cleared from the woods, and he became one of the substantial men of his day, being honored and respected by all as an industrious, hard-working pioneer. His children were: George Washington, Andrew Jackson, Mary Jane, William M., Sarah Catherine, Rebecca Ellen, Ann Eliza and John H.

Mr. and Mrs. Mock spent six years on the old homestead, and then removed to their present farm. On this tract Mr. Mock has made many substantial improvements, erecting good buildings and supplying modern machinery for the carrying on of his work. In politics he is a Democrat, and has served as supervisor of his township. Fraternally he is connected with the I. O. O. F., in which he has passed all the chairs, including that of Noble Grand, and he has represented his lodge in the Grand Lodge of the State. Mrs. Mock is a member of the Christian Church at Oaklandon. To Mr. and Mrs. Mock have been born these children: Jeannette Clementine, March 9, 1863, married Edward Springer, a farmer of Lawrence township, and was the mother of four children—William Delbert, Jesse C., Nellie May and George E. (the mother died April 24, 1893); Mollie was born Oct. 5, 1866; William H., born Oct. 19, 1868, married Emma Cory, is a farmer in Lawrence township, and has four children—Chloe, Jose, Ernest and Archie; and George W., born Feb. 27, 1872, married Margaret Watson, and is a coal dealer in Indianapolis.

ALBERT HENRY VESTAL, ex-prosecuting attorney of Madison county, Ind., has been a lifelong resident of this section, having been born near Frankton, Madison county, Jan. 18, 1874, son of William and Mary (Jackson) Vestal. The Vestals are of English origin, and were among the Colonial settlers of Guilford county, N. C. The Jacksons are of Scotch-Irish descent, and of the same stock as the famous "Stonewall" Jackson, the Confederate leader, and they also are an old family of Guilford county.

William Vestal, father of Albert Henry

Vestal, came to Henry county, Ind., in 1866, and settled on a farm. In 1872 he moved to Frankton, where he bought an eighty-acre farm, which he improved and added to until he owned a fine farm of 160 acres, a valuable piece of property. Mr. Vestal is a member of the Methodist Church and a most desirable citizen, the head of an excellent family. His children are as follows: Robert; Mattie; H———; John L.; Solomon P.; who graduated from West Point in 1880 and is now a captain in the 7th Cavalry Regiment, United States army; Lillian; Charles, who is at home; and Albert Henry.

Mr. Vestal was born and reared on a farm, and in his boyhood became inured to hard work as found in the life of the average agriculturist. But he had other ambitions for his own life work. During his early years he attended the district school in Pipe Creek township, and he was only sixteen years old when he began to teach, in Nemaha county, Neb., where he was engaged successfully for two terms. He then returned home, and for two terms attended the National Normal School at Valparaiso, Ind., after which he taught in Madison county for four years. Following this he took a law course in the law department of the National Normal at Valparaiso, being admitted to the Bar when about twenty-one years old. After that he attended the same law school for another year, meantime teaching a graded school in Frankton, Ind., and he graduated from the law school in 1896, soon after which he began to practice, in Frankton. He continued to teach there for two winters, finally devoting all his time to the legal profession, in which he soon found enough work to engage all his energies. From early manhood he has been interested and active in politics, and in 1900 he was elected prosecuting attorney of Madison county on the Republican ticket. That he was honored with reelection in 1902 and 1904 is sufficient evidence of the satisfaction his services gave. He received good majorities on both occasions. Mr. Vestal proved an active and fearless prosecutor, and was noted for his vigorous and efficient conduct of cases which came under his care. He was one of the most successful prosecuting attorneys at the Madison county Bar, and in about two hundred and fifty cases which he handled he sent two hundred and forty criminals to the penitentiary—all criminals beyond the shadow of a doubt and justly convicted of the crimes of which they had been accused. Whenever possible, Mr. Vestal made it a point to be sure of the guilt of a criminal before an arrest was made, and that there was sufficient evidence to warrant conviction. He was particularly successful in jury trials, being clear, convincing and forcible in his presentation of cases and the legal points which carry weight and conviction.

In the incumbency of the office of prosecuting attorney Mr. Vestal became widely known among the legal fraternity of this section of the State, and he made a reputation for excellent work which places him in the ranks of the most successful young men of the day. He has made his position by straightforwardness and strict attention to business, the hard work which is sure to bring success in any line. He is also well known fraternally, belonging to the I. O. O. F. at Frankton; to the Uniform Rank, K. P., at Frankton; to the I. O. R. M. at Anderson; to the B. P. O. E., and Loyal Order Moose.

Mr. Vestal has been twice married. On Sept. 15, 1895, in Pennville, Ind., he married Madge Horn, daughter of W. C. Horn, and two children were born to them, Vivian L. and Ralph A. Mrs. Vestal died Aug. 5, 1899, in Frankton, and on Jan. 8, 1903, Mr. Vestal married, in Anderson, Ind., Hulda W. Malone, daughter of Charles T. Malone.

Albert H. Vestal is an active candidate for the Republican nomination for Congress in the Eighth Congressional District. His many friends have urged his candidacy, believing that his long experience in the office of State's Attorney has qualified him eminently for the higher duties of Congressman. There is little doubt that Mr. Vestal will prove one of the most aggressive candidates before the people.

GEORGE OWENS. Deprived in early youth of the strong arm and watchful care and guidance of his father, George Owens had not only his own way to make in the world, but he felt the responsibility of the care of the family and of his widowed mother, throughout his later boyhood days. To one who has had the counsel and advice of fond parents since earliest memory, this loss cannot be understood, but with all the deprivations of example and material aid, came the compensation which is ever-present—that this young man was thrown wholly upon his own resources and necessarily never learned to lean upon others, but singly and alone met all of life's problems as they came to him. He was early shown the serious side of life, and while this was trying in many ways, it yet fitted the boy for the career ahead and made him wise beyond his age. In later years it enabled him to deal successfully with the problems of life and opened up success to him.

He was born in Needham township, Johnson county, on June 30, 1833, and has resided there ever since. He was the son of Samuel and Millie (Fisher) Owens, his father being a native of Roanoke county, N.C., and his mother of Rowan county, N. C. They were married in 1826, and moved into Johnson county, settling in what was then known as Franklin township, but which is now called Needham township, where he entered 160 acres of land from the government, to which in after years, as a result of his labors and business ability, he added other lands until he owned 246 acres of highly productive land, from which he himself cleared away the woods, which covered it at the time of his purchase. He died in October, 1846, aged thirty-eight years, his wife surviving him nearly a half century, and dying in 1896, at the age of eighty-six years. Both were earnest and faithful members of the Baptist Church, in which he long served as deacon and church trustee. To them were born nine children, five sons and four daughters, of whom, however, only two are now living besides Mr. Owens, William; and Nancy, wife of Theophilous McBride.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. Owens was James Owens, who was born in Virginia, and who came as a pioneer to the new and undeveloped State of Indiana, locating in Clark county, where he took up government land which, however, he afterward sold in order to enter land in Johnson county. This he did in 1835, settling in Needham township, and acquiring 120 acres from the government. Subsequently he sold that farm to his son, and bought forty acres near Urmeysville, in the same township, at which latter place he died at the honored old age of eighty-five years. He reared a large family and was always a devoted husband and father. For a considerable period of time he was captain of the State militia, in which position he discharged his duties with great tact and ability. He also served a few years as a justice of the peace, his decisions as such officer being rendered with rare ability and always in justice tempered with mercy.

The maternal grandfather of George

Owens was George Fisher, who claimed North Carolina as the place of his nativity. He also was a pioneer in the early days of the Hoosier State, and located in Clark county at the present site of New Washington, where he continued his abode until the time of his death, which occurred after a long life of usefulness.

George Owens received his early education in the old fashioned subscription schools, and in later years acquired further information and learning as the result of his reading and experience. He continued at the old homestead until reaching the age of maturity, when after marriage, he rented a farm from his uncle by the year. He then bought 110 acres of land which forms part of his present home, and to these he added from time to time until he once owned over four hundred acres, but of this he has given portions to his children until he now has but 232 acres, all of which is highly improved and productive land.

On Jan. 8, 1854, he was joined in marriage to Catherine Owens, a daughter of John and Mary (Fisher) Owens. Of this union two children were born, Thomas M. and Emma J. The former, now a prosperous farmer in Needham township, married Fannie J. Patterson, and they have five children, Leslie, Euba, Addie, Onie and Bernice. Emma J. is the wife of John T. Rowe, of Shelby county, and has three children, Alice, Clayton and Virffel. On April 27th, 1857, Mrs. Catherine Owens, died, at the early age of twenty-four years. Her loss were deeply felt by her husband and was mourned by all. She was a faithful and devoted member of the Baptist Church.

On March 10, 1859, Mr. Owens was married to Serena Hutchings, daughter of John and Lydia (Fisher) Hutchings, and of this second union six children were born as follows: Mollie, Robert, Joseph, Bert, Ora, and Gertha. Of these, Mollie is the wife of J. V. Conover, of Needham, and they have one child, Olive. Robert is still home and assists in the work of the farm. Joseph married Ella Lusk, and lives in Needham township; Bert married Coy Johnson, a successful teacher in the public schools of Franklin. Ora is at home and adds much to the comfort and pleasure of her parents. Gertha is married, and has two children. Both Mr. Owens and his wife are influential members of the Baptist Church, where they have long been respected and esteemed.

John Hutchings, father of Mrs. Owens, was a Virginian by birth, born April 11, 1802. His wife, Lydia Fisher, was a North Carolinian, born in 1805. Their marriage occurred on March 25, 1825, and eleven children were born to them, five sons and six daughters, of whom but six are now living, as follows: George, Mary Ann Hutchings, Jane (who married Robert J. Hutchings), Frances and Allen, all residing in Clark county; and Serena, wife of Mr. Owens. The father, John Hutchings, was throughout his whole life a farmer by occupation, coming to Indiana in the war time of 1812, when he was only ten years of age. He grew to manhood in Clark county, clearing a farm there. His death occurred in 1884, when he was four score and two years of age. His wife survived him until 1897, and died at the age of ninety-two years. Both were earnest and faithful Methodists. His father was Steven Hutchings, who died on the way down the Ohio River as he was emigrating from Virginia to Kentucky. He left a large family, of whom John was the youngest. John continued to reside with and assist in the support of his mother until March 29, 1829, when he married Lydia Fisher, who with her father's family had come from Rowan county, North Carolina, settling in Washington county, Ind. They soon located in Clark county, where they made their home until their decease. John was a class leader in the church for years where he was much beloved and esteemed, and his wife was also active in church work, and a faithful Christian as long as she lived.

The maternal grandfather of Mrs. Owens was George Fisher, also a native of Rowan county, N. C., and he came with his parents to Clark county, Ind., where he died at an advanced age. He also was a farmer by occupation. Mrs. Serena Owens was born Oct. 14, 1837.

Mrs. Millie (Fisher) Owens, mother of Mr. Owens, of whom we write, was the daughter of George and Catherine Fisher, and was born Feb. 2, 1810, in Rowan county, North Carolina. Five years later her parents with their family removed to Clark county, Indiana, making the journey in a covered wagon, the prairie schooner of those early days, and she loved to tell in later years of the exciting incidents of this thrilling trip. Many dangers were encountered, and the little party had to submit to many privations. On April 15, 1826, she married Samuel Owens, of the same county, and in October of the same year they came to Johnson county, settling in Needham township, where they resided thereafter. For about twenty years in their new home in the wilderness, they endured the hardships of the pioneer's life, when death claimed her husband, and she was left alone in that new country to rear and educate her seven children. For nearly fifty years she was a widow, and by earnest efforts and indomitable will she succeeding in providing well for all of her offspring. Her numerous descendants included forty-seven grandchildren and forty-one great-grandchildren. She was reared in the Lutheran Church, but April 23, 1836, she placed her membership with the Second Mount Pleasant Baptist Church, and ever lived a Christian life.

Mr. George Owens served for a period of two terms as supervisor, and also for a considerable period as school director. In both of these positions his energy, ability and broad-mindedness made him exceptionally valuable. He effected many radical reforms and made many improvements, and throughout was highly esteemed by all with whom he came in contact. He early espoused the cause of Democracy, and has been faithful to the principles of his party at all times. Though handicapped in many ways, Mr. Owens has simply profited by his deprivations and hardships, and has made a name for himself throughout the county, of which he may well be proud. He is esteemed by all as a fair-minded, just and honorable man.

C. A. B. VAN ARSDALE, a retired farmer and prominent citizen of Whiteland, Ind., who passed away Feb. 6, 1907, was born in Mercer county, Ky., Oct. 3, 1823, son of Simon and Catharine (Whiteneck) Van Arsdale, natives of Mercer county, Kentucky.

Cornelius A. B. Van Arsdale, the paternal grandfather, after whom Mr. C. A. B. Van Arsdale is named, was a native of Pennsylvania, of Dutch descent, and by occupation a farmer. During the early history of Kentucky, he removed to that State and was one of its pioneers, locating in Mercer county, and there he married and lived until his death, which took place when he was between seventy and eighty years of age. Of his large family, none is now living.

Henry Whiteneck, father of Mrs. Catharine (Whiteneck) Van Arsdale, was a native of New Jersey, of Holland Dutch descent, and a pioneer of Mercer county, Ky. After locating in his new home, he made a trip back to New Jersey on horseback. By occupation he was a farmer. He died in Kentucky at the age of eighty-two. He was twice married and had a large family.

Simon Van Arsdale was a farmer who came to Indiana from Mercer county in 1827, entering land in Franklin township, Johnson county, clearing up a farm of 160 acres, from the dense woods which covered it. This property was government land, and the patent was signed by President Jackson. Mr. Van Arsdale lived on this farm until his death, in 1882, when he was within a month and ten days of being eighty-three years of age. His wife died in 1875, aged seventy-one years. Both were members of the Presbyterian Church, and charter members of the Hopewell Church. Twelve children were born to them, seven sons and five daughters.

Mr. C. A. B. Van Arsdale was four years old when brought by his parents to Indiana, and he resided in Johnson county for eighty years. Like so many boys of that period, he was brought up upon his father's farm working on it during the summer months, and during the winter attending the old-fashioned subscription schools, held in log houses, with split rails for seats, an open fireplace at one end, and entirely lacking any of the conveniences and appliances of the schools of today. Still, in these primitive schools, the boys and girls of those faraway days learned thoroughly what was taught them, and appreciated to the utmost their educational advantages, poor as they might be. Mr. Van Arsdale remained at home until he was twenty-two years old, when he rented a farm for a year, but at the end of that time, he purchased eighty acres in Pleasant township. After cultivating and improving it for three years, he sold the farm and purchased seventy-one acres in Franklin township. Later he sold this farm and purchased back his first farm, paying double for it what he did originally, and here he resided for seven years. He then sold it for $3,500 cash, making a profit of $1,300 in addition to what he had made from his crops. His next purchase was the Sebern farm of eighty-two acres, in Pleasant township, to which he added forty acres and later twelve more acres, and he lived there from September, 1864 to October, 1884, when he divided his property among his four children, then living, and removed into Whiteland, where he built a comfortable home in which he and his estimable wife resided, retired from active business life, until separated by his death in 1907.

On Nov. 25, 1847, Mr. Van Arsdale married Miss Nancy Jane Clem, daughter of Isaac and Nancy (Shepperd) Clem. Five children were born of this union, three girls and two boys: (1) Nancy C. married George L. Brunner of Whiteland, and has three children, Albert T., Ammie Jane and William Jasper. (2) Margaret Jane married James L. Henderson, now deceased, had three children, Newton Gilbert, Stella Jane and Elmer Thomas, and married (second) Peter G. Covert, of Union township. (3) William D. married Cynthia Arams, and had five children, three of whom are now living, Gustavus, Edward and Charles T. After her death he married Mrs. Jennie Hildebrand, and they reside in Pendleton, where he owns a good farm, and is also in the employ of the gas company. His wife has two daughters by her former marriage—Mollie and Essie Hildebrand. (4) Sarah Ellen married James Richard Powell, and died the mother of two sons, Chauncy Jackson and Cornelius. (5) Samuel Edward, a farmer in Pleasant township, married Miss Mary Van Arsdale, of Mercer county, Ky., and has two children, Harry E. and Alice Jane. Mrs. C. A. B. Van Arsdale is a member of the Presbyterian Church, to which her late husband also belonged. During the late Civil war Mr. Van Arsdale belonged to the Home Guards. In politics he was a stanch Republican, and took an interest in public affairs, both national and local. During a long and useful life, Mr. Van Arsdale did whatever duty lay to his hand, and gained the respect and confidence of his fellow citizens, as well as the love and veneration of his family.

The parents of Mrs. Van Arsdale were natives of Kentucky, but moved to Johnson county, Ind., in 1833, when she was but two years of age. Upon locating in Indiana, Mr. Clem entered government land in Pleasant township, and there resided until his death, which occurred in 1881, when he was nearly ninety years of age. His first wife died in 1847, aged fifty-six years. Mr. Clem served in the War of 1812, and during the many years of his long and eventful life, saw wonderful changes in government as well as in the country itself. He and his first wife had six sons and six daughters, nine of whom grew to maturity, but only three are now living: Willis R., of Miami county; Louisa Ellen, widow of Robert Smith; and Nancy J., widow of Mr. Van Arsdale. Mr. and Mrs. Clem were members of the Methodist Church. Mr. Clem's second marriage was with Mrs. Annice Thorp, now deceased, and they had two daughters, who are living: Emily, wife of George McKinney; and Fannie, wife of Isaac Suttles. Isaac Clem was a son of Philip Clem, a native of Virginia and a soldier in the Revolutionary war, who married Phoebe Miller. Mrs. Van Arsdale's maternal grandfather was William Shepperd, a native of Kentucky, where he died; his wife was a native of Holland, and did not learn to talk English until after she was married and the mother of three children.

HENRY WILLIAMS is one of the most prosperous and progressive agriculturists of Johnson county, where he now resides in Clark township. Starting in life's battle with no worldly possessions, and with no one to advise and assist his first endeavors, he nevertheless attained a very high degree of success, and is now numbered among the wealthiest men in that section of the country. Mr. Williams combines with his wide comprehension of business matters a broad minded and keen interest in the community about him, which, in appreciation of his ability and integrity, has intrusted him with many a matter of trust for widow, orphan and friend, and these obligations have always been discharged to the entire satisfaction of all concerned.

He was born in Fayette county, Ind., near Connersville Nov. 22, 1841, son of Joel D. and Frances (Walker) Williams. His father was a native probably of Indiana, and his mother was born in Chillicothe, Ohio. Six children were born to the parents of Mr. Williams, four sons and two daughters, of whom three are now living, Jane, who married (first) James Johnson and after his death, Peter Brown (also deceased) and now living in Needham township; Catherine, wife of Henry Johnson, of the same place; and Henry.

Joel D. Williams was raised by a widowed mother, and was a pioneer in Indiana, settling in Union county, and later moved into Madison county. In the year 1850 he again removed, to Johnson county. He was reared as a farmer's boy, but in his early manhood followed teaming and did hauling from Connersville to Cincinnati and other points. After pursuing this occupation for some time, he commenced farming, and continued the work of an agriculturist all his life. He settled in Needham township, Johnson county, where he bought 100 acres of land, to which he continued to add until he once owned about 700 acres. He then moved nearer to Franklin in Needham township, and from there to Madison, settling finally near Carthage, Mo. He died Aug. 7, 1891 at the age of seventy-nine years in Johnson county, Ind., whither he had returned, and his wife died about four years prior in her seventieth year. He was reared in the faith of the Baptist Church of the old school, but was not identified by membership with any church. His wife was reared, and always remained, a Methodist, and was a faithful and influential church worker all her life.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. Williams was born in North Carolina. He died in middle life. He was twice married. He had several children by his first wife, of whom one was named Noah and another Jessie. His daughter by his second wife was named Susan, and she married Zachariah Conway. Noah was engaged in the Mormon disturbances.

The maternal grandfather of Mrs. Williams was William Walker, who came from Chillicothe to Indiana, and settled East of Connersville, where he entered a large tract of land from the government. He died there at about the age of four score, being blind at the time of his death. He had ten sons and two daughters.

Mr. Williams was nine years old when his parents came from Madison to Johnson county, and he has resided there ever since, a period of fifty-seven years. At that time there were no railroads, with one exception, and there were also no well-constructed wagon roads, and the country was primitive and undeveloped. He remained at home until he reached the age of about twenty years, attending the old fashioned subscription schools, and his vocation in life has always been that of a farmer. In this career he began by farming a portion of his father's farm, and his first purchase was eighty acres in Needham township, which he partly improved and cultivated. Today he owns 675 acres. It was in February, 1878, that he moved into Clark township, and here he has made his residence ever since.

On Nov. 6, 1861, he was joined in wedlock to Miss Serena Johnson, daughter of James W. and Martha Johnson, and to them seven children were born, four sons and three daughters. Emma A., Charles G., Dora B., Elmer A., Ollie M., Walter J., and one child who died in infancy. Emma, who died aged twenty-three, married Harland P. Patterson, and had one child, Bessie (who married Lloyd Bought, and has one son, Clare, who is the great-grandchild of Mr. Williams). Charles G., now deceased, married Josie Hempfield, and had one son, Harry. Dora married George Wolfe, a prosperous liveryman in Franklin, and they have three children living, Ralph, Elsie and Irene. Elmer is single and resides in Indianapolis. Ollie married L. W. Kirtley, of Lebanon, and they have one daughter, Lucile. Walter J. married Henrietta Edmunds, and lives in Shelby county.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Williams are members of the Hurricane Baptist Church in which he has served ably as deacon. In his political affiliations Mr. Williams has long supported the cause of the Republican party. He was trustee of Clark township from the year 1880 to 1884, and has occupied many responsible positions in the community. He began life a poor boy, and owes all his successes to his own ability and sagacity. To the young man who today sighs for opportunity, the prospect would have looked hopeless, indeed, fifty years ago, in the position of the subject of this review, and we venture an opinion that the youth would soon wish himself back in his present place. Men to a great extent make their own opportunities: certain it is that Mr. Williams made the fullest use of all the avenues open to him, with what splendid success we have already made mention.

JOHN A. FESLER, a well-known citizen of Daleville, Ind., and a survivor of the Civil war, was born July 24, 1842, in Madison county, Ind., six miles south of Anderson, son of David and Elizabeth (Landis) Fesler.

David Fesler was of Pennsylvania Dutch descent and was born in 1813, near Schaeffers-town, Lancaster Co., Pa., a son of George Fesler, a farmer of that neighborhood, whose other children were: Jacob, William, Peter, Sarah, Catherine and Elizabeth. David Fesler was a stone-mason and plasterer by trade in Lancaster county. There he married Elizabeth Landis, also born near Schaefferstown. They moved to Dayton, Va., and in 1840 moved with family and possessions and settled at Columbus, Bartholomew Co., Ind. Mr. Fesler owned town property, and continued to work at his trade until 1863, when he moved to a farm south of Columbus, and during 1864-5 he had charge of the county farm. He then bought thirty-four acres in Pipe Creek township, in the north part of Madison county. This land was improved, and as he had a sawmill on the farm, his son John operated it for eight years.

Mr. Fesler bought other property until he owned 134 acres, on which he built a two-story hewed log house, which he afterward weather-boarded, lathed and plastered, making it a compact, comfortable home. He also built a substantial barn of 40 x 50 feet in dimensions, and otherwise improved his place. He next traded forty acres for a stone quarry of sixteen acres, two and one-half miles north of Frankton, and this his son John ran for twenty-two years. He died here Nov. 14, 1894, aged eighty years, eleven months and five days. His children were: Rebecca; John A.; William; Catherine; Benjamin; Arabella, who died aged twenty-two years, leaving a husband; and Abraham and Sarah, who both died in infancy in Virginia.

Mr. Fesler made the journey to Indiana by wagon, and his brother Peter and family came at the same time. They were all members of the Dunkard Church. Mr. Fesler was a lifelong Democrat. He was an industrious, upright man, and so possessed the confidence of his fellow citizens that he was elected deputy sheriff of Madison county, and several times was township assessor. For years his brother Peter was one of the county commissioners of Madison county.

John A. Fesler was reared among the pioneers of Madison county, and very early in life learned to work on the farm and to manage a team. When the Civil war broke out he was anxious to enter the army, and was nineteen when he ran away from home and enlisted, March 10, 1862, as a private of Company K, 8th Ind. V. I., for three years or during the war. He served until he was honorably discharged at Indianapolis, in February, 1864, re-enlisting as a veteran again to serve three years. His final discharge was on Sept. 28, 1865, on account of the ending of the rebellion. His service was in Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana, Virginia and Georgia. Mr. Fesler took part in twenty battles, and was in so many skirmishes he can scarcely recall them. The battles were: Cotton Plant, Ark., Port Gibson, Miss., Champion Hills, Miss., first battle of Jackson, Miss., Big Black River, Miss., Vicksburg, Miss., second battle of Jackson, Miss., Mustang Island, Texas, Fort Esperanza, Texas, Austin, Texas, Baton Rouge, La., Carrion Crow Bayou, La., Atchafalaya, La., Berryville, La., Hall Run, W. Va., Winchester, W. Va., Fisher's Hill, W. Va., New Market, W. Va., and Cedar Creek, W. Va. During all this time he was absent from his regiment but one day, except when he took his veteran furlough, in May, 1864. He was never wounded and never suffered imprisonment. On the battle-field of Cedar Creek he assisted William Fesler, who was seriously wounded, four miles to the field hospital.

After the war Mr. Fesler returned to his father's farm in Indiana, and ran the sawmill for eight years, and also farmed for one year. When his father acquired the stone quarry he took charge of that and operated it for twenty-two years. He then settled on his farm of thirty acres, two and a half miles northeast of Frankton, and in the fall removed to Daleville, where he now resides.

Mr. Fesler was married (first) Dec. 3, 1866, in Pipe Creek township, Madison Co., Ind., to Nancy Stanley, born in Anderson township, Madison Co., Ind., Jan. 4, 1839, daughter of John and Mary (Perkins) Stanley. John Stanley, father of Mrs. Fesler, was a pioneer of Anderson township, where he developed a good farm. His death took place previous to the Civil war. His children were: Hutchinson, Meridith, Jehiel, Henry, Clyde, Eliza, Alkana, Mary, Amos, Elizabeth and Andrew, all of whom are deceased except Elizabeth. To John and Nancy (Stanley) Fesler were born: John Franklin, Emma Catherine, Oliver Cecil, and two that died in infancy. Mrs. Fesler died on the farm, July 18, 1899. On June 11, 1901, Mr. Fesler was married (second) to Mrs. Anna Funkhouser, born Aug. 25, 1850, in Delaware county, Ind., daughter of Alexander and Rebecca (Pierce) McAllister, the former a farmer in Delaware county. His two children were Franklin and Anna. The latter married William Funkhouser, a farmer of this county, and became the mother of Cora, Augusta, Louisa, Vearl, Sophia, Maud and Joseph, of whom Louisa and Sophia are deceased. No children have been born of her marriage to Mr. Fesler.

In politics Mr. Fesler has always been a Democrat, and he has frequently been elected to local office, and has served as assessor of Pipe Creek township. Both Mr. and Mrs. Fesler are members of the Christian Church.

JOEL D. STARR, a substantial farmer, now retired, and a respected citizen of Anderson, is a native of Indiana, born in Henry county, July 6, 1841, son of Wiley and Dorcas (Vickrey) Starr.

Wiley Starr was born in Pennsylvania, but taken by his father to Western Ohio when a small child. In early manhood he removed to Indiana and there married Miss Dorcas Vickrey, daughter of Pleasant and Mary (White) Vickrey, the former of whom was a pioneer from Guilford county, N. C. A brother, Alva Vickrey, was in an Indiana regiment for three years during the war. After his marriage Wiley Starr resided in Harrison township, Henry county, on a farm. His children were Joel D., John and Elizabeth.

Joel D. Starr lost his father when only eleven years old, and he was from boyhood obliged to work hard to help his mother. He was educated in Henry county, receiving only three months schooling during the winter. He began in an old log school house, but this was later replaced by a really good building. At the age of nineteen Mr. Starr enlisted at Middletown, Henry county, April 8, 1861, in Company B, 8th Ind. V. L., answering the first call for troops. At the end of his term of three months he was honorably discharged at Indianapolis. At Newcastle he re-enlisted, Oct. 4, 1861, in Company D, 2d Ind. V. C., and served his full three years to a day, and was a second time honorably discharged at Indianapolis. Mr. Starr saw service in Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi and Florida. He was at Chickamauga; was under fire for twenty-eight days during the Kentucky raid after Bragg; fought at Crab Orchard; Perryville, Ky.; and in many minor engagements and skirmishes. Except for measles during his first term of enlistment Mr. Starr was always in active service. After his discharge in October, 1864, he returned home, but almost immediately re-enlisted, as a veteran in the 147th Ind. V. I. for a year. He was, however, discharged the following July at Indianapolis at the close of the war.

Mr. Starr went home again, and in 1866 married and settled down in Harrison township, where he bought thirteen acres of land and worked at farming for some years. On March 10, 1875, he moved to Anderson township, Madison county, and at first rented land there. Later he bought forty acres in La-Fayette township, which was partly cleared up, and the following year moved onto it. He has added to the original tract till he now has a fine farm of ninety-eight acres, on which he has himself made all the improvements and erected all the buildings, all due to his own untiring efforts, and a due reward for his industry and rectitude. He and his wife are both members of the United Brethren Church, in which he has been class-leader and steward. In politics he has always been a Republican, and cast his first vote for Abraham Lincoln, for the second term. He is an ex-member of Major May Post, G. A. R., of Anderson.

On Sept. 9, 1866, Mr. Starr was united in marriage to Miss Sarah A. Pring, who was born in Harrison township, Feb. 8, 1843, daughter of William and Nancy (Small) Pring. They have reared a family of six children, all sons: (1) William Clinton, a machinist residing in Muncie, married Sarah Margaret McFarland, and they have a son, J. Bernald. (2) Alonzo, a mail carrier in Anderson, married Miss Mary E. McFarland, by whom he has had six children: Juanita A., Ruth Etta, Iva (who died in infancy), Howard D., Robert Clinton and Elva. (3) The third son is Tecumseh Sherman. (4) Scott married Miss Ida B. Cook. (5) Frank, a steamfitter in Anderson, married Miss Jessie B. Webb, and has three children, Anna, Helen and Mary. (6) Charles, born May 12, 1881, received a common school education, and is now carrying on the home farm. He was married in Anderson, March 20, 1901, to Miss Ethel Blanche Grover, who was born in Tipton county, Ind., in December, 1882, a daughter of John and Matilda (Reid) Grover. To this marriage two daughters have been born, Ada Fay and Mabel.

The Pring family, to which Mrs. Joel D. Starr belongs, migrated to Indiana from Eastern Tennessee, where her grandfather James was born. He married there and later with his wife and two children, moved to Indiana, settling first in Wayne, and then in Henry, county. He lived to be an old man. The children born to him were: Mary; Emerson; Ruthie, who died young; and William. William Pring lived in Henry county, from early boyhood and there married Miss Nancy Small, who was born in Indiana, probably on Fall Creek, Madison county, and was left an orphan in childhood, with a sister and brother, Jane and James. She is still living in Henry county, aged eighty-one years. William Pring was a hard-working farmer, who became quite well-to-do. He bought forty acres of forest in Harrison township, in 1845, cleared the land, built a log cabin and made his permanent home there. He added to his property till he owned over 200 acres. He was much respected as an honest, straightforward citizen, and lived to be sixty-five years old. In politics he was a Democrat. The children born to William Pring were: Amy Ellen, Sarah Adeline, Amanda Jane, James Martin, John Anderson, Christina Elizabeth, Mary Ann, Eli, William Lewis, Susan and two that died in infancy. The others all lived to rear families except William and Amy Ellen.

JOHN FISHER. Of sturdy pioneer stock, John Fisher inherited qualities of mind and body which gave him a strong natural tendency in the direction of agricultural pursuits, and enabled him to take up the arduous labors of a pioneer farmer and overcome all difficulties as they presented themselves. Probably no richer inheritance can come to a man than just such a physical composition, for these fundamental elements of fearless self-reliance and abundant physical strength and health, render him capable of successfully pursuing almost any vocation in life. So richly endowed by nature it is not surprising that Mr. Fisher attained to material prosperity and was able to do much to advance the growth and progress of Johnson county.

Mr. Fisher was born in Needham township, Johnson Co., Ind., Aug. 17, 1834. His father was Jacob Fisher, a native of North Carolina, whose occupation throughout his long and eventful life was that of a farmer. He came to Indiana among the earliest pioneers, entering land there from the government, in the township in which his son John was reared. This he cleared of heavy timber after a long period of much labor and self denial, and in the years following accumulated other lands to a considerable extent. He died there at the age of eighty-two years, surviving his wife by a number of years. She was Catherine (Bower) Fisher and claimed as the place of her nativity, the same State as did her husband. Seven children were born to them, three sons and four daughters, of whom three besides John are now living, as follows: William M., of Needham township; Jane, who married D. H. McLean, of Franklin township (who died in January, 1903) and had three children, Hettie (Mrs. Patterson), Nannie (Mrs. Wilde) and Kate (Mrs. Cutsinger, who died in March, 1904); and Mary, wife of David S. Gross, also of Needham township. Both Jacob Fisher and his wife were faithful followers of the doctrines of the Methodist Church, in which they were active and earnest workers.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. Fisher was George Fisher, who came from North Carolina to Clark county, Ind. in the early days, and died here at an advanced age after a long and fruitful life, leaving several sons and daughters. Mr. Fisher's maternal grandfather was Henry Bower, of North Carolina, by occupation a blacksmith and farmer. He also came to Indiana settling in Clark county, where he died at an old age, leaving six children.

Mr. John Fisher in early boyhood days attended the subscription schools, being able to go, however, only about three months in the winter season, spending the rest of the year in arduous work upon the farm of his parents. He there remained until his marriage, when his father gave him 120 acres of land, which he extended from time to time, until he now owns a highly improved and productive farm, exceeding 200 acres in extent. His life has been spent in Needham and Clark townships.

On Dec. 6, 1856, he was joined in holy matrimony to Miss Ellen C. McLean, daughter of Daniel and Nancy (Farnsworth) McLean, and is the father of three children, Ira Clarence, now located in Los Angeles, Cal., and Elmon M. and Alma, twins. Ira C. is a physician, having an extensive practice and rapidly making a name for himself; he married Ella Cutsinger, and has one child, Gladys Alma. Alma married Charles Shepard, of Clark township, and has one child, John Howard. Elmon still remains at home, but runs an elevator in Needham.

Both Mr. Fisher and his wife are influential members of the Missionary Baptist Church, where they are highly esteemed and active workers. In his political affiliations, Mr. Fisher early identified himself with Democracy, and has rendered faithful services to his chosen party. While he has never sought political office, yet on account of his ability and sterling worth, he was made supervisor, and he also served as school director during several terms. He has seen the county in which he lives gradually develop in his hands and those of a few of his neighbors, from its primitive conditions as a forest and wilderness filled with Indians and with many kinds of game, until now, when it is fertile and productive, and one of the best farming sections in the country. In the early days, deer, wolves and wild turkeys were exceedingly abundant throughout Johnson county, until the many Indians of the section gradually killed them off; that, together with the cutting away of the timber lands, has wholly exterminated the game of this description.

While Mr. Fisher from his natural unobtrusiveness, chose to remain throughout his life in the county of his birth, and while, in his investments and business, he did not interest himself in enterprises foreign to that locality, yet he is possessed of wide information in all matters of national interest, both commercial and political, and since his early youth always kept thoroughly abreast of the times. To his own ability and earnest effort, he owes his success and in his long and upright career he has won the admiration and respect of all who have had chance to cross his pathway in life's journey.

WILLIAM D. NOBLE, a highly esteemed citizen of Elwood, Pipe Creek township, Madison Co., Ind., and one of the survivors of the Civil war, was born Jan. 24, 1827, near New Richmond, in Clermont county, Ohio, twenty-five miles above Cincinnati.

Jonathan Noble, grandfather of William D., and the founder of the family in America, came to this country from England and settled first in Maryland, bringing his wife Nancy and his eleven children, of whom Henry, Jonathan, John, Elijah, James, William, Margaret, Nellie and Rose Ann are remembered. Jonathan Noble settled in Cincinnati, Ohio, when the country was still in a wild state, the only buildings in the vicinity of the city being Buckeye cabins, and here he owned 160 acres of land. His son John was the first mayor of Cincinnati. Jonathan Noble removed to Clermont county, Ohio, in early times, settling on the present site of New Richmond, on the Ohio river, where he cleared up a farm. In later life he moved to Rush county, Ind., again a pioneer, and entered forty acres, his son, Jesse, entering 160 acres. The land was mainly cleared by the sons of Jonathan Noble.

Elijah Noble brought his family to Madison county after his mother died, and the father lived with this son for fifteen years, during ten of which he was blind. He died in Madison county, aged fully 110 years, and there is no doubt but that he served in the Revolutionary war and the war of 1812. His wife also died full of years, aged about eighty-eight. Both were consistent members of the M. E. Church. In his political principles he was a Jacksonian Democrat.

Elijah Noble, father of William D., was born in Maryland, and was a mere boy when he accompanied his father to Cincinnati, Ohio.

He frequently recalled circumstances concerning their early settlement, and remembered that he and his brother James, with the hounds which they had brought from their Southern home, used to drive deer along the runways so that their father could shoot them on the lands now covered by the beautiful suburbs of Cincinnati. After removal to Clermont county, he married, and after the birth of three children, in 1833, the family removed to Rush county, Ind., settling on forty acres of land in the woods where he built a log cabin. This land Mr. Noble cleared, and later through purchase and trading obtained eighty acres which he improved and resided upon until 1851, when he removed to Madison county, and settled four and one-half miles north of Alexandria on Lily Creek. Here Mr. Noble bought 160 acres of partly cleared land, of the original owner, Rider Smith. This land he improved and developed into one of the best farms in the county, and died in the double log cabin he first built, when aged nearly seventy-five years. His children were: John, William, Marian, Jonathan, James E., Nancy Ellen, Mary Ann, Jesse and Frances. Mr. and Mrs. Noble were members of the early Methodist Church in Madison county, and their house was the home of the old pioneer Methodist preachers. From being a Jacksonian Democrat, he became a Know-Nothing, subsequently a Republican, and voted for Abraham Lincoln. His only office of which we have record was that of road supervisor. Two of his sons served in the Civil war, James for nearly three years, and William for a shorter period, both being in the same company and regiment.

William D. Noble was born Jan. 24, 1827, near New Richmond, Clermont county, Ohio, twenty-five miles above Cincinnati, and was six years old when his father removed to Rush county, Ind. He remembers the first school he attended which was held in a log cabin with mud and stick chimney, and with puncheon floors and slab benches. He is authority for the fact that "Old Peter Newhouse" was a real old-fashioned pedagogue, whose policy it was to whip the pupils with beech switches on the very first day of school, probably to give an idea of what each one might expect in the future. Until he was nineteen years of age Mr. Noble attended school in the winter seasons, but the summers were devoted to hard farm work.

On Aug. 9, 1849, Mr. Noble was married two miles south of Fairview, Rush county, to Mary J. Butler, born Jan. 29, 1828, daughter of Eli and Jane (Bugar) Butler. To this union there were born: James, born Jan. 16, 1851; John A., July 11, 1853; Frances M., Dec. 19, 1855 (died Nov. 24, 1858); Catherine Jane and Lydia Ellen (twins), March 10, 1858; Wills Ira, Feb. 1, 1860; Mary Frances, Feb. 24, 1862; and William T. Sherman, Nov. 10, 1866.

After marriage William D. Noble and his wife settled on one of his father's farms in Rush county, where they lived two years, and in the meantime he entered eighty acres on the Indian river, eight miles north of Elwood, for which he paid two dollars an acre. In September, 1854, he moved to this place and cut a road through, extending two miles to where his farm now is. His first log cabin, built by a man he had hired, was found to be inadequate as he could scarcely stand up straight in it, and he soon erected another, and his neighbors came from six miles around to help him build it. This second cabin was of sufficient height, was constructed of round logs and was altogether comfortable.

In September, 1863, Mr. Noble enlisted for service in the Civil war, entering Company B, 130th Ind. V. I., as a private under Capt. Ephraim Doll, but was immediately made orderly sergeant. His contract was for three years or during the war, and he was honorably discharged in North Carolina and mustered out at Charlotte. His service was in North Carolina, Alabama and Georgia and he took part in the great Atlanta campaign, when the soldiers were under fire continuously for 110 days. At the siege of Atlanta a cannon ball passed so close to him that it carried away his knapsack and left him senseless for some time. Although he participated in all the battles of his company and regiment, and was always a prompt and reliable soldier, he was never taken prisoner nor was wounded, and never was sent to a hospital. During his absence in the army his wife resided in the log cabin on his father's farm in Alexandria, Madison county. After the close of the war Mr. Noble returned to Indiana, and to the farm on the Indian reservation where he lived until he removed to two miles north of Elwood, where he bought 106 acres of land, having sold his first farm. As this property had but seven acres cleared it required hard work to bring the rest of it into a state of cultivation. The time came, however, when Mr. Noble was no longer able to endure hard work, and he bought a residence property in Elwood, to which he moved, and also a lot on the east side. Subsequently he bought a twelve-room house near the city buildings in Elwood, but this he has disposed of.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Noble are members of the Methodist Church. He has been a lifelong Democrat in his political views. For forty years he has been a member of the I. O. O. F., at Elwood, joining when there were but eight official members. In this organization he has passed all the chairs, including Noble Grand, and has represented his lodge at the State Lodge. He is a member of the Grand Lodge of the State and of the Encampment.

CLAYTON BLAINE HICKS, one of the rising young men of Lebanon, Boone county, was born in that city June 6, 1884, only child of Charles Bascom and Louise J. (Bradley) Hicks. Henry Hicks, the paternal grandfather, who is still living, is a native of Pennsylvania, whose early progenitors were German. He migrated to Boone county, Ind., in the early days when the present site of Lebanon was but a swamp. His occupation for the greater part of his life has been that of a shoemaker. He was twice married, the second time to Miss Susan Nancy Doremire, to whom he was united Dec. 10, 1848, in Liberty, Union Co., Ind. She was the daughter of Richard and Nancy Doremire, the former a native of Ohio, and an early settler in Lebanon, where he owned a boot and shoe store; and where his death occurred. He was the father of five children, of whom Susan Nancy was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, July 22, 1831. She died in December, 1902, aged seventy-one years, four months and twenty-one days. Of the family of Henry Hicks there still survive John Q., of Indianapolis, and a daughter, by the first marriage, Celia, now Mrs. Rinewalt, of Sandusky, Ohio.

Charles Bascom Hicks, father of Clayton B., was born in Boone county Aug. 6, 1858, and continued to be a resident there during the forty-six years of his life. He was at different periods in his career a brakeman on the Big Four railroad, a compositor in the patent office, and the manager of a transfer line in Lebanon, but for the last fourteen years of his life he had held the position of manager for the Standard Oil Company. He was regarded as one of their best employes, and his services were highly esteemed by the company from whom he at one time received a letter of com-commendation on the fact that he had made the greatest gain in local business of any agent in the State. In politics Mr. Hicks was a Republican, and was one of the active workers in the State, upon whose efficiency the party could always rely, but he could never be prevailed upon to hold office. In religious belief Mr. Hicks was a Presbyterian, and with his wife was a member of that church.

On May 7, 1881, Miss Louise J. Bradley became the wife of Charles B. Hicks. She was the daughter of George W. and Mary (Akers) Bradley, the former a native of Kentucky, and the latter of Indiana. Mr. Bradley came to Indiana about fifty years ago and settled in Shelby county, where he met and married his wife. They had six children as follows: Joseph; Louise J., now Mrs. Hicks; John; Laura, the wife of William Shoemaker; Della, deceased April 4, 1901, Mrs. Hillis W. Harrison; and Eva, wife of Peter Adair. After living in Shelby county for some time, Mr. Bradley took his wife and family of four children to Wisconsin, where they remained four years in the vicinity of Coral City, but at the end of that time they returned to Indiana and settled on a farm four miles north of Lebanon. Later this place was sold and another farm, east of the first one, became the family home instead. There Mrs. Bradley died in 1895, at the age of fifty-three years. Mr. Bradley is still living. Both he and his wife were members of the Baptist Church. Mrs. Hicks' paternal grandfather was Richard Bradley, who was drowned in middle life; her maternal grandfather was George Akers.

Mrs. Louise J. Hicks was an ardent sympathizer with her husband in his lodge work, and is herself active in similar lines. She is a member of the Ben Hur Society, the Rathbone Sisters and the Degree of Pocahontas, and in 1899 was Great Pocahontas of the State of Indiana.

Mr. Charles B. Hicks was an enthusiastic lodge man, and was known all over the State for his efficient work along those lines, and for his success in arousing a kindred interest in others. He belonged to the Improved Order of Red Men, the Haymakers, Knights of Pythias, Uniform Rank, the Modern Woodmen of America, Noble Order of Bailiffs, the Society of Ben Hur, the Degree of Pocahontas, and the Rathbone Sisters, while he played in the drum corps of the G. A. R., and was made an honorary member. He had passed through all the chairs in the Knights of Pythias, and the Red Men, was Great Sachem, and in the fall of 1903, was elected Great Prophet. During his term of office as Great Sachem he had more new lodges and a greater increase in membership to his credit than any of his predecessors in office and this, too, in spite of ill health, which continued for a period of two years before his death. His funeral was largely attended, with many out-of-town tribes present, forming a long procession. The services were conducted at the Presbyterian Church, by Rev. A. McFeron, and were an impressive tribute to his memory and character. Mr. Hicks was of a social, jovial disposition, kind and accommodating to an unusual degree and most warm-hearted and generous, so that his popularity was wide spread and he was loved and honored by a wide circle of friends.

Clayton Blaine Hicks passed his boyhood in Lebanon where he attended the public schools, and the Lebanon Business College, and there learned the tailor's trade, but he soon became his father's assistant instead of following his own trade, and after his father's death was appointed by the company to succeed him, an unusual token of appreciation for so young a man. In politics he is a Republican, and in his church connection is a member of the Methodist Church. His wife belongs to the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Hicks was married April 21, 1904, to Miss Hazel Welch, daughter of John A. and Nettie (Bechtell) Welch. The Bechtells were among the oldest settlers in Boone county. John A. Welch was a Western Union telegraph operator at Anderson, Ind., where he died in 1894, aged forty-two years. His wife is still living, and a resident of Indianapolis. Their children were: Nellie, wife of Arthur Sheppard, of Lebanon; Hazel, Mrs. Hicks; James and Russell. The maternal grandparents were James and Evaline (Perkins) Bechtell, the former a native of Ohio.

HENRY G. WILLIAMS from a humble financial beginning has steadily risen to greater and greater success, and has now achieved a most enviable position in Clark township, Johnson county, the place of his birth—which occurred on Jan. 11, 1847—and his lifelong home. Not alone for himself have his energies been expended, but many have profited by his labors, he having served his country faithfully in the Civil war, and in the years which followed having been prominent in many churches, fraternal organizations and other associations for the uplifting of the thought and lives of men.

His parents were James and Judea (Wheeler) Williams, his father being a native of Tennessee, and removing to Indiana with his parents in very early life. His mother was a native of Kentucky, whence she came at the early age of three years with her parents, who settled in Indiana. Mr. Williams was one of fifteen children, eight sons and seven daughters, of whom, however, only four are now living besides himself: Andrew J., Franklin Pierce, John Jefferson and Robert Lincoln.

James Williams was throughout his life engaged in the varied work of a farmer, coming to Wayne county, Ind., in 1816, and removing thence to Johnson county in 1821, settling at Edinburg, and eleven years later removing to Clark township. He lived until Aug. 17, 1897, when his demise occurred at the advanced age of eighty-seven years, his wife having died in the year prior at the age of eighty-one years. Both were devoted members of the Christian Church. In political faith he was a Democrat until the year 1856, when he changed his views and became a staunch Republican. He served as township trustee for about twenty-five years, and was a man of more than ordinary ability and force of character.

The father of James Williams was Allen Williams, who was born in North Carolina, whence he moved to Tennessee, there marrying and locating in Indiana in 1816, where he died in Clark township at the age of about seventy-two years, leaving a large family. He was a typical pioneer both in point of time and personal characteristics, and was noted for his skill in all the varied work of the early settler, and also for his undaunted courage. He was with General Jackson at Horse-shoe Bend, where he rendered valiant service. His father was Amos Williams, a Quaker, who settled in Pennsylvania with William Penn, and Amos was a son of Linear Williams, who came from Wales in the very early days, settling in Pennsylvania.

The maternal grandfather of Mr. Williams was Benjamin Wheeler, who came from Kentucky to Edinburg, Ind., about 1824, and entered land from the government, dying there at the age of about fifty-two years. He married Betsey Barlow, a Virginian by birth, and had a large family. Her father, Lewis Barlow, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war.

Henry G. Williams received an excellent education in the common schools, and on account of his fitness for the position was chosen as a teacher, in which capacity he served for four years. He then returned to his work of farming and began for himself by renting farm lands for a number of years, ultimately purchasing 122 acres, which he finely improved, and upon which he has built a beautiful home, and other substantial and necessary buildings.

On Dec. 24, 1868, he married Martha E. Tracy, daughter of Rhode (Brown) Tracy, and to them were born four children: Flora A., Lulu L., Millie May and John S., all of whom are unmarried and remain at home assisting in the work of the farm. They have all received excellent advantages, and are justifiably a source of pride and pleasure to their parents. Both Mr. Williams and his wife are devoted members of the Christian Church, in which they have a high standing. The children are all members of the Methodist Protestant Church, and Mr. Williams is prominent in a number of fraternal organizations, being a member of the Knights of Pythias and of the Wadsworth Post, No. 127, G. A. R. In 1864 he enlisted as a private in Company G, 132d Ind. V. I., and served with great devotion to the cause for seven months and twenty-three days, when he was honorably discharged. In political belief he has long sustained the principles of the Republican party, in which he is a firm believer. He served the township ably for some six years as trustee. Mr. Williams has made the utmost of his slender opportunities, and in his varied interests, has contributed in no small degree toward the happiness and welfare of his fellows, as well as having provided bounteously for his own immediate family.

MILTON LUTHER HARRIS, of Muncie, Ind., represents a family originally of Scottish ancestry, but which has been identified with Indiana for the last century, as his great-great-grandfather, Obadiah Harris, settled there in 1808-09.

(1) Obadiah Harris was a Quaker minister in Guilford county, N. C., preaching in the New Garden Church of that persuasion, near the historic "Beard's Hatters Shop," which stood at the intersection of Dobson and Guilford cross roads. On his arrival in Indiana he settled in Wayne county, where both he and his son Obadiah cleared up farms. He was the founder of the Quaker meeting in Indiana, put up on his place a building named, in memory of the old church in North Carolina, the "New Garden Friends Church," and preached in it for a long time. He later moved farther north in Wayne county, and cleared up another farm there, but his last days were spent in the home of his son Obadiah, where he died when over one hundred years old. He had but two children, Obadiah and Benjamin, the former of whom reached almost as advanced an age as his father, two prominent instances in a family noted for longevity.

(II) Benjamin Harris was born in North Carolina about 1766, and became a farmer in Guilford county. He and his family accompanied his father on the exodus to Indiana in 1808, and he selected a location six miles north of Richmond, where he cleared a good farm and built a log cabin. This soon gave place to a two-storied hewed log house, and after his death Mrs. Harris had a frame house built. He became a large land owner, and was one of the substantial men of the new community. When a Quaker church was started two miles from Richmond he was one of its founders and loyal supporters. Benjamin Harris lived to the age of seventy, dying in 1836.

While in North Carolina, Benjamin Harris was married to Margaret England, or Shipley, as the name is thought to be by some. They had a large family of children. (1) Obadiah married and settled in Wayne county, Ind. (2) Lewis was a pioneer farmer at Indianapolis. (3) Pleasant married a Miss Mossie in Wayne county, moved to Iowa and became a judge in Iowa City. (4) John settled in Des Moines, Iowa, where he married a Miss Harvey and reared a family. (5) James is the next in direct line of Milton L. Harris. (6) Benjamin married in Wayne county Miss Lydia Heatt, and settled in Wayne county. (7) David was the seventh born. (8) Aaron married Miss Polly Lewis, of Wayne county, and there lived for some time, but later moved to Hamilton county, where he died leaving a family. (9) Nathan settled first in Wayne county, and then in Randolph, where he died. (10) Bathsheba married Job Cogshell, of Wayne county. She died near New Garden, leaving three children. (11) Rebecca married Henry Dutrow, and they lived nine miles north of Richmond, rearing a family. (12) Margaret married John Gardner, of Wayne county, and settled successively in Wayne county and elsewhere in Indiana and in the State of Oregon, where both died, leaving children. (13) Sarah married John Catz and they lived near Williamsburg, Wayne county, where both died leaving a family. (14) Elizabeth married Seth Gardner, and lived in the eastern part of Wayne county with their family.

(III) James Harris was born in Guilford county, N. C., about 1792, and the old family Bible now owned by Bronson L. Harris, shows him to have been a birthright member of the New Garden meeting. He was hardly more than a boy when he accompanied his parents to Indianapolis, but it is remembered that even then he owned one of the famous hats from Beard's Shop. On the frontier it was of course impossible for him to get any advanced education, but he was of much more than ordinary intelligence and he became very well informed through his own reading, largely of an historical character. He married early and settled on a farm about three miles west of Williamsburg, but he soon sold this and bought instead a place a mile and a half east of Williamsburg, comprising 160 acres of woodland. Before this had all been cleared Mr. Harris moved to Green's Fork, southwest of Williamsburg, and bought another 160-acre tract from his brother Obadiah, who moved to Indianapolis. The latter had built first a cabin and later a hewed log house on the place, and it was partially cleared, so that James Harris soon had the place in good condition, and he developed it into a fine farm, later building a two-story frame house and a double hewed log barn, very good buildings for his day.

James Harris married in 1812 in Green township, near Williamsburg, Miss Naomi Lewis, who was born in Randolph county, N. C., about 1794, daughter of John and Sarah (Ruckman) Lewis. Mr. Harris and his wife were both members of the Methodist Church. The former when eighteen years old had enlisted for service in the war of 1812, and consequently, the Quaker Meeting had disowned him. In politics he was a Henry Clay Whig, and a man whose opinions commanded respect in the community. He died July 20, 1854, aged sixty-two, and his wife fifteen years later at the age of seventy-six. Their children were: Bronson L., born in 1818, and still living; Winston E., Milton R., Allen M., Hannah and Sarilda.

The Lewis family to which James Harris' wife belonged, was of English stock and came to Indiana from Randolph, N. C., where her father, John Lewis, was a farmer. He moved to Wayne county, Ind., about the same time Obadiah Harris went, and settled on Green's Fork, where he owned one of the best farms in the county, including between 200 and 300 acres. His son Richard settled near him and cleared up 300 acres, and their descendants are still living on the land. In those early days there was on Richard Lewis' farm a block house, where the family all fled for protection whenever there was danger of an attack from the Indians. John Lewis lived to a good old age, passing away at his old home near Williamsburg. He married Miss Sarah Ruckman, and they had children as follows: Richard, who was a captain in the war of 1812; Sallie, who married Obadiah Harris; Hannah, who married Thomas Lamb; Joseph, who was in the war of 1812, stationed at Vincennes, and who was for several terms a member of the early Indiana State legislature; Priscilla, who married Samuel K. Boyd; and Naomi, Mrs. James Harris. Mr. Lewis belonged to no church, but his wife was a member of the New Light Church and many meetings were held in their home. Mr. Lewis held pronounced views on slavery, and left North Carolina because of the conditions there.

(IV) Winston E. Harris was born Jan. 9, 1820, on his father's farm near Williamsburg, and was nearly six when they moved to Green's Fork. As a boy he went to a school in a deserted log cabin, while later when he was a young man he had two terms in a school held on his father's farm, where a building of hewed logs had been put up. But his school days were limited to brief periods in the winters, when there was no work on the farm to take most of his time. In 1839 he married, and as his father gave him a tract of 160 acres of wooded land on which to make his home, his days were still spent at the arduous task of making a farm from the wilderness. He cut the brush from a knoll and on that favorable location built with his own hands a log cabin, having only his brothers to assist him in any way. This cabin had a four-pane window, 8 by 10. In the course of time he put up a really good house, two stories high, of hewed logs, weather-boarded and with a shingle roof. He added to his land till he owned 200 acres, sixty of it cleared, and in 1851 laid out the town of Parker on his property, a town now having 1000 inhabitants. In 1855 he bought his father's old farm, including some 100 or 170 acres, and operated that for twenty years, retiring finally to Williamsburg, where he lived till left a widower in 1897. Since then he has made his home with his children. Mr. Harris is a typical pioneer, and one of the few men living who can remember the State in its original glory of primitive forests, and can tell from personal experience of the men who made the State.

Mr. Harris was in early life an old-line Whig and cast his first vote before he was twenty-one. As he was married then, there were no questions asked when he presented himself to vote for William Henry Harrison, but his legal status was taken for granted. He was one of the original Republicans, voting for Fremont in 1856, and has ever since supported that party's candidates. For seventeen years he was justice of the peace. In religious belief Mr. Harris was in early life a Methodist, having joined that church when twenty-three years old. He was class leader a long time and helped to found two Methodist Churches. For the past twelve years, however, he has been a member of the Christian Church. Fraternally he is an unaffiliated member of the I. O. O. F., having joined Green's Fork Lodge. He has passed all the chairs, has been noble grand, and has been sent as representative to the Grand Lodge of the State.

Mr. Harris was married (first) in Indiana, Feb. 17, 1839, to Rhoda Emeline Hollingsworth, who was born in South Carolina, daughter of Aquilla and Thomas (Kenworthy) Hollingsworth. On both sides the family was of English ancestry, and belonged to the Quaker faith. Mr. Hollingsworth died in South Carolina, and his children, of whom there were seven—James, Benjamin, Nancy, Susan, Mary, Patsy and Rhoda Emeline—came to Indiana and entered land in Greene township, Wayne county. Mrs. Harris died in the fall of 1853, leaving four children, James, Milton Luther, Martha and Hannah. In October, 1854, Mr. Harris married (second) Naomi, who was the daughter of John and Betsey Lacey and the widow of Calvin Thomas. She was born in Wayne county, Dec. 12, 1821. There was one child by this union, a daughter Emma, who married Columbus Reynolds and settled in Williamsburg. She has since died, leaving one daughter Edith, the wife of Clinton Ball. Mrs. Harris passed away some years ago in Williamsburg, Feb. 5, 1897.

(V) Milton Luther Harris was born in Randolph county, June 22, 1847. He attended the district schools all through his boyhood, and up to the time when he enlisted for the Civil war. He was only sixteen, when he was enrolled in Richmond, Ind., Dec. 28, 1863, as a private in Company C, 9th Ind. Cav. He served till mustered out at Vicksburg and received his honorable discharge at Indianapolis, Sept. 14, 1865, having been on duty in Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. While never wounded, he was once knocked senseless by a shell so near as almost to graze his cheek, and while at Vicksburg, was in hospital once for two weeks in August, 1865. Otherwise, he shared unhurt in all the experiences of his regiment participating in the battles of Florence, Lynnville, Lawrenceburg, Franklin, Pulaski, Nashville, Wilson Pike, Hollow Tree Gap, Sugar Creek and Little Harpeth, besides many skirmishes.

After his discharge Mr. Harris returned home, and worked on his father's farm till March, 1866, going in then with his brother-in-law, Harmon Davis, on the Davis farm. After his marriage in 1867 he rented a farm north of Selma for a year and a half, then was at Dunkirk, and in 1872, bought a small farm in Wayne county. Five years later he removed to Northern Michigan, and was engaged in sawmill work at Kalkaska from 1877 to 1882. Returning to Indiana he farmed first in Delaware county and finally in 1891 went to Muncie, where he was later one of the first rural mail agents, appointed by McKinley. He is still thus engaged, and has made a splendid record.

On Aug. 8, 1867, Milton L. Harris was married to Miss Lorena Ellen Williams, born April 8, 1851, daughter of Col. S. J. and Lorena (Davis) Williams, whose sketch is given elsewhere. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Harris, Emma Ora, now the wife of William Davis, of LaJunta, Colo., and the mother of three children, Edith Irene, Erison Harris and Bertha Leona; and Mattie Irene and Georgia Leona, both deceased. Mr. Harris and his wife are members of the Methodist Church, while in politics he is a Republican. He is an ex-member of Williams Post, G. A. R., named after Col. Williams, of Selma, and belongs to the I. O. O. F., while he and his wife are enrolled in the order of Daughters of Rebekah, in which Mrs. Harris is Past Grand.

HENRY CLARK, one of the esteemed and respected citizens of Anderson, Madison Co., Ind., is a native of Ohio, born in Darke county, ten miles southwest of Greenville, on a farm, Dec. 16, 1838, son of Amanson and Julia Ann (Lawrence) Clark, the former a native of Pennsylvania, and a son of James and Susan (Blanchard) Clark.

The Clarks are of English descent, and James was a farmer. He spent five years in Pennsylvania, where his children, Alanson, James and Amanson, were born. He removed to Darke county, Ohio, in early pioneer times, and bought land which he partly cleared. About ten years later he removed to the Mississinewa river, in Grant county, Ind., and purchased 160 acres of land which he cleared, there intending to spend the remainder of his life, dying, however, in Kansas, with one of his daughters.

Amanson Clark was born about 1813, and was quite a lad when he went with his father to Darke county, Ohio. When he was nine years old he went to live with John French, who was a very substantial farmer of that county, owning some 300 acres, and there he remained until he was twenty-one years of age. At that time he received an outfit, consisting of a horse, saddle, bridle and a suit of clothes, but he continued to work for Mr. French at farm work, until twenty-five years old. Mr. Clark married Julia Ann Lawrence, who was born in Darke county in 1817, daughter of Clark and Susan (Ginn) Lawrence. Amanson Clark and his wife settled in Darke county, where they rented land for many years, finally buying a farm in New Madison. Here he lived retired for some time, and later purchased land in Adams county, upon which he died in his fifty-second year. He was a hard-working industrious man, an old-line Whig and Republican in politics, and a strong Union man. His children were: Henry; Thomas M., who was a private in the 44th Ohio Infantry, in the three years' service, veteranized and served until the close of the war, saw much hard service, and was a prisoner at Andersonville for three months; Mary; Susan; James, who was in the 110th Ohio Infantry, being but a boy of fifteen years when he enlisted, served three years, was in many battles, was taken a prisoner at one time and paroled and during his term of service had seven balls shot through his blouse; Lucinda; William, who served as a private in the war, enlisting in an Ohio regiment at the last call; Emeline; and Saphine. None of the boys who served in the war received a wound, and all the children lived to maturity.

Clark Lawrence, father of Mrs. Amanson Clark, was born in Pennsylvania and became a pioneer of Ohio, where he entered forty acres of land which he cleared. There he erected a log cabin, and purchased twenty acres more land, which he also cleared, and later purchased forty-five acres more, one mile distant. At his death, which occurred in Darke county, when he was in his seventysixth year, he was a very substantial farmer. His children were: Wesley, Henderson, Clark, Boyd, John Tilton, Polly, Henrietta, Lucinda, Jane and Julia Ann. Clark Lawrence was a very highly respected farmer and an industrious man. His sons, Clark and John T., served in an Ohio regiment during the Civil war.

Henry Clark was reared among the pioneers of Darke county, Ohio, and attended a subscription school in a log house, with the exception of the last two winters when a better place was furnished in which the sessions were held. During the winter months Mr. Clark attended school for about six weeks, and thus he, at the age of fourteen years, had gained possession of the common school education of those pioneer days. He was brought up to endure hard work on the farm and in the clearings, and can relate how he was often engaged as late as ten o'clock at night, burning brush and logs on his father's clearings. His recollections of early hardships and customs would make very interesting reading.

Henry Clark engaged in farm labor from his eleventh year. At the age of twenty years he started to work for his father on shares, and then worked for one year with his uncle, Wesley Lawrence. After this he removed to Preble county, Ohio, and after his marriage he and his wife settled on a rented farm of 160 acres in that county, and after two years there, returned to Darke county, where they rented a farm of eighty acres, but soon, however, gave up this farm. Mr. Clark enlisted in the 100-days' service at Eldorado, Preble Co., Ohio, and was mustered out at Camp Dennison, as a private of Company B, 156th O. V. I., April 20, 1864. He had previously enlisted in the Ohio State militia, and served his full time with that body. He was called out during Morgan's raid, and went with his company to Hamilton, Ohio, where Morgan was stopped. He was called out the second time in the volunteer service as a private of the 156th O. V. I., his services being in Kentucky, Virginia and Maryland, and he saw service in battles with Mosby, three miles from Cumberland City, Md. He was also in a number of skirmishes in Kentucky. When he first enlisted Mr. Clark was stationed at Cincinnati, being later detailed with others to guard prisoners who were being transported. He made two trips to Baltimore with prisoners, and served out his full term of service, being honorably discharged at Camp Dennison, Ohio. Mr. Clark was always an active, cheerful, gallant soldier, doing his duty as such in a soldierly manner. He was never wounded, nor was he ever taken prisoner.

After the war Mr. Clark returned to Darke county, Ohio, to the farm, where his wife had lived with their two children while he was away from home. There he remained until 1866, when he removed to Preble county, Ohio, renting 160 acres of land. In 1869 he made his way to Indiana, and settled in Anderson, where he teamed for eight months, afterward renting a farm in Anderson township. This farm, which consisted of forty acres, he cultivated for seven years, and then spent five years on a ninety-five acre farm in Lafayette township. He continued to rent land in the same township until 1895, when he purchased his present property in North Anderson, which consists of a house and three lots. Here he now resides, engaged in a very successful express business.

Mr. Clark has been twice married. He was first married, when nearly twenty-three years of age, Sept. 19, 1861, in Preble county, Ohio, to Margaret Lee, who was born in that county, in 1841-42, daughter of John and Maria Randall Lee. John Lee was a farmer of Preble county, where he owned eighty acres of land, having gone thither from Butler county. He had one son, William, in the Civil war, who served three years in an Ohio regiment, returning home in safety from the front.

The children born to Mr. Clark and his first wife were: Francis Almon, a clerk and a resident of the city of Anderson, married Myrtle Hunt, and has two children; William married Adda McNit, and they reside in Anderson, and also have two children; Lottie married Frank Helm, of Anderson; Susan married Charley Williams, and resides in Anderson, the mother of one child; Della married John Riggs, also of Anderson, and she died leaving one child; Walter married Jessie Hastings, of Anderson, and has two children; Amos, a young man, residing at home, is a good practical farmer; Joseph was accidentally killed when nine years old; Nora died in childhood; and Theodore died in infancy. Mrs. Clark passed away in May, 1877, in the faith of the U. B. Church. She was a good Christian woman of many virtues, and was loved and esteemed by all.

Mr. Clark's second marriage occurred in April, 1879, in Lafayette township, Madison county, when he was united to Mrs. Annie (Slone) Wolfrey, who was born in Randolph county, Md., Feb. 10, 1846, daughter of Samuel and Ruth (Harmon) Slone, both of whom were of Pennsylvania German stock. Samuel Slone was born in Pennsylvania, and was a pioneer of Randolph county. His children were: Abner, who served in the Civil war in an Indiana regiment, and died in the service; Annie; Sarah Ann and Naomi Ann. Samuel Slone owned a tract of forty acres of fine farm land in Randolph county, Indiana.

Mrs. Annie (Slone) Clark has been three times married. Her first union, which occurred when she was but fifteen years old, was to Joseph Richardson, of Henry county, Ind., who died three years later, leaving his young wife with two children, George and Rosetta, both of whom died young. Mrs. Clark's second marriage was to James Wolfrey, and two children were born to this union, Margaret and George (who is now deceased). These children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Clark: Elnora who died in infancy; Walter; James; Harley; Amos and Charles. Mr. and Mrs. Clark are members of the Methodist Church, in which faith they are rearing their children. Mr. Clark is an active and popular member of Major May Post, G. A. R., of Anderson, and is a practical, industrious and hard working man, and a highly respected citizen. He is very well known in his section of the country, and he has innumerable friends and well wishers.

WILLIAM DORRELL, deceased, one of Johnson county's respected citizens, was born in White River township, Johnson Co., Ind., Sept. 15, 1830, and he died April 20, 1904, respected by all who knew him.

William Dorrell, his grandfather, was a native of Maryland of German descent. He moved to Ohio in his youth, and there married, and there most of his sixteen children were born. In 1804 he removed to Indiana and settled in Ohio county, where he remained until his death, which occurred June 30, 1853. Some of the children died in infancy, and of them there is no record. The others were: Nancy, Mrs. Wynn; Katie, Mrs. Conover; Betsy, Mrs. Sedam; Rachel, Mrs. Lankin; Sally, Mrs. Sedam; Hattie, Mrs. Sutton; Margaret, Mrs. Mandal; Rebecca, Mrs. Mitchell; Jacob; William; Daniel and Peter.

Jacob Dorrell, son of William and father of our subject, was born in Ohio, in 1801, and when three years of age moved with his parents to Ohio county, Ind., where he grew to manhood. In 1822 he married Miss Mary Alexander, who was born in Ohio county, June 4, 1804, daughter of John Alexander, of Pleasant township. John Alexander was a pioneer of Dearborn county, Ind. In 1820 he moved to Johnson county, purchased land in Pleasant township, and followed the occupation of a farmer. Later he sold this land and bought the farm on which he lived until his death. He was a soldier in the War of 1812. He was a worthy member of the Methodist Church. In politics he was identified with the Whig party, but never sought office, although he was a leader in the development of Johnson county. John Alexander had five children, namely: Samuel, Joseph, Mary (Mrs. Dorrell), Peggy (Mrs. Means) and Anna (Mrs. Lemaster).

Jacob Dorrell moved to Johnson county in 1828, settling in White River township, where he bought land on credit from Judge Hardin. The county was then but sparsely settled, and Mr. Dorrell and wife had to overcome many obstacles to get their land into cultivation. Jacob Dorrell was compelled to use such farm implements as he could make. His plow had a wooden moldboard, for hauling he had a sled made from hickory poles with pegs for nails, the harness for his horse was quite different from that used now. The collar was made of shucks, hames of crooked beech roots and the traces of hickory bark. After having improved his first land into a good farm, he traded it for three eighty-acre lots on which he made substantial improvements, and lived for the rest of his life. Jacob Dorrell was above the average in size, with a strong constitution, of social disposition, a fluent speaker, opposed to vulgarity of any kind, broad minded and intelligent, and was known for his integrity. He was a good neighbor, always ready to assist the sick and needy, and with his horses conveyed the dead to their last resting place. He died Feb. 1, 1881. His wife died Jan. 12, 1873. Thirteen children were born to Jacob and Mary Dorrell as follows: John, who died and left two sons; Elizabeth, Mrs. Smith; James, who died and left three children; Cynthia A., who died single; William, the subject of this sketch; Daniel, of this township; Paschal, of Greenwood; Sarah, Mrs. Sedam; Joseph, who died and left two children; Mary, Mrs. H. Myers; Samuel, of Greenwood; Urzella, who married (first) W. Clara, and (second) George Hughes; and Margaret, Mrs. J. W. Shephard.

William Dorrell remained under the parental roof until he was about twenty-five years old, and in 1854 he went to Iowa, in which State he entered land, also working land on shares with another man. In 1857, having sold his land, he returned to the homestead in Indiana.

In August, 1858, Mr. Dorrell was married to Miss Marcella Bristow, born in Marion county, Ind., July 22, 1835, daughter of James and Sarah Dunn Bristow. James Bristow was born in Kentucky, in 1805, son of Payton Bristow, a pioneer of Marion county, Ind., who was well known and highly respected, and who died in Marion county.

James Bristow came to Indiana with his parents and was reared among the early settlers of Marion county. He followed the occupation of a farmer, and died in Indiana in February, 1855. His wife, Sarah Dunn Bristow, died in Indiana in 1873. They were members of the United Brethren Church. The children of James and Sarah Dunn Bristow were as follows: Marcella, wife of our subject; Madison, who was a first lieutenant in the Civil war, and who, when in battle his captain fell, took command, and was killed leading his company by ten paces; Joseph, a veteran of the Civil war, residing at Indianapolis; Thomas, who died and left five children; Jane, who died single; Mary, Mrs. James Davis, of Indianapolis; Alford, deceased; and Sarah, Mrs. W. Cahill.

When William Dorrell married he had but thirty dollars to start housekeeping with, but their small capital proved an incentive to the young couple. He rented a farm for a few years, and then bought the land on which he still lives. This purchase consisted of 120 acres of land with no house, and but a few acres under cultivation. He first bought a log cabin in which they lived for a number of years. His wife ably assisted him in all the hard work and struggle to succeed. On borrowed capital he bought more land, manufactured the brick and built his two-story residence. For thirty-five seasons he ran a threshing machine, and during these seasons while away from home, his wife looked after the farm. William Dorrell helped clear and put into cultivation over three hundred acres of land, he split rails, and he worked hard to develop the country. In 1885 he retired from active labor, attending to his farm interests only, and enjoyed the fruits of his early hardships until his death. He had a fine farm of four hundred acres, the residence very beautifully situated on high rolling land with back ground of a large orchard and natural grove, fronting on the Three Notch gravel road connecting with Indianapolis, which city is only twelve miles north, and always proved a good market.

William Dorrell and wife were blessed with eleven children, as follows: Jacob G., a farmer; Joseph, who died young; Daniel D., carpenter and farmer; Sarah M., Mrs. J. Humbarger; Mary, who died young; Paschal E., a farmer of Greenwood and justice of the peace; William A., a farmer; Thomas, a teacher and merchant, and at present student at the State University; James M., living at home; Robert, farming the homestead; Cora J., Mrs. Repass.

Mr. Dorrell never departed from the principles of the Democratic party. He filled two terms as justice of the peace with honor and credit and discouraged lawsuits when they could be avoided, settling many disputes out of court to the satisfaction of the people. He was a worthy member of Mt. Auburn M. E. Church, the rolls of which contained the names of eighteen members of the Dorrell family, including Mrs. Dorrell's. The history of Mt. Auburn Church dates back to 1826. The few Methodists of this vicinity at that time worshipped in a frame church 24x30 feet called Pleasant Hill, and located on the banks of Pleasant Run, one miles west of the present site of Fairview Church. The names of some of the members are still remembered and are Henry Britton, Abner Leonard and wife, George Wright, Jesse Hughes, Julia Pruitt, Frank Sanders, Margaret Smart, Thomas Davis, and Nichols Orme. This was a flourishing church for many years, but as the county became better settled other societies were formed. In the year 1835 the first Methodist class was formed in the neighborhood, being organized at the home of William Harrell, which is now owned and occupied by George Hughes. From this class grew the old Pleasant Hill Society some of the members of which were: Jesse Hughes and wife, John Surface and wife, William Harrell and wife, John Robe and wife, Amos Smith and wife, Jane Ross, and about thirteen others, making a class of about twenty-four. About 1836 this society erected, about one-half mile west of the present church, a small frame building with walls of mud, and used it for school and church purposes. It was familiarly known as the Mud School House, and was used for thirteen years, during which time twelve ministers worked in the field, and in 1843-44-45, successful camp meetings were held on the land of David Melton, now owned by Paschal Dorrell. In 1848-49 the present church was erected, and although not entirely finished was used as a house of worship. In 1853 through the efforts of George Hughes, who passed around the subscription list, enough money was obtained to finish the building. This church has always been an important factor for good in the community, and has had many able pastors. The Sabbath-school of this church had its origin in the Old Mud School House, and has become one of the largest and most active in the State.

Mr. Dorrell was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, being a member of Southport Lodge, No. 270, and with his wife belonged to the Eastern Star.

THOMAS A. MCCOY, a well-to-do resident of Anderson, and a member of a well-known family in Madison county, is a son of Capt. John and Lydia (Clendenning) McCoy, and was born Jan. 1, 1847, in Butler county, Ohio. His youth was spent in Springfield township, Franklin county, whither his father removed when he was nine years of age. He was educated in the district schools there.

From the outbreak of the war Mr. McCoy was eager to enlist, but was twice rejected on account of his youth. In July, 1863, although only a few months over sixteen, he was accepted, and enlisted in Butler county, Ohio, in Company K, 86th O. V. I., under Capt. James Owens, for six months' service. At that time he was five feet seven inches in height and weighed 130 pounds. Mr. McCoy served out his time and was honorably discharged at Cleveland, O., in April, 1864. He was assigned to duty in Cleveland and Columbus, and also for about ten days was in the pursuit of Morgan. The infantry followed mainly by railroad, and by horses and wagons secured from farmers, and pursued the enemy to the Ohio river, where Morgan was finally captured after a skirmish. Mr. McCoy was present at the capture, and at close range saw Morgan and his officers, including his brother Richard and Basil Duke. The tired horses of the Confederates were all turned over to the Union men, and all along the road Rebels were captured as they lay on the ground completely exhausted, their horses standing by them too worn out even to eat grass. Both sides had exchanged horses at the farmers' barns as they passed. After this raid Mr. McCoy went into camp with his regiment at Columbus, Ohio, and from there went to Kentucky. His company took part in the capture of Cumberland Gap, being detailed in squads, and sent in different directions. At that point the four States, Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee come together, and the exact spot is marked by a square stone.

Mr. McCoy tried to enlist once more at Cleveland, but was rejected there, and sent home. In Franklin county he was accepted and became a private in Company H, 134th Ind. V. I., under Capt. Robert Allen, to serve 100 days. He was ordered on guard duty during this period. He was in Indianapolis, Nashville, Louisville and Stevenson, Ala., and was in no fighting except skirmishes. From the last State he went to Louisville and Henderson, Ky., on a steamer, and assisted in executing two noted guerrillas, Morgan and Powell, only about 100 Union men being present. The other guerrillas made a desperate effort to rescue their comrades, and a hot skirmish ensued. Finally the enemy sent out a flag of truce and when Lieut. Spelman, McCoy and Davenport were sent out to meet it a demand was made for surrender, which they refused. They offered the guerrillas a few moments in which to retreat before the Union men would open fire, and the chance of escape was accepted. The band was one that had committed all kinds of outrages. Returning to Louisville and Nashville, Mr. McCoy spent the rest of his term of service there. He had previously been in hospital for a time at Camp Nelson, Ky., and toward the end of his enlistment he was again in hospital at Decatur, Ill., on account of a sun stroke received while on dress parade. He was senseless for three days, and also rendered deaf. From the effects of this sun stroke Mr. McCoy has not recovered. He was finally mustered out at Camp Morton, Indianapolis, in September, 1864.

After the war Mr. McCoy went home and worked on the farm, but for some time was more or less disabled and unable to work in the sun. His father then started him in business as a butcher in Mount Carmel, and for three years he drove his wagon through the surrounding country, and then continued his business at Thorntown, remaining until 1878. The next year was spent at Huntsville, Ala., where he bought a butcher shop, but in 1879 he returned to Thorntown, for three years more. From 1882 to 1888 he was conducting a butcher shop in Rushville, Ind., and then went back to Franklin county, bought the home farm and conducted it for ten years. At the end of that time he bought his present home near Anderson, a place of forty acres, which he has improved and developed into a fine farm.

At the age of twenty-five years Mr. McCoy was married in Franklin county, to Miss Elizabeth Gates, who was born there in 1851, daughter of Richard and Mary (Rosebro) Gates. Her father, a son of James Gates, was born in Butler county, Ohio, became the owner of a large farm in Franklin county, Ind., and there died at the close of the war, having these children: Francis, James and Elizabeth. Mrs. Elizabeth McCoy had two children: Clifford, born in 1874; and Ethel, in 1885. During their residence in Rushville, Mr. McCoy lost his first wife, and two years later, on Oct. 9, 1889, he was married to Miss Alice Oliver, who was born June 28, 1863, daughter of George and Mary Jane (Benn) Oliver. George Oliver came of an old Kentucky family, and was born in that State. He moved to Hamilton county, Ohio, and there married Mary Jane, daughter of Samuel and Phebe Benn, the former of whom was a Virginian, of German ancestry, and owned a farm of fifty-three acres together with a vineyard, near Cincinnati. Some time after his marriage George Oliver moved to Rush county, Ind., bought a large farm near Rushville, and he is still living there, aged eighty years. His wife died there at the age of sixty-one, the mother of three children, William, Bell and Alice. By his union to Miss Oliver Mr. McCoy became the father of the following children, all born in Franklin county, save the youngest: Blaine B., born April 1, 1893; Reed, March 21, 1895; John Thomas, June 29, 1897; and Walter Allen, born in Madison county, July 26, 1900. Mr. and Mrs. McCoy are both members of the Methodist Church, in which he has been class leader. In politics Mr. McCoy is a Republican, and as an old soldier naturally has been found in the ranks of the G. A. R., being an ex-member of Major May post. He is also an unaffiliated member of the I. O. O. F., to which order he has belonged since he was twenty-four years old. Mr. McCoy has always been an industrious man, and has accumulated a good amount of property. In whatever sphere of life he has found himself, he has been faithful to every demand made upon him, and now he is one of the esteemed and honored citizens of Madison county.

WILLIAM H. MARKER, a young and successful financier of central Indiana, who by his own efforts has made his way from the position of a poor boy to that of a representative and responsible man, with influence in his community and ample means at his control, was born in Monterey, Ky., June 25, 1872, son of Alexander C. and Anna (Hardy) Marker.

The Marker family is of Colonial stock, of English descent, the branches of which are scattered through Maryland, Delaware and Virginia.

William Handy Marker, the paternal grandfather, was born July 17, 1789, in Delaware, son of Frederick Marker, a soldier of the Revolutionary war. He was, himself, a soldier in the war of 1812, and took an active part in all the military movements at that time. Later he went as a pioneer to Owen county, Ky., removing soon after to Mercer county. There he married a member of the Sheldon family which is one of the old and aristocratic ones of Culpeper county, Virginia. Mr. Marker bought timber land and engaged in lumbering. He shipped vast quantities of lumber down the Kentucky river to Madison and Cincinnati. He owned large timber tracts in Owen and Shelby counties, Ky., and also owned numbers of slaves. His children were: John, Joseph, George, Alexander, Timothy, Margaret, Sophronia and Mary. The sons served as soldiers in both the Union and Confederate armies during the Civil war, although the father was a strong Union sympathizer. Much of his property was destroyed during the war, and the rest greatly depreciated in value. His death occurred June 10, 1885, at the age of nearly ninety-six years. Mrs. Marker was a good, Christian woman, a consistent member of the Baptist Church.

Alexander C. Marker, father of William

H., was born Oct. 11, 1848, in Owen county, Ky., and obtained a common school education. He followed an agricultural life, settling on a farm which his father gave him at his marriage, but in 1880 he removed to Tipton county, Ind., in order to give his children better educational opportunities. He bought a well improved tract of 100 acres in the north part of the county. He is now a resident of Tipton, retired from business activity. Mr. Marker is a worthy member of the Christian Church. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity at Tipton, and also belongs to the I. O. O. F. In 1871 he was married in Owen county, Ky., to Anna Hardy, born Jan. 8, 1855, in Owen county, a daughter of Dr. Samuel and Amilla (Jameson) Hardy. The Jamesons were from Virginia, and are closely related to those of the same name in Pennsylvania. Dr. Samuel T. Hardy was a pioneer settler, and one of the earliest physicians in Franklin county, Ky., where he cleared up a farm and practiced his profession for many years. He was a man of excellent business perception, engaged extensively in lumbering, and owned mills near Harmony, on the Kentucky river. Born in 1812 he lived until 1885, closing a long and useful career at the age of seventy-three years. During his active years he was prominent in public affairs and served at various times as county treasurer, and also as sheriff. He was a leading member of the Baptist Church. His children were: John P., Mary, Sallie, Anna, Amanda and Isabel. The children of Alexander C. Marker and wife were: William H., Noah R., John T., Forester and Grace. All were given excellent educational opportunities.

William H. Marker was eight years old when he accompanied his parents to Indiana. He had attended two terms of school, and in the new neighborhood he attended the district schools until he was fifteen years of age. Farming did not appeal to him and he concluded to leave home and make his own way in the world, and he secured the opportunity of learning the telegraph business at the Windfall station on the Pan Handle railroad. He became an expert telegrapher, working extra hours in order to perfect himself. He attracted the attention of the officials of the Tipton County Bank, and when he was seventeen he secured a position there. It was a humble one and his duties were manifold, including the care of the office, but he soon demonstrated his fidelity to his employers and came under the direct approbation of E. H. Shirk, the senior member of the company, who, in reward for his faithfulness, trained him in business methods and later gave him opportunities without which, Mr. Marker says, his success would have been impossible. From a clerkship he was promoted and gradually worked his way up to the position of assistant cashier by 1896, and to that of cashier in 1901.

The First National Bank of Tipton is the successor of the Tipton County Bank, a private banking institution which was established in 1876 by Shirk & Shirk, and was managed by E. H. Shirk, Jr., until his death in 1901. After his decease, the bank was reorganized as a National Bank, with a capital stock of $100,000. The officers are: E. W. Shirk, president; Mrs. N. R. Shirk, vice-president, and William H. Marker, cashier. Mr. Shirk is a resident of Chicago, and is president of the First National Bank of Peru, Ind. The Tipton bank is doing a safe and prosperous business.

Mr. Marker was married Dec. 19, 1893, at Tipton, to Rebecca Law, born Oct. 11, 1872, at Shelbyville, Ind., a daughter of Samuel and Sarah (Cutsinger) Law. Mr. and Mrs. Marker have two children: Kyle, born July 15, 1895; and Harry O., born Oct. 7, 1899. Both Mr. Marker and wife are consistent members of the Christian Church. Mr. Marker is a prominent Mason, having taken the 32nd degree, and is a member of Austin Lodge, No. 128, Tipton, the Scottish Rite bodies and Mystic Shrine at Indianapolis, and is Deputy Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of the State of Indiana. In politics he is a fervent supporter of the Republican party, and was a delegate from his district to the last National Republican Convention held at Chicago.

SAMUEL EDWARD BREWER, one of the leading farmers and vegetable packers of Whiteland, Ind., and a man of good standing in the community in which he resides, was born in Pleasant township, near Whiteland, Johnson Co., Ind., June 28, 1842, son of John and Frances (Webb) Brewer, natives of Kentucky.

Daniel Brewer, the paternal grandfather, was a native of Kentucky, and a farmer by occupation, who came to Indiana in 1834, locating in Pleasant township, two miles southwest of Whiteland. Here he entered government land and died, in 1847, at the age of seventy-two years. Eleven children were born to himself and wife. The Brewer family were originally Holland Dutch, and the founder of the family came to America, in 1643, settling in Manhattan. The maternal grandfather was James Webb, a native of Kentucky, of Welsh descent, who came to Indiana in 1836, settling eight miles south of Indianapolis, in Marion county, where he engaged in farming and cattle raising. Here he died at the advanced age of ninety-five years, and he, too, had a large family.

John Brewer, father of Samuel Edward, was a farmer all his life, and came to Indiana in 1832, locating in Pleasant township, Johnson county, where he entered a large tract of government land, part of which is now embraced in the present site of Whiteland. His real estate holdings aggregated about 1000 acres, and here he died in 1881, aged seventy-four years. His wife died in June, 1904. Both were stanch Presbyterians. Eight children were born to them, six now living: Samuel Edward; Docia, wife of Dr. A. Miller of Bloomington, Ind.; Mary E., of Bloomington; Belle, wife of Leon Covert, of Long Beach, Cal.; Maggie, wife of L. F. Tracy, of Whiteland; and Tellie, widow of Albert Brooks.

Samuel Edward Brewer has passed his life in Pleasant township, having resided here for sixty years and seen the country develop in a wonderful degree. His parents were among the pioneers of the State, and his boyhood days were passed among surroundings which appear strange today. The land his father owned, and all of which he improved, was covered with heavy timber, to fell which was an almost endless task. His primary education was obtained in the little log school house of the neighborhood, where a split rail served for a seat, and books were few and old-fashioned. This he supplemented with a course at Hope-well Academy, which enabled him to teach school from 1864 to 1871.

When Mr. Brewer was thirty years of age, he left the home of his father and operated a mill for sixteen years, when he sold his plant and embarked in vegetable packing, making a specialty of peas and tomatoes. Later, he established the canning factory in Whiteland, which he conducted for ten years and then disposed of it to Grafton Johnson. In the busy season this factory employs 150 to 200 people.

On March 21, 1867, Mr. Brewer was married to Miss Melissa Springer, daughter of Cordenan and Orpha (Webb) Springer. Four children were born to them: Anna married Charles Graham of Whiteland, and they have five children—Roy, Earl, William, Fannie and John. Fannie married Rev. William Alexander, lives in Argyle, Ill., and has three children—Mary, Anna and Clara. Edward, who was a storekeeper and postmaster of Whiteland, married Mary L. Pearson, had two children, Samuel and Marcia, and died in November, 1899, aged twenty-five years. Leona is still at school. Mrs. Brewer is a member of the Methodist Church. In politics Mr. Brewer was brought up in the Democratic faith, but is now independent. At one time he served as justice of the peace, and has been a notary public for the past sixteen years. He owns eighty acres of the old homestead, all of which is finely improved and forms a portion of the village of Whiteland. Both Mr. and Mrs. Brewer are highly esteemed by their neighbors, and are enjoying a well-earned prosperity in their pleasant home.

THOMAS J. MITCHELL, a reliable citizen of Eaton, Ind., and a soldier of the Civil war, was born April 22, 1837, in Clark county, Ohio, son of Samuel and Malinda (Stafford) Mitchell.

Samuel Mitchell, the father, was born in 1811, in Giles county, Va., son of William and Catherine (Stafford) Mitchell. Mr. Mitchell was born in England of Scotch-Irish extraction, and came to America in 1810, settling near Gilestown, Va., where he engaged in farming until he moved to Ohio, in Samuel's boyhood.

William Mitchell entered land in Miami county, Ohio, near Troy, where he cleared up a good farm of 160 acres, and this land is still owned by the Mitchell family. He died on his farm aged eighty-seven years. His mother lived with him and survived to the age of 103 years, and the venerable lady is remembered by our subject, who was ten years old at the time of her death. The children of William were: Wilson, Samuel, George, Zachariah, William, Helen, Elizabeth, Malinda and Susan. William Mitchell was a true pioneer in all that the word implies, and he was one of the early supporters of the cause of religion, a worthy member of the Methodist Church.

Samuel Mitchell, father of Thomas J., was born in Giles county, Va., and was about one year old when his father removed to Miami county, Ohio. He was reared on the farm, enjoyed a pioneer school education, and later he learned the carpenter's trade, at which he worked in Miami county. Subsequently he bought a home place of fifteen acres, and here operated a mill on Honey Creek. In 1852 he removed with his family to Indiana, and settled in Niles township, Delaware county, where he bought 160 acres of partially improved land, about fifteen acres having been cleared and on this a log cabin had been erected. He completed the clearing and improved the place with a story and a half residence and good farm buildings. These he sold at a later date and bought 190 acres of improved land, south of Granville, on which he lived many years, but finally he retired to Muncie, bought property, and there he died aged three months over sixty-eight years. He was a member of the Methodist Church, in which he was a steward. He was generous in his assistance to the church, and was a man thoroughly respected by all who knew him. In politics he was a Republican, but in the early days an old-line Whig. He served as trustee of Niles township. During the Civil war he was loyal to the Government, and gave two sons to the service of his country, Thomas J. and Edward. The latter was a member of Company B, 84th Ind. V. I., and when taken sick was brought home by his father, but all that parental care could do, was to preserve the beloved life one week after they reached home. This father again brought a son, our subject, back to the old homestead suffering from the effects of army exposure, in this case having the comfort of seeing health once more return.

Samuel Mitchell married (first) Malinda Stafford, born in Clark county, Ohio, daughter of Thomas and Catherine (Williams) Stafford. Thomas Stafford was born in Giles county, Va., and was a pioneer in Miami county, Ohio, where he acquired a good farm of 160 acres, and lived thereon into old age. His children were: George, Joseph, Thomas, Henry, John, Malinda, Elizabeth, Susan, Nancy, Jane and Lucinda. To Samuel and Malinda (Stafford) Mitchell were born: Elizabeth, Catherine, Sarah Ellen and Thomas J. Mrs. Mitchell died in Ohio, in 1839, when our subject was but two years old. Mr. Mitchell was married (second) in Miami county, again to a Malinda Stafford, a cousin to his first wife, and the children of this union were: Edward, Marilla and Ellen. After the death of his second wife, Mr. Mitchell was married (third) to Hannah De Witte, and they had one son, William W.

Thomas J. Mitchell was fifteen years old when he accompanied his parents to Indiana, in 1852. He can recall the journey from Ohio, made with four two-horse, covered wagons. The party spent four days on the road, camping by the wayside and each day noting the differences in soil and forest growths between the two States. The trip at his age was one of enjoyment and its hardships were mere pleasing adventures. He had attended the district schools in Ohio, and possessed at this time a fair knowledge of the rudiments, and this was fortunate, for, after settling in Indiana, his opportunities were meager, although he did attend a few sessions of school in the little log school house in the vicinity of his home, in Delaware county. All his training for the future was in the line of farming and, as the eldest son, much of the hard work and responsibility, fell upon his shoulders. It resulted in his early development, and he was but nineteen years old when he was ready to establish a home of his own and set up his own domestic circle, renting land in Niles township.

On Sept. 10, 1861, Mr. Mitchell enlisted at Richmond, Ind., as a private of Company K, 36th Ind. V. I., to serve three years or during the war, and served until honorably discharged at Indianapolis on account of sickness, having been in the army for thirteen months, mainly in Kentucky. He was taken ill with typhoid-pneumonia, at New Haven, Ky., and was confined in the hospital there from Feb. 9, 1862, until the following April, when he was brought home by his father, in a very weak condition, not expected to live. He continued too ill to engage in business for the next two years, but as soon as able, resumed farming.

Shortly after his second marriage, in 1864, Mr. Mitchell settled first in Niles township, but later removed to Hamilton township, living there five years, and then moved to Hartford City, where he engaged in a butchering business for nine months. He then resumed farming, moving to Clinton county, later to Cass county, where he lived for nine years, and in 1892 came to Eaton, where he purchased his present residence, and six other lots.

On Aug. 7, 1856, Mr. Mitchell was married (first), to Elizabeth Sharon, of Niles township, daughter of George and Nancy Sharon. George Sharon was a pioneer farmer of Niles township, where he cleared 160 acres from the woods and converted it into a productive farm. He was a man of means and prominence in his locality. The children of Mr. Sharon were: Henry, Elizabeth, Nancy, Jacob, Sarah and Mary. After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell settled in Niles township, and on this farm Mrs. Mitchell died in August, 1860. They had one child, Henry C., who died aged ten months.

On Jan. 7, 1864, Mr. Mitchell was married (second), in Niles township, to Amanda Edgington, born in Adams county, Ohio, Nov. 11, 1840, daughter of Wilson D. and Hannah (Naylor) Edgington. Wilson D. Edgington was born in April, 1808, in Adams county, son of William and Catherine Edgington, the former a pioneer farmer of Adams county. In 1851 he moved to Indiana and settled in Niles township, where he bought a farm of 140 acres, on which he made improvements, and lived to the age of ninety-three years. His wife died aged seventy-nine years. She was a member of the German Baptist Church. Their children were: Phebe, Evans, Thomas, Amanda, Minerva, Frank and Clara.

The children of Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell are: Samuel, George S., Cyrus O., Eva and Otto D. These children have all been afforded excellent educational advantages. Cyrus O. is a graduate of the Lebanon Ohio National Normal School, and is now teacher of Latin and German at Frankton, Ind. Eva H. is a graduate of the Eaton High School and of the Normal College at Marion, Ind., and she has been a successful teacher in the Delaware county district schools. Otto D. graduated at Valparaiso, Ind., and is a druggist at Eaton, a successful business man.

Mr. Mitchell, while never very active in politics, has always taken a good citizen's interest, and has always been identified with the Republican party. Formerly he belonged to the G. A. R. post at Logansport, Ind. He is a member of the Christian Church.

A. J. SMITH comes from an old and highly respected family of Indiana, his father having settled in Fayette county, in 1802. Mr. Smith was born in Fayette county, April 29, 1828. His father, Tobias Smith, Jr., was born in 1781, and was the only heir of Tobias and Ruth Smith, of Virginia. Tobias Smith, Sr., belonged to one of the first families of Virginia, where he was a successful and respected farmer, and in that State he died.

Tobias Smith, Jr., remained at home until he was a young man. In 1802, with a small colony of neighbors and friends, he migrated to Indiana territory and settled in Fayette county. Here he entered land, and with much hard work soon had a good farm opened. A few years after settling in Indiana he married his first wife, of whom but little is known. Nine children resulted from this union, as follows: Mariah, Mrs. Buchanan; John; Ruth, Mrs. Messersmith; Mary, who married Peter Messersmith; Robert, who located in Johnson county; Joseph, who located in Johnson county; Sarah, who died single; Tobias; and George, who died in 1826. Of these Robert, Joseph and Tobias moved to Johnson county. Besides attending to his general farm work Mr. Smith raised stock, for which he found a good market at home. He also ran a distillery, for the product of which he found a market at Cincinnati, Ohio. He owned land in different counties, and traded western land for 600 acres of land in West Virginia. This land, which no doubt is of great value now for its minerals, coal, oil and gas, has never been accounted for to his estate. Shortly after obtaining this land he and his wife's brother went there to inspect it. On this trip Mr. Smith met with an adventure that nearly cost him his life. He was armed with a gun and a knife and encountered a bear that he wounded, and which showed fight, chewing one of his arms; he finally killed the animal with his knife. He was in every sense a pioneer, and no doubt the exposure and hardships he encountered shortened his days. Being broad-minded, intelligent and a thorough business man, he became prominent and influential among the early settlers. In 1821 he was chosen a delegate to the convention that located the State capital at Indianapolis. In politics he was a Democrat, and used his influence in support of his party. He was a leader in many public enterprises, and in all respects a very useful man in the new country. Having purchased 160 acres of land in Johnson county, he was arranging to move there when he was taken sick and died at the old homestead, Aug. 21, 1836, at the age of fifty-five years. Mr. Smith's second wife was Margaret Lilly Foster, whose first husband was William Foster, by whom she had six children: Enoch; Jane, Mrs. Hank; Fanny, Mrs.

Draper; Ellen, Mrs. Patterson; Susan, Mrs. Pruitt; and Sampson. These children were reared by Tobias Smith, Jr. Mrs. Margaret Lilly Foster Smith was born in Bath county, Va., Sept. 20, 1782, daughter of Wm. Lilly, a respected citizen of West Virginia, who remained there until he died. William Lilly had four children, David, William, Dorothea (Mrs. Messersmith) and Margaret (mother of our subject). Three children were born to Tobias, Jr., and Margaret Lilly Smith, as follows: George W., who was raised in Johnson county, and when a young man moved to Iowa, where he died; Rebecca, Mrs. Williams; and A. J., the subject of this sketch. After the death of her husband Mrs. Smith took as her dower right the land in Johnson county, and in the same year, 1836, moved there with the unmarried portion of her family and settled on the land where A. J. Smith now lives. At that time there were only thirty-five acres partly cleared and two cabins, but Mrs. Smith was not discouraged. Realizing her position she bought a loom, and its click could be heard at all hours. With this loom she wove the material for the clothing of many of her neighbors. She gave instructions to her boys, and by hard work, conservative management and the assistance of her sons she began farming, and made the home self-supporting. She was a devout Methodist, and in that faith passed away Feb. 27, 1853.

A. J. Smith was eight years old when his mother came to Johnson county. He remained with her during her life, helping her in every way and assisting in clearing up the land and improving the farm. His early education was somewhat limited, but he gained a good practical education in the school of experience. After the death of his mother he bought eighty acres of the old farm. Mr. Smith was married Oct. 9, 1854, to Sarah Echols, a lady of culture and refinement, a worthy wife and good helpmate to a successful man. Mrs. Smith is a worthy member of the Methodist Church. She was born in White River township May 28, 1835, daughter of Joshua and Nancy Echols, both of Kentucky, where they were married, after which they moved to Johnson county. Here he entered land and improved a farm. He also taught school, and was a successful and well known farmer, commanding the respect of the community. Mr. and Mrs. Echols had nine children as follows: Emaline, Mrs. William Carder; James, deceased; William, deceased; Lucy, Mrs. Jennings; Isaac, deceased; Sarah, wife of A. J. Smith; Christopher, of Indianapolis; Martha, Mrs. Thomas Orme; and John, of Indianapolis.

To Mr. and Mrs. Smith have come ten children: Marcellis, born March 1, 1856, who died Oct. 21, 1862; James W., born Nov. 10, 1857, who died Sept. 14, 1862; Margaret E., born Sept. 20, 1859, who married James Lassiter; Horace L., of Glens Valley, born Dec. 15, 1861; George L., born March 15, 1864, who resides in Indianapolis; Nancy A., born Sept. 15, 1866, who married G. Trussler; Mary A., born Sept. 15, 1866, a twin of Nancy, and who married T. Church; E. J., born Jan. 1, 1870, engaged at farming the homestead; Laura A., born Aug. 4, 1872, who married William Stone; and Charles A., born Jan. 15, 1875. Mr. Smith is a practical and successful farmer and by his hard work and honesty has gained a competency for his old age. He now enjoys the fruits of his well-spent life, and the high regard of his neighbors. In politics Mr. Smith is a Democrat, but has never aspired to public office. During the war of the Rebellion he remained loyal to the flag, and paid for two substitutes.

GEORGE L. BRUNNEMER, a prominent and respected farmer of Johnson county, was born near Waverly, Morgan county, Jan. 22, 1842, son of Anthony and Blanche (Mitchell) Brunnemer, the former of whom was born in Virginia, and the latter in Tennessee.

George Brunnemer, the paternal grandfather, was born in Virginia, where his Holland ancestors had settled long before, and became a pioneer in Morgan county, Ind., where he followed an agricultural life. He reared a large and respected family, and finally passed out of life respected by all who knew him. The maternal ancestors of George L. Brunnemer were of Irish descent, and the grandfather, a native of Tennessee, took part as a soldier in the Revolutionary war.

Anthony Brunnemer, father of George L., came in boyhood to Indiana with his parents, and grew to manhood in Morgan county, married there, and died in 1893, at the age of eighty-two years. His wife, Blanche Mitchell, passed away in 1883, aged eighty years. Both parents were worthy and consistent members of the Methodist Church. Their children were as follows: Sarah J., wife of George L.

Tackett, of Camargo, Ill.; William, deceased; Mary E., wife of David Shutters, of Franklin, Ind.; and George L.

George L. Brunnemer was reared in Morgan county, attending the district schools and assisting on the farm until he was seventeen years old, when his parents removed to Johnson county, in 1860 locating one mile north of Whiteland, and there he resided until he was twenty-one. He then built a house of his own, on his father's farm, and attended to the whole property on shares, continuing thus until the spring of 1865, when he enlisted for service in the Civil war. He became a private in Company E, 148th Ind. V. I., and his duty consisted in the guarding of posts and prisons during his whole term of service, being mustered out in September of the same year. Returning home, he purchased a tract of forty acres of land, located a mile and a quarter west of Whiteland, to which he has added, until now he owns 320 acres of finely improved land. Mr. Brunnemer lived there and operated the farm until 1890, when he removed to Whiteland and embarked in the fruit packing business, first as a stockholder, but later as superintendent of the work. For seven years he was engaged in this profitable business, and then sold out to Grafton Johnson, since that time being the latter's assistant. For four years he conducted a store in Whiteland, being succeeded in this enterprise by his son. For the past twelve years he has made his home in the village, building here a comfortable and convenient residence. His farming interests are in the hands of his sons, although he enjoys a general supervision over his large estate.

The first marriage of Mr. Brunnemer was to Miss Sarah E. McClellan, daughter of Joseph and Margaret (Clem) McClellan. Two children were born to this union, namely: James D., operating one of his father's farms, who married Louie Sharp, and has two children, Elsie and Harry; and Emma, who died at the age of two years. Mrs. Brunnemer died in 1866, and Mr. Brunnemer married (second) Miss Nancy C. Van Arsdale, daughter of C. A. B. and Nancy Van Arsdale, the three children of this union being: (1) Albert T., a farmer, married Rosa Perkins, and has one son, Myron L. (2) Annie J., married Hugh E. Johnson, postmaster at Whiteland, and has three children, Homer; Wilbur D.; and Lillian. (3) William J. succeeded his father in a general merchandise business at Whiteland; he married (first) Ida Capplinger, and (second) Burdette McClain, and has three children. William Merrill, Winfred Herald and Georgie Catherine.

In politics Mr. Brunnemer is identified with the Republican party. Both he and wife are leading members of the Methodist Church, all of the family being supporters of the same. The esteem of the community is enjoyed by Mr. Brunnemer, who is recognized as a man of worth and reliability, and as a useful and estimable citizen.

JOHN GILMORE, late a representative citizen of Adams township, Madison Co., Ind., was an honored survivor of that great struggle which convulsed the United States from 1861 to 1865, in which he bravely bore a part, and he ever afterward suffered on account of injuries received in the line of duty. He came from Scotch-Irish ancestry.

Hugh Gilmore, Sr., the great-grandfather of John, was a weaver by trade, and was quite an extensive linen manufacturer for his day. He employed men and ran three looms, and lived in Monaghan, Ireland, and it is believed that he left a considerable property. The family were Protestants.

Hugh Gilmore, Jr., grandfather of John, was born about 1776, and received a common school education in Ireland, coming to America when a boy of sixteen years of age and landing at Charleston, S. C., in 1792. He hired out to a man who was moving to West Virginia on the Great Kanawha river. Although unaccustomed to horses, he drove a four-horse team through from Charleston to the place of settlement. He worked for his employer for some years and remained in that neighborhood, Mason county, W. Va., about eighteen miles up the river from Point Pleasant. Mr. Gilmore married Lucretia Reynolds, born in that neighborhood, daughter of Morris Reynolds, a pioneer salt maker of the Kanawha, farmer and substantial citizen. Hugh Gilmore and his wife settled in that neighborhood, where he bought 120 acres of land, mostly bottom land and very fertile, and cleared it from the woods. Here he made an excellent farm, and reared his children, whose names were: Elizabeth, John, William, Silas and Morris, Silas being a soldier in the U. S. service. The family were members of the Baptist Church. In October, 1829, Hugh Gilmore and his family came to Adams township, Madison Co., Ind., locating on what was afterward known as the Gilmore homestead on the 29th of that month. He bought a squatter's claim, and later entered 190 acres of land, and still later purchased eighty acres more. He began to clear his farm, but was accidentally killed while clearing a spot for a burial ground. Throughout his life he was a hard working, industrious, God-fearing man, and helped to establish firmly the Baptist Church in the new section of the country. In politics he was an old-line Whig.

Morris Gilmore was born in West Virginia, June 11, 1811, and received a common school education, becoming a well read man and a skilled mathematician. His old copy book used in school by him is still in existence. Mr. Gilmore was married in Gallipolis, Ohio, to Elizabeth Blazer, born in Gallia county, Ohio, daughter of George and Elizabeth (McKinley) Blazer, the former of Pennsylvania German stock. Shortly after his marriage Morris Gilmore came to Madison county, Ind., in October, 1829, bringing his parents and two other parties, having two light covered wagons, one drawn by three horses and the other by two. There were not many roads after passing the Ohio river, the elevations being their only guide, but as it was the dry season they made the trip in about three weeks, arriving Oct. 29th. There was a log cabin on the farm, and Mr. Gilmore bought out the squatter and located on the place with the family. Nothing was cleared on this farm except a small patch around the cabin, but Mr. Gilmore was hearty and strong, and that winter cleared three acres, the next season raising a good crop. The horses and cows lived on the wild pea vine and other wild plants of the forest. Mr. Gilmore became prosperous, clearing up a good farm of 270 acres, and he built the first brick house in that section of Indiana, one and one-half stories, a large, square structure, the timbers for which were cut from the farm and the shingles made by hand. Mr. and Mrs. Gilmore were Methodists in religious belief. He was an influential man in his community, and for several years served on the board of township trustees. He lived to be seventy-one years of age, and died Dec. 5, 1879. His children were: George, Hugh, Philip, Roman, Van, John and Morris (twins), Mary Ann, Elizabeth and Reve. Of these Philip was accidentally killed when twenty-one years of age, and Elizabeth and Reve died in infancy.

John Gilmore was born May 10, 1841, on the farm in Adams township, in the brick house, and was probably the first child born in a brick house in this section of Indiana. He received a good common school education, having some excellent teachers, and was reared among the pioneers, working in the clearing when he was young with his brothers. There was much clearing to be done, but the youths were strong and hustling, and some times cleared as much as fifteen acres in a season and put it under cultivation. They raised good crops and the family had an abundance. His father set out a large orchard when he first came to the county, and the trees soon became large and fine, supplying the family with fruit, while the mother spun flax and yarn and made the family clothes.

On July 29, 1861, John Gilmore and his brother, Morris, with four other boys of the neighborhood, went to Indianapolis, Ind., and enlisted as soldiers for three years' service in Company A, 19th Ind. V. I. John served until his honorable discharge, Jan. 9, 1863, at Philadelphia, Pa., on account of gunshot wounds and disability; Morris was shot and killed at the battle of Antietam, Sept. 17, 1862, and his remains rest in an "unknown" grave. He had been in the battles of Gainesville and Second Bull Run, and made a brave and faithful soldier. John was also at Gainesville and Second Bull Run, and at the latter place was wounded in the left hand, being confined at Washington, D. C., at the hospital, suffering from his wounded hand and from other troubles, being later removed to U. S. Grant Hospital, West Philadelphia, where after two months he was discharged, a physical wreck. Until his disability he was a faithful, gallant soldier, and served his country to the best of his ability.

After the war Mr. Gilmore returned to his home and resumed agricultural pursuits on the home farm, where he continued until his death May 29, 1905. He was married Oct. 15, 1867, in Adams township, to Sarah S. Von Winkle, born in Adams township on her father's farm, Jan. 22, 1843, daughter of Robert and Catherine (Irwin) Von Winkle, old Colonial families, the Von Winkles being originally of Pennsylvania and early settlers of Montgomery county, Ohio. Robert Von Winkle was born in 1815, and was married there, subsequently removing with his family to Adams township, where he had a farm of 300 acres, most of which he bought cleared. On this farm he had two brick houses. He was a man of liberal views and of high moral character.

being an excellent neighbor and friend, and a kind and indulgent father. He was very independent. His children were: George, Sarah S., Greeley, Charles, Anna and Laura.

To the first marriage of John Gilmore there were born these children: Charles I., a resident of Anderson, married Jocelyn Davis; Robert M., a farmer of Madison county, married Eva Myre, and has two children, Edward and Evan; Eva F. married Lincoln Smith, of Madison county, and they have one child, Zola B.; Anna L. resides at home; and Homer H. was a student in the high school at Anderson, from which he was graduated in 1898, graduated from the University of Bloomington, class of 1903, and is now in the wholesale and retail coal business at Muncie.

Mr. Gilmore was married a second time May 22, 1880, in Anderson, to Mrs. Aveline (Guinn) Welch, born June 24, 1843, in Madison county, Ind., daughter of John and Florence (Graham) Guinn. By this marriage Mr. Gilmore had one daughter, Edna V., who married Walter Cooper. Mrs. Gilmore was married (first) to Clinton C. Welch, a cabinet maker and carpenter, and to this union was born one child, Mary B., who married Edward H. Lewis, and became the mother of two children: Robert and Mildred.

John Guinn was a Virginian of Colonial stock of West Virginia, born Dec. 21, 1812, and his wife March 29, 1819, and their children were: Mary Ann, born Feb. 25, 1828; Isabel Jane, Sept. 2, 1840; Aveline, June 24, 1843; James, March 31, 1845; and Harrison, March 4, 1850. John Guinn was a son of Daniel and Elizabeth (Taylor) Guinn, of Monroe county, Va., and was a pioneer of Stony Creek township, where he cleared up a good farm, and died at the age of sixty-seven years. His son, James, was a soldier in the 8th Ind. V. I., during the Civil war, and still survives, carrying on agricultural pursuits in Stony Creek township.

After marriage John Gilmore settled in the present residence of the family, which he built with the assistance of his father, who gave him eighty acres of land, part of which he cleared. He made a good home, set out a fine orchard, and became a substantial farmer. When a young man Mr. Gilmore was very industrious, but about four years before his death he was stricken with dropsy, and he was an invalid the rest of his life. Mr. and Mrs. Gilmore were members of the Methodist Church, of which they were always very liberal supporters. He was an honored comrade of Major Samuel Henry Post, G. A. R., Pendleton, and in political matters a Republican, casting his first vote for Abraham Lincoln, and for every Presidential candidate of his party after that time.

JOHN BARLOW, who owned one of the finest farms in Johnson county, improving it himself from natural woodlands, clearing and cultivating until it became a model modern farm, died Jan. 20, 1903.

Mr. Barlow was born in Bartholomew county, Ind., one mile and a quarter south of Edinburg, March 1, 1826, one of the family of five sons and eight daughters (all now deceased) born to Jacob and Rebecca (Pile) Barlow, the former a native of Virginia, and the latter of Kentucky.

Jacob Barlow was born in Rockingham county, Va., and moved to Kentucky with his parents at the tender age of one year, and there he grew to manhood and was married. He was throughout his life a farmer, and combined with a thorough knowledge of all the varied duties of an agriculturist, a natural bent in the direction of mechanics. He came to Indiana in 1831, and located in Bartholomew county, south of Edinburg, and entered land there, and some years later entered three quarter-sections in Shelby county, and also three quarter-sections in Johnson county, part of which only he retained. 'At one time he had over 1300 acres of valuable farm land. In 1812 he was drafted into the army, but hired a substitute. He conducted a distillery in Kentucky, and also one in Bartholomew county for some years, and occupied the position of justice of the peace, and also that of school trustee. His home was in Bartholomew county up to the time of his death, which occurred, however, at the house of his daughter Margaret in Clark township, Johnson county, in 1862, his age being seventy-eight years. His wife died in 1840.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. Barlow was Henry Barlow, a native of Virginia of Dutch descent. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and served with distinction in many campaigns. He moved into Kentucky in the early days, where he conducted the business of farming successfully, and combined with this the care of a distillery. He died there at an advanced age, leaving a large family, having had six sons and several daughters, nearly all of whom moved to Illinois.

Benjamin Pile, father of Mrs. Rebecca (Pile) Barlow, lived and died in Kentucky in the prime of life. He had a large family. He, too, was a farmer and ran a distillery, and also conducted a water mill. His various enterprises were ably handled, and his efforts were crowned with more than ordinary success.

John Barlow was reared upon a farm in Bartholomew county. He received his education in the old-fashioned subscription schools, and throughout his life engaged in general farming. He remained at home until he reached the age of twenty-seven years, when having saved some money in working for his father, he came to his late home farm in the fall of 1853, and located upon land given him by his father, three parcels of eighty acres each, and he had about 600 acres of highly improved and valuable farm land. He cleared the land received from his father of the heavy woods, and replaced the small log farm house upon it with a handsome brick house. The log house still stands, a monument to the days long since gone by. Mr. Barlow built a number of barns and other buildings, which compare favorably with any in the county.

On Aug. 21, 1853, he was joined in marriage to Hannah Smith, daughter of William and Elizabeth (Heck) Smith. Of this union four children were born: William Henry, of Shelby county, who married Tillie Watson; Orea, who died in infancy at the age of two and one-half years; May, who married James L. Copeland, lives about a mile north of Mr. Barlow's home, and had four children, Lenna, Elmer, John (deceased) and Oscar Lowe; Hernan, of Clark township, who married Mamie Whitton, and has three children, Russell, Ethel and Everett.

Mrs. Hannah (Smith) Barlow died Jan. 19, 1903, but one day before her husband entered into rest. She was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which she was highly esteemed and beloved. Her father, William Smith, was born in Essex county, Delaware, and her mother Elizabeth (Heck) was born in Maryland. They were early settlers in Indiana, coming here from Ohio and settling in Shelby county, where he died in 1856, or 1857, at the age of sixty-one years. His wife survived him about twenty years, and died there in 1877, at the age of seventy-six years. She was a member of the Lutheran Church; her husband was a Methodist in religious belief. They had five children, one son and four daughters, all but one now living. Hannah, wife of John Barlow; Elvira, widow of Lawrence Lowe; Mary, widow of Jasper Hughes; Jane, wife of Redin Doron; and John, the only son.

James Smith, father of William, was a native of Delaware, who died in Ohio well advanced in years. He had but a small family, and was a farmer by occupation. The maternal grandfather of Mrs. Barlow was an early settler in Indiana, coming here in about 1818 and locating in Shelby county, where he died at an old age, leaving a family of six or seven children. He was a farmer by occupation, and his wife was Hannah Heck.

In political belief Mr. Barlow was a lifelong Republican, and from the ranks of the voters rendered efficient services to the party. He took a great interest in all of its vital issues, and was thoroughly informed upon all the political issues of the day. In his long life he offered a most excellent example to others of his township, both young and old, in his farsightedness, and business ability, which contributed so largely to his success, and to which he added an integrity which made him respected and admired by all who knew him.

JOSHUA JESTER, a respected citizen of Mt. Pleasant township, Delaware county, is of Scotch descent, and his ancestors were among the early settlers of the State of Delaware, in which commonwealth he was born Nov. 23, 1845.

George W. Jester, father of Joshua, was a native of Newcastle county, Del., and was a farmer and overseer of plantations. Somewhere between 1850 and 1852, he moved with his family to Ohio, and located first in Pickaway county, and then in Ross. Except for one year, when he worked as a carpenter in Chillicothe, his time was spent in farming there, until in 1860. In the spring of that year he moved to Indiana, lived four years between Alexandria and Summitville and then bought town property in Yorktown, where he resided until his death in 1890, at the age of sixty-five years.

Mr. Jester was twice married. He married, Dec. 28, 1838, Miss Eliza Ann Scott, who was born in Delaware, March 27, 1822. They became the parents of ten children, born as follows: William Henry, about 1840, who died in the Civil war; Lydia Ann, Aug. 13, 1842, who died young; James A., Nov. 23, 1843; Joshua, 1845; Manlove, April 9, 1849, who died at the age of twenty-six; George W.,

Aug. 7, 1850; Mary A., Jan. 29, 1854; Eliza J., March 22, 1856; Sarah A., March 3, 1858; and John Wesley, Jan. 31, 1860. The mother died in Yorktown, Ind., March 27, 1864, and for his second wife, Mr. Jester married Miss Alice Groves, born in Indiana, June 4, 1824. He and his wife were members of the Methodist Church, as was also the first Mrs. Jester. In politics he was an ardent Republican and a strong Union man. Three of his sons were in the war, William Henry, James Alfred and Joshua.

William Henry Jester enlisted in Company B, 36th Ind. V. I., for three years' service, but died in a hospital in Chattanooga, June 24, 1864, after considerable hard service. His last battle was Resaca, in the Atlanta campaign. He was about twenty-four years old when he died, and was a young man of fine character. He began to work early, and used his first money to buy a Bible. In that book, which is now in the possession of Mr. Joshua Jester, are the family records, which William Henry gathered and wrote therein in his neat handwriting. It is from these that this sketch is mainly compiled.

James A. Jester was in the 8th Ind. Cav. for three years and though he participated in many battles, he returned home safely. He resides in Delaware county.

Joshua Jester was between five and seven years old when his father moved to Ohio, and about fifteen when his father located in Indiana. For nearly two years he continued to help on his father's farm, but in January, 1862, he enlisted in the same company with his brother William, and served until honorably discharged in Indianapolis Sept. 17, 1865. His regiment was in Tennessee, Kentucky, Alabama, Georgia and the Carolinas, and the list of battles and skirmishes in which he shared during his two years of military life was a long one. After the battle of Buzzard's Roost, Feb. 27, 1864, followed Red Clay, Rocky Face Ridge, Tunnel Hill, Mill Creek, Buzzard's Roost Gap, Varnell's Station, Resaca, Sugar Valley, Oostanaula, Tilton, Turner's Bridge, Adairsville, Rome, Kingston, Dallas, New Hope Church, Burnt Hickory, Pumpkin Vine Creek, Allatoona Hill, Cassville Station, Burned Church, Ackworth, Kenesaw Mountain, Lost Mountain, Marietta, Big Shanty, McAfee's Crossroads, Pine Mountain, Nose's Creek, Pine Knob, Power Springs, Lattimore's Mills, Noonday Creek, Culp's House, Lafayette, Nickajack Trace, Smyrna, Vining Station, Chattahoochee River, Stone's Ferry, Tallapoosa River, Auburn, Montgomery Railroad, Peach Tree Creek, Hood's first sortie, Courtland, Stoneman's raid to Macon and McCook's to Lovejoy's Station; Ezra Chapel; Campbellstown; Flat Shoals, Siege of Atlanta, Sunshine Church, Decatur (Ga.), Dalton (Ga.), Cleveland, Decatur (Ala.), Fairburn, Kilpatrick's raid, Red Oak, Jonesboro and Blockhouse No. 5.

Through all these experiences Mr. Jester was neither wounded nor taken prisoner, but following the fall of Atlanta was sick in the hospital. For five weeks he was thus held in Chattanooga and Nashville, and later for six weeks in the latter place, but otherwise was always with his regiment, doing his full duty. On the march from Pulaski, Tenn., to Nashville, he was the last man in the rear guard between the two armies, and once, while on guard at a brick house owned by a Union man at Franklin was nearly taken. He remained so long that the Rebels fired on him and got so near that one of them called out "Soldier, we have got you." But Mr. Jester escaped into the woods and succeeded in rejoining his company.

A years or two after he was once more settled in Yorktown, Mr. Jester was married to Miss Calista Grice, Aug. 15, 1867. They made their home from the beginning in Mt. Pleasant township, where the family still resides. Mrs. Jester was born in Delaware county, and was the daughter of Joseph Grice. She died in March, 1886, leaving four children, Margaret Ann, Amy Bell, Clara and James Leroy. Mr. Jester was united to his second wife, Mrs. Eliza Jane (Jones) Mansur, March 19, 1888. She was born in Mt. Pleasant township, Feb. 24, 1846, and was brought up there in the pioneer days. Her first husband was George S. Mansur, a farmer of that locality. By birth he was a Bostonian, son of Samuel Mansur, of that city, who, beginning as a pork packer in a small way, became very wealthy. By this first marriage she had two sons, John E. and Theodore Edward Mansur. John E. Mansur lived only three months, while Theodore E., born March 8, 1878, was given a good education and was brought up a farmer. Mr. and Mrs. Jester have had no children.

Joshua Jester is a Republican in his political principles, active in local affairs, and is central committeeman from his precinct. He is an influential member of John Stewart Post,

No. 310, G. A. R., of Cammack, Ind., post commander, and has been president of Delaware County Veterans' Association for two years. He has also been chosen delegate to the State G. A. R. meetings. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., of Cammack, Ind. He and his wife are both identified with the Christian Church, in which he has been a deacon twelve years, and is a member of the board of trustees, both of the Yorktown church and of Hoefer's Chapel, which he helped to establish.

Mrs. Jester was a daughter of John and Lucinda (Reid) Jones, and on both sides comes of pioneer stock in Delaware county. Her maternal grandparents, James and Betsey (Dorrity) Reid, were of Scotch-Irish stock. James Reid was the owner of a large farm in Clinton county, Ohio, which he sold in order to move to Indiana. Buying 200 acres in Mt. Pleasant township, he settled there, cleared it and lived on it to a good old age. His daughter, Lucinda, Mrs. Jester's mother, was born April 20, 1820. On her father's side she was of Welsh descent. Her grandparents were Timothy and Sallie (Cox) Jones, Virginians, who moved to Ohio at an early day, about 1812-1815. In 1827 they went on to Indiana, settling in Mt. Pleasant township. Timothy Jones lived to be nearly ninety years old, and left six children, William, Henry, John, Charles, Sallie and Fannie.

John Jones, father of Mrs. Jester, was born near Culpeper Courthouse, Va., April 17, 1808, and came to Indiana when about seventeen years old, and he experienced to the full the arduous life of the pioneer. He occupied with his family a farm of 120 acres which he had cleared, but also owned and cleared several other good farms in that same locality. He died in 1881. By his wife, Lucinda (Reid) Jones, he had four children: Charles; James, who died leaving a wife and six children; Alfred F.; and Eliza Jane. Mr. and Mrs. Jones were both of the Christian denomination, and helped to found that church in Mt. Pleasant township.

SAMUEL RODIBAUGH, veterinary surgeon, and a progressive farmer of Pike township, Marion county, Ind., and now employed by the U. S. Bureau of Animal Industry and stationed at Maier Packing Company, Los Angeles, Cal., was born in the township, in 1859, a son of Simon and Lurena (Needham) Rodibaugh, the former born in Pennsylvania in 1821, near Pittsburg, and the latter in Tennessee in 1827.

Samuel Rodibaugh, grandfather of our subject, was born in Pennsylvania in 1798, and died about the close of the Civil war in 1865. By occupation he was a farmer, and coming west with his son Simon, he settled in Pike township, Marion Co., Ind., when the land was wild, and game plentiful. By hard work they accumulated 320 acres, and had the pleasure of seeing the vast forest change into fertile fields.

Simon Rodibaugh was only seven years of age when he was brought to Pike township, but he grew up to hard work, and the life of a farmer. When he came to years of maturity, he married Lurena Needham, and they had three children: Samuel; John R., who married Alice McCorkle, and is a farmer of Pike township; Eli, who married Margaret Coble, and is a farmer. In politics Simon Rodibaugh was a Democrat, but never aspired to office. He was a consistent member of the Lutheran Church. Fraternally, he was a Mason, belonging to New Augusta Lodge No. 473. His death occurred in February, 1891, while his wife died in October, 1889. In all his operations the father was very successful, and died universally respected.

The maternal ancestors of our subject came from Tennessee, and were of English descent. The maternal grandmother's mother was of German descent. Of the six children born to Grandfather Needham, one is still living—Lee, of Montgomery county, Indiana.

After completing a common school education in his native township, Samuel Rodibaugh engaged in farming until 1888, when he began to minister to the needs of stock, and as the demand for his services grew, and he recognized his aptitude for the work, he attended a veterinary college, from which he was graduated in 1895. He has 100 acres in his farm, and eight acres surrounding his livery barn, on which he erected the stop board, reading INDIANAP'S & NORTHW'N TRACT. CO. STOP SIX. His entire property is highly improved, and his land is well ditched. That he is recognized as one of the leading men of his profession, is shown by his appointment to his present responsible position under the government, at a salary of $1,800 per year.

In politics Mr. Rodibaugh is a Democrat, but will not accept office. He belongs to the Masons, being affiliated with Hansbrook Lodge, No. 473. In religious belief he is a member of the Lutheran Church, and one of its most liberal supporters.

Dr. Rodibaugh married Minnie Day, daughter of Michael and — (Reddick) Day, farming people. Three children have been born of this marriage: (1) Miss Alice, a most charming young lady, thoroughly educated, is now studying music, for which she has decided genius. (2) Alfred B., like his father has shown great aptitude for veterinary work, and he, too, is in the employ of the U. S. Bureau of Animal Industry, at a salary of $1,800 per year. He is stationed at Kingans, at Indianapolis. On Dec. 12, 1906, he married Miss Golda E. Tiller, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Tiller, prominent and well-to-do farmers of Marion county. (3) Grover K. The children were all given good educational advantages, and were well trained to enter upon life's duties, and become useful citizens.

CAPT. JACOB F. SCHOLL, a representative citizen of Indianapolis, who passed away Jan. 1, 1905, at his home at No. 321 Agnes street, was born Sept. 24, 1838, in the Kingdom of Wurtemberg, Germany, a son of John J. and Catherine (Klotzer) Scholl, both of whom passed their honored and useful lives in their native land.

John J. Scholl, the father, was born Nov. 11, 1808, and he died Aug. 16, 1872. His wife, Catherine Klotzer, died in December, 1864. By trade he was a tailor, and as he was an excellent workman he kept his family far beyond want. That he was a man of sterling character was proved by the action of the authorities who elected him burgomaster and collector of taxes, and he was filling the latter office at the time of his demise. He was a competent business man, and not only managed his own affairs well, but gave satisfaction when fulfilling the duties of public office. He was a descendant of an old Protestant family, and through life was a worthy and consistent member of the Lutheran Church. The children of John J. and Catherine Scholl were the following: (1) Tobias came to America in 1855 and for two years lived in Logan county, Ohio, and then moved to Bloomington, Ind. There he married Matilda Rush, and they reared a family of four children. For more than forty years he operated a mill at one place. (2)

Jacob F. is mentioned below. (3) Christian remained in Germany, and became superintendent of a large manufacturing plant. (4) Maria became Mrs. Heim, and remained in Germany. (5) Gottlieb was a jeweler, and he died in Germany.

Jacob F. Scholl remained under the parental roof until he was almost sixteen years of age, attending school during early boyhood and later learning the excellent trade of stonemason. He was ambitious, and having heard many tales of better opportunities being afforded young men in America, he in 1854 embarked for that land of promise. His sixteenth birthday was spent on the high seas. The vessel safely landed him in port and he then joined his brother, who was at Bellefontaine, Ohio, where Jacob soon found employment as a farm hand. In a short time, he left Ohio and came to Wayne county, Ind., where he found employment in a brickyard. Finding that his lack of knowledge of the English language would be a drawback, he started to school, and attended more or less regularly for two years, in that time acquiring a good English education and a good command of the language.

Mr. Scholl while going to school worked for the firm of Bard & Schlosling. In 1857 he joined his brother a second time, the latter having located at Bloomington, and for one year he engaged in work in a sawmill and on a farm, and then found employment at his trade. On Dec. 22, 1859, he married and then settled for a time on a farm, but later returned to his trade in Bloomington and was residing there when the Civil war broke out. He had already learned to love his adopted country, and was ready to assist in preserving her unity. On June 7, 1861, he enlisted for three years in Company K, 14th Ind. V. I., under Col. Nathan Kimble. The regiment was consigned to the Army of West Virginia, then under the command of General McClellan. Mr. Scholl was later detailed as clerk for Captain Collins, in the commissary department, and he continued on duty until he was honorably discharged on account of disability, Oct. 28, 1862.

Mr. Scholl returned to his home, but he was not through with military life. Shortly afterward he joined the State militia and was commissioned a lieutenant by Governor Morton. Lieutenant Scholl led his company through the week's pursuit after the Confederate raider, Morgan, through Indiana. In October, 1863, he helped to recruit Company I, 10th Ind. Cav., of which he was commissioned sergeant. The company went into camp at Indianapolis. Later Mr. Scholl was made drill master of a colored regiment and went to Camp Fremont, on Virginia avenue, Indianapolis. Still later he was sent to Cincinnati for examination for promotion, and passed as second lieutenant, and was subsequently advanced to be first lieutenant. He was next sent on to Washington, D. C., and to Arlington Heights, where he was commissioned acting assistant to Colonel Bross, of Chicago. He went into active duty in front of Richmond under General Burnside and participated in the various engagements before Richmond and Petersburg, and during this time had many dangerous experiences. He was a member of the party that went to the head of Monkey Creek to secure General Sheridan's wagon train. The first attack of the Confederates was repulsed, but the skirmishing was very heavy and the Union forces found trouble in crossing the swampy land. On July 29th hostilities commenced in earnest. A Pennsylvania regiment placed twenty tons of powder under one of the forts in front of Petersburg, and when one regiment charged through the gap made by the explosion, the enemy gained an advantage and captured the entire command. Captain Scholl has said that many a colored soldier was killed with the butt of the muskets without any chance to defend himself. From Friday night until the following Wednesday the prisoners had nothing to eat, and were subjected to many indignities. As the Confederates were particularly angered at the white men who had commanded the colored troops, efforts were made to conceal the identity of the officers, but in some way it was discovered that Mr. Scholl and another had been in command, and they were secluded from the other white men and condemned to death. They were taken to Danville, where a mob spat in their faces and brought a rope to hang them. However, the provost marshal of Danville was a man of character and bravery, and he came forward and called a halt, saying the prisoners of war should have protection. For two weeks he kept guard over them, and they were then sent to Columbia, S. C., and placed in jail, where they were kept for six months. During this period the only food they were given was corn meal and molasses.

J. F. Lusk

At the end of the six months Mr. Scholl with 1,500 other prisoners, all officers, was placed in a stockade. Although facing ignominious death every moment, ragged and hungry, Mr. Scholl did not abandon hope, and in some way he obtained a small blank book in which 500 other officers inscribed their names. This most interesting relic he preserves. Good news in some manner reached the prisoners on the night of Feb. 14, 1864, this being that General Sherman's command was approaching. The Confederates then transferred the prisoners to Rolla, N. C., and they were paroled on July 26, 1864. Mr. Scholl was taken to Wilmington, and from that point reached Annapolis, Md. On March 13, 1865, he obtained a thirty-days' leave of absence and visited his home. At the expiration of this time he started to return to his command, and when at City Point he learned the fact of the assassination of President Lincoln. In a few days he was appointed assistant quartermaster at Point Lookout, where he was kept a short time and then returned to City Point. On June 16th he embarked on a steamship for Indianola, Texas, where he remained until July, 1865, when he was transferred to Corpus Christi. There he was mustered out on Nov. 28, 1865, and went to New Orleans. On New Year's Day, 1866, he embarked on a Mississippi river steamer, in a few days reaching Indianapolis, where he was given an honorable discharge Jan. 6, 1866, the third one during his long and faithful period of service. Naturally Captain Scholl felt the effects of this period of hardship all his life, although so many years elapsed before its close. He was an honored member of George H. Thomas Post, G. A. R., of Indianapolis, and of the German Veteran Association.

Shortly after his return from the army, when home care had restored him to a measure of health, he accepted employment as a stone worker and bridge builder for the Louisville, New Albany & Chicago Railroad and remained with that road for five years. In 1868 he moved to Greencastle, and from there, in 1871, to Indianapolis, taking service with Scott & Nicholson, contractors for the construction of the Court House. Captain Scholl was employed by this firm for seven years, and worked both on the inside and outside of the imposing structure they erected. After the completion of this work he was on the police force for a short time, and was then employed for three years on the stone work construction of the State House.

For four years Captain Scholl served as deputy county clerk under Clerk Moses McClain, and for eight years he was bookkeeper at the Maus brewery, terminating this connection when the brewery discontinued business. In the meanwhile he had purchased a lot of ground on which he built his commodious residence on Agnes street. Later he was appointed as inspector of street sweeping and sprinkling, but resigned this position one year later and took charge as superintendent of street cleaning for a time. Subsequently he took service in the county abstract office under Henry Rasebrock, where he remained four years, and still later accepted a clerkship in the city comptroller's office. Thus he led a very busy and useful life. He was a strong and uncompromising Republican and on one occasion, when chosen by his party as nominee for councilman of the Fifth ward, was beaten by but 100 votes in a section where the normal Democratic majority was 400. He lived an honorable and upright life and was held in the highest esteem by his fellow citizens.

Captain Scholl was married, in 1859, to Priscilla Woodward, born Feb. 14, 1839, in Monroe county, Ind., daughter of Bartlett and Sarah (Tate) Woodward. Her parents were natives of Kentucky, where they married, and later they came to Monroe county, Ind. Bartlett Woodward was a plain, honest farmer, and both he and his wife lived worthy, virtuous lives. They reared the following children: Parthenia, Mrs. Brookshire; Bartlett; John; Susan, Mrs. William Snatty; Chester; Priscilla; Litha, Mrs. Whitney; Henry; and Martha, Mrs. Christy.

To Captain Scholl and his wife were born two children, namely: Charles H., who became a skilled machinist at Indianapolis; and a daughter that died in infancy. Captain Scholl was a charter member of Capitol City Lodge, Knights of Pythias, and he passed all the chairs in an Indianapolis lodge of Odd Fellows. Mrs. Scholl is a member of the M. E. Church. She now resides at No. 953 Prospect street.

MRS. EMMA W. (EAGLESFIELD) HANCH, widow of the late George B. N. Hanch, is a descendant of one of the honored old pioneer families of Marion county, Ind. She now occupies land, entered by her father in 1834, in Wayne township, where much of her life has been spent. She was born Nov.

17, 1839, in Indianapolis, daughter of Thomas and Margaret (Stubbs) Eaglesfield.

Thomas Eaglesfield was born in 1807 in Elizabethtown, N. J., a son of Theophilus Eaglesfield, and a grandson of Thomas Eaglesfield, both of whom were born in England. The latter emigrated to America and settled in New Jersey. In his native land he was a large wool grower and a manufacturer of carpets, and prior to sailing he had converted his business into funds, much of which was lost by the sinking of the ship on which the journey was made. His name is among those who early assisted in the settlement of New Jersey. After reaching that State he started a hat factory at Millville or Newark, and he died at the latter place. His son Theophilus married married Phoebe Gardner, daughter of Benjamin Gardner, also of England, and they became pioneers in Butler county, Ohio, where he improved a fine farm. Although he died in middle age he was a man of means and prominence. The children of Theophilus Eaglesfield were: Jane, who died young; Thomas; Jane (2), wife of William Railsback; Mary A., wife of Dr. A. A. Stall; George, who died in Indianapolis, and who was a merchant tailor of that city; Sarah, a teacher, who married R. King; Harriet, who married L. Freeman; and William, founder of the Eaglesfield Lumber Co., and a well-known merchant, who died at Indianapolis.

Thomas Eaglesfield, son of Theophilus, was born in New Jersey, and moved with his parents to Butler county, Ohio, where he remained until after the death of his father, when he returned to his grandfather in New Jersey. There he was apprenticed to the business of coach making and served his apprenticeship at Newark. As a journeyman he went from Newark to New York City, then west, and then South, engaging in business both at Lexington, Ky., and at New Orleans. When he returned North he entered several sections of land near Lafayette, Attica, Covington, and in Hendricks and Randolph counties, Ind., and in 1834 made a trip to Indianapolis which resulted in his entering a tract of 320 acres of land, in Wayne township, Marion county, which he held during life, and which is still owned by the family. Soon after coming to this locality, in partnership with Fred. Foltz, he established about the first carriage and wagon shop in Indianapolis, locating it on the corner of Market and Pennsylvania streets.

where the American Bank now stands. After some years this partnership was dissolved, and he resumed business at another location, and successfully conducted it until 1838, when, with his brother William, he embarked in a mercantile business which they jointly conducted for some years. About this time Samuel and Jonathan Ogden owned one of the pioneer sawmills of the locality, and Mr. Eaglesfield took charge of and operated it for some eight years. His next business venture was the establishment of another wagon making establishment, on West Washington street, and here he conducted a prosperous business for several years. During these years he had built some cabins on his land and had leased some of it in order to get it prepared for farming and later he moved upon it and engaged very extensively in agriculture. The Ogdens were business men of Cincinnati, natives of New Jersey, and when they desired a reliable agent to look after their large land investments in Indiana, they approached Thomas Eaglesfield, one of whose integrity they were assured. With that confidence in his honor which they never had cause to regret, they executed a power of attorney and placed all their great interests in his hands. A daughter of this Jonathan Ogden, the friend of Mr. Eaglesfield, married the late Philip D. Armour of Chicago. Mrs. Hanch has many confidential letters from these gentlemen to her father.

In 1858 Mr. Eaglesfield had moved his family to the farm, employed help in a lavish way, and continued large operations until 1869, when failing health made a different climate advisable. He went to Louisiana and bought a plantation, adjoining the town of Franklin, and for a time this seemed to the family a desirable home, but later Mrs. Eaglesfield became dissatisfied and decided to return North. Mr. Eaglesfield sent his family back North, and while he remained to close up his affairs, he was stricken with apoplexy and died April 27, 1871. His remains were interred at the Franklin (La.) cemetery. The family later disposed of the Louisiana home, and lived on the old homestead in Wayne township, where the widow died in 1877. The Eaglesfield family in religion followed the teachings of the Church of England.

Thomas Eaglesfield was a strong and influential Democrat, served as councilman in Indianapolis, and filled other offices, and in all acquitted himself with credit. Mr. Eaglesfield is recalled as one of the most progressive business men the city has ever had, and he was noted for his charity and kindness and for a character above reproach.

On Jan. 17, 1839, in Camden, Ohio, Thomas Eaglesfield married Margaret Stubbs, who was born in Butler county, Ohio, daughter of John and Rhoda (Whitcomb) Stubbs, the former a native of North Carolina, who married in Butler county, Ohio, about 1800. John Stubbs was a son of Isaac Stubbs, and he was of English descent, and a member of one of the early Quaker families of North Carolina. Opposed to human slavery, he removed to Ohio in about the year 1785, with his wife Margaret Carter, a member of a prominent family of Chatham county, N. C. The Carters are a numerous family in Marion and adjoining counties. John Stubbs was a miller, and was one of the earliest to follow that trade in Butler county, where he accumulated a large property. After the death of his wife, he came to Marion county and enjoyed his last years among his children and grandchildren, and his remains now rest in the Friends cemetery, at Bridgeport. The Whitcomb family was prominent in New England during Puritan times, and John and Anthony Whitcomb were Methodists in religious belief. They participated in the Revolutionary war.

John and Rhoda Stubbs had children as follows: Hulda, married S. S. White; Margaret, became the mother of Mrs. Hanch; Zimri, who came to Indianapolis, made his home with his brother-in-law for a time, made many moves, was married four times and died in Cowley county, Kan.; Mary married M. Shirts; James died in Marion county; Joshua, who was a resident of this county, died in January, 1906; Elizabeth became Mrs. Fuqua; Isaac W., who was a brave soldier in the Civil war, and who was promoted from a private to the rank of captain, for his bravery at the battle of Stone River, died in Texas, in 1874, from the effects of the service; Anthony W., died in Missouri.

The children of Thomas Eaglesfield and his wife were: Emma, who is Mrs. Hanch; Mary, who died when two and one-half years of age; Mary (2), who married Isaac Scudder, a very prominent farmer of Wayne township.

Mrs. Hanch was born Nov. 17, 1839, in Indianapolis, and in 1858, accompanied the rest of the family to the farm. On Sept. 6, 1859, she was married to George B. N. Hanch, and they located at Maywood, Mr. Hanch being a farmer and trader. When the Eaglesfields went to Louisiana, the Hanches accompanied them, and during their stay in the South, Mr. Hanch successfully dealt in horses, oranges and sugar which he shipped North. In 1871 they returned to Indiana and again located on the old Hanch homestead, where they lived two years and then came to the farm on which Mrs. Hanch still resides. This land was a part of that entered by her father in 1834, and which he later improved and left to his children. Mr. and Mrs. Hanch continued the improvements and made the surroundings very attractive. Mr. Hanch was a good business man and handled a great amount of stock. He was a Pennsylvanian by birth, born Feb. 12, 1836, and was brought to Indiana when a babe of three years, by his parents, Jacob and Mary (Fry) Hanch, the former of whom was born in 1807, in Lancaster county, Pa., and died July 31, 1881, at his Maywood home. His paternal grandfather was a missionary to the West Indies, from Prussia. Jacob Hanch's father was educated at the Moravian College at Bethlehem, Pa., was a fine scholar and musician, and a teacher of note. His death took place in his native State. He married Barbara Roland, whose father was captured by the Indians and remained with them for fifteen years, but finally escaped, returned to civilization, settled in Pennsylvania and had a family of eight children, three of whom lived to maturity.

Jacob Hanch came to Indiana in 1838, and bought a farm in Decatur township, near Maywood, where he lived until his death, July 31, 1881. Early in life he served an apprenticeship to a lock-smith, and learned to work in iron. For a number of years prior to coming to Indiana, he lived at Reading, Pa. His life as a farmer brought him large means and he became one of the highly respected and widely known citizens of his section. Jacob Hanch married, Nov. 4, 1829, Mary Fry, daughter of William and Mary Elizabeth (Nifong) Fry, and they had eight children, as follows: William D. was born Nov. 30, 1830; Sarah B., born Sept. 13, 1833, died unmarried in 1856; George B. N. was born Feb. 12, 1836; Mary E., born Oct. 22, 1838, is the wife of Dr. W. Eggart of Indianapolis; Rebecca was born Aug. 14, 1840; Harriet E., born Oct. 21, 1844, married (first) H. Wilson and had two children, and (second) O. Voorhes; Jacob N. was born June 15, 1847; and Laura E., born May 4, 1850, died in 1864.

In the death of George B. N. Hanch, Marion county lost a first-class citizen in every particular. In business he was successful and in private life he was a man of honor and integrity. During a number of years his health was rather delicate and his lamented death occurred Nov. 2, 1901. In politics he was a Democrat, and was popular with his party, but would never consent to hold office. His parents reared him in the faith of the Lutheran Church and he was confirmed in that religious body. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Hanch were: Florence, born Sept. 29, 1861, died May 18, 1864; Raymond T., born April 13, 1864, is farming on the homestead; Charles C., born Nov. 19, 1868, a young man of marked ability, was assistant in the county treasurer's office, spent two years in business at Evansville, two years as assayer of minerals in the Montana and Kootenai district, went to Spokane and Helena, and then back to Indianapolis and accepted his present responsible position as credit man for the Nordyke & Marmon Works; Georgia R., born Sept. 6, 1881, married, Nov. 4, 1903, I. A. Benell.

Mrs. Hanch is a lady who possesses more than the usual amount of business ability. She served as her father's assistant and confidant, and was her husband's chosen business adviser. After his death it was her good management which made the operation of the estate easy, and through it all she has been a fine housewife, a devoted wife and a most admirable mother. It was through her enterprise that the fine gravel road was constructed past her farm, and she made the first bond to assist in the building of this fine public highway and so appreciated were her efforts that it was named the "Emma Hanch Gravel Road," in her honor.

The original spelling of the name of Hanch was Hantsch.

WARD M. TAYLOR, a representative citizen and enterprising business man of Pendleton, Ind., was born March 3, 1873, at Pendleton, son of John W. and Margaret B. (Todd) Taylor. He belongs to one of the most prominent families of this section of Indiana.

John Taylor, grandfather of Ward M., was born in Greenbrier county, W. Va., and was married in Monroe county, Va., to Mary Magaw, also of Virginia. In 1840 Mr. Taylor removed to Madison county, Ind., and settled on land west of Pendleton, belonging to his son Andrew, who had come to Madison county a few years before. [Extended mention of the early history of the Taylor family will be found in the sketches of Jacob and James A. Taylor, elsewhere.]

John W. Taylor, son of John and father of Ward M., was born Oct. 19, 1838, in Greenbrier county, W. Va., and was brought to Pendleton by his parents when about two years old. He had but limited school advantages in boyhood, but later attended a commercial school in Indianapolis. He was reared to farm work, and then became associated with his brother, Andrew B., in the ownership of a mill at Huntsville. He continued in partnership with his brother but two years, the milling not agreeing with him as he was afflicted with asthma. Mr. Taylor next engaged in a mercantile business in partnership with Miles Todd, in which he continued for nearly thirty-five years under the firm name of Todd & Taylor. After closing out his interests here he engaged in a clothing business at Pendleton, making his son, Ward M., the manager, in which he continued until his death. Mr. Taylor was a well-known and respected citizen, a man of excellent business capacity and of sterling traits of character. He was one of the old and solid members of the Methodist Church. Although not very active in political life, on account of large business interests, he always attended to his duties of citizenship, casting his vote for the Republican party. He married Margaret B. Todd, and their children were: Laura M., born Feb. 24, 1864, married William N. Eminger, of Indianapolis; Julietta L., born Dec. 12, 1867, married Harry L. Silver, of Indianapolis, and has two children, Ralph and Herbert; Grace M., born Sept. 27, 1869, married (first) Edward Manifold, had one child, Mabel, and married (second) Robert Beck, of Pendleton; Ward Milton, born March 3, 1873; Fanny, born Aug. 11, 1875; and Horace, born Aug. 23, 1878, married April 1, 1900, Olive W. Birdsall, of Jeanette, Pa., and has one child, Horace. During the Civil war, when trouble was occasioned by the raids of the guerrilla Morgan, the late John W. Taylor enlisted for State protection.

Mrs. Margaret B. (Todd) Taylor, widow of John W. Taylor and mother of Ward M., was born in Chester county, Pa., Feb. 4, 1841, daughter of Miles and Judith (Zeublin) Todd, the former of whom was born Jan. 11, 1810, also in Chester county. By trade he was a shoemaker, and for some years he followed his trade in his native locality and also at Norris-town, Pa., where he owned a shoe manufacturing establishment. Later he removed to Philadelphia, where he bought the drug store of the famous Dr. Thomson, who was the founder of the Thomsonian system of medicine, which is now known as the physio-medico school of medicine. Still later Mr. Todd came to Indiana, where he was licensed as a local Methodist preacher, in the city of Goshen, by Bishop Levi Scott. On May 1, 1852, he settled at Pendleton, buying property there, where he lived until the date of his death July 14, 1903, when ninety-three years of age. He was one of the founders of the Methodist Church of Pendleton. The children of Rev. Todd were: Elizabeth, born July 1, 1833, died May 27, 1839; John M., born July 26, 1834; Nathaniel C., born March 4, 1836, died May 7, 1836; Isaac N., born March 4, 1837, died May 14, 1860; Mary J., born Nov. 24, 1838, died in June, 1903; and Margaret B., born Feb. 4, 1841.

Ward M. Taylor was educated in the public schools, completing the high school course, and then becoming a clerk in his father's dry goods store at Pendleton. After two years' experience he engaged in business for himself. Since his marriage he has resided continuously at Pendleton, with the exception of a year and one-half, when he was in the clothing business at Indianapolis, and two years during which he was associated with the When Clothing Company, at Anderson, as manager. In 1898 he was connected with the above firm and later filled the same position with the E. C. Fesler Company. He is recognized as a practical and capable business man. In politics he is a Republican. Fraternally he is prominent in Masonry, belonging to the Pendleton Chapter and Commandery.

On March 25, 1895, Mr. Taylor was married at Indianapolis to Margaret E. Phipps, born at Huntsville, Ind., May 28, 1873, daughter of George A. and Araminta E. (Alfont) Phipps.

George A. Phipps was born in Montgomery county, Pa., son of Henry and Margaret (Aiman) Phipps, the latter of whom was born Feb. 19, 1817, and died April 11, 1906, aged eighty-nine years, one month, twenty-five days. George A. Phipps was reared a farmer and at maturity, in Madison county, Ind., married Araminta E. Alfont. Later he removed to Huntsville, where he bought a flouring and sawmill of Benjamin F. Aiman, but subsequently sold out and moved to Philadelphia. Mr. Phipps later returned to Huntsville, where he still resides. The Phipps children are: Benjamin F., Claude, Harry, Sarah, Hazel, Paul and Margaret E.

JOHN ADAIR, a wealthy and influential farmer of Lebanon, Boone county, was born in Kentucky, May 20, 1820, and died in Lebanon, Ind., March 5, 1904, aged nearly eighty-four years.

His parents, Pleasant and Julia (Shoemaker) Adair, were both natives of Virginia. They were among the early settlers of Kentucky, and there Mr. Adair died in 1823, in the prime of his early manhood. His wife long survived him and passed away in 1879, aged seventy years. They were both members of the Christian Church. Of their children—four sons and a daughter—only two are now living, namely: William, of Kansas; and Benjamin, of Carlisle, Kentucky.

John Adair grew up on a farm in Kentucky and almost from boyhood shared with his two older brothers, William and Payton, the responsibility of supporting the family, which devolved upon them after their father's death. In 1850 he removed with his family to Indiana, and settled on land just south of Lebanon, Boone county, where he cleared the place of the timber, and soon developed it into a fine farm. Boone county was scarcely opened up when Mr. Adair moved there, and it was not only improved and settled during his lifetime, but it owed many of its onward strides toward civilization to his progressive and public-spirited mind and action. He was one of the representative men of the county, one whose opinion and counsel carried great weight. In the management of his own farm he was very successful, and was justly looked upon as one of the able and substantial men of that section. The last years of his life were spent in the city of Lebanon, and there his death occurred. He was a member of the Christian Church, and for many years a trustee of it.

By his first wife, Eliza (Haun) Adair, Mr. Adair had four children, namely: John, a farmer, married Ella Morris, and has two children, Bertha and Julian; Martha, deceased, married Oliver Spencer, and had two children, Ida and Frank; James died when about fifteen years of age; and the fourth child died in infancy. Mrs. Eliza Adair died in 1874, and two years later, on Oct. 17, 1876, Mr. Adair was married to Mrs. Lydia Ann Coombs, widow of George Coombs, and daughter of Isaac and Catherine (Rose) Dubois. Mrs. Adair, who survives her husband, was born in Union county, Ind., in 1834, and since 1851, has resided in Boone county. Her grandfather, Isaac Dubois, was a farmer, and was the father of several children. Her father, Isaac Dubois, who died in 1853, was a lifelong farmer by occupation. He was a native of Union county, Ind., but his wife, Catherine Rose, was born in New Jersey, and came with her parents to Indiana when three years old. She died in 1886, aged seventy-six. Both Mr. and Mrs. Dubois were Methodists.

At the time of her marriage to Mr. Adair, Mrs. Lydia Coombs was a widow and the mother of five children. Of these, the oldest (1) Monroe Coombs is deceased; he married Miss Emma Hamilton, and had a family of seven children, Bessie, Benjamin, Robin Adair, Genio, Ruth, Beulah and George (who died in infancy). (2) Catherine Coombs lived only a few months. (3) Frank Coombs is in the lumber business in Lebanon. He married Miss Nellie Lane, now deceased, who bore him three children, John (now deceased), Florence and Esther. Mr. Coombs married for his second wife, Miss Ethel Campbell. (4) Hattie Coombs married Charles Marvin, and has had four children, of whom three are living, Mary, Ethel and Ralph. (5) Frederick Coombs, a druggist, married Miss Nannie Dinwiddie, and has two children, Janice and Donald. Mr. George Coombs, the father of these children, died in 1873, aged seventy-one. He was born in Indiana when it was still a territory, and was one of twelve children born to his parents, William and Mary (Dubois) Coombs. Two of his brothers and a sister are still living, viz.: Jacob, the eldest, of Decatur county, Ind.; Allen, of Zionsville, Ind.; and Elmira, a resident of Illinois. George Coombs first followed the tinner's trade, but later became a farmer. He and his wife both united with the Christian Church. The paternal grandfather of Mr. Coombs was a Virginian.

JAMES M. DUCKWORTH, SR., a prominent citizen of Martinsville, Ind., and a representative of one of the old pioneer families of the State, is a retired farmer and stockman. He was born Sept. 10, 1832, in Jefferson township, Morgan county, son of John and Mary (Gwin) Duckworth, natives of Kentucky.

William Duckworth, grandfather of James M., was a native of Virginia, who was an early settler in Kentucky, and later removed to Knox county, Ind., and died in advanced years.

John Duckworth, son of William and father of James M., came from Kentucky to Ashland township, Johnson Co., Ind., at a very early day, removing later to Ray township, Morgan county, and at one time he owned 1200 acres of land in Ray and Jefferson townships. The last few years of his life were spent in Martinsville, where he owned 117 acres of land, in addition to some good city property. He died at the age of sixty-three years, about 1869. His wife, whose maiden name was Mary Gwin, survived him several years. They were both reared in the Baptist Church, but later in life Mrs. Duckworth became connected with the Presbyterian Church, as no organization of her choice was within reach. Mr. and Mrs. Duckworth reared a family of eight children—three sons and five daughters—William, deceased, who lived in Jefferson township, Morgan county; Nancy, who married Robert Walters, of Ray township, and both are deceased; Melinda, who married Solomon Teage, of Washington township, and both are deceased; James M.; Melvina, deceased wife of William Fippins, of California; Jackson, of Dallas, Texas, deceased; Minerva, wife of Van Cobb, of California; and Mary Ann, who died aged about thirteen years.

James M. Duckworth, Sr., was reared in Jefferson township, and the main part of his long and useful life has been spent in Morgan county. His education was secured in the subscription schools, and he enjoyed the comforts and good influences of an excellent home as long as he desired them. When he attained maturity, his father started him out with a farm of 120 acres in Jefferson township, and there he remained until the fall of 1902, when he retired from farming and settled at Martinsville. His time and attention were given to general farming and stock raising, in both of which he was eminently successful. Mr. Duckworth owns 512 acres of land. During his seventy odd years of residence in Morgan county he has viewed wonderful changes, and he has done his part in improving agricultural conditions, and in advancing the interests of education and religion.

On Nov. 9, 1859, Mr. Duckworth was married to Miss Nancy Margaret Hynds, daughter of William Hynds, and eight children were born to this union, four sons and four daughters, viz.: Ella May, a teacher; Edward, senior member of Duckworth Brothers, of Martinsville, dealers in horses and mules; Mary Belle, wife of George Hineman, of Kansas City, Mo.; William, a farmer in Jefferson township, who married Lilly Walters, and has one son, Everett; Miss Annie, at home; James M., Jr., of Martinsville, who married Alice Suter, and has three sons and two daughters; Minerva, a bookkeeper in Indianapolis; and John, a member of the firm of Duckworth Bros., dealers in horses and mules. The beloved mother of this family, Mrs. Nancy Margaret Duckworth, died April 17, 1882. Both she and Mr. Duckworth had long been connected with the Presbyterian Church. In politics he is a Democrat, but has never been willing to accept political office, although by his standing in the community and reliability and intelligence, so well-fitted for positions of responsibility. The family is one which is held in the highest esteem in Morgan county.

SAMUEL CLAYTON SELLS, of Anderson, is the leading undertaker of Central Indiana, and has recently erected the largest and most modern building for undertaking purposes in the United States, into which he has introduced exceptional facilities for reverent care of the dead, the proper conduct of funeral services, and for the comfort and convenience of those bereaved by death who are at a distance from their homes. Mr. Sells was born in Madison county, Ohio, June 29, 1862.

Joseph Sells, great-grandfather of Samuel C., was a hotel-keeper near Greencastle, on the National road. He removed to Ohio about 1836, and settled in the woods where he purchased land and here died soon after from the effects of a disease peculiar to the early settlers, known as the "milk sickness," one of his sons dying of the same ailment at the same time. At the time of his death Joseph Sells was aged about sixty-five years, while his wife, who bore the maiden name of Kline, lived to be about seventy-two years old. Their children were: Jacob, Peter, Joseph, Fannie, Hannah and Sarah.

Jacob Sells, grandfather of Samuel C., was born near Chambersburg, Pa., and was a shoemaker by trade. He was married (first) near Uniontown Valley, to Molly McIlroy, who died at Chambersburg. He was married (second) near that place, to Nancy Lindsey, who was of Welsh stock, and who, it is believed, was born in Wales and came to this country when young. To Jacob and Nancy (Lindsey) Sells were born: Jacob, George and John W. (twins), Mary, Clara and Sarah. Jacob Sells moved with his family at the same time that his father did, in 1836, to Ohio, and purchased land, and after his father's death he went to Licking county. He followed his trade here until his death, at the age of forty-two years, his wife having preceded him to the grave when about thirty-five years old. Mr. and Mrs. Sells were members of the Methodist Church, of which he had been an officer, and both are buried at Newark, Ohio.

John Wesley Sells, father of Samuel C., was born Sept. 22, 1835, in Franklin county, Pa., one-half mile from Greenville, and between Shippensburg and Chambersburg. He was early left an orphan, and went to live with Gilbert Brady, clerk of the court of Licking county, with whom he remained until twelve years old, and then started out for himself with a little bundle in a cotton handkerchief and $10.31 in cash. He walked forty miles to a point seven miles south of Prospect, Ohio, part of the distance being over corduroy roads, and passed through Delaware, Ohio, where he stopped over night at the hotel. He lived with his uncles, Frederick Fox and Peter Snell, for over a year, and then went to Clark Co., O., and lived with friends from 1850 to 1860. He began to work at farm work as soon as he was old enough, and when seventeen years of age experienced religion under the ministration of Reverend West, a Methodist minister. From that time on he was a most devout member of the Church, and labored with great zeal for the cause of religion.

John Wesley Sells was married March 6, 1860, in Madison county, Ohio, to Elizabeth Correll, born in that county, daughter of John and Mary (Rowland) Correll. John Correll was a farmer, owning 350 acres in Madison county, Ohio, as well as a 250 acre farm in Vermilion county, Ill., on Grand Prairie. He lived to be sixty-five years old, and his wife attained the age of sixty years, and both died in the faith of the Methodist Protestant Church. Their children were: Samuel, Edward, Emanuel, Elizabeth, Nancy and Amanda. To Mr. and Mrs. Sells were born these children: George W. (who died aged about two years), Samuel C., Charles Edward, Jessie L., Maggie Lee, Thomas Theodore and Milton Earl. After marriage Mr. Sells settled in Clark county, Ohio, renting land, but some time later removed to Charleston, where he engaged in the livery business. He resided on his father-in-law's farm for three years, and removed to Springfield, Ohio, about 1865, where he embarked in the grain and hay business, continuing there until his retirement, when he located in Anderson, Indiana. Mr. Sells is a staunch Republican, although he has never cared for political office. His wife, who was ever his able helpmate, died in the faith of the Methodist Church, July 2, 1902, in Hagerstown, Ind., while on a visit to her son, Theodore.

Samuel Clayton Sells received his education in the public schools of Springfield, Ohio, and there learned the art of embalming from W. A. Gross in the early eighties. Mr. Sells came to Anderson in 1889, and engaged in the lumber business for one year, then embarking in the undertaking business which he has continued to the present time, and which has grown from a small beginning to one of the leading undertaking establishments in Indiana. In 1903 Mr. Sells and his family visited Europe, making a tour through Holland, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, France, England, Wales and Ireland. Mr. and Mrs. Sells made a study of architecture, visiting many fine buildings, and on their return Mr. Sells began the erection of his present building, designed expressly for undertaking purposes, and which is unique in plan and architecture, comprising all modern features for the safe, convenient and sanitary care of the dead. This fine and substantial building is partly Colonial in design, and embraces many ideas of Mr. Sells, some of which he gained in Europe and some of which are original with him. The building is of brick, four stories high and 40x72 feet. It contains a convenient and well-arranged office and morgue, separated by a broad hall from a spacious chapel appropriately furnished for funeral services, and adjoining which is a solid vault of masonry for the safe keeping of the remains of any deceased person or persons whom it is desirable for any reason not to have interred immediately. The entire building has twenty-one rooms, among which are commodious resting and reception rooms and sleeping apartments with bath, for those who come from a distance to attend the last sad duties for their dead. For their convenience, also, a separate dining room is maintained. The establishment also contains a dining room and breakfast room for Mr. Sells' private family, who reside in the building. The private rooms are entirely adequate for the comfort and convenience of the family as well as attendants. The rooms of the professional department, consisting of stock rooms for the keeping of caskets (of which a fine assortment is carried), a well appointed show room for their exhibition, and a trimming room, are also well fitted. The entire establishment is equipped with the best system of modern plumbing, and has both hot and cold water in all rooms where required, and is lighted by electricity and heated by steam. The establishment is fitted with the long distance telephone service. The office is open day and night, and it is intended to have an attendant on duty at all times. However, if for any reason, the attendant should be absent during the night, a bell is provided which is connected with Mr. Sells' private sleeping apartments. A caller, when sounding the bell, sees the words "Be Seated," appear on an illuminated slab on the office table. This establishment has a commodious and convenient brick stable of two stories, 40x50 feet, with stable room for fifty horses and the necessary carriages. Mr. Sells has ready for use four cabs, a pall-bearers' coach and four fine hearses. He also owns the city patrol wagon and ambulance, which the city uses under contract. The stable also contains four living rooms for the attendants, which are lighted by electricity and heated by steam.

Mr. Sells is a well known and highly respected citizen of Anderson. Fraternally he is a member of several societies, among them the Knights of Pythias, the Elks and the Red Men, in the latter of which he has passed all of the chairs. In political opinions Mr. Sells is a staunch Republican, and has been elected coroner of Madison county two terms.

On Feb. 21, 1885, at Alton, Ohio, Mr. Sells was married to Miss Cora Dinkel, daughter of Stephen and Marietta (Gripp) Dinkel, the former born in Bainbridge, Germany. Stephen Dinkel came to this country when about seventeen years of age, and spent a short time in Philadelphia and then removed to Cincinnati. Later locating in Springfield, Ohio, he established a brewery in about 1864, and became very prosperous, accumulating an estate of $300,000. He and his family were Catholics in religious belief, while his politics were those of the Democratic party. He was prominently connected with the I. O. O. F. His children were: John, Elizabeth, Joseph, Georgie, deceased, Henry, Cora, Barbara, Nicholas, Mary (who died in infancy), and Frederick.

Mrs. Cora (Dinkel) Sells was reared in Springfield, and was educated in the parochial school of that city, the St. Aloysius Academy at Lexington, Ohio, and the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy, Reading, Ohio. To Mr. and Mrs. Sells have been born two children: Orville Clayton, born March 4, 1887, in business with his father; and Mabel Hazel, born in 1890, in Springfield, Ohio. Mrs. Sells has made several trips to Germany. She spent fourteen months there on her first visit, and four months the second time. She has made a study of embalming, and has three diplomas attesting to her skill and knowledge of this art, two of them being from American institutions, and one from a German College. She is an able and efficient aid to her husband in this business.

WILLIAM A. BLAIR, a retired merchant and respected citizen of Muncie, was born in Adams county, Ohio, April 15, 1832, son of William L. and Catherine Elizabeth (Steen) Blair, the latter of whom was a daughter of Alexander and Nancy (Ferris) Steen, of Maryland, and of German extraction.

The branch of the Blair family to which William A. Blair belongs is from Tennessee, and has had many distinguished representatives in the United States, one of these being Hon. Frank T. Blair, formerly United States Senator. The Blair family originated in Scotland, but William Blair, grandfather of William A., was born in the North of Ireland. He emigrated to Tennessee, but spent his last days with his children in Adams county, Ohio. He was a Presbyterian in belief. His children were: John, Wallace, James, William L., a daughter who married William Shepard, and another who married William Blair and moved to Illinois. William Blair became possessed of a farm of 400 acres in Scott township, Adams Co., Ohio.

William L. Blair, son of William and father of William A., was born Dec. 25, 1803, in Tennessee, and was reared on a farm. He received only enough education in the common schools to enable him to read and write. He accompanied his father to Adams county, and was married in Scott township, near Winchester, in 1831, to Catherine E. Steen, born in 1811, at Flemingsburg, Ky. They lived on rented land in Scott township for several years, but later Mr. Blair bought 100 acres of Nathaniel Sawyer, of Cincinnati. This land was entirely covered with timber, but with the assistance of his son, William A., was cleared and a fine farm was subsequently developed. The first home was a round log cabin, with a stick chimney, covered with mud and straw, which was locally called "cat and clay." The fireplace was made of puncheons covered with clay, with a large stone to face the fire. There was but one room, but here the family lived in cheerful content and happiness, and with the respect and friendship of the entire neighborhood. Mr. and Mrs. Blair were both very religious, and held family worship morning and evening. About 1850 Mr. Blair sold this farm and moved to Morgan county, settling twelve miles distant from Jacksonville, Ohio, on the railroad to Springfield. He lived on this rented farm for one year and then went back to Adams county, Ohio, settling on the east fork of Brush Creek, at the junction. There he bought land and built a house which is still standing, and also erected a store room, which he fitted up with a stock of general merchandise, in which he conducted a business for four years. Mr. Blair then removed to Mt. Orab, near Georgetown, Brown Co., Ohio, where he bought a hotel, which he conducted for two years, afterward returning to his dwelling on Brush Creek. Later he sold this property also and moved to Brown county, where he kept a toll-gate on the Russellville turnpike for some years. His last days were spent at North Liberty, Ohio, where he died in 1867, aged sixty-four years, his wife passing away in the same place. Their children were: William A.; Josiah Whitford; Thomas Alfred; John N.; James Ferris; George W.; Robert P.; Martha Ann; Mary C.; Nancy J.; Aaron Wallace; and a babe who died in infancy. Mr. and Mrs. Blair were lifelong members of the Presbyterian Church at Mount Lay, in Adams county, which edifice is still standing. Mr. Blair was a straightforward, industrious man, and while always in modest circumstances, lived well and brought up his large family in comfort. Mrs. Blair was a woman much beloved for her great kindness. She fed the hungry and cared for the afflicted, and no one was ever turned from her door who needed her hospitality. Her son, William A., well remembers her religious instructions to him when he was a child, and asserts that they had a large influence in the formation of his character.

William A. Blair received but a meager education in the pioneer schools of Adams county, working hard on the farm until sixteen years of age, and he can well remember the pioneer scenes. He left home before he had reached the age of twenty-three years. After his marriage in 1857 Mr. Blair settled on a rented farm in Adams county, upon which he lived for four years and then bought eighty acres in Scott township, on which he was living when he enlisted for service in the Civil war. He enlisted July 14, 1862, at West Union, as a private of Company E, 91st O. V. I., for three years or during the war, but was honorably discharged in August, 1863, after a service of thirteen months in West Virginia and Buffalo, Kans. He was confined in a hospital at Fayetteville, W. Va., and also at Charleston for about four months with lung trouble and other complications. He was greatly exposed by sleeping in the fields and the various hardships of the soldiers' life aggravated his disease. Three of his brothers, James F., George W. and Robert P., were soldiers in Ohio regiments.

After his return from the army and when he had become sufficiently recuperated, he moved from Adams county, Ohio, to Selma, Ind., where he bought a home and engaged in carpenter work with Andrew Hoover, his brother-in-law, who now resides in Muncie. Mr. Blair continued in business at Selma for ten years, but subsequently sold out and went to work in a school desk and chair factory, one year later removing to Eaton, where he followed cabinet-making and undertaking for eight years, and during five of these was postmaster of the place. In addition to his other business at Eaton he conducted a hardware store, but finally sold out all his interests there and moved to Milroy, Rush Co., Ind., where he bought a hardware store, which he operated for eight years. While living there he served four years as school trustee. On account of failing health he closed out his business affairs, and in 1890 moved to Muncie, where he purchased considerable valuable property.

In 1857, Mr. Blair was married to Sarah M. Freeman, born near Blue Creek, Adams county, in the neighborhood of the Scott county line, in 1824, daughter of Isaac and Jemima (Moore) Freeman. Isaac Freeman was of German stock, born in Adams county, near Blue Creek, where he cleared up a farm of 100 acres. In 1835 he removed to Muncie, settling four miles north of the town, where he entered and later cleared 100 acres of land. He died in the log house which is still standing on the place, his wife passing away at the home of her daughter, at Selma, Ind., where she had made her home for a number of years. They were members of the Methodist Church. Their children were: John, William, James, Jane (who married Andrew Hoover), Elizabeth Ann (who married a Mr. Lewis), and Sarah M. To William A. and Sarah M. (Freeman) Blair were born three children: Dora E., Austa and Manda. Mr. Blair was married (second) in Adams county, to Jennie McKee, daughter of Peter McKee, who was a pioneer settler there. To this marriage were born: Edith B., stenographer at the Union Station at Eaton; Ethel C.; and Frank P. All the children have been given good educational advantages. Mr. Blair is a charter member of the Presbyterian Church. He assisted to organize the Church at Selma and for many years has been an elder. At Milroy, Ind., he was commander of the G. A. R. Post, and he is now an honored member of Williams Post at Muncie. In politics he is a staunch Republican.

REV. DAVID R. RICHARDS, a leading minister of the German Baptist denomination in Indiana now residing at Ingalls, has behind him a record of years filled with services to mankind, both in his ministerial capacity and before that as a soldier who risked his life for his country in the war of the Rebellion. A resident of Indiana since the age of two years, he was born in Lawrence county, Pa., Nov. 3, 1840, son of John and Rebecca (Moore) Richards.

The Richards family is of hardy Welsh descent and the paternal grandfather of David R. Richards, by name William, was born in that country. Coming to America, he settled in Lawrence county, Pa. For service in the American Revolution, he received a land warrant, which he located in that same county, clearing up a farm and making a good homestead. He married and had a family as follows: James; Owen; Samuel; John; Sarah; a daughter who married a Mr. Stanley; and one who married a Mr. Roberts. He became a member of the Methodist Church, and was so interested in religious work that he put up a building for worship on his land. While the original structure of logs has been replaced by several buildings since, the church organization has continued unbroken, and July 3, 1904, celebrated the 100th anniversary of its foundation, having in that time never expelled a member, nor had a church trial.

John Richards, son of William, was born in 1785, on his father's farm near Newcastle, Pa. He married Miss Rebecca Moore, who was the daughter of Adam Moore, a New Englander by birth. Mr. Moore, like William Richards, had fought in the Revolution and located his land warrant in Lawrence county. The children born to John and Rebecca Richards were: John, William, Annie, Mary, Samuel, Matilda, Nancy, Sarah, Jesse and David R., all now deceased except the youngest. John Richards became a local Methodist minister, and after moving to Indiana in 1842, continued to preach there in Madison, Hancock and Hamilton counties. He died in Ingalls, at the age of sixty-five years.

David R. Richards was brought to Indiana by his parents when hardly more than a baby, the journey being made by boat to Cincinnati and thence by wagon to Vernon township, Hancock county. Thus the child grew up among the Indiana pioneers, and was able to secure only a limited education, attending school during the winters till he was fifteen, and in summer working on his father's farm. Left an orphan at the age of ten, he went to his brother William at Newcastle, Pa., for three years and then, returning to Indiana, lived with his sister, Mrs. Henry Kinnaman. From that time he made his own way in the world.

When twenty-one years old, Mr. Richards enlisted, July 19, 1861, at Fortville, Ind., as a private in the 11th Ind. V. I., a Zouave regiment commanded by Gen. Lew Wallace. The regiment was sent on a forced march of twenty miles from Paducah to Viola, Ky., to destroy Rebel supplies and a mill where the Confederates were getting their flour, and Mr. Richards' feet were so badly injured by a new pair of poorly fitting army shoes with heavy pegs, that for the march back he was unable to put on the shoes. He rode part way back with a dinky who was driving a small one-horse wagon, but Gen. Wallace saw him and peremptorily ordered him off. However, when he found that his feet bled if he stood upon them, the General allowed him to remain in the wagon. He was in the field hospital for some time after, and as he did not recover promptly he was discharged Dec. 25, 1861. He returned home and by July, 1862, was able to enlist again, this time in Company G, 12th Ind. V. I., for three years or during the war. He was under Capt. James Huston and served till the war closed, and he was honorably discharged at Indianapolis in June, 1865. He was in the battles of Jackson, Miss., Missionary Ridge; Dallas, Ga., Resaca, Ga., and took part in the Atlanta campaign, where the Union forces were under fire for nearly four months. Mr. Richards participated during this time in the battles at Kingston, Big Shanty, Kenesaw Mountain, Peach Tree Creek, was in the left flank at the battle of Atlanta, July 22, when Gen. McPherson was killed, and in the right flank during the second conflict till July 28. Near Rome, Ga., Mr. Richards was injured by a sergeant with dispatches, who rode over him at a gallop in the darkness. He was sent by wagon 150 miles to Chattanooga hospital and contracting rheumatism, did no more active service. From Chattanooga he was sent to the Nashville hospital and four days later to Evansville, Ind., where he remained till he was sent home and discharged for disability incurred in line of duty. This was the only injury he received and he was always in active service previously, prompt, cheerful and efficient.

After returning from the war, Mr. Richards engaged in farming for a time, and in the next spring, May 1, 1866, was married. His bride was Miss Emily C. Davis, of Hamilton county, who was born Jan. 12, 1844, on the farm where Mr. Richards now lives, daughter of Morris and Charlotte (Boone) Davis. The former was the son of Elisha Davis, who was of an old North Carolina family and was one of the early settlers in Madison county, Ind. Mrs. Davis was the daughter of Ovid Boone, who belonged to an old Colonial family and was a connection of the famous Daniel Boone. He was also a pioneer farmer in Madison county. Morris Davis became a well-to-do farmer, owning 400 acres, although at the time of his death he was only forty years old, a fact which proves his energy and perseverance. He had three children, Emily C., Anna E., and Tensley L.

After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Richards settled on 160 acres of the Davis estate. The land had been partly cleared and a round log house built, although the latter had neither roof nor floor when Mr. Richards took it. He was a successful farmer, clearing the land from timber, improving it and building a good frame house. Half the property he gave to his children and the rest he exchanged for his present farm. The family born to David and Emily Richards were as follows: (1) Alpha Moore, born July 31, 1867, a farmer of Hancock county, Va., married Miss Mary Tobin, and has a son and daughter, William and Margaret. (2) Cora Temple, Aug. 4, 1868, married Samuel Pettigrew, a farmer of Madison county, and has two sons, Sam and Harold. (3) Henry Edwards, Sept. 25, 1870, a farmer in Madison county, is married to Miss Bessie Haskell and father of Emma and Arzley. (4) Merilla Mary, Aug. 28, 1872, is the wife of John Smithers, a clerk in Ingalls, and mother of Mildred Fern. (5) Jesse Linley, Nov. 28, 1874, educated at the State University at Bloomington, married Miss Lillie Ulen, of Lapel. (6) Anna Mary, Sept. 1, 1877, married Edwin O. Norris, a farmer in Madison county, and has four children, Marion, Orvis, Lorna and Kenneth. (7) Lydia Ellen, Sept. 20, 1879, married Victor M. Bedell, a farmer in Madison county, and is the mother of Emma, Clarence and Oro. (8) Eliza Vandois, Oct. 11, 1881, married Oliver Rash, of Indianapolis, employed by the Big Four Railroad. (9) Ernest D. was born Sept. 12, 1883. The mother of this family died Sept. 27, 1884. She was a member of the German Baptist Church and a woman of many virtues, who was a true helpmate of her husband.

On May 9, 1885, Mr. Richards married a second time; and was united in Elwood to Miss Charlotte Elizabeth Davis, who was born April 4, 1859, in Bartholomew county, Ind., to Noble and Susan (Wolfendale) Davis. The mother was a daughter of Robert Wolfendale, of an old American family. Noble B. Davis owned a farm of eighty acres in Bartholomew county, which he had cleared from the woods. In 1872 he moved to Madison county, where he now resides at Elwood, where he is a highly respected citizen. He and his wife are both members of the United Brethren Church. Their children were: Robert, Electa, Vinna, Charlotte, Sarepta, Lyman, Noah, Emma, Carrie, John and Charles. By this second union Rev. David Richards has had four children, namely: Alta T., born March 26, 1886; Minnie C., March 27, 1888; Indiana R., July 13, 1893; and Dewey Sampson, April 3, 1898.

At the age of fifteen Mr. Richards joined the Methodist Church, but in 1872 he became convinced of the truth of the doctrines taught by the Dunkard or German Baptist Church and united with that denomination. It is a sect of primitive Christians of simple religious life and has always been devoted to the cause of human liberty. It is said that at an annual meeting in Pennsylvania 105 years ago they denounced the system of slavery then existing in the Southern States and passed severe resolutions against it. Mr. Richards was from the first an earnest worker in the church, was soon elected a deacon, and Oct. 6, 1881, was chosen a minister in the first degree. Proving himself worthy he was forwarded to be a minister of the second degree two years later and was made a full minister and ordained as elder in 1893. He has been for a number of years in charge of the Beech Grove Church in Green township, and has also preached in many different churches of his denomination in the State. For ten years he did mission work very successfully, in southern Indiana and also assisted to organize a church in Lawrence county, Tenn. A devoted student of the Bible and an earnest and untiring minister of the Gospel, he has been a man of wide influence for good.

Mr. Richards has been successful also in a material way, and owns a good homestead. As a citizen he is public-spirited and ready in his support of all good movements. A Republican in his political sentiments, he has served the township one term as trustee and one as assessor. He has always been highly esteemed for his excellent character, and his sons and daughters have added to the credit of the family name.

ELLER E. PRYOR, a well-known citizen and a leading attorney of Martinsville, Ind., was born Dec. 17, 1867, at Newark, Greene Co., Ind., son of Nathan and Susanna (Rucker) Pryor. Three children were born to these parents, the survivors being Eller E., and Louisa wife of J. G. Gaston, of Indianapolis, Indiana.

The Pryor family came originally from Virginia, but the grandfather, James Pryor, was born after his parents moved to Ohio. The grandmother was Sarah Windom, an aunt of former Secretary of the Treasury, William Windom, so long a prominent statesman.

Nathan Pryor, son of James and Sarah Pryor, was born in Ohio, and brought his family to Indiana in February, 1866. The journey was made overland, with a four-horse team, and settlement was made in Beech Creek township, in Greene county, where he bought 160 acres of land. Mr. Pryor is still a resident there, but now owns but 140 acres, having sold the rest of the land, and this he has placed under a fine state of cultivation, but lately improving it with a handsome residence and appropriate new buildings. Both Mr. and Mrs. Pryor are members of the M. E. Church, in which he served as class leader for some twenty years. In politics he is a Republican. Since 1874 he has been a member of the Odd Fellows. His wife, Mrs. Susanna (Rucker) Pryor, was born in Ohio, daughter of Samuel Rucker. Samuel Rucker died in Ohio, in 1837; by birth he was a Pennsylvanian. His family consisted of two daughters and one son. After the death of Mr. Rucker, Mrs. Rucker married a Mr. Askins, and one daughter was born to this union. After the death of Mr. Askins she married (third) a Mr. Bowersox, and both are now deceased.

Eller E. Pryor was reared on the farm in Greene county, near the village of Newark, and he received an excellent education in the public schools, graduating March 22, 1883, and taking a supplementary course at the summer Normal. In 1887 he took up the profession of teaching, his first experience being near Spencer, Ind. In 1888-9 he taught at the Crow school in Greene county, and during the next winter was at the head of the Wolf Creek school. During the summer of 1889 and the spring of 1890, he attended the Normal School at Valparaiso, taking the scientific and stenographic courses, subsequently going to Chicago and becoming an employee of the McCormick Harvester Machine Company, and later of the Davis Brothers' Cheese factory. In 1890 he returned to Greene county and taught the winter school at the Hanson schoolhouse, and April 9, 1891, he opened the spring term of school at Mansfield, Ill. While his winters were thus filled with work, he was by no means idle during the summers. It was his ambition to prepare for the law, and in 1891 he read law under C. F. Mansfield, teaching again through the winter of 1891-2, at West Point, and, in addition, did all the stenographic work for Mr. Mansfield's office. Mr. Pryor's stenographic education was very thorough, and he was able to put it to practical account. For a period he did the reportorial and stenographic work on the "Odd Fellows' Herald." at numerous conventions and he was the chosen stenographer and official reporter for the dedication of the Odd Fellows' Orphans' Home, at Lincoln. In the spring of 1893 he accepted a position as teacher of typewriting and stenography in the Western Michigan College, at Grand Rapids, and was admitted to the Bar of the Greene County Circuit court, in the succeeding September. His last term of teaching was in the town of McVillie, in the succeeding winter, but Feb. 12, 1894, he resigned this position and entered upon the practice of the law, at Spencer, Owen county, in association with Willis Hickam, and here he officiated as deputy prosecutor for two years. On Dec. 20, 1896, Mr. Pryor removed to Bloomington, Ind., and formed a partnership with George L. Reinhardt, who was then grand master of the I. O. O. F., of Indiana. While attending to the duties of his calling, Mr. Pryor still found time to perfect his legal education in the law department of the State University, and here he graduated in June, 1898. Immediately after he came to Martinsville, and has been engaged in practice ever since. He has given exceptionally efficient service as prosecuting attorney of Morgan and Owen counties. He was the official reporter of both Morgan and Owen counties, and has attained great speed and accuracy in this line, placing him in the front rank of court stenographers in the State.

On June 9, 1894, Mr. Pryor was united in marriage with Miss Clara Robertson, daughter of George W. and Sarah E. Robertson, and one daughter, Iona Gayle, has been born to this union. Mr. and Mrs. Pryor are members of the Baptist Church.

Although Mr. Pryor has made a name for himself as a court reporter and in his profession, he is, perhaps, most prominent on account of his work in the Odd Fellow fraternity. His initiation into the order took place Dec. 20, 1888, three days after his twenty-first birthday, when he was made a member of Newark Lodge, No. 467. When he removed to Spencer, he moved his subordinate membership and became connected with Hobah Lodge, No. 323, in November, 1894, and so zealous was he in the interests of the Order and so able was he proved for office, that in the succeeding December he was elected Vice-Grand; and in June, 1895, was elected Noble Grand, and in May, 1896, he was made the representative to the Grand Lodge. From that time he faithfully served on the finance and legislative committees until his election as Grand Warden, in November, 1900, to which office he was elected on the second ballot, in a field of nine contestants. In November, 1901, he was elected deputy Grand Master, in 1902 Grand Master, and in 1903 Grand Representative to Supreme Grand Lodge. In 1892, at Monticello, Ill., he joined the Encampment, and in 1895 moved his membership to Spencer, becoming a charter member of Spencer Encampment, No. 228. In that body he passed the Encampment chairs and became a member of the Grand Encampment, and during 1898-9 and 1900 he was Grand Instructor of the Grand Encampment. Mrs. Pryor is also enthusiastic in fraternal work and has occupied the distinguished position of Grand Conductor of the Rebekah Assembly of Indiana, and she possesses a certificate as Deputy Grand Instructor, which certifies that she is perfect in the unwritten work of the Rebekah degree and the Rebekah Assembly degree, and has been Noble Grand of the local Rebekah degree staff ever since coming to Martinsville. Mrs. Pryor is also a member of Canton Capital, No. 42, of Indianapolis; and of Anniversary Lodge, No. 89, Knights of Pythias, of which he is now a Past Chancellor; he is also a past Deputy Grand Chancellor.

In politics he is a Republican. Mr. Pryor is occupying his beautiful residence recently completed, modern in every respect and surrounded by fruit trees, and he keeps a very large number of fancy exhibition poultry. In addition he owns other valuable real estate and is one of the substantial citizens of Martinsville.

DEWITT C. HUPP, for nearly a quarter of a century a popular resident of Alexandria, is descended on both sides of the family from Pennsylvania Dutch stock, and was born in Timberville, Rockingham Co., Va., in June, 1840, son of Samuel and Catherine (Minnick) Hupp, the former a wheelwright by trade.

DeWitt C. Hupp lost his father when only a small child. He was brought up in Virginia, was sent to the subscription schools there and received really an academic training in them, as he studied the higher mathematics and surveying. He worked at farming for a time, and then in 1862, at the age of twenty-two, removed to Indiana, where he settled in Middletown, Henry county. He was employed in a cooper's shop until January, 1865, and then responded to a call for troops. He enlisted in Company H, 147 Ind. V. L., for a year, and served until August, of the same year, when he was honorably discharged at Harper's Ferry, at the close of the war. His regiment formed part of Hancock's corps, and was engaged in Northern Virginia. Mr. Hupp was promoted to be duty sergeant because of meritorious conduct. He was never ill nor wounded, but always in service, and he answered to every roll call.

After the war Mr. Hupp returned to Indiana, but located in Madison county, where he attended school at Richland in the winter of 1865-66, and worked on a farm during the summer. The next fall he again entered school to finish his preparation for taking the teacher's examinations. He passed them successfully and commenced teaching in LaFayette township. The next two terms were spent near Franklin, and after that he taught in Richland and Lafayette townships, at Chesterfield and in Union township. Beginning in 1881 he was principal of the Chesterfield graded schools for two years, and then held a position in Alexandria as teacher two years. Mr. Hupp was one of the organizers of the Teachers' Institute of Madison county, and his twenty-seven years of service there entitled him to a place among its leading educators. He was at one time truant officer for the Elwood and Summitville districts and made a most active and efficient official. Since 1901 Mr. Hupp has been a carrier in the rural mail service, and has performed the duties devolving upon him as promptly and capably as in all previous situations in life. He has always been a good and useful citizen, and his interest for the welfare of the hundreds of pupils who have been under him has been far reaching.

On March 24, 1870, in Linwood, Mr. Hupp was united in marriage to Miss Martha Relfe, who was born in that place, in August, 1850, daughter of Malachi and Mary (Albertson) Relfe. The Relfes and Albertsons were both Quaker families from North Carolina, and the former were of English stock. Malachi Relfe was a substantial farmer, and the owner of 240 acres which he cleared. He was born in 1790 and died in 1850. One of Mrs. Hupp's brothers, Wilson Relfe, enlisted in an Indiana regiment during the Civil war, and was lost on the ill fated "Sultana," when that steamer was blown up in the Mississippi river. The marriage of DeWitt and Martha Hupp was blessed with a large family of children, as follows: Samantha L.; Horace H., who died at the age of twenty-nine; Mary C., who married Herman Ross, and has two children, Mary C. and Alexander; Fred L.; Daisy

M.; Ramdon H.; DeWitt C.; Victor H.; and Stella. Mr. and Mrs. Hupp are members of the First Congregational Church, in which Mr. Hupp has served four years and is still serving as a deacon. In politics, while a strong Republican in national issues, Mr. Hupp has always been independent in local affairs. He is a member of Lew Taylor Post, No. 243, G. A. R., of which he is adjutant, is a Mason in the Alexandria Lodge, and with his wife belongs to the Eastern Star.

MARTIN WAYMIRE, of Orestes, Ind., a veteran of the Civil war, was born in Wayne county, March 29, 1849, son of Zebedee and Louisa (Prewett) Waymire.

Waymire is a German name and the first of the family to leave the Fatherland was John Rudolph Waymire. He came to America before the Revolution and settled in Rowan county, N. C. His mother Sally Verne, started for America with him, but died on the ocean and was buried at sea. John Rudolph Waymire was twice married, but the name of his first wife is not known. They had one son, John Andrew Frederick, and seven daughters, mention of whom is made as follows: One who married and settled near Richmond; Mrs. Julian; Mrs. Sinks; Mrs. Newman; two who married and lived near Milton, Ind.; and one who married, whose name is lost. By his second wife John Rudolph Waymire had one daughter, Tampa, and seven sons: David, Rudolph, Jacob, Davis, John, Henry, and Daniel, the last four of whom settled in Montgomery county, Ohio. Rudolph was in the war of 1812, under Gen. Jackson, and settled in Indiana; Jacob also settled in Indiana; and David is mentioned below. The father of these children died in North Carolina, advanced in years.

David Waymire was born in North Carolina in 1780, but moved to Indiana with his brother Rudolph in 1802, traveling with their families in wagons. He settled on eighty acres at Noland's Forks, in Wayne county, while his brother selected eighty acres adjoining on the north. Here in 1810 they were joined by their brother Jacob, who came with his wife on horseback. David Waymire became one of the substantial farmers of the community, and served as trustee of his township for many years. He was a devout Methodist and a class leader, and with Joseph Dodridge built the Dodridge Church, the land for it being donated by the latter. This organization is still in a flourishing condition and the members now worship in a brick church. His wife was equally active in good works. Her maiden name was Fannie Hauver, daughter of Brittain and Sarah (Scribner) Hauver, pioneers of Wayne county, of English and Welsh descent, respectively. David and his wife had children as follows: Mary (Polly), who married Peter Little, of Wayne county; John S.; Jacob; Charity, Mrs. Joshua Wood, of Madison county; Zebedee; Sarah, Mrs. George Stinson, of Madison county; Abigail, Mrs. William Brewer; and Betty, who married Branson Brewer, brother of William. The children still own the homestead of David Waymire. He lived to be eighty years old, and was honored and esteemed to the last.

Zebedee Waymire was born in Wayne county, near Milton, in 1816, and on reaching his majority he married Louisa Prewett, who was born in Madison county, in 1819. The family with which he thus became allied, were pioneers of that county, where William Prewett settled somewhere in the second decade of the century. He took up 160 acres of woodland, cleared it and prospered so that he added to it until he owned 240 acres. In time he had good buildings, though his first home was a log cabin built in the usual primitive fashion with puncheon floors and a clay and stick chimney. He was of German stock and a Dunkard in religion. A well known man in his section, he was one of the early commissioners of the county. His wife, Sarah, bore him seven children, Thompson, Ellis, Martin, John, Jane, Adeline and Louisa. After his marriage to Miss Prewett, Zebedee Waymire lived for three years in Wayne county, five in Madison, and then about 1852 settled on a tract of woodland, which he bought three miles east of Elwood. This forty-acre piece was entirely wild, and he had to clear a space on which to build his cabin, constructed according to the usual frontier method. Mr. Waymire was a hard worker, and he transformed the place into a productive farm, which was his home until he died, Feb. 12, 1879. In religion he was a Methodist, and in politics a Jacksonian Democrat. He was the father of four children, Sarah, William F., Martin and Adeline.

Martin Waymire was only a very small boy when his father moved to the farm east of Elwood, but small as he was he can remember distinctly helping in building the fireplace in the cabin. He went to school winters until he was seventeen, beginning in the Job school, which was a typical frontier structure, and then attending one near Huntsville, but much of his time was spent in hard work about the farm. When about sixteen years of age he enlisted, Feb. 4, 1865, in Richmond, Ind., in Company I, 147th Ind. V. I., for three years, but on Aug. 17th of the same year he was discharged at the close of the war. His service was entirely in Virginia, and he proved himself a good soldier. After the war Mr. Waymire resumed farming and located first in Pipe Creek township. Most of his life has been spent either there or in Monroe township, with two years in Decatur and Rush counties. In November, 1900, he moved to his present home in Orestes, where he owns his residence.

Martin Waymire was married, Aug. 14, 1867, in Pipe Creek township, to Miss Sarah H. Dwiggins, the Rev. John Little performing the ceremony. Mr. and Mrs. Waymire are both members of the Baptist Church. In politics he is a Democrat. The children of Martin and Sarah Waymire are six in number, namely: William F., a farmer in Pipe Creek township, married Nancy Ferguson, and has two children, Agnes Mary and Retta Pearl; Sarah J., who married Charles J. Carver, of Orestes, has one child, Lela Pearl; Clarence A., of Orestes, married Miss Maude Belle Cook; Albert F.; Elzy F., of Orestes, married Miss Pearl Finimore; and Ora Jasper married Miss Teresa Carver, and has one child, Kate N. The family is a popular one in the community, where Mr. Waymire has always stood high in general esteem.

Mrs. Waymire, who was born July 4, 1853, in Pipe Creek township, was a daughter of Jackson and Margaret (Welborn) Dwiggins. The former was born in Wayne county, and was a son of Daniel and Sarah Dwiggins. He was a pioneer in Pipe Creek township, where he cleared up an eighty-acre tract, and made his permanent abode. His wife died there when thirty years of age, while he reached middle life. They had five children, Daniel, George, Sarah H., Mary and Frances.

JOHN STRANGE WAYMIRE, uncle of Martin Waymire, was born June 24, 1824. He received a common school education and was reared a farmer, and followed that occupation all his life. He received 100 acres of land by will from his father's estate when he was twenty-one years old, and remained upon this tract improving and clearing it until after the death of his first wife. On Aug. 10, 1855, he settled on a farm in Pipe Creek township, Madison county, which he had bought in 1849, a tract of 160 acres in the woods, and unimproved. This he cleared and cultivated, and made into a good home where he has lived ever since.

Mr. Waymire was twice married. On Dec. 17, 1844, he married, in Noland, Rachel Hauver, born Dec. 5, 1829, daughter of Jacob and Sarah Hauver. Jacob Hauver was of German stock, and his father, George Hauver, was probably born in Germany. The latter was a wealthy man and bought much land in the woods in Greenbrier county, Va. This he settled on and cleared, and made it his home until his death. Jacob Hauver was born in Virginia, and as a young man came to Wayne county, Ind., where he met and married Sarah Waymire, daughter of Jacob and Elizabeth (Fuller) Waymire.

John S. Waymire's first wife died in 1854, and on May 31, 1855, he married Barbara M. Green, who was born Sept. 26, 1830, near Baltimore, Md., daughter of Joshua and Susannah (Foster) Green. The former was of Welsh stock, son of William and Susannah Green, and settled in Maryland. Mrs. Susannah (Foster) Green was a daughter of Thomas and Barbara Foster, the former of whom was in the Revolutionary war and fought under Washington; he died in Baltimore. In 1835 Joshua Green moved his family in a one-horse wagon to Wayne county, Ind., and was one month and two days on the road. Mrs. Waymire well remembers the journey. Joshua Green worked hard to clear his land, but died a year after coming to Indiana. His wife lived many years with her children and died in Illinois. She was the mother of two children, Barbara and George W. They owned eighty acres of land near the Vermilion schoolhouse in Richland township.

SUMNER A. FURNISS, M. D., now a regular practicing physician and surgeon, at No. 132 West New York street, Indianapolis, was born at Jackson, Miss., Jan. 30, 1874, but came to this city with his parents in his childhood.

William H. Furniss, father of Dr. Sumner A., is superintendent of the Special Delivery Department of the Indianapolis Postoffice. He was born in New England, and received his education at Dartmouth College. He went into the South during the reconstruction days. He married Elizabeth J. Williams, who was born in Massachusetts, and two sons blessed their union, namely: Henry W., who was educated in Indianapolis and at Howard University, Washington, D. C., and who is United States Consul at Bahia, Brazil, appointed by President William McKinley; and Sumner A.

Sumner A. Furniss secured his academic education in the Indianapolis city schools, and in the University of Missouri, where he attended until within one month of graduation. Under the instruction of Dr. E. S. Elder, one of the prominent physicians of Indianapolis, he began the study of medicine in 1891, entering the Medical College of Indiana from his office, and was duly graduated in 1894, ranking second in a class of fifty-two members. Dr. Furniss was appointed interne at the City hospital after his graduation, a position he attained on competitive examination in a class of fourteen candidates, coming from the various medical colleges of the city. One year was devoted to the work of this position, and in 1895 his professional career was begun at his present location, where he engaged in a general practice. With characteristic zeal and thoroughness he has applied himself to his chosen profession, and has already won a fine practice and a high standing in professional circles. He is a gentleman of broad culture, a thorough student, and of genial manners in every relation of life. Dr. Furniss belongs to the county and State medical societies, and the American Medical Association, and though still a young man his words command respect and attention, for his mastery of the healing art is manifest to all who come into contact with him.

Dr. Furniss is a prominent Mason, having risen to the thirty-second degree in that body, and he is also a member of the G. U. O. F., and the K. of P. In religion he is a member of the Presbyterian Church. In politics he is a Republican, and has been an active worker in his party for several years, being now a member of the Marion county Republican executive committee. Never has he confessed or manifested any aspirations for political honors, his profession seeming to him so large a field that he could never hope to satisfy all its exhaustive demands, let alone turn to anything else. He is a worthy representative of the medical profession in its higher and more honorable functions. He is a dignified and honorable gentleman, scholarly in his disposition, and capable in his work, possessing the confidence and esteem of the community in a rare degree for so young a man.

THOMAS BOYLEN, a reliable citizen of Anderson, and a soldier of the Civil war, was born Feb. 21, 1844, in Pittsburg, Pa., and was so early left an orphan that he cannot remember his mother and can barely remember his father.

When he was six years old, Mr. Boylen was brought West with his father to Cincinnati, and at his father's death was taken by John Spivey and his wife, of Fayette county, Ind., with whom he lived from the time he was nine years old. These good people gave him a good home, and he was brought up on the farm, attending the district school, obtaining a fair education. He enlisted when he was seventeen years old in Richland, Rush Co., Ind., Sept. 18, 1861, as a private in Company K, 37th Ind. V. I., to serve three years. His first captain was John McKee. Mr. Boylen served three years and forty days, and was honorably discharged at Indianapolis, Ind., in October, 1864. He was a participant in the battles of Stone River, Chickamauga, and was in the great Atlanta campaign when the Union troops were under fire for nearly four months. Other battles in which Mr. Boylen was engaged were Peach Tree Creek, Kenesaw Mountain, and Jonesboro, besides many minor battles and skirmishes too numerous to mention. Mr. Boylen was always an active soldier and was with his regiment in every march, battle and skirmish, in which it took part. He was never wounded or taken prisoner, but was confined to the hospital for one week. After the war Mr. Boylen returned to his old home in Fayette county, and attended the district schools, also taking a commercial course in Indianapolis, at Gregory's Commercial College. He then took up teaching in Fayette county, afterward teaching in Rush county, and for seven years was principal of the Fayette high school. Mr. Boylen is almost entirely self-educated, having gained most of his education by his own efforts. He attended the district school three months each winter, working on the farm in the summer time. In 1884, Mr. Boylen located in Anderson, and was engaged in the Nicholson File Works. In politics Mr. Boylen is a staunch Republican, casting his first vote for Grant's first term, and for every Republican Presidential candidate since. Mr. Boylen was assessor of Orange township, Fayette county, for eleven terms, and was elected trustee of his township, being prevented from serving, however, by his removal to Anderson.

In December, 1874, in Rush county, Ind., Mr. Boylen married Amanda Hunt, born in Ohio, daughter of Abijah and Margaret Hunt. The following children were born to this union: William, John, Frank, Garfield and Edward. Mrs. Boylen died, and Mr. Boylen married (second) Isadora Doughty, widow of Joseph C. Doughty, and one child was born to this union: Myrtle, who is attending the public school. Mr. Boylen is a member of the Christian Church. He is affiliated with Joel Wolf Post, G. A. R., of Rushville, Ind. He is a man of high integrity and character and is respected by all who know him. His sons all reside in Anderson, where they occupy good positions.

ROBERT HUGHES, residing near Alexandria, Madison county, has occupied his present home for nearly half a century, and has been a factor in both the industrial and moral development of the locality during its growth from pioneer conditions to those of today. Of Irish nationality, Mr. Hughes was born in County Tyrone, July 8, 1824, to John and Elizabeth (Deckey) Hughes.

John Hughes was a substantial weaver and manufacturer of linen as well as a farmer, and lived on rented land which today his son, Samuel, occupies. His family consisted of Samuel, Joseph, John, David, William, Robert, Thomas and Margaret. John Hughes was a small man, but of much vigor and endurance, and lived to be ninety-seven years old. He went to church the Sunday before his death, and his last illness lasted barely a week. He and his wife were both members of the Presbyterian Church.

Robert Hughes received a limited education and that was gained at home. He was brought up to farm work, and also learned to weave linen. He started for America in 1847, sailing from Belfast on a vessel which was twenty-nine days on the voyage between Liverpool and New York. After landing Mr. Hughes went directly to Philadelphia, but very soon moved into New Jersey, and engaged at farm work. In 1855 he decided to try his fortunes in the newer West, and going to Indiana, settled in Madison county, where he again worked at farming. In the following spring he bought his farm, paying $600 for forty acres. Three acres of this had been cleared about 1850, and an apple orchard set out. They had been grafted on natural apple trees, or seedlings, and one tree began to bear the year Mr. Hughes bought the place. Now, after this lapse of years, they are giant trees and are still vigorous and fruitful. There was also a log cabin on the land, where he lived at first, but later he put up good buildings. He cleared and drained the property, and improved it until it became very valuable, and in recent years he sold all but sixteen acres of it, at a high price. He retained the residence part, and has a very pleasant home, the old orchard adding a special charm to the situation.

On March 5, 1865, Mr. Hughes enlisted as a private in Company I, 13th Ind. V. I. for three years or during the war, and served in North Carolina until he was honorably discharged there in September of the same year. He made a good soldier, prompt and ready in the discharge of duty, and was always in active service and he escaped either injury or capture. As a veteran Mr. Hughes is naturally now found enrolled in the ranks of the G. A. R., a member of Lew Taylor Post, Alexandria.

After purchasing the farm late in that fall, Mr. Hughes returned to New Jersey, and Dec. 2, 1856, was married at Mt. Holly to Miss Samelia Dale, who was born in County Antrim, Ireland, near the famous Giants Causeway, Nov. 8, 1834, to Jacob and Mary (Lile) Dale. Jacob Dale was a farmer in that county, and the father of the following family: John, Joseph, William, Robert, Samelia and Anna, all now deceased except the two daughters. Mrs. Hughes accompanied an uncle to America. She and her husband have had six children namely: William T. R., a farmer, still living at home; Annie F., who now takes care of the home; Minnie D., who married W. S. Worth, of Summitville, Ind., and has one daughter, Mamie; Nevada L., who is the wife of Fred Suter, a grocery clerk in Alexandria, and the mother of one daughter, Mabel; Florence and Morrison, who both died in infancy. Mr. Hughes with William Rubel and M. C. Lewis were the founders of the First Presbyterian Church of Alexandria, and he served as elder one year. Fraternally he is a Mason, belonging to Lodge No. 235 Alexandria. For several years after reaching this country Mr. Hughes carefully read the papers supporting both political parties here, and finally decided that the principles upheld by the party of Jefferson and Jackson, was the right one, and he has steadily maintained that view ever since. Mr. Hughes is a man held in much esteem in his locality, and well deserves respect, for he is industrious and frugal, straightforward in character, and with very sensible views on life.

WILLIAM HENRY PROPS was known among his fellow citizens in Union township, Delaware Co., Ind., as an intelligent farmer, a good business man, and a public-spirited member of the community. He showed energy and enterprise in all his undertakings, which prospered under his excellent management until he came to be ranked among the most substantial men of his locality. Born June 18, 1841, in Marion, Grant Co., Ind., he was the son of pioneers of this section of the State, and he was associated with some of the most interesting and courageous spirits of the early days, whose impress upon the life of the region is still felt.

John Props, father of William Henry Props, was born in Rockbridge county, Va., near the Natural Bridge, and was of German descent. Tradition has it that either his father or grandfather came from Germany. He learned the trade of blacksmith, and during his young manhood was for some years employed in the Arsenal at Harper's Ferry. Later, coming to Fort Wayne, Ind., he worked on the canal and at the locks, dressing tools. Next we find him at Pendleton, Madison county, this State, near which place he was married, and after that he settled in Marion, Grant county, where he was following his trade about 1838. It is believed that his blacksmith shop was the first built at Marion. He finally settled on a farm three miles north of Marion courthouse, to which considerable interest attaches from the fact that the first settler thereon was David Connor, an Indian trader, who is said to have been the first white man to pass through Delaware county; he was found on an adjoining farm.

On June 12, 1838, John Props was married, near Pendleton, to Eliza Janes, who was born Oct. 26, 1820, in Logan county, Ohio, and died on her birthday, Oct. 26, 1846, when but twenty-six years old. She was fifteen at the time of her marriage, and became the mother of four children: John A., born May 9, 1839; William Henry, born June 18, 1841; James Madison, born June 18, 1843; and Lemuel Theodore Coen, born in 1845. Mrs. Props passed away on the farm in Grant county, but Mr. Props died at the home of his brother Solomon, in Clay county, Ind., in 1859. He was originally identified with the German Lutheran Church, but later became a Methodist, like his wife.

The Janes family, to which Mrs. Eliza (Janes) Props belonged, is of Scotch-Irish stock and one of the old Colonial families of Virginia. Zachariah Janes, father of Mrs. Props, was a soldier in the war of 1812, and in recognition of his service received a land warrant which he located in Davis county, Iowa, driving through to that county with a carriage to locate it. He was a pioneer in Madison county, Ind., settling on Fall creek, near Pendleton, while the Indians were still in that region. Building a log cabin, with only the earth for a floor, he remained there for some time, clearing a good farm from the woods, but sold out during the latter fifties and moved to near Lexington, Mo., where he bought land and improved a farm. There he died in 1867. Mr. Janes was twice married, his first wife, whose maiden name was George, being the mother of Mrs. John Props, who was the eldest of the family, the others being: Nancy, Mrs. Davis; Mary Ann, Mrs. Hardman; Sarah; Lucinda, Mrs. Maull, who moved to California; and Susanna, Mrs. Miller, who moved to Missouri. By his second wife Mr. Janes had two children, Thomas Franklyn and Carolina, the former of whom met his death in Missouri at the hands of bushwhackers, who invaded the house and killed him.

William Henry Props was but five years old when his mother died, and a kind man, Bartney Ruley, cared for him a few months, and then he went to live with Joel W. Long, son of the pioneer, Robert Long, being brought up in this Christian family. His lot was that of the average boy of his day, for he was engaged at farm work during the summer and went to school for a few months during the winter, attending the log cabin school on the corner of the farm which was a typical institution of pioneer times. Later he was a pupil in a school located where Eaton now stands, until the winter of 1860. He was just past his majority when he enlisted for service in the Union army, Aug. 5, 1862, at Muncie, Ind., becoming a private in Company B, 69th Ind. V. I., for three years or during the war. However, the regiment went into active service almost immediately, in Kentucky, Mr. Props taking part in the battle at Richmond, Ky., on August 30, twenty-five days after his enlistment. There he was shot through the right lung, and he was carried from the battlefield by the nephew of James Yates, a farmer of the neighborhood, who was a slaveholder and disappeared upon the approach of the army, leaving his nephew with the negroes. The nephew and some of the negro boys supported Mr. Props on a horse as far as the house and cared for him there for a week, and a Confederate surgeon belonging to the Texas Rangers visited him and advised the application of plenty of cold water to the wound. At the end of a week Mr. Props attempted to return home, and he received medical treatment en route at Maysville, Ky., from Dr. Shackelford. Reaching Delaware county, he made his home with his old friends and benefactors, the family of Joel W. Long, where he was tenderly cared for until he had recovered sufficiently to begin work again. He received an honorable discharge from the army, on account of disability, Nov. 25, 1862.

Resuming his old life, Mr. Props followed farming and trading in stock for two years, and while buying stock in Blackford county, this State, injured his right foot in jumping off a fence onto the frozen ground. He reached Mr. Long's home with difficulty, and within three days was unable to leave the house, decay of the bone having set in. For nine months he was kept indoors altogether, and the greater part of the foot had to be amputated—all but the heel and a small portion surrounding. He devoted his time after that principally to farming, stock raising and trading, and did well in both lines, having a fine property of 183 acres, well improved and highly cultivated. He was practical and up-to-date in his methods, and he enjoyed good standing among the intelligent agriculturists of his neighborhood, where his progressive spirit was recognized and appreciated.

From boyhood Mr. Props was interested in political movements, and he was a staunch Republican in principle, though he supported various causes which he believed worthy without reference to the party that espoused them. He was only fifteen when, in company with two young companions, John and Robert Brandt, during the first Republican Presidential campaign (Fremont's campaign), he cut, hauled and assisted to raise the first Republican flag pole which was ever set up in Union township, Delaware county. His first Presidential vote was cast for Abraham Lincoln, on the occasion of his second nomination; he supported Grant on his first nomination; became a Greenbacker and voted for Peter Cooper and then for Weaver, of Iowa; later became identified with the People's party; and was an ardent adherent of William J. Bryan. As might be expected from a veteran of the Civil war and a man of strong patriotic impulses, Mr. Props was an enthusiastic G. A. R. man, and was one of the charter members of the post at Eaton, in which he had held the office of quartermaster. This post was named after his old schoolmate and comrade, John Brandt, one of the boys mentioned as having assisted in the cutting and raising of the first Republican flag pole in Union township. He was born on a farm in that township, son of David Brandt, a pioneer and the first storekeeper in Eaton, and enlisted when about seventeen years old, becoming a private in Company B, 84th Indiana Volunteer Infantry. He was wounded at the battle of Chickamauga, and died at Chattanooga from the effects of his wound, in 1863. In commemoration of his bravery the post at Eaton bears his name.

In this connection it may be mentioned that William Henry Props was not the only one of his family to show bravery and patriotism during the Civil war, all three of his brothers entering the Union service. Lemuel served in a Missouri regiment, the others in Indiana regiments, John A. Props, who was a second lieutenant in the Home Guard, being the first man in his township to enlist; he was out in the Morgan raid as a second lieutenant, and was an earnest member of the Union League, which was organized in opposition to the Knights of the Golden Circle.

On Sept. 7, 1865, Mr. Props was married, on the home farm, to Sarah Lewis, who was born May 26, 1845, in Niles township, daughter of John and Mary (Babb) Lewis. John Lewis was one of the pioneer settlers in Niles township, where he entered large tracts of land for others and was well known as a land viewer. He died on his farm at the age of fifty-four years. His children were: Margaret, David (who was drowned when young, in Riverside Park), George and Sarah. To Mr. and Mrs. Props came children as follows: Mary married L. McFee, and both are now deceased; they left no children. Rachel Louella married (first) Reuben Estep, who died in 1883, leaving two sons, Harry and Reuben, and she is now the wife of George Pickerill, by whom she has one child, Farrice; they reside on the Props home farm. Joel W., who died June 21, 1905, in the same room of the old homestead where he was born thirty-six years before, having overtaxed his strength while managing a glass factory at Lancaster, Ohio, married Aurora Lucas, and they had one son, Emil, a bright and promising boy. George Robert died when about nineteen years old. John Cooper lives in Eaton, where he is engaged in the real-estate business; he married Beatrice McKeever, and they have one daughter, Isabele. Nettie B. married George Silers and they have two children, Laura Opal and Sarah Iona; they reside in Eaton. Three children died in infancy. Mrs. Props is a member of the Christian Church, in which faith Mr. Props died June 8, 1907. He had united with the church in 1867 under the pastorate of Elder George W. Thompson. He was charitable to those in need, and his house was always open to his friends. His death removed from the scenes of life's activities one whose presence is missed by people in every walk of life.

The Long family, with whom Mr. Props passed the greater part of his early life, were among the worthy pioneers of Delaware county. They were of Scottish descent. Robert Long, the father of Joel W., and a pioneer of Eaton, was a native of Clinton county, Ohio, and there married Jane Cartnell, who was also born in Ohio, of Irish descent. Their children who attained maturity were: Cassandra, Simcon, Martha, Charlotte, William A., Joel W., John C. and Rachel. Robert Long migrated with his family to Delaware county, Ind., and in 1836 settled a short distance east of Eaton, on the hill, where Mr. Props lived. Here he bought 160 acres of William Sheron, who had entered it during Jackson's administration and first built a round log house on the place. Later he had built a two-story hewed log house, which stood on the brow of the hill, in front and a little to the west of the present residence on the place. Robert Long built a hewed log addition to the dwelling, but he later erected a story and a half brick house, in the year 1852. This is still standing, and is the house now occupied by the Props family. The brick for it was made by John Morris. When Robert Long settled on Easley creek, which flows by the farm, there were only a few settlers in this part of Delaware county, among them being William Easley (for whom the creek was named), Junius McMillian and a Mr. Harris, in the immediate neighborhood, while Aaron Mote lived a little to the north. The McMillians lived east of Eaton, and the Shidlers were located west of that place.

With the assistance of his sturdy sons

Robert Long cleared up his land and made an excellent property. It is said that he entered other tracts on first coming hither, which he subsequently turned over to his sons. At any rate, he was for many years regarded as one of the most substantial and respected citizens of this region, and his death, which occurred on his farm about 1852, when he was seventy years old, was generally lamented. He was an earnest member of the Christian Church, assisted to organize the church of that denomination at Eaton (it being organized in 1839 at his home), and was active in its work and liberal in support of church enterprises. He often talked in meeting, and the early ministers found a warm friend in him, being entertained at his home when preaching in that part of the county.

Joel W. Long, son of Robert, was born in Clinton county, Ohio, and was a young man when he came with his family to Delaware county, Ind. The journey was made with horses and wagons, a fact which serves to illustrate most forcibly the progress which has been made and the transformation which has taken place within the memory of men who are not yet past their prime. After commencing life on his own account he was located for a time on Walnut creek, near Marion, in Grant county, his father remaining on the old homestead, whither Joel W. Long and his wife returned in the year 1850. They were typical pioneers of this section, hospitable and kindly, and possessed of all the rugged virtues of the better class who settled the great forests and prairies of the West. Like his father Mr. Long was an ardent Abolitionist and Free Soiler, and the old homestead was a station on the famous "underground railway," sheltering several slaves on the road to Canada and freedom. Joel W. Long had an old dun horse which while he was living in Grant county helped several slaves to liberty. At that time there were only three Free Soil votes cast in Union township, those of Robert and William A. Long, and Aaron Mote. But it was characteristic of this family that its members should be on the side of the oppressed, and the Longs always were sturdy champions of right and endeavored to show in their own lives the value of the principles they held.

Joel W. Long married Rachel Wilson, like himself a native of Clinton county, Ohio, and a daughter of Amos Wilson, a pioneer of that county, who later came to Indiana, dying near Granville. He is said to have been the first white man in Marion. Mr. Wilson was a Revolutionary soldier. Mr. and Mrs. Long had no children of their own, but they bestowed parental care and affection on several orphaned children, showing their benevolence and kindheartedness in many ways. They were well repaid in the affection and esteem of many whom they had befriended, and by whom their names are held in reverence. Both were members of the Disciples Church, and earnest Christians in every relation of life.

CAPT. HENRY CLAY DURBIN, one of the representative citizens of Anderson, and a survivor of that great war which clouded our country forty years ago, springs from a family of Hoosier patriots which furnished six brothers to that great struggle, one of whom, Winfield T. Durbin, afterward served his country nobly and his State notably as Governor.

Henry C. Durbin was born Aug. 16, 1845, in Lawrenceburg, Ind., son of William and Eliza A. (Sparks) Durbin. He received his education in the public schools of New Philadelphia, Washington county, Ind., where his father moved when he was six years old. He later attended a private school at Madison, Ind., and subsequently the New Albany public schools. His father was one of the Indiana pioneers, and he lived at Lawrenceburg when Henry Ward Beecher was a minister there, and when he was still unknown to fame. Mr. Durbin was well acquainted with the noted clergyman, although he did not belong to his religious organization, being a member of the Methodist Church, of which he was a trustee. In those days much silver money was in circulation, and Capt. Durbin remembers his father saying that he hauled the silver money from Cincinnati to Brookville, Ind., with which to start the first bank in Brookville.

Captain Durbin was only sixteen years old when he enlisted for service in the Civil war, entering in July, 1862, Company B, 16th Ind. V. I., as a private, for three years or during the war, and he served until he was honorably discharged at Vicksburg, in March, 1863, on account of disability. He returned to Indiana, and in the following year, re-enlisted to serve five months, as a private of Company K, 139th Ind. V. I., and was made corporal, serving until his honorable discharge at Indianapolis. He participated in the battle of Richmond, Ky., Aug. 29 and 30, 1862, where he, with other members of the regiment, was captured, later was paroled and still later exchanged at Indianapolis. He then went with his regiment to the First brigade, First division, 13th Army Corps, under General Sherman, and he was in the campaign on the Yazoo river, in the rear of Vicksburg, which continued for nearly two weeks, and where many a brave man gave up his life. He was also in the battle of Chickasaw Bluffs, and in the battle of Arkansas Post. His record shows that he was an active soldier, taking part in all the campaigns, marches, battles and skirmishes of his regiment, and he did his full duty promptly and cheerfully, as became a brave and loyal citizen. Of his brothers who served in the Civil war: John W. was first lieutenant in the 138th O. V. I.; David S. was first lieutenant of Company G, 13th Ind. V. I.; Hosier H. was in the three years' service in the 8th Ind. Battery, in which he was sergeant; W. N. was in the 139th Ind. V. I.; and Winfield T. was first in the 139th Ind. V. I., and afterward was colonel of the 161st Ind. V. I., in the Spanish-American war, and still later was made Governor of the great State of Indiana.

After the war, Henry C. Durbin returned to Indiana and worked in his father's tannery at New Philadelphia, leaving there in 1872 to go to Indianapolis. There he was in the grocery business for some fifteen years. In 1894 he moved to Anderson, and for seven and a half years he was with the Diamond Paper Mills, and for eighteen months with the Ames Shovel & Tool Company. At present he is deputy oil inspector for the 8th Congressional District.

Mr. Durbin has been twice married. In July, 1868, he wedded Harriet N. Morgan, born in Canton, Ind., daughter of Thomas and Harriet Morgan, the former a native of Kentucky, who came to Indiana as a pioneer. Mr. and Mrs. Durbin were parents of three children: Minneola, Clinton and Clarence. The mother died in Indianapolis in 1881. Mr. Durbin was there married (second) in 1883, to Frances Elizabeth Hay, born July 14, 1849, in Charlestown, Clark county, Ind., daughter of Dr. Andrew Jennings Hay.

Dr. Andrew Jennings Hay was born April 8, 1822, in Charlestown, Clark Co., Ind., son of Dr. Andrew Paxton Hay, a pioneer of Clark county, from Virginia, where it is believed he was born. He first settled in the old town of Corydon, the first capital of Indiana. His sister was the wife of Gov. Jennings, the first Governor of the State. Dr. Andrew P. Hay practiced medicine in Charlestown, Ind., for many years, where he was a pioneer physician. During one of the early Indian wars in the State he was made an Indian commissioner. He died in 1849, at Charlestown, Ind., aged fifty-six years. His children were: Andrew Jennings, Lawrence, Gano, Campbell, William H., Julia B. and Sarah F., all reaching maturity.

Dr. Andrew Jennings Hay, father of Mrs. Durbin, received his medical education at Louisville, Ky., and practiced many years in Charlestown. About 1880 he moved to Indianapolis, where he was made bank examiner under President Garfield. In politics he belonged first to that organization known as the old-line Whigs, but later became thoroughly identified with the Republican party. He was an honored citizen and was twice a member of the Indiana State Legislature, and was clerk of Clark county for one term. He was also one of the early Masons of the State, a charter member of his lodge at Charlestown, a Knight Templar and Scottish Rite Mason, and subsequently grand master of the Grand Lodge of Indiana. All over the State he was known as a man of high standing. Dr. Hay married Rebecca C. Garrett, born in December, 1824, in Washington county, Pa., daughter of James and Jane Garrett. The Garretts were of Scotch-Irish stock and of the same ancestry as is claimed by the Garretts so prominently identified with the management of the great Baltimore & Ohio railroad system. At the time of her marriage, Miss Garrett was a teacher in Clark county, Ind., having been educated in the old-time seminaries of Washington county, Pa., and Steubenville, Ohio. Three children were born to this union, viz.: Frances E., Eugene G. and Mary. Mrs. Hay died in 1866, and Dr. Hay married (second) Virginia Naylor, and they were the parents of two daughters: Flora N. and Kate M. Dr. Hay died July 7, 1897, at Crawfordsville, Ind., where he was leading a retired life.

After his marriage as noted above, Capt. Henry C. Durbin remained in Indianapolis until his removal to Anderson. He has always taken an active interest in political affairs from early manhood, and ever since his location in Anderson has been recognized as a man of ability, judgment and public spirit.

He was reared in the Methodist faith and still retains membership with that religious body. Mrs. Durbin is a member of the Presbyterian Church. They have one daughter, Rebecca May. Capt. Durbin is an honored member of the G. A. R., past commander of Major May Post, No. 244, and is also a member of the I. O. O. F., of Anderson. Mrs. Durbin is equally well known. She is a member of the Woman's Relief Corps and president of the Woman's Club of Anderson.

WILLIAM L. LANKFORD, who entered into rest in the summer of 1907, was a representative farmer and old settler of Morgan county, an ex-soldier of the Civil war and a most highly esteemed citizen of Jefferson township. He was born June 8, 1828, in Knox county, Tenn., son of Nathan and Nancy (Embley) Lankford, both of whom were natives of Nelson county, Virginia.

In early manhood Nathan Lankford engaged principally in teaming as an occupation, but after marriage he became interested in farming and came to Indiana in 1831. For two years he was located in Monroe county, and then moved into Morgan county, where he lived in both Washington and Jefferson townships. His death occurred in 1846, at the age of sixty-five years, his wife also dying at about the same age. She was a member of the Methodist Church, but he was not identified with any religious body. During the War of 1812 he paid for a substitute. For twenty-four years he was a justice of the peace in Jefferson township. To Nathan and Nancy (Embley) Lankford were born eight children, of whom two survive: John E., of Newton county, Mo., and Payton A., of the same place.

The grandparents of William L. Lankford were farming people and were slave owners in Virginia. William Lankford, the father of Nathan, was of English ancestry, lived and died in Virginia and was the father of fourteen children. The maternal grandfather, Luke Embley, was of Irish and English ancestry, was also a native of Virginia, reared a family of one son and seven daughters, and died in his native State, well advanced in years.

William L. Lankford was three years of age when his parents came to Morgan county, and in boyhood he attended the subscription schools in his vicinity. After his marriage he rented land for three years, and then purchased a tract of eighty acres, which he later sold and bought another containing sixty-nine acres. Later he sold this farm and bought his late home of 160 acres, located in section 2, Jefferson township. In August, 1862, Mr. Lankford enlisted for service in the Civil war, entering Company H, 79th Ind. V. I., and performed a soldier's duties for one year, lacking a few days and then was discharged on account of disability, having contracted rheumatism. Mr. Lankford held the rank of sergeant. Upon his return to Morgan county, Mr. Lankford resumed farming, and for forty years was a leading agriculturalist in Jefferson township, his residence in Morgan county covering a period of sixty-six years.

In 1847 William L. Lankford was married to Miss Martha Sloan, daughter of William and Ritchey Sloan, and the ten children born to this marriage were: Minerva G., who married Alonzo Lewellen, of Monroe township and they have children, William Gurney, Annie A. and Margaret; James H., a farmer in Jefferson township, who married Mary J. Isenhour, and she died in October, 1902, leaving twin daughters, Ida (wife of Clay Williams) and Iva (wife of Leonard Canatsy); Nathan E., who died at the age of two years; William Perry, who married Clara Hodges, and has children, Howard, Frederick and Carlton; Nancy Margaret, deceased, who married William D. Overton, and had one son, William; Harvey Mason, a farmer near Vincennes, Ind., who married Pearl Decker; Edward S., who married Serena Stirewalt and lives in Ashland township; Joseph H., an employee of the War Department, at Washington City, who married Rose Wilhite, and has three children, Everett, Jesse and Joseph; John E., who died at the age of four years; and Tony H., at home. The mother of this family died in 1884, aged fifty-four years. She was a member of the Christian Church, in which Mr. Lankford was an elder. In politics Mr. Lankford supported the Republican party.

ISAAC GOODMAN. In the early days of Henry county, Ind., a little company of pioneers from Hawkins county, Tenn., settled in 1838, about five miles south of New Castle. Some fourteen farmers with their families, including among them twenty-four young men, made the journey with one-horse vehicles, for all were in humble circumstances, and rented farms in that section. With these came also a widow, Mrs. Patsy (Morris) Goodman, whose husband, William Goodman, had died in 1835, and left her with a family of six children, a daughter who died young and five sons, Harrison, William, Jesse, Alfred and Isaac. Brought up to farm life, the sons took hold to help their mother as best they could, and after struggling along at first, eventually became successful men, as did most of the Tennessee band. Harrison Goodman, on his death, in Henry county, left a property of $80,000, and Jesse, who became a large landowner and cattle man in Arkansas, accumulated some $200,000. Mrs. Goodman died in Missouri, at the home of her son Isaac.

Isaac Goodman was born in Hawkins county, Tenn., May 14, 1832. The family migration occurred when he was but six years old, so he was deprived of the chance to get a good education. He attended school but one month in his life, but learned to read and write at home, and through his own efforts became quite well informed. When only seven he was put to work with a farmer near by, James Winsor, and remained with him five years, beginning with wages of three dollars a month and ending with twenty. At the age of twenty-one he went to New Castle, opened a livery stable, and ran it three years. He then sold out, went to Pulaski county, Mo., bought some land and also entered 160 acres, settling down there to farming.

Soon after his arrival in Missouri, in 1856, Mr. Goodman met the young lady whom he shortly after married. She was a Miss Pauline F. Brown, who was born in Pulaski county, daughter of Richard and Nancy Brown. Richard Brown had moved to Missouri from Tennessee, and taking up considerable land, was the owner of several hundred acres at the time of his death, which occurred at the ripe old age of eighty-one years. There were born four children in his family, Pauline, Rebecca, William and Perry. Isaac Goodman and his wife lived in a little log cabin on his farm, only fifteen or twenty acres of which were at first cleared. They had eleven children, the three eldest born before the war, namely: Thomas Harrison; Isaac; Richard; William; Ernie; Nancy; Laura; Belle; two who died; and Ethel. In 1862 Mr. Goodman enlisted in the army, and his wife was left with little help except from the oldest boy to run the farm. Between them they managed to put in the crops and raise enough to support them, aided by the money Mr. Goodman sent home. But it meant much of the hardest toil, while in addition to the work outside, all the clothing for the family was made from wool which was carded, spun, woven and made up in the house.

Mr. Goodman enlisted at Waynesville, Mo., in Company A, 48th Mo. V. I., for three years or during the war, and re-enlisted as a veteran in the same organization, making nearly four years' service in all, before he was honorably discharged at St. Louis in 1865. For one year he served as mail carrier in Missouri, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee and Georgia. He shared in practically all of the battles, marches and campaigns of his regiment, participating in the engagements at Cross Hollow, Ark.; at Big Mill, near Waynesville; in Morgan county, Mo.; at Nashville; in several other battles in Kentucky and Georgia; and in one at Milton, Mo., where the U. S. troops killed or wounded 300 of the opposing guerrillas, only one man escaping. He was also in endless skirmishes with the guerrillas, as much of the time they were after Price's men. While out as a scout in Arkansas, with five comrades, Mr. Goodman was once taken prisoner but was allowed to go free in a few days by the Confederate officer in charge, to whom he had rendered a service shortly before. Mr. Goodman had been detailed a few days earlier on a foraging expedition and the cattle of this officer were taken, but because of Mr. Goodman's appeal to his commanding officer in behalf of the wife and children, who would be left in dire straits, she was allowed to choose two cows to retain. When later he was himself captured by the husband, the latter, on learning his name, managed in his gratitude to let the prisoner go. At another period Mr. Goodman was on guard duty at Camp Douglas, Chicago, and while there was taken with varioloid, and obliged to spend three months in hospital. Otherwise he was in active service all through his time of enlistment.

After the war Mr. Goodman returned home. The place had been raided by the enemy several times during the war and everything taken, so that it was in reality beginning again, but he went to work and brought much of his 160 acres under cultivation. In 1868 he returned to Indiana and bought 160 acres in Madison county, paying forty dollars an acre. This property, which is still his home, was only partly cleared then, and had only a log dwelling. He finished clearing the land, ditched it, put up a good frame house and barn and set out an orchard. He has now increased his holding to 200 acres, a tract of forty acres, on which are good buildings, now comprising his homestead. He has always been a hard working man and has reaped the due reward for his labors. Under President McKinley he served two years as postmaster at Dundee, Madison county. He has been a good Republican since the founding of the party, when he cast his vote for Lincoln. He belongs to Elwood Post, G. A. R. Both Mr. Goodman and his wife are members of the Christian New Light Church, and are much respected and esteemed in their neighborhood.

' FREDERICK C. SANDERS. No nation has contributed to the complex makeup of the American social fabric a more valuable element than has the great empire of Germany, from which much of our best citizenship has been recruited. The subject of this review is a native of Germany and is known and honored as a pioneer citizen of Indiana's capital, with whose development and material progress he has been intimately identified.

Mr. Sanders was born in the Province of Hanover, Germany, May 29, 1832, son of Christian and Charlotte (Dipka) Sanders, both natives of that same Province, where they passed their entire lives, being people of sterling character and representative of fine old German stock. Christian Sanders was reared on a farm, and to agriculture he gave his allegiance throughout his entire life, becoming the owner of a fine estate, and being one of the most prominent and influential farmers in his locality. He was never active in public affairs, but was progressive and energetic, and was a man who commanded uniform confidence and esteem, and whose generosity and kindness were proverbial. He was for many years an elder in the Lutheran Church, and in his home community was accorded many appreciative marks of public confidence and regard. He died on his old homestead, about 1850, his wife surviving him a number of years and passing away at the age of seventy. He was one of five children, all of whom passed their lives in the Fatherland, namely: Louis, Henry, Christian (father of our subject), Lizzie and Sophia. The mother of our subject was one of four children, being the youngest, and the others were Louis, Fred and Caroline. Christian and Charlotte (Dipka)

Sanders became the parents of four children, namely: Henry inherited the old homestead, where he still lives; William, now a resident of Fort Wayne, Ind., came to America with our subject; Sophia became Mrs. Stopenhagen; and Frederick C. is the immediate subject of this review.

In the excellent schools of his native Province Frederick C. Sanders received his early education, and he remained on the homestead farm, assisting in its cultivation, until he had reached the age of seventeen, when, in 1849, in company with his brother William, he emigrated to America, landing in Baltimore, from which city the brothers proceeded by canal and by conveyance over the mountains to Pittsburg, Pa., and thence by steamboat down the Ohio river to Cincinnati, where they again embarked on a canal boat, which afforded them transportation to Fort Wayne, Ind. They had been detained seven weeks in Cincinnati, owing to a break in the banks of the canal, which thus lost its requisite supply of water. At that time cholera was raging in the city, and the brothers were compelled to remain on the canal boat during the time of their detention. Shortly after his arrival in Fort Wayne Mr. Sanders found employment in general work about the home of a local banker, receiving $5 per month and board in compensation for his services. He was thus employed for eight months, after which he passed six months in the employ of the owner of a general store, and later he secured a position as stable boy in connection with a hotel, in which connection he had his initial experience with the aborigines, having a rather exciting encounter with a party of Wabash Indians, and being at the time able to understand neither their dialect nor the English language. In 1851 Mr. Sanders became a driver on the Wabash canal, and in the fall of that year he came to Indianapolis, where he secured a position in a livery stable, receiving $12 per month and his board. After fourteen months he secured an advance of a dollar in wages by becoming omnibus driver for General Elliott, and with this line of work he was identified until the time of his marriage, in 1854, when he purchased a team, with which he engaged in street sprinkling for a time, and later was employed as helper in the Washington foundry, at $7 per week, thus continuing for about a year, when he became incapacitated for work through an attack of jaundice, from which the various physicians were unable to relieve him, though he resorted to one after another. A cure was finally effected through a simple home remedy given him by an old German lady. Before recovering his health Mr. Sanders found his ready money exhausted, and he took employment as helper in the blacksmith shops of the Bee Line Railroad, and here he learned the trade and became a good workman, remaining employed as a blacksmith in the shops until 1863, having received $3 per day for a term of several years and having so economized as to save a goodly portion of his earnings. In the year mentioned he resigned and engaged in business on his own responsibility, purchasing four acres of land, for $1,600, and there taking up the manufacture of brick. Later on he purchased an additional three acres, and when, after a number of years, the clay was exhausted on the seven acres, he bought 30 acres farther out from the city and there moved his plant. There he continued the manufacture of brick for many years, having been continuously identified with this line of enterprise for nearly a half century, and having been successful by reason of his energy, close application and good management. He retained possession of his seven-acre tract, which was outside the corporate limits of the city at the time of purchase, but eventually the city extended even beyond this locality, and he platted the tract as an addition and disposed of a number of lots at profitable figures. He still owns the thirty-acre tract, which is now devoted to farming. On his seven-acre tract he erected a commodious brick residence and this still continues to be the family home, the same being located on Prospect street. Mr. Sanders has erected a number of other substantial buildings for business and residence purposes, and is the owner of valuable realty in the city, having thus contributed a due quota to the advancement of the interests of the capital and to its substantial upbuilding, while he has ever maintained a lively interest in all that touches the welfare of the city of whose magnificent development he has been a witness. After years of earnest toil and endeavor, having accumulated a competency, Mr. Sanders retired from active business in 1894, since which time he has devoted his attention to the supervision of his various properties and financial interests. He is known and honored as a man of impeccable integrity, and has ever retained the confidence and good will of the community. In politics he is a staunch Democrat, but has never aspired to public office. He was loyal to the Union during the Civil war, being so situated that he could not go to the front in person but sending a substitute at his own expense. He clings to the faith in which he was reared, and is one of the honored members of the Lutheran Church, having been a regular attendant of old Zion Church, on West Ohio street, ever since locating in Indianapolis. He was one of the prime movers in the establishment of the German Orphans' Home, and contributed liberally to the fund by which this noble institution was supplied.

In 1854 Mr. Sanders married Miss Alice Myer, who was born in Minden, Prussia, April 8, 1834, daughter of Carl and Dora (Fay) Myer, who emigrated thence to America in 1851, landing in New Orleans, thence coming to Indianapolis, where he purchased ten acres of land and engaged in gardening, in which he continued until 1870. In that year he retired, and his death occurred two years later, while his wife survived him by about eight years. Their children were as follows: Charles, a resident of Minnesota; Alice; Crist, who died in 1899; and Louisa, the wife of William Nagle, an engineer. The parents and children all held membership in the Lutheran Church. The union of Mr. and Mrs. Sanders has been blessed with seven children, namely: Ella, Mrs. F. Weilburg; Charles and John, who are successful business men of Indianapolis; Henry, a dairyman; Nannie, Mrs. Galt; Bertha, Mrs. F. Gates; and Fred, still at home, who served as a member of the Indianapolis Battery, in Porto Rico, during the Spanish-American war.

GEORGE GINDER, a highly esteemed resident and substantial farmer of Green township, Madison county, Ind., was born Feb. 3, 1829, in Lawrence county, Pa., son of Michael and Mary (Schaefer) Ginder, both of which families are of sturdy Pennsylvania Dutch stock, long settled in Lawrence and Beaver counties, Pennsylvania.

George Ginder, father of Michael, went to Ohio, and settled in Mahoning county, near Petersburg, where he owned a farm. His children were: Frederick, George, Michael, Mollie, Tenie and Rachel.

Michael Ginder located in Indiana in 1852, and settled near Fortville, where he bought eighty acres of land. This land was little improved, but by hard work Mr. Ginder succeeded in clearing it up, erected good buildings and made a comfortable home. This home he later sold, moving, before the Civil war, to a farm, where the brick Fall Creek Methodist Church now stands. Here he owned sixty acres of well improved land, and upon this farm he died aged eighty-one years. Mrs. Ginder, who was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, died at about the same age. In politics Mr. Ginder was an Old Line Whig. He and his wife were the parents of the following children: John, a member of the 12th Indiana Infantry; George; Sarah, who died in Pennsylvania; Jennie L., who married Charles Bargarner, a soldier of the Civil war.

George Ginder received but a common school education. He came to Indiana in 1852, the journey being made down the Ohio river with his sister Jane, to Madison, Ind. The horses and goods were shipped to Cincinnati, whence his father and mother made their way to Madison county. George Ginder worked on the farm when young, and was married May 19, 1852, to Mary Ellen Richard, born April 21, 1833, in Lawrence county, Pa., at Scalp Springs, so named because of the custom of the Indians to cut a notch in the trees at this place, for every white man's scalp that was taken. Mary Ellen Richard was the daughter of John and Margaret (Moore) Richard, the former of whom was of Welsh and Irish stock. He was a Methodist preacher and farmer of Lawrence county, removing from there in 1850, to Fortville, Ind. He improved a farm near Fortville, upon which he set out an orchard of fine apple trees, which he later sold, moving to a farm where the town of Ingalls now stands. Here he died in 1851, aged about fifty years, and his wife died in the same year. John Richard preached the Gospel to the pioneers in the surrounding country, and was a man of great piety of character. His children were as follows: David, of the 12th Indiana Infantry; John; Samuel; Jesse; William; Mary Ellen, Mrs. Ginder; Anna; Matilda; Sarah and Nancy.

George Ginder was engaged in farm work at the time of the outbreak of the Civil war. In November, 1861, while plowing in the field, Mr. Ginder heard the drums beating at Fortville, where the soldiers were getting ready to leave for the front. Leaving his team of horses hitched to the plow, standing in the furrow, Mr. Ginder walked into town and volunteered. Mrs. Ginder was left to face the burdens of life, with three small children, as she might. Our subject was mustered in as a private of Company B, 2d Ind. Cav., known as the 41st Ind. Regt., to serve three years or during the war. He served until his time expired, and then re-enlisted as a veteran, at Cleveland, Tenn., for three years more, serving until honorably discharged at Nashville, Tenn., in 1865, the war having closed. He was a participant in the battles of Pittsburg Landing; Bardstown, Ky.; West Point; Shelby, Ga.; Shiloh; Hartsville; Crab Orchard; Chickamauga; Sequatchie Valley; Mossy Creek; Strawberry Plains; Dandridge; and many other smaller battles and skirmishes. On veteranizing Mr. Ginder received a thirty-days furlough, making a trip home. He was never wounded in battle, but was sick in the hospital at Tallahassee, Fla., for two weeks. He was injured by falling from his saddle in a charge across a bridge and was confined in a hospital at Louisville a short time. With these exceptions, Mr. Ginder was with his regiment in all of its marches, skirmishes and battles, and always did his duty as a loyal soldier should.

After the war Mr. Ginder returned to his home in Madison county, Ind., where he received twenty acres of land from his father, which he later sold and bought forty acres of timber land. This he cleared, ditched and made into a good farm, erecting good, substantial buildings, where he now has a fine home. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Ginder have been as follows: (1) Sarah Jane died aged twenty-seven years. (2) Nancy Ann died aged eighteen years. (3) John Warren was killed by accident at the Brightwood car yards, aged thirty-two years. He had married Clara B. Brattain, and left two children, orphans, his wife having died six months before. These children were: Effie D., and Bertie L., who died aged ten years. (4) Margaret Frances married (first) John Bixler, who died at the age of thirty-two years, leaving one son, William H. She married (second) Joseph Morris Sheppard, a farmer, son of John J. and Flora (Hiday) Sheppard, by whom she had children, Emerson Lee, Ruth Marie and George Joseph. Mr. and Mrs. Sheppard work the farm for Mr. Ginder. They are members of the German Baptist Brethren Church, in which he has been a minister for the past eight years.

George Ginder has always been an industrious and hard working man, but was greatly disabled through the exposure received during his services to his country. In political opinions he was an old-line Whig, and one of the first Republicans, casting his vote for John C. Fremont, the Presidential candidate, and for every Republican Presidential candidate since. He is a member of Sol. D. Kempton Post, G. A. R., of Fortville, Indiana.

NORMAN T. CUNNINGHAM, one of the prominent and substantial farmers of Morgan county, was born in Jefferson township, in this county, within a half mile of his present home, on Feb. 16, 1856, son of William N. and Nancy H. (Lankford) Cunningham, the former of whom was born in Woodford county, Ky., and the latter in Virginia.

John Cunningham, the paternal grandfather, was a native of Kentucky and of Irish descent, his father having emigrated to the United States from Ireland. John Cunningham took part in the War of 1812, married twice and reared two sets of children, and died in his native State when far advanced in years. The maternal grandfather was a native of Virginia, also a soldier in the War of 1812, and in search of good farming land, came to Morgan county, Ind., among the early settlers. His descendants were numerous and he lived to old age.

William N. Cunningham worked in his father's distillery in Kentucky for a time, but was still a young man when he made his way to Indiana seeking his fortune, landing in the State with fifty cents in his pocket. At first he worked by the month and then entered land from the Government, in Washington township, at the same time embarking in a mercantile business at Terre Haute. He later met with misfortune, lost all he had earned, and then began farming in Jefferson township, Morgan county. Mr. Cunningham in later life was reckoned among the wealthiest men of the county. Although he was rated at $200,000, he continued farming until within a few years of his death, when he moved to Martinsville and lived there retired until his decease in 1886, at the age of eighty-one years. He was survived by his wife until Sept. 22, 1897, aged seventy-nine years at her death. Both parents were most worthy members of the Christian Church. Mr. Cunningham was twice married, his wives being sisters. Of the seven children of the first marriage, two survive: Eliza, wife of Harmon Weddell, of Vigo county, Ind.; and Nancy, who married

(first) Ephraim Goss and (second) John Weddell, and resides in Davis county.

Norman T. Cunningham has passed his life in Jefferson township and has attended the district schools. At maturity he was financially assisted by his father when the latter divided his estate among his children, Norman T. receiving 201 acres of the old homestead, to which he has added, until he now owns a little less than 500 acres. In 1887 he built a large, handsome, brick residence on the place, and now has one of the finest farms in Jefferson township.

On Oct. 27, 1889, Mr. Cunningham was married to Miss Mary J. Williamson, daughter of Wilson and Margaret (Downey) Williamson, the former of whom was born in County Tyrone, Ireland, married and emigrated to the United States. After a short residence in Ohio, they came to Morgan county, Ind., and lived some years in Washington township, and then moved into Jefferson where Mr. Williamson died in 1891, aged fifty years. His father was a farmer in Ireland where he spent his life. Mrs. Williamson was also born in Ireland, a daughter of John Downey, who lived in Ohio, whence he came to Indiana in 1860, settling in Morgan county. He died in Washington township, aged ninety-six years, the father of thirteen children. Mrs. Williamson is still living. Both she and husband were members of the Episcopal Church.

Mr. and Mrs. Cunningham have had three children born to them: Mabel, Earl, and one that died in infancy. In politics he is a Republican, and he is a man of established reputation, and is regarded as one of the representative men of the county.

HENRY C. MITCHELL, who has been a resident of Anderson for a period of thirty-four years, is connected with the postal service at that place, and is a veteran of the great Civil war. He was born in Harrison county, Ohio, Sept. 2, 1843, son of John and Elizabeth (Haller) Mitchell.

John Mitchell was a native of England, who, after coming to America, settled in Maryland and served in the War of 1812. He became a planter and slave owner, but later, not believing in slavery, released his slaves, and moved to Harrison county, Ohio, where he settled on a large tract of land. He was twice married, the children of the first marriage being: George; Ira, a soldier in the Civil war who served with an Indiana infantry regiment; Jonathan; Joseph; Katy and Hester. To Mr. Mitchell and his second wife these children were born: William K.; Henry C.; Sarah Catherine; and John N. The father of these children died on his farm in Harrison county, Ohio.

Henry C. Mitchell received a common school education, attending during the winter months while he worked on the farm in the summer time. He enlisted in Tippecanoe township, Harrison county, Ohio, but was accredited to Washington township, March 17, 1864, as a private of Company K, 74th O. V. I., to serve three years or during the war, and he served until honorably discharged on account of the close of the war, July 20, 1865, at Camp Denison, Ohio. Mr. Mitchell was a participant in many great battles, among which may be mentioned: The great Atlanta campaign, when the Union troops were under fire for nearly four months; with the 14th Army Corps, under "Pap Thomas," in the battles of Buzzard's Roost, Peach Tree Creek, Allatoona, Kenesaw Mountain and Rome, Ga. He was taken sick with chronic diarrhea, chills and fever, and was confined in Hospital No. 1, Nashville, Tenn., nearly dying from this complaint. Upon his partial recovery he was made hospital steward, in which capacity he served until April, 1865, and then rejoined his regiment at Washington, taking part in the Grand Review, the greatest review in history.

After the war Mr. Mitchell returned to Harrison county, Ohio, where he lived two years, and then, in 1867, went to Virginia City, Nev., making the journey by way of New York, by steamer to the Isthmus of Panama, up Lake Nicaragua, on to San Francisco, Cal., thence to Sacramento and from there by rail and stage, over the mountains to Reno and finally to Virginia City. He worked in a sluice mill from May, 1868, until September, 1870, at $100 per month in gold coin. In 1870 he located in Anderson, Ind., engaging in the marble business, in which he remained six years. For fifteen years he was baggage master of the Big Four railroad in that city.

Mr. Henry C. Mitchell was married June 24, 1875, in Anderson, to Flora E. Kessler, born in Massillon, Stark county, Ohio, Feb. 22, 1850, daughter of Simon P. and Susan (Upp) Kessler. The Kesslers were of sturdy German stock of Pennsylvania, and the Upps were of the same nationality. Simon P. Kessler was born in Mifflin county, Pa., in 1814, and was married in Sandusky, Ohio, where he was working at his trade of carriage trimmer and upholsterer, to Susan Upp, daughter of Peter and Susan (Winters) Upp. Mr. Kessler settled in Massillon, Ohio, where he conducted his business successfully and became a respected citizen. He was a Lutheran in religion, while his wife was a Methodist, and they were the parents of these children: Alonzo, a private of the three years' service, 76th O. V. I.; Henry, of the 19th O. V. I., who served three years; Ida; Flora; George, Laura, Emma and Edward. Mrs. Mitchell received an excellent education in the public schools of Massillon, including the high school, and began teaching at seventeen years of age. She taught for two years near Massillon in the district schools, and came with her father's family to Anderson, Ind., in 1870, where she taught five years, or until her marriage.

Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell were the parents of three children: Ralph C., who died at the age of two and one-half years; George F., who died at the age of eighteen years, as the result of an accident in Anderson; and Vaughn, who died at the age of eighteen months. Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell are members of the Methodist Church, in which she was a Sunday-school teacher in her younger days. In political opinions Mr. Mitchell is a staunch Republican. He is an honored member of Major May Post, G. A. R., and has been a member of the Masonic fraternity for twenty-seven years. He is well known as a reliable, industrious man.

CLAUDE C. BALL, who is engaged in the practice of law in Muncie, Delaware county, Ind., stands well in his profession and among the substantial citizens of his section. He was born in Delaware county, where his family has been settled for almost three-quarters of a century, his grandfather, Samuel Ball, having come hither from Ohio in 1834. He is of old Virginia stock, being a great-grandson of James Ball, who was born in Virginia, Sept. 5, 1777, and settled in Perry county, Ohio, when a young man, passing the remainder of his life there. A complete account of himself and his son, Samuel Ba.' will be found in the sketch of Robert Mansfield Ball.

Samuel Ball was born March 11, 1817 in Perry county, Ohio, spent his early life there, and in 1834 came to Indiana, making the journey on foot. He settled in what is now Monroe township, Delaware county, took up land, was one of the organizers of the township, and a prominent member of the Christian Church in the neighborhood. He died May 17, 1886, in that township, respected by all who knew him. He was married in Delaware county to Rebecca Mansfield, likewise a member of a pioneer family of the county, and they became the parents of children as follows: Arthur D., John W., Andrew (who died when three years old), George M., Susan, James B., Samuel P., Robert M., Margaret M., and Rebecca (who died unmarried at the age of thirty-eight years).

George M. Ball, father of Claude C. Ball, was born in Monroe township, Delaware county, and grew to manhood among pioneer surroundings. He bought 120 acres of land in the woods in that township, cleared it, and followed farming all his days, living on that place continuously from the time of his marriage until his death, which occurred March 1, 1879, at the early age of thirty-five. He married Susan Hale, who was born in Henry county, Ind., daughter of Lafary Hale, and to them were born the following named children: Walter L., a lawyer, member of the firm of Ball & Needham, Muncie, and present State senator; Joseph H., also of Muncie; Claude C.; John W., a resident of Muncie; Clay A., a student at the Indiana Medical College, Indianapolis; Maude M., who married Arthur B. Ayres, has two children, Gaynelle and Ellen, and resides in Fortville. The mother of this family survives, and is at present living on a farm in Delaware county. The father was a substantial and respected citizen, a worthy member of a family whose representatives have always been regarded as belonging to the best element in their communities wherever found.

Claude C. Ball was born on the home farm Sept. 26, 1874, and was reared in that neighborhood, where he attended the district school. He also went to a graded school at Springport, Henry county, Ind., and when he was seventeen began teaching, continuing at that work for two terms, after which he entered the State University at Bloomington. He graduated in 1895, and having in the meantime taken up the study of law during his summer vacations—reading with J. N. Templer, of Muncie—he followed with a course in the law school, from which he was graduated in June, 1896. He was admitted to the Bar in July, and became associated in the practice of law in the firm of Templer, Ball & Templer, continuing for four years, until the partnership was dissolved, when Mr. Ball continued alone. He has been at his present location since that time, and has acquired an extensive and lucrative patronage, principally corporation business, which occupies his time fully. Mr. Ball's standing at the Delaware county Bar is a credit to the legal fraternity in his locality, and a tribute to his ability and professional attainments, which have been recognized wherever he has been engaged. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias at Oakville, Ind., and of DeEmber Tribe, I. O. R. M., of Muncie. In political sentiment he is a staunch Republican.

On Aug. 8, 1905, Mr. Ball was united in marriage with Edna M. Sutton, who was born at Dunkirk, Ind., daughter of James and Emma Sutton.

JOHN EDWARD BAIN, a prominent farmer of Morgan county, residing on Section 11, in Jefferson township, was born Feb. 12, 1852, in that township, son of John and Bridget (Gallagher) Bain, the former of whom was born in the Highlands of Scotland and the latter in the State of Pennsylvania.

The Bain family belonged to County Caithness, Scotland, and there the paternal grandparents lived and died, although a number of their children came to America. The maternal grandparents lived for many years in Baltimore, Maryland.

John Bain, father of John Edward, was a stone mason by trade. He came to America from Scotland about 1830, locating at Baltimore, and in 1834, came to Indiana, settling in Jefferson township, Morgan county, where he bought land and kept on purchasing additional tracts until he owned about 1,400 acres. His death took place in 1872, when he was aged sixty-six years. His first wife passed away in 1856. Although she was reared in the Catholic faith, she joined with her husband in membership in the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Bain became a very prominent citizen, served several times as township trustee and left behind him the record of a useful and exemplary life. To John and Bridget (Gallagher) Bain were born three sons and one daughter: James G., of Martinsville; William G., of Jefferson township; John Edward; and Mary C. For his second wife John Bain married Mrs. Bathsheba Abbott, daughter of Frederick Goss, of Gosport, and the children of this marriage were: Charles, deceased; Benjamin F.; Murry C.; Emma O., wife of Glenn Swiggett, of Missouri; and Henry and Harvey, twins.

John Edward Bain has lived in Jefferson township all his life, securing his education first in the district schools and then in the Martinsville high school. Until he reached maturity and was prepared to start out in life for himself, he remained with his father. He received fifty acres of land from his father's estate and has added eighty by purchase, and as his wife owns some 270 acres, they together have the income from 400 acres. Mr. Bain operates his land carefully and successfully, and has the reputation of being one of the best farmers in the township.

On Dec. 2, 1873, Mr. Bain married Miss Perlina Cunningham, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William N. Cunningham, the former of whom was born in Kentucky and the latter in Virginia. They were early settlers in Morgan county and reared a family of four children, extended mention of this prominent family being found in another part of this volume. Mr. and Mrs. Bain have a family of six sons and one daughter, namely: William C., Walter T., James E., Marion J., Blanche Estella, Ernest S. and Harrison McKinley. The eldest sons are students at college. Mrs. Bain is a valued member of the Christian Church. Mr. Bain gives his political allegiance to the Republican party. He is one of the highly esteemed citizens of Jefferson township, which he has served four years as trustee.

ELMER BURRITT BRYAN, A TEACHER OF TEACHERS.—To bear such a title is synonymous with knowledge and experience. Knowledge is power. The one possessing in that power can use it for the benefit or for the injury of his fellow-men. A knowledge that pursues philosophy and digs deep into science only to use it for evil purpose, to distort its meaning, to teach infidelity and every form of falsehood, although this teaching may seem truth and beauty—such teaching in the day we live in is too prevalent. A teacher of teachers!

Such is Dr. E. B. Bryan, President of Franklin College, a man who, but still a young man, forty-three years of age, is swaying and molding the lives and thoughts of young men and women not only in the institution of which he is the head, but throughout the United States. Dr. Bryan's services are in great demand. Probably no man of his age has spoken to as many and as large audiences from Pennsylvania to Kansas. He has delivered very many lectures on the subject of Pedagogy, and it is conceded that as a teacher of teachers he has no superior, if an equal. As a platform speaker and orator he is forceful, his delivery quiet but impressive. The truths he imparts are always truths that sink deep into the heart. An earnest Christian man in his talks and teachings, he ever holds up the Man of Galilee as the name above all names. Dr. Bryan believes that to succeed this command that he often quotes from Exodus, "Thou shalt have no other Gods before me," shall permeate and be the motto of a man's life.

Elmer Burritt Bryan was born in Van Wert, Ohio, April 23, 1865, son of Daniel and Mary Elizabeth Beeler Bryan. He attended the high school in Kokomo, Ind., graduated from the Indiana State Normal School in 1889, and from the Indiana University in 1893, with the degree of A. B. He was a student at both Harvard and Clark Universities from 1898 to 1900.

On June 28, 1889, he was married in Terre Haute, Ind., to Miss Margaret L. Scott. He was a teacher in public and high schools part of each year from 1882 to 1894; also was a teacher in the manual training school, Indianapolis, from 1894 to 1896; professor of Social and Educational Science, Butler College, 1896-97; assistant professor of Pedagogy, 1897-99; assistant professor of Pedagogy, 1899-1901, Indiana University; principal Insular Normal School in Philippine Islands, 1901-02; General Superintendent of Education, Philippine Islands, Jan. 1 to Aug. 13, 1903; professor Educational and Social Psychology, Indiana University, 1903-05; president Franklin College, since July 1, 1905. He received a gold medal and diploma at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition for the Philippine Exhibit.

Dr. Bryan is a member of the National Educational Association. He is a Republican in political sentiment and a Baptist in religion. He is a frequent contributor to educational publications. He is the author of a standard work entitled "The Basis of Practical Teaching," a book on Pedagogy, and is writing another book, "Moral Education." As an educator Dr. Bryan holds high rank; as a man he is universally admired and honored.

WILLIAM G. SHAW, an enterprising agriculturist of Monroe township, Madison county, who is engaged in cultivating his fine forty-acre farm just outside of the corporation of Orestes, is a veteran of the Civil war. He was born Dec. 7, 1843, in Jackson township, Madison county, Ind., son of William and Mary (Heck) Shaw.

William Shaw was born in Brown county, Ohio, of Scotch stock, and was married in Bracken county, Ky., to Mary Heck, daughter of Godfried Heck, of German stock and a soldier of the War of 1812. After marriage Mr. Shaw and his wife settled on land in Fayette county, Ind., where he cleared a farm, but this he sold, and in 1843 removed to Madison county, Ind., and settled in Jackson township, on 200 acres of wild land in the woods, which he purchased from the United States Government. Here he built a log cabin, in which he lived for five years, when his death occurred, in his forty-seventh or forty-eighth year. The cabin which stood on the farm was used by the family for many years. It was built of logs and had a fireplace with a stick chimney. At the time of his death Mr. Shaw left these children, the youngest of whom was three years old: Mary Ann, John, Eliza, Nicholas, Elizabeth, Thomas, James, Samantha, Eli, William G. and Douglass. Mr. Shaw was a hard-working, industrious man and was well known among the pioneers. In politics he was a Democrat. After his death Mrs. Shaw remained on the farm for about three years, and then sold out and removed to Des Moines county, Iowa, settling six miles west of Burlington, but not liking the country, after two years she returned to Indiana and settled in Pipe Creek township. She died at the home of her daughter, Elizabeth Cochran, in Frankton, at the age of ninety years, in the faith of the New Light Church.

William G. Shaw was about nine or ten years of age when taken to Iowa, prior to which time he had attended school for about two terms. He went to school in the new State for two years, and after returning to Indiana continued to receive instruction until about eighteen years of age. His summer months were spent in work on the farm, and in the winter, when attending the school, a hewed log house with puncheon seats, he had to travel three miles to reach it.

When nineteen years of age Mr. Shaw enlisted at Indianapolis, Ind., Oct. 21, 1863, in Company G, 34th Ind. V. I., Capt. H. L. Dean, to serve one year or during the war, and was honorably discharged at Brownsville, Texas, Oct. 21, 1864, his services having been in Louisiana and Texas, mostly on garrison duty. He participated in many hard marches, notably that on Padre Island, on the Gulf of Mexico, when he was on a foraging expedition after a large herd of Texas cattle for an army of between 3,000 and 4,000 men. The weather was extremely hot and the men suffered terribly, being compelled to march forty miles in twenty-four hours, the entire march being a distance of 240 miles. Mr. Shaw was ever an active and faithful soldier, and did his full duty to his country.

After the war Mr. Shaw returned to Indiana and engaged in farm work by the month. On March 10, 1869, he was married in Monroe township, Madison county, to Mary J. Young, born Oct. 20, 1849, daughter of William and Jane (McClucas) Young, the former a native of Scotland and the latter of Pennsylvania, of Scotch-Irish descent. To Mr. and Mrs. Shaw were born: Ella, Allie and Charles, the latter of whom, educated in Orestes, is a boxmaker by trade and for nine months was a soldier in the Spanish-American war, belonging to the First Heavy Artillery, United States Regular Army.

After their marriage Mr. Shaw and his wife first settled on land one mile south of Pipe Creek, in Monroe township, after which they removed to the present home, a farm of forty acres, just outside of the corporation of Orestes. This is a part of the original home of William Young, the land having been entered by him and cleared from the woods. Mr. Shaw has made many improvements on the place, including the erection of new and substantial buildings, and he is considered one of the practical farmers of the township. In political matters he is a Democrat, and he is connected with Alexander Post, G. A. R.

ALEXANDER D. READING (deceased). From the older settled states of the Union, when Indiana was opened up for settlement, came families in whose veins ran some of the best blood in the country. Working with the energy and keen foresight which made their progenitors conquerors in so many unequal struggles with greater powers, these early settlers subdued the hostile Indian tribes, redeemed the land from forest and swamp, and founded and developed the great commonwealth, which is now an honor to them and their children's children. One of these families so mentioned, bore the name of Reading, and another that of Brown.

Alexander D. Reading was born near Frankfort, Ky., Oct. 18, 1822, and passed away on Dec. 6, 1901. He was a son of Samuel and Susan (Johnson) Reading. The Reading family trace their ancestry back to Sir Robert Reading, of England. A part of the family emigrated to America with some of the first emigrants, and located in what is now New Jersey. The paternal grandfather of Alexander D. Reading served in the Revolutionary war, fighting the mother country for freedom. He moved to Kentucky at an early day, from which place his son Samuel served in the war of 1812. Samuel followed farming, having a farm of several hundred acres near Frankfort which was worked by the slaves, he being a large slave owner. The maternal grandfather Johnson came to Kentucky from the East also at an early day, and brought with him one hundred slaves.

After the death of his father, Alexander D. Reading sold his portion of the slaves, and came in 1850 to Indianapolis, and followed his trade of plastering, accumulating several pieces of property. In the fall of 1865 he moved to Warren township, Marion county, Ind., and followed farming. He owned a fine farm of 140 acres, with excellent improvements. In politics he was always a strong Democrat, and he always believed in slavery. He never aspired to public office, but served as justice of the peace from 1872 to 1876. His religious views made him a Baptist. He was a member of the First Baptist Church of Indianapolis, and to the erection of that edifice he donated $500 in 1862, and he continued a faithful member in good standing until his death.

Mr. Alexander D. Reading was married, in 1851, to Sarah E. J. Brown, daughter of Robert and Elizabeth (Messenger) Brown. Robert Brown was born in Stanton, Augusta county, Va., Feb. 5, 1787, and his wife was born in Pennsylvania Dec. 26, 1786. They were married in Pennsylvania in 1807, and moved to Hamilton, Ohio, in 1808. While living at Hamilton, he entered the army for service in the War of 1812. His division was sent to the frontier to hold the Indians in check and prevent them from murdering the settlers. His family still has his captain's sword, which they prize very highly. Mr. Brown moved his family to Indianapolis in the fall of 1822, and bought and lived on seven acres of land, the present site of the Blind Asylum, and he raised corn on the present site of the Marion county court house. In the fall of 1830 he moved to Warren township, where in 1824, he had purchased eighty acres from the government, and had cleared a few acres and built a cabin in the meantime to move his family into. He helped to build the first log cabin school house in the neighborhood. Mr. Brown was a typical pioneer, a great hunter, a good farmer, and a helpful neighbor. His wife died April 20, 1867, and he followed her on Oct. 20, 1876, at the ripe old age of four score and ten. Six children were born to Robert and Elizabeth Brown, of whom Mrs. Reading, born May 9, 1830, was the youngest; she died April 6, 1907. She became a member of the First Baptist Church of Indianapolis in 1862, and was a member at the time of her death.

Six children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Alexander D. Reading: Robert S., who married Lula Walford, is a farmer in Dent county, Mo., where he owns 700 acres of fine land; William A. is a prominent attorney of Indianapolis; George P., M. D., a retired physician, lives on the old homestead; John M. lives in Dent county, Mo., and follows farming; Mary E. lives at the homestead, as also does Russ R. Reading.

LUTHER C. ALLISON, one of the highly esteemed citizens of Muncie, Ind., and a leading business man of that thriving city, was born Oct. 26, 1845, at Warrenton, Fauquier county, Va., son of James J. and Elizabeth (Minter) Allison.

The Allison family is of English and, by intermarriage, of Scotch stock, the founder of the family in America, tradition says, being an Englishman. The great-grandfather of Luther C. Allison, who is supposed to have been the founder, was the possessor of a tool chest, made of yellow poplar, which has been handed down from generation to generation to our subject, and by him modernized and still used.

Luther C. Allison received but a scanty education, but studied much and read considerably, and in this way gained knowledge of many subjects. He was reared on the 600-acre farm of his father, who was a slave owner, and began to learn the trade of millwright, having a natural talent for mechanics. After serving a regular apprenticeship of three years in Warrenton, Va., with an old time Scotch mechanic, John Llewellyn, a master of his business, who was very thorough, exacting and severe, Mr. Allison left Warrenton, being about sixteen years of age at this time, and located in Urbana, Ohio, and began work at bridge building and carpentering. He was engaged at this work in February, 1865, when he enlisted at Urbana, as a private of Company E, 8th O. V. I., to serve three years or during the war, and he served until honorably discharged at Columbus, Ohio, the war having closed. His service was in Kentucky, Tennessee and Virginia, and he took part in many skirmishes with the guerrillas in Tennessee and Kentucky. His regiment was also stationed at Cumberland Gap for several months. While skirmishing with bushwhackers in Kentucky, he was shot through the right thigh and right heel by minie balls, and having contracted measles in the temporary field hospital in an old church, he was taken to the hospital at Louisville, Ky. Later he returned to his regiment at Cumberland Gap, and served until discharged. He saw hard service and participated in several forced marches, including one from Embment to Cumberland Gap, the course taken being over the mountains and fording the Cumberland river. He was a good, faithful soldier, and served his country efficiently and well.

After the war Mr. Allison returned to Urbana, Ohio, and engaged in the carpentering business, and there married July 8, 1866, Sallie Bishop, born Feb. 28, 1850, in Zanesfield, Ohio, daughter of Edmund and Maria (Garner) Bishop, both of Pennsylvania-German stock. Mr. and Mrs. Allison removed in 1860 to Springfield, Ohio, where he engaged with Whitley, Fastler & Kelley, manufacturers of harvester machinery, and with the exception of one and one-half years in 1882-83, when he had charge of Barney Smith & Company's plant, he was with this company for twenty-eight successive years, being foreman and general manager of the shops and railroads (the company having 108 miles of railroads to the coal regions), and also architect and machinist, having charge of from 600 to 700 men. In 1891 he came to Muncie for this firm as agent, having charge of the equipment of their plant in Muncie, but in 1892 he resigned from their employ, at which time he received the following letter from the firm, then doing business under the name of William N. Whitley Company:

September 29, 1892.

L. C. ALLISON,

Dear Sir: As you are about leaving my employ and going elsewhere into business, I desire to express to you my sincere thanks for the many kind favors in the past twenty-seven years and over of business acquaintance. During most of the time you have been in my employ in the different capacities of workman in shop, foreman of department, superintendent of construction, millwrighting, erecting and equipping factories, operating harvesting machines in the field, selling machinery, making collections and doing general traveling work. I have always found you a faithful, energetic, reliable business man in all the capacities in which I have known you, very thorough-going, painstaking and tireless in your efforts. A man of your experience, strength and vitality should make yourself felt wherever you go. You are the kind of man that has made up the mighty West of this country, and in seeking new fields for your efforts I bespeak you every success that you so much deserve.

With kindest regards and best wishes,

(Signed) W. N. WHITELEY.

Mr. Allison then engaged with the Huber Manufacturing Company, of Marion, Ohio, and was their collector for eighteen months, when he received a letter of endorsement from them as follows:

MARION, O., April 2, 1895.

To Whom It May Concern:

We take pleasure in saying that Mr. L. C. Allison has been in our employ for the past fifteen months in the capacity of collector, and he has given us good satisfaction. The only reason he leaves us is that we have our collection department shaped up so that we cannot use the services of a collector to good advantage. We cheerfully recommend him to any concern needing a good man on collections.

Yours Respectfully,

(Signed) S. E. BARLOW, Treas.

His next employment was traveling as collector and salesman for Wardner, Bushnell & Glessner, until 1898, traveling through twenty-two States for this firm. He then settled in Muncie, where he has since been engaged in a general jobbing and bicycle business.

Fraternally Mr. Allison is a member of the Knights of the Golden Eagle, the Red Men and the Patriotic Sons of America, holding offices in these lodges when a resident of Springfield, Ohio. He was a charter member of the Red Men there, this being one of the first lodges of that order in Ohio. He is a member of Williams Post, G. A. R., Muncie, Ind., and was formerly identified with Mitchell Post, No. 40, of Springfield, Ohio. In political matters he is a staunch Republican, having voted for every Republican Presidential candidate since Abraham Lincoln's second administration. He and his wife have had the following children: Cora Bell, who married Keller Vinda, a butcher at Muncie; Willie, who died aged about four years; and Mollie Dell, who married John G. Otstot, a bookkeeper for Amos Whitely at Muncie, and has two children, Jessie and Amos. Mr. and Mrs. Allison were members of the M. E. Church in Ohio for about twenty years, and both may be said to have been lifelong Methodists. Mr. Allison is a very skilled mechanic.

James J. Allison, the grandfather of Luther C., who is supposed to have been a son of Martin, as Martin is a very common name in the family, was a farmer and store owner, living near the Rappahannock, on the north fork in Fauquier county, Va. His children were: William Thomas; Martin; Richard; James J.; Catherine, who married a Mr. Jarmans; one who died young; and one daughter who married Lewis Bray, who was a soldier in the British army, and who, after the death of his wife, returned to England. (He had a belt made, in which he carried his gold around his body, and as he never returned to this country it may be that he met with foul play.) The great-grandfather, Martin, lived to be 103 years old.

James J. Allison, father of Luther C., was born about 1824, in Fauquier county, Va., a short distance from where he now lives. The remains of the old stone fireplace of the original log habitation are still standing. On the site of the old log house, immense oak and poplar trees are growing. The grandfather, and his father, Martin, had cleared this farm, and here had owned 200 slaves. James J. Allison married Elizabeth Minter, born at Culpeper Court House, daughter of William Minter, of Scotch stock of that region. James J. Allison was a staunch Union man during the war. His children were: Luther C., John T., Jeremiah, James J., and Rosa, who died in infancy. Mrs. Allison died when our subject was twelve years of age, in 1857. Her husband, who is still living, was an old-line Whig, but is now a staunch Jacksonian Democrat, and has served his locality as supervisor. He is a member of the Campbellite branch of the Christian Church, and is staunch in its support.

He is honored and esteemed for his many sterling qualities of character, by all who know him.

HENRY AND DANIEL GASCHO. With all of its foreign elements of population America claims comparatively few of French Huguenot stock. Of these few, Hamilton county, Ind., has been the home of members of the family of the name of Gascho since 1840 or earlier. Daniel Gascho, now advanced in years, is in the fourth generation from the last French ancestor, and his brother, Henry Gascho, who also lived in Hamilton county, died Nov. 11, 1906.

Owing to the troubles and dangers experienced by the Huguenots in France, the great-grandfather of the Gascho brothers left his native land and took refuge in Worms, Germany. His son, Henry, was born in that country, in a town called Darmstein, July 15, 1752. In the fall of 1766, when only fourteen years of age this Henry Gascho, with his sister Barbara, two step-sisters, his mother, and his step-father, a Mr. Kraemer, embarked on an old-fashioned sailing vessel for America, taking fourteen weeks for the voyage. In the course of it Mr. Kraemer died and was buried at sea. Henry Gascho was a redemptioner, that is, in order to pay for his passage he had contracted in Germany to allow his services to be sold on his arrival in America for a set term of years, and his half-sisters are supposed to have come on similar terms. They served their time with German settlers in Lancaster county, Pa., and Henry's employer was John Kaufman.

Henry Gascho, after serving his time, located in Lancaster county, and followed his trade as a weaver. His family lived on a small farm, which he bought there, and which he carried on in addition to his weaving. During the Revolution he enlisted in a Pennsylvania regiment, and fought for his adopted country. He married Barbara Schenck, who was born in Lancaster county, March 7, 1760, and who died Oct. 16, 1844, aged eighty-four years. He lived to the age of eighty-eight, dying four years before his wife. Their children were: John, born May 7, 1784 (father of Henry and Daniel); Barbara, Mrs. Jacob Murry; and Henry. The family were all Mennonites in their religion.

John Gascho, born May 7, 1784, was given the ordinary common-school education of his day, that is, he could read and write and had some knowledge of figures. His father, though able to do as much in German, never learned to do the same in English. John Gascho learned the weaver's trade from his father, and followed that occupation until past middle life, working in the old style which was probably handed down from his Huguenot ancestors, for they were known as a race of skilled weavers and were the first to introduce the art into England. John became an unusually good weaver, and one of his descendants still preserves a napkin made from a tablecloth of his handiwork. It is of pure linen, woven in a very fine intricate pattern and is as fresh as if made yesterday. There is also preserved a pattern book printed in Leipsic in German, which belonged to John Gascho. He wove both flax and wool, and produced not only table linen, coverlids, and clothing, linsey woolsey for home blankets, but also carpets.

Mr. Gascho made his home during many years of his married life on a farm of sixty acres in Lancaster county, part of which was inherited from his wife's family, part from his father, and a part earned by himself. In 1847 he left Pennsylvania for Indiana. His brother Henry had already gone there, buying and clearing land originally entered by "Big Jacob" Crull, where Arcadia now stands, and John had visited Hamilton county and looked over the country about there before deciding to move. The family started on their journey April 18, 1847, in a two-horse wagon and one wagon with four horses. The four-horse wagon was an enormous Conestoga, the best type of freight wagon ever devised. It had broad tired wheels, a body bowed up at each end and a canvas shelter projecting over the driver. The near tongue horse was ridden by the driver, who managed the four, or even six, horse team with a single line. Some of these wagons had a carrying capacity of ten tons. They were much used in those days in pioneer travelling, and the first steam boiler in Noblesville, designed for the sawmill of John and James Harris, was brought on Mr. Gascho's four-horse wagon from Indianapolis about 1849.

The Gaschos were thirty days on the road, for they were heavily loaded with household goods, and some of the boys walked. The men slept in the wagons and the women in the party went to the wayside inn for shelter. They did their own cooking, for the inns of that day had a big kitchen with fireplace which travellers were allowed to use. On reaching Hamilton county John Gascho bought 160 acres, the place where his son still lives, which had been entered by George Dale and bought from him by Samuel Beatty. On half of this the small timber and brush had been cut and burned, leaving the heavy timber to work out as it was cut down. There had already been built, in the days of the canal boom, a four-room frame house and a hewed log barn. Mr. Gascho cleared his land and added to it until he owned 707 acres of fine farming property, all of which, and more to the amount of 1,000 acres, is still in the possession of his descendants bearing his name. The old homestead and substantial barn still on the place were built by him.

At the age of twenty-eight in 1812, John Gascho married Catherine Schollenberger, born in Lancaster county, Dec. 16, 1790, daughter of Henry S. Schollenberger, a Pennsylvania German and a substantial farmer residing in Columbia. The children born to this union were as follows: Jonathan, born Sept. 22, 1812; John, Feb. 13, 1814; Henry, Jan. 14, 1816; Christina, April 15, 1818; Tobias, Sept. 27, 1819; Elias, Jan. 22, 1823; Fannie, Nov. 23, 1825; Catherine, July 29, 1828; and Daniel, Oct. 27, 1836. Mr. Gascho and his wife were members of the Mennonite Church. He was a great reader of the Bible and practiced its teachings in his life. His large property was all attained honestly, without wrong to anyone, and his known integrity made him a man of influence in his community. He was independent in his views, voting as he thought best, always took a newspaper and was a representative of the finest type of pioneer citizen.

Henry Gascho, son of John, lived until his death in 1906 with his brother, Daniel, on the original homestead, in a good two-story frame house. He received a common school education and was then occupied both with farming and weaving. In his earlier years he was very skilful in the latter occupation, and there is still a colored coverlet of his own work, made sixty-five years ago. The colors are almost as bright as ever. After going to Indiana he gave his entire time to the farm, and did much to develop it. His first visit to the country was made in 1839, when he paid a visit to his uncle Henry, making much of the journey by canal and steamboat, but also walking a considerable portion of it. In politics he was a Republican. The family is a long-lived one, for the mother lived to be ninety-five years old, while farther back, Henry Schenck, a brother of Barbara (wife of Henry Gascho), lacked only half a year of the century mark. With such a family record it is not surprising that Henry Gascho reached his ninety-first year and retained his faculties to a remarkable degree. Of a gentle, quiet disposition, he always had the reputation of a peacemaker and was altogether a fine character.

Daniel Gascho was about ten years of age when he came to Indiana and he has seen Noblesville develop from a place of but 500 inhabitants to its present size. He has always helped to manage the homestead, and with his brother he owned jointly 400 acres adjoining Noblesville on the east. One of the first Republicans he voted that party ticket from the time of Lincoln until 1884, when he became a Democrat. He has always been prominent in local affairs, and was on the Hamilton County Board of Commissioners three years, from 1876 to 1879. During this period the new court house was erected in Noblesville and Mr. Gascho's name is one of those cut in the corner stone, which was put in place in 1878. Mr. Gascho has shown himself possessed of strong character, independence and ability and his good qualities have been fully appreciated by those among whom his long life has been passed.

The family have always been active in work for the moral uplifting of the community, and two nephews of Henry and Daniel Gascho, John B., still living, and Seth, deceased, have been earnest laborers in the Master's vineyard as ministers of the German Baptist Church.

JACOB W. BARTMESS, who died Jan. 26, 1907, was a prosperous retired citizen of Anderson, Ind. He was born in Fairfield county, Ohio, June 18, 1836, son of Jacob and Mary (Rader) Bartmess. The Bartmess and Rader families are both of Pennsylvania Dutch stock.

Jacob Bartmess, grandfather of Jacob W., was a pioneer of Fairfield county, Ohio, where he died on his farm near Lancaster.

Jacob Bartmess, son of Jacob, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1800, and married Mary Rader. They settled on a partly cleared farm in Fairfield county, Ohio, and a few years later, in 1844, located in Jay county, Ind., where he cleared a farm of eighty acres, upon which he died aged seventy-seven years. He and his wife were members of the United Brethren Church, in which he took an active interest, helping to build the first church in his neighborhood. He was a highly respected citizen, and held the office of justice of the peace for many years. In politics he was a Democrat. He had received a good common school education, was well read, and possessed much general information for those days. To him and his worthy wife the following children were born: Margaret, Louisa, Jacob W., Abraham and Almada. Of the foregoing children, Abraham was a soldier in the Civil war, belonging to the 89th Ind. V. I., and was in many battles, among them the battle of Nashville.

Jacob W. Bartmess was eight years old when his parents located in Indiana, and he received the usual district common school education, attending school during the winter months, and working on the farm in the summer time. He was married at the age of twenty-one years to Miss Amanda Antles, Sept. 20, 1857, at the home of his bride's father, in Jay county, Ind. She was the daughter of David and Sarah (Skiles) Antles, the former of whom was the son of David Antles, a native of Ireland. The Skiles family were of English stock. David Antles, Jr., was born in Columbiana county, Ohio, and moved with his family to Indiana in 1839, settling on land in Jay county, where he improved 120 acres from the woods, entering his land at the Fort Wayne land office. He made a good home and died in middle life, while his worthy wife lived to a ripe old age, dying at the home of one of her sons in Nebraska. The children born to David and Sarah (Skiles) Antles were as follows: Mary, Amanda, Anderson and Harrison and Maria. Of these children Harrison served in the Civil war, and was a participant of several battles. After their marriage Jacob W. Bartmess and his wife settled in Jay county, Ind., on the old Bartmess homestead.

At the age of twenty-six years Mr. Bartmess enlisted in Company C, 29th Ind. V. I., which was reorganized as the 8th Ind. Cav., to serve three years or until the close of the war. Mr. Bartmess served until honorably discharged at the close of the war, having served within one month of three years. Mr. Bartmess was in the battle of Stone River, where he was taken prisoner, and was confined for one month in the famous Libby prison, being then sent to parole camp at Annapolis, Md., and later exchanged. He was captured in December, 1862, when sick with chronic diarrhea and suffered fearfully, his effects—blankets, oilcloth, etc.,—having been taken from him by the Rebels, and he was obliged to sleep on the bare floor which increased his suffering greatly, it being the winter season. The rations were small, poor and badly cooked, and when he finally reached home, Mr. Bartmess was confined to his bed for several weeks. As soon as he was able, however, he rejoined his regiment, although still weak from the effects of his sickness, and participated in the battle of Chickamauga, and the great Atlanta campaign, during which the Union troops were under fire for four months. He took part in the battles of Kennesaw Mountain; Pumpkin Vine Creek; Peach Tree Creek; Atlanta on July 22d, in which General McPherson was killed, also being in the general assault on Atlanta of July 28. He was in the greatest march in the history of war—Sherman's famous March to the Sea, and took part in the celebrated foraging expeditions in Georgia. He marched through Goldsboro and wintered at Greensboro, N. C., which closed his services. Colonel Harrison, afterwards President, was Mr. Bartmess's first colonel.

After the war, Mr. Bartmess returned to his home in Jay county, Ind., and settled in Westchester, where his wife had located while her husband was serving in the war. She had cared for the children at home, a task of fortitude and patience not excelled by the soldier at the front, and when bulletins came from the battlefield, giving the names of the dead and wounded she would wait and listen, ever expecting to hear the name of her husband, the father of her children. Mr. Bartmess took up blacksmithing, at which he worked for two years. He next located with his family in Wells county, working as a carpenter in Rockford, where he lived nineteen years, and then moved to Marion, Grant county, and continued carpentering. Trading some property for a dry goods and grocery store at Camden, Carroll county, he lived there one year, after which he located in Westfield, Hamilton county, where he lived about eight months. In 1892 he located in Anderson and opened a grocery store and meat market, which he conducted until bought out by his son, Elliott S., in September, 1904.

In his political views Mr. Bartmess was a Republican and cast his vote for the great martyr president, Abraham Lincoln, and afterward as long as he lived voted for every Republican candidate for the Presidency. He was justice of the peace in Westchester for two years, and at Rockford was postmaster for four years. He was a member of the United Brethren Church, and was a Sunday-school teacher and superintendent. He was an itinerant minister, and was an ordained elder of the United Brethren Church for three years. He began to preach before the Civil war, but for some years only occasionally filled an appointment. He was a member of Major May Post, G. A. R., of Anderson, and was chaplain of his regimental organization. He was also chaplain of his post at Camden and at Westfield.

Mrs. Bartmess died June 10, 1901, aged about sixty-nine years. She was a devout member of the United Brethren Church for many years, and was a sincere Christian woman of excellent character. She and her husband reared a fine family of children, as follows: Elliott S., born Aug. 18, 1858, a prominent business man of Anderson, who is conducting the grocery and meat market business formerly owned by his father; Elista, born May 1, 1861, who married Luther Hood, and has two children, Glenn and Clare; Ulysses Sherman, born in October, 1866, and actively engaged in the glass business in Pennsylvania, who married May Watson, and has the following children, Paul, Leah, Lou, Phyllis, Esther and Vernon; Zora, born in August, 1871, who died at the age of twenty-eight years; and Findley, born Sept. 3, 1876, who died at the age of eight years. Mr. Bartmess never hesitated when duty and his country called, and he had a war record of which any man might be proud. As a brave soldier of the Civil war, and as a good citizen of Anderson, he was highly esteemed throughout Madison county, and his death was sincerely mourned by all who knew him.

JAMES K. HERSHMAN, a retired business man now living on a small farm near Arcadia, Hamilton county, was born in Indiana, in the same county, May 11, 1843, son of James and Susanna (Baker) Hershman, both of Ohio.

The paternal grandfather came from Germany to America, and settled in Ohio in the early pioneer days, remaining there for the rest of his life. James Hershman grew up there, was married and then in the thirties moved with his family to Indiana, where he located in Jackson township, Hamilton county. He took up government land in the forest, lived the life of a typical pioneer and was a noted hunter. The nearest market for supplies was Lafayette, and everything possible was made at home, the mother spinning and weaving all the cloth for their wearing apparel. They were successful farmers and in time became well to do. Mr. Hershman was a Republican and he and his wife belonged to the Methodist Church. Their declining years were passed in their old home, and there the husband and father died in 1870, the wife surviving him until 1894. Their children were: Martha, the wife of John Chew, both deceased; Charles, who married and is living on the old home farm; and James K. All were given good public school educations, and the two sons are both doing well in the world.

James K. Hershman began for himself in 1863 when he bought a farm in Jackson township. His original purchase of eighty acres he cleared and improved, and later added another eighty acres. In 1875 he gave up active farming, moved to Arcadia, and was engaged in the drug business there for a year, but at the end of that time he became connected with a dry goods house instead. This he ran for seven years and the seven succeeding years he had a livery business. He was successful, however, in whatever he undertook, and has worked his way to a comfortable position in life. At present he is living on a small farm, retired from active business.

In 1861 Mr. Hershman was married to Miss Elenora Bowman, a native of Virginia, and daughter of Matthias and Nancy Bowman, both of that State. The Bowmans were of an old southern family. Matthias was the son of Jacob, a Virginian, and came to Indiana in 1856, buying a farm there, on which he lived till his death. Mr. and Mrs. James K. Hershman had four children; two of them died in infancy; William E. is married, and after teaching in the public schools for a number of years, is now engaged in the practice of law at Carmel, Ind.; and Laura E. lives at home. Both children were given good educations. Mr. Hershman and his wife are both members of the Christian Church. He is an active politician, has been interested in the subject for many years, and has been a delegate to nearly all the State conventions. Fraternally he is a member of the F. & A. M., Blue Lodge, and the I. O. O. F. He is well known throughout the county and is held in much respect by his neighbors.

PROF. LEVI GIDDINGS SAFFER, an old and honored survivor of the Civil war, and for many years one of the best known educators of Delaware county, Ind., was born July 4, 1831, in a round-log cabin in Posey township, Harrison county, Ind., thirteen miles southeast of Corydon, the first capital of Indiana. In this county lived many of the most famous of the original pioneers of Indiana and the real founders of this great State.

The Saffers are of Huguenot stock, and the name was formerly spelled "Savier," a spelling retained in St. Louis as late as the time of Thomas Benton. Religious persecution drove the family from France to Wales, whence they came to America in Colonial days and settled in the Shenandoah Valley. The old stock of Saffers were all powerful men, none of them being less than six feet in height. The Giddings family is of old New England Puritan stock.

Enoch Saffer, great-grandfather of Prof. Saffer, was an extensive planter and slave-owner, and he died in Virginia.

John Saffer, son of Enoch, was born in the Shenandoah Valley, and served in the Revolutionary army. He married Rebecca Mathes, and to them were born: James, Katie, William M., Sarah, John, Rhoda, Elizabeth and Enoch. Of these children, William M. became a Methodist preacher, and was also a lawyer, and he represented Harrison county, Ind., in the legislature several terms. John Saffer, the father of these children, had a farm in Virginia, but as early as 1805 removed to the Clark grant in Indiana, making the journey with a four-horse covered Virginia wagon, the bed, or bottom, of which curved up at both ends like a boat. It had a kicking-board and was covered with canvas, and had a great capacity. It was probably a Conestoga wagon, which style had been introduced into the Shenandoah Valley by the Pennsylvania settlers, by whom the valley was first settled, and who continue to this day to be its most numerous people. John Saffer's children were all born in Virginia with the exception of Enoch, whose birth occurred in Indiana. John Saffer raised a crop in the bottoms in Clark's grant, near the present site of Jeffersonville, but not being content with the locality he harvested his crop, and mounting his horse rode down the Ohio river, looking for a new situation. He kept his money, both gold and silver coin, in an oaken chest in the big wagon. After a long and wearisome journey, made doubly hard by the intense growth of all kinds of underbrush, he finally arrived at the mouth of Mosquito Creek, where he found drift so high that he could just reach it from his saddle. This caused him to look for higher land, and crossing the hills to Buck Creek, he came upon Joseph Potts, a pioneer, who was residing in a log cabin built so low that one standing on the dirt floor could reach the ridge-pole. The claim that had been made by Mr. Potts was purchased by Mr. Saffer, the former locating near by and building a mill on Buck Creek, the first in that section. Mr. Saffer returned for his family and brought them to the new home, and here settled down to agricultural pursuits, building a cabin of round logs and clearing a small part of the tract. While on a hunting excursion one day he came across a fine, clear spring, about three miles southeast of his location, and he immediately sold out his tract and removed to this spring, where he built a mill in which he ground corn for many years, the water-power being excellent. He finally erected a two-story house of stone, the first in that part of the country, and from that time on until his death engaged in land deals, being a good, practical business man. He at one time ran a still, manufacturing whiskey, peach brandy, apple brandy and cider. In religious belief he was an Ironside Baptist, and in politics a Jeffersonian Democrat. In later life he sold out his farm, and his last days were spent on an improved farm of 160 acres on Mosquito Creek, where he died in 1847, aged ninety-seven years. His wife passed away aged ninety-five years.

Enoch Saffer, son of John and father of the Professor, was born May 18, 1808, on the old homestead of his father in Harrison county, Ind., and he received but little education, although he wrote a good hand and read well. Shortly after his second marriage Mr. Saffer removed to Fulton county, Ill., where he entered land and built a log cabin, but after three years returned to the homestead at the request of his father. Here he continued until 1850, when he removed to Bureau county, Ill., and settled near Princeton, where William, his youngest child, was born, March 12, 1855. Mr. Saffer died in 1862 of pneumonia, at the home he had purchased there, and soon thereafter his family removed to Adair county, Iowa. Enoch Saffer was a Jeffersonian Democrat in early life, but later became a Republican, after his acquaintance with Owen Lovejoy, the famous Abolitionist, although he had always been an anti-slavery man, and belonged to the secret organization known as the Underground Railroad.

In 1830, near Elizabeth, Ind., Enoch Saffer was united in marriage with Almada Giddings, daughter of Levi and Ardelia Giddings. Levi Giddings was probably born in New York State, and was an old-time carpenter and joiner. He was a pioneer of near Elizabeth, Ind., where he cleared a farm of 120 acres, on which he died aged eighty-two years. His children were: Julia Ann, Ardelia and Almada. Three weeks after the birth of her son, Levi G., Mrs. Saffer died in July, 1831, and Mr. Saffer was married one year later to Elizabeth Snodgrass, by whom he had these children: Louisa, Charles Thomas, Lucy, John, Sarah, Elijah, Rhoda and William.

Prof. Levi Giddings Saffer secured a very limited education in the log cabin subscription school, which he attended for one summer when he was but five years old. This was the only school attended by him until he was nineteen years old, when he entered the school kept by John Spurrier Sandbach in Posey township, Harrison county, Ind., three miles south of Elizabeth, in a hewed log house. John Sandbach, a native of Fredericktown, Md., was a famous pioneer school teacher, and he was engaged in that profession for fifty years. With this gentleman Mr. Saffer spent part of two terms, about six months in all, and this, with the schooling mentioned before, is all that he ever received. However, he had an excellent tutor in his Virginian grandmother, who was a good scholar in the common schools and who taught him to spell, read and write. His blackboard for writing was the hearth, on the broad stones of which he practiced with coals taken from the fire. His first reading book was the New Testament, and he then borrowed and read Bunyan's Holy War, Goodrich's History of the United States, and then an ancient history owned by his father, noting with boyish interest the story of Romulus and Remus being suckled by a she-wolf. The first newspaper he ever saw was the Corydon Investigator, published at Corydon by I. Matingly, the pioneer editor of that part of the State. After that time he became a wide reader, and he has accumulated an excellent library. Not only is he well versed in ancient and modern history and literature, but he is well-read in Anthropology and the Sciences, and has many up-to-date works on these subjects.

As a boy Mr. Saffer started work on his father's farm, and at the age of fourteen years started out for himself, working on steamboats running from Louisville, Ky., to New Orleans, La., as well as on flatboats. He followed this business during the proper seasons until twenty-one years old, when he was married. After his marriage Mr. Saffer followed cooper work near Elizabeth for a time, but later purchased forty acres of land in the woods and began to clear up a farm. On Nov. 5, 1862, in Elizabeth, Ind., he enlisted as a private of Company B, 53d Ind. V. I., to serve three years or during the war. Soon thereafter he contracted measles, and was confined in the old brick hospital in Indianapolis. Being entirely disabled he was honorably discharged after two months service, on account of disability, and returned home. After partial recovery he joined the Home Guards, and was captured by Gen. John Morgan in his famous raid at Corydon, Ind., but soon thereafter was paroled. After the war he went to New Madrid and lived one year, but later took a private school fourteen miles south of New Albany, Ind., where he taught for three months. The following winter he taught in a public school and then became city editor of the New Albany Standard, being one of the founders of this paper with Joseph Gwin and James V. Kelso. Mr. Saffer was connected with this publication for one year and then worked on the old Louisville Ledger, the Courier Journal and the New Albany Ledger, after which he resumed teaching. He taught at Palmyra and Willow Springs and in Peters' schoolhouse four miles south of Elizabeth, and in 1874 located in Delaware county, Ind. He taught school in the winter of 1874-75 at Albany, for two years at the Jackson school in Muncie, and for one year in the Brick House near the Fair Grounds north of Muncie. In 1877 he located in Selma, and was for ten years principal of the public schools, since which time he has been retired from school-teaching, with the exception of one term at Smithfield.

On March 20, 1852, in Harrison county, Ind., three miles southeast of Elizabeth. Mr.

Saffer was married to Ruth Peters, born in Posey township, Harrison county, March 20, 1832, daughter of John and Matilda (Meek) Peters, and to this union were born: Almeda, Matilda, Mathew Edwin and Ellen. Mrs. Saffer died Oct. 15, 1862. On Aug. 21, 1881, Professor Saffer was married (second) to Mary Henrietta Spangler, born Nov. 6, 1851, near Gettysburg, Pa., daughter of Henry and Anna Mary (Reaver) Spangler, the former of German and the latter of English ancestry. Henry Spangler was born in 1812, on a farm near Gettysburg, Pa. The Spangler Springs were made famous in the Civil war. Mrs. Saffer was educated in the public schools of Liberty township, in the State Normal at Terre Haute, and at the Baptist Collège, Ridgeville, Randolph county, Ind., and then taught in the public schools of Selma for seven years, and a like period in the district schools. Professor and Mrs. Saffer are the parents of two children: Lloyd Garrison and Lois Jeanette.

In political matters Professor Saffer first voted, for Winfield Scott for the Presidency, and later became one of the original Republicans, voting for the first Presidential candidate of that party, John C. Fremont, and every Republican candidate for the Presidency since that time. He was assessor of his township for five years. He is an unaffiliated member of the Masonic fraternity, and was a charter member of his lodge at Elizabeth, Harrison county, being also a charter member of the lodge of Red Men at Selma. Professor Saffer is a man of works rather than words, and has passed a life of great usefulness. He is a remarkable example of the self-educated man, who, born and reared in a log cabin, among pioneer environments and in a district nearly devoid of books, has acquired by his own efforts a superior education that has enabled him to take a high stand as an educator. Now nearly seventy-seven years of age, he is still active and strong, and carries out the arduous duties of a rural mail agent. He has a pleasant residence and an excellent library of books, his constant companions in his leisure hours. He is highly esteemed in his locality, both as a good citizen and as an honored survivor of the Civil war, and, as a leading resident remarked, he has educated probably more young men and women for the profession of teaching, who are now active in the work, than any other educator in this section of Indiana.

REV. DAVID D. POWELL. Few men can look back upon a life of greater usefulness than did Rev. David D. Powell, who in the stirring times of the Civil war risked his life for his country and who later, after the return of peace, ministered to his fellowmen for twenty years as a pastor of the Methodist Church. While in his later years he lived nominally retired, his interest in the cause of the Gospel was as keen as ever and he spent largely of his time and strength in its work.

The Powell family is of Welsh descent, but settled in Virginia during the Colonial days. There Charles Powell, grandfather of Rev. David D., lived in Isle of Wight county, on a farm. The Powells had been Friends or Quakers for generations, and Charles Powell professed the creed of his ancestors. Although he lived in a slave State, he was strongly opposed to slavery and joined the Abolitionists. His wife, who bore the maiden name of Miriam Draper, bore him a number of children, but the only names now known are John, Mary and Osborn. Charles Powell died in 1823.

John Powell was born on his father's farm, Jan. 14, 1817. After his father's death, when he was six years old, he was brought up by his uncle, Aaron Draper, who gave him a common school education. At the age of fifteen, he accompanied his uncle to Indiana, and they settled on a farm eight miles north of Richmond. It was wild land that had to be cleared, and the two went through the usual pioneer experiences before they had the farm cleared and in a productive state. Mr. Powell remained with his uncle until he was twenty-four years old, when he married and began life for himself on a farm of thirty acres which Mr. Draper gave him, located in Wayne county, near Whitewater. He was industrious and hard working, and made a success of his farming operations, making his land highly productive and putting up good buildings on the place. His death occurred at this home when he was sixty-six years of age. He was a devout Methodist, and joined that church at Whitewater, when he was somewhat over thirty years old. He became an exhorter and a Sunday-school teacher, conducting a Bible class for many years. It was composed of men of various ages and conditions in life, with as many different views, some of them infidels, but Mr. Powell was so thorough a Bible student and so earnest a Christian that he never failed to arouse their interest in Bible truths.

While Mr. Powell was a well-informed man and a very good mathematician, his education was largely gained by his own efforts and by a wide reading of the best books, including, specially, theological works.

John Powell was married in 1841, to Miss Henrietta Bunch, who was born in Wayne county, Ind., April 24, 1824, daughter of Richard and Anna (Pierson) Bunch. The children born to this union were, David D., Mary A., Richard B., Aaron E. and Jonathan W. Mrs. Powell's father, Richard Bunch, was a Quaker, and both he and his wife were natives of North Carolina. He was a pioneer settler of Wayne county, where he cleared a farm of 125 acres. His property was situated on the Middle Fork of the Whitewater, and although Mr. Bunch paid only a dollar and a quarter an acre, it was valuable land. His death occurred there at the age of fifty. The children were: Harriet, Henrietta, John, Richard, Sallie, James, Edith and Lucetta. It is worthy of remark that although Mr. Bunch was a Quaker, yet he bore arms in the War of 1812.

David D. Powell was born on the homestead in Wayne county, Jan. 13, 1843. He was reared on the farm and inured to farm work from his boyhood, being engaged in that during the summer and attending the public school in the winter. After finishing the studies offered in the common school he was sent to Whitewater Academy for some time. When eighteen years old, Oct. 22, 1861, he enlisted at Richmond, Ind., as a private in Company C, 57th Ind. V. I., under Capt. Joseph Stedman, to serve three years or during the war. After only six months' service Mr. Powell was honorably discharged on account of disability, incurred at Pittsburg Landing. His military duty was in Kentucky and Tennessee, and at Louisville he was taken with the measles, was obliged to lie on the ground during his illness and caught cold, causing complications. On being examined by Dr. Mussey, of Cincinnati, he was pronounced unfit for further service, and in April, 1862, returned home. He recovered his health, and in May, 1864, enlisted again, for four months, in Company A, 152d Ind. V. I., Capt. Elias Hoster, served out his term and was a second time honorably discharged, ending his service in Camp Denison, Ohio, in September, 1864. During this period Mr. Powell was stationed in the Shenandoah Valley guarding provision trains. He was also on duty during Morgan's raid, accompanying the regiment to Hamilton, Ohio. He was a good soldier, always doing his full duty, cheerfully and promptly. Returning to Indiana after the war Mr. Powell engaged at first in farm work for his father or for others in that vicinity. Later he went to school again at the Whitewater Academy, and then during the winter of 1866 taught in Randolph county. Meantime his mind had been gradually turning more strongly toward the ministry as his life calling, and April 8, 1867, he joined the North Indiana M. E. Conference. In 1869 he was ordained a deacon and two years later, an elder. He was first assigned as junior minister to the Middletown Circuit, Henry county, and then stationed for one year at Windfall, Tipton county.

The following year, 1873, Mr. Powell resumed his agricultural occupation, but in 1874 again took up his work in the ministry and was successively stationed for two years at Parkinsville, Madison county; two at Eden, Hancock county; three at New Britain, Hamilton county; and two each at Cicero, Sharpsville, Fishersburg and Albany. One more year was spent at Fortville, and then in 1885 Mr. Powell retired and lived afterward on the Craycraft farm in North Anderson. His interest in and devotion to the work continued, and he served as a local preacher and filled many pulpits as a supply, until his death. He was always an enthusiastic and careful student of the Bible, and for the last eighteen years of his life conducted a Bible class in the First Methodist Church at Anderson. Mr. Powell and Mr. Farmer were the founders of the Mt. Hope M. E. Church, and the First Church organization grew out of a class started by Mr. Powell in the Mt. Hope school house.

On April 30, 1868, Rev. David D. Powell and Miss Jennie Craycraft were united in marriage. Miss Craycraft was born Aug. 30, 1844, on her father's farm, which is her own home today, and was the daughter of Zadoc and Leah (Goody-Koontz) Craycraft. To her union with Mr. Powell there were three children born as follows: Grant C., July 30, 1870, a machinist of Anderson, married Miss Visa Mixell, and has four children, Maud Z., Richard D., Hortense and Otto. Oren C., Dec. 13, 1872, also a machinist in Anderson, is married to Miss Alta C. Vineyard, and has two children, George and Herman; Cyrus O., Aug. 22, 1874, married Miss Lou Cook, and died March 26, 1902.

The first vote ever cast by Mr. Powell was for Abraham Lincoln, for his second term, and after that time he was always a good Republican, voting the straight ticket, except for a few occasions when he voted with the Prohibitionists. Fraternally Mr. Powell was a Mason, belonging to Mt. Moriah Lodge, No. 77, in which he had been both junior and senior deacon, and in addition he was a Royal Arch Mason. He also belonged to Solomon D. Kempton Post, G. A. R. Mr. Powell was a man of a deeply religious temperament, but also of practical common sense and strong character. As manager of a farm of eighty acres he proved himself a good farmer, and not afraid of hard work himself, while in his ministerial capacity he contributed a lifetime of service to his fellowmen and had a long record of usefulness behind him.

DAWILLA SPANNUTH, a well-known newspaper man of Hamilton county, Ind., who conducts at Noblesville The Hamilton County Democrat, now the leading independent paper of the county, was born three miles south of Noblesville, Feb. 27, 1871, son of George and Elizabeth (Troutman) Spannuth.

George Spannuth was born in November, 1830, in Jackson township, Lebanon county, Pa., grandson of a Hessian soldier, who was taken prisoner at the battle of Trenton by Washington, Dec. 25, 1776. This soldier was the son of a well-to-do farmer, three miles from Frankfort-on-the-Main. After capture he was sold into bondage and earned his own freedom. He was well educated for a man of his time, and skilled in his trade as a weaver of fancy cloth. In after years he became a prosperous Pennsylvania farmer and founder of the Spannuth family in America.

George Spannuth received his education in the common schools of Pennsylvania in the German language, and was reared on the farm. After he moved to Indiana he acquired a knowledge of English, which he supplemented with much reading. He was married in Lebanon county, Pa., to Elizabeth Troutman, daughter of Henry and Magdalena Troutman. After his marriage he worked at his trade of brick mason. Later he bought, entirely on time, a forty-acre farm, which he sold to buy a sixty-acre tract. After the birth of eight children, March 22, 1866, Mr. Spannuth came to Hamilton county, Ind., and purchased a farm of 114 acres three miles south of Noblesville. By steady thrift and industry he added to his farm, later purchasing another tract of ninety-three acres. He was a member of the Lutheran Church, and his wife of the Reformed denomination. Mr. Spannuth died May 3, 1896, and his wife Oct. 11, 1902. Their children who survive them are: Cyranus, Aaron, George, Levi, Elizabeth, Emmeline, Nathan, Alvin and Dawilla; while Amanda died at the age of thirteen years, and one child died in infancy.

Dawilla Spannuth attended the district and high schools of his native locality, and from the latter institution he was graduated in 1894. After taking elective studies at the Northwestern University for three years, he became connected with the Greenfield Republican, remaining for one and one-half years. On July 10, 1902, he purchased the Democrat, and this he has conducted to the present time, as an independent sheet. Mr. Spannuth conducts a clean, moral newspaper, containing the best of news, and views on subjects calculated to be of benefit to humanity. He is fearless and outspoken in behalf of law enforcement, purity in politics and the prohibition of the saloon traffic.

On June 4, 1904, Mr. Spannuth was married to Miss Frances Comstock, daughter of Dr. James A. Comstock, of Greenfield, Ind. They have one child, Mary Elizabeth, born Feb. 18, 1906. Mrs. Spannuth was graduated from the Greenfield high school in 1892. Both Mr. and Mrs. Spannuth have long been active members of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

WILLIAM H. WHITESITT, postmaster at Paragon, Ind., a veteran of the Civil war, and a highly esteemed citizen, was born April 30, 1838, in Jefferson county, Ind., son of Andrew J. and Rachel B. (Pearcy) Whitesitt, both natives of Indiana.

John Whitesitt, the paternal grandfather, was a pioneer in Indiana and for a number of years lived in Jefferson county, moving later to Illinois and dying near Danville, Vermilion county, aged about sixty years. His wife bore the maiden name of Mary Ann Blankenship, and they reared a large family. The maternal grandfather, Robert Percy, was a native of Kentucky, took part in the War of 1812, was an early farmer in Jennings county, Ind., and died there aged sixty-five years.

Andrew J. Whitesitt, father of William H., resided during the greater part of his life in Jennings, Morgan and Johnson counties, Ind., and died in Paragon, in 1877, aged about fifty-nine years, his wife, Rachel B. Percy, having passed away in 1871, aged fifty-one years. Both were members of the Christian Church. During the Civil war, Mr. Whitesitt served about fourteen months, as orderly sergeant, in Company H, 33d Ind. V. I., and was discharged for disability. The family born to Andrew J. Whitesitt and wife consisted of two sons and two daughters, namely: William H.; Mary L., deceased wife of William L. Tarr; Martha J., wife of John Zook, of Waynetown, Montgomery county, Ind.; and George W., of Plainville, Daviess county, Indiana.

William H. Whitesitt was but a child when his parents moved from Jefferson to Johnson county, and he obtained his first schooling in the latter county, but was living in Morgan county when he attained manhood. Later he moved to Illinois, and for three years lived in Cumberland county, and then returned to Morgan county, Ind., for several years. Again going to Illinois he spent four years in Jefferson county, that State, but finally returned to Morgan county and took up his residence at Paragon. His changes of location were occasioned by the situation of the various farms he has operated, the first one being rented land. The first farm he bought was one of sixty acres in Cumberland county, Ill., which he later sold and bought a tract in Wayne county, which he also sold soon after. Until 1896 he engaged in farming, and since he has lived at Paragon, he has been the popular postmaster.

In 1861 Mr. Whitesitt enlisted in the army for a term of three months, and after serving came home, but in 1862 he re-enlisted, entering Company H, 79th Ind. V. I., under Col. Fred Knefler, and he continued in the service until the close of the war, entering as a private and coming out with the rank of sergeant. Mr. Whitesitt saw much hard service and participated in these great battles: Chickamauga, where he was wounded; Perryville; siege of Atlanta and then back to Nashville, and many skirmishes and long, exhausting marches.

On Oct. 13, 1861, Mr. Whitesitt was married to Miss Maria A. Self, and four children were born to this union: Emma, who married (first) James McGinnis, had two children, Elva and Ollie, and (second) Frank Vert, of Paragon, by whom she had one child, Charles; Leota, who married Jacob Holsapple, of Paragon, and has children, Cecil, Clyde and Eureka; Oscar, a farmer, unmarried; and Orla, who married Nannie Burch, of Ray township, and has children, Charles, Ruby, Hester and Baby. The mother of these children died in 1878, in the faith of the Methodist Church.

On April 6, 1890, Mr. Whitesitt was united in marriage with Mrs. Matilda Crane, widow of Edward Crane and daughter of Hiram Philip and Saline (Woody) Burch. Mrs. Whitesitt had three children by her former marriage: John F., of Freedom, Ind., who married Edna Rice, and has one son, Carrol; and Phoebe and Victor Nathaniel.

Hiram Philip Burch, the father of Mrs. Whitesitt, was born in Indiana; and her mother in Kentucky, and they were pioneers first in Lawrence and later in Greene county. They reared a family of five sons and seven daughters, the ten surviving children being: Nancy, wife of Joseph Cisney; James M.; Matilda, wife of William H. Whitesitt; John; Nelson H.; Joseph W.; Rachel M., wife of Martin Shaver; Hiram T.; Effie wife of Robert Fowler; and Nina (Nannie), wife of Orla Whitesitt. Mr. Burch died in 1887, aged sixty-three years, his wife still surviving, a resident of Paragon. Mrs. Whitesitt's paternal grandfather, James Burch, was a native of North Carolina, and was a pioneer in Greene county, Ind. In addition to doing extensive farming, he also manufactured shoes and gunpowder. On the maternal side, the grandfather was Henry Woody, a native also of North Carolina and an early settler in Lawrence county, a farmer and a Baptist preacher. He died of typhoid fever, in middle life, leaving his widow, Mary Elizabeth (Edwards) Woody, and a large family. Both of the parents of Henry Woody lived to be over 100 years old, and the father was a Revolutionary war soldier.

Mr. and Mrs. Whitesitt are members of the Christian Church, where they are active and useful. In politics he is a Republican, and has been trustee of Ray township. He is a member of Paragon Lodge, No. 406, I. O. O. F.; and of Jefferson Smith Post, No. 573, G. A. R.

LIEUT. CYRUS WALLACE BENBOW, a leading citizen of Anderson, Ind., and an honored survivor of the great Civil war, was born March 28, 1839, in Henry county, Ind., son of Edward and Rebecca (Powers) Benbow.

The Benbow family is of Welsh origin, and was founded in South Carolina during the early settlement of that State, being of the same stock from which came Commodore Benbow of the English navy, who died of wounds received in battle, and to whom a monument was raised in the city of London. The grandfather of Lieutenant Benbow, Col. Evan Benbow, who was a native of South Carolina, served in the Revolutionary war. He settled in 1806 in Lebanon, Ohio, and in 1814, removed to Indiana, and later became one of the first settlers of the city of Richmond. His children were: Berkeley, Evan, Howell, Benjamin, Martha, Maud, Parker and Edward.

Edward Benbow, son of Col. Evan, was born in South Carolina in 1800, and was six years of age when the family located in Lebanon, Ohio, later removing with his parents to Indiana. He settled on wild land in Wayne county, Ind., where he cleared a farm and lived to an advanced age. He learned the wagonmaker's trade at Centerville, and worked at that occupation in Indianapolis when the old capitol was being built. During the Civil war he conducted a shop in Anderson. He was married in Henry county to Rebecca Powers, born near Morestown, Va., daughter of John Powers, and to this union there were born: Eliza Ann, Cyrus W., Maria Louisa and George H.

Cyrus W. Benbow received a common school education, and was twelve when he accompanied his parents to Newcastle. Here he learned the wagon builder's trade, and was following it when, at the age of twenty-two years, he enlisted in Indianapolis, in Company D, 11th Ind. V. I., re-enlisting after the battle of Shiloh, in the 84th Ind. V. I., as a sergeant, serving until honorably discharged July 18, 1865. He was commissioned second lieutenant, and was later promoted first lieutenant of the 109th U. S. Colored Troops, being mustered out as adjutant. He served in the battles of Fort Donelson, Fort Henry, Tullahoma, Missionary Ridge, Marietta, and Atlanta campaign, being under fire fifty-six days. He was ordered to report to Gen. Chelton at Louisville, and then to Col. Bartholomew of the 109th U. S. Col. troops, being with his regiment in the battle of Petersburg, and those up to and including the battle of Appomattox Court House, the troops behaving splendidly. Lieutenant Benbow was never wounded or taken prisoner, but was with his regiment continuously, serving as a brave and gallant soldier and efficient officer.

After the war he returned to Anderson. He had been married while on a leave of absence after Lee's Surrender, May 28, 1865, in Sulphur Springs, Ind., to Mary Skinner, born in Missouri, daughter of Jacob and Elizabeth (Delaney) Skinner. Mr. Skinner was a soldier of the Civil war, having served for three years a member of Company G, 84th Ind. V. I., and is now living aged eighty-two years. To Mr. and Mrs. Benbow were born these children: Henry, William O., Jessie Lee, Edna Louise, Frank M., Grace L., and Charles F., all living at home. Frank M., of this family, served one year and ten months in the Philippines as quartermaster's sergeant, Troop E, 12th Cav., one year in the Spanish-American war as a private of Company L, 160th Ind. V. I., in Cuba; and four years in the regular United States Army in Tennessee and Texas.

Lieutenant Benbow is a charter member of Major May Post, Anderson, and has been adjutant and commander of the post. He is connected with the I. O. O. F., having represented his lodge at the Grand Lodge of the State, is a member of the Encampment and the Uniform Rank, reaching the Patriarch Militant degree. For the past seventeen years he has been secretary and scribe of the Encampment. Lieutenant Benbow's political principles are those of the Republican party.

WILLIAM H. HUBBARD, a very prosperous and public-spirited resident of Monroe township, Morgan county, Ind., was born at Monrovia, Ind., Nov. 14, 1848, son of William B. and Ludah (Vestal) Hubbard, natives of North Carolina.

(I) George Hubbard came with two brothers from England at a very early date. One brother settled in Massachusetts, another in New York, and George in Virginia, where he was called General George. Among his children was John Hubbard.

(II) John Hubbard moved from Virginia to Deep River, N. C., where he resided until his death, being a prominent member of the Society of Friends.

(III) George Hubbard, son of John, and grandfather of our subject, was reared in North Carolina, but after he had raised the greater number of his family he removed to Wayne county, Ind., about 1830. After a year there, he came to Morgan county about 1832, and bought wild land, now the present site of Monrovia. Then began a pioneer life for the family, which continued until the land was cleared. Mr. Hubbard died in 1868, and left a large estate. He was well known as a prosperous and progressive farmer, and a most excellent man.

(IV) William B. Hubbard was about twenty years old when his father came to Indiana. Soon thereafter, he bought a farm in Monroe township, one and one-half miles northwest of Monrovia, then in a wild state. This he cleared off, and made it his home until his death in 1863. He was a well known and successful man and was greatly beloved by his family and neighbors. His wife died in 1864. Both were members of the Society of Friends. Nine children were born to them, four boys and five girls, all of whom grew to maturity and had families of their own. Two are now deceased. Our subject is the eighth in the family in order of birth. Receiving good educations, these young people all taught after finishing school.

(V) William H. Hubbard not only had a common school education, but went to Spice-land Academy, and then to Haverford College, where he took a literary course, being graduated therefrom in 1870. Following this he studied medicine at the Indiana Medical College, from which he was graduated in 1878. He earned the money to pay for his education by teaching school, beginning when he was sixteen years old. After graduation he located at Indianapolis for a year, and was then appointed physician of the Insane Hospital at Indianapolis, and was there four years. He practiced at Fairmount and Marion, in Grant county, for twelve years, when he gave up regular practice, and settling in Monrovia, in 1896, went into the milling business, and operates a fine farm of 110 acres, upon which he carries on a general farming business. In 1904 he built a modern mill, with a capacity of seventy-five barrels daily, and is successful beyond any expectations he had when he began his present operations.

In 1881, Dr. Hubbard married Emma J. Woollen, born in Madison, Ind., daughter of William W. and Sarah E. (Young) Woollen, the former of whom was a banker, but is now deceased. He lived in Indianapolis during his later life, and became very prominent in politics, serving as comptroller during the Sullivan administration. Four children have been born to Dr. and Mrs. Hubbard: Sadie, William W., Henley H. and James W. Dr. Hubbard and his wife are consistent members of the Society of Friends. In politics, Dr. Hubbard is a Democrat, but does not aspire to office. The Hubbard family is one of the best known in this community, where the several generations have worked and borne their part in the development of the Commonwealth. Each generation has progressed with the community, and all have been men and women of probity, uprightness of living, and singleness of heart. The family is also well known among the Friends throughout Indiana, and their homes are pleasant gathering places for many of that simple faith.

ORLANDO A. HARNISH, one of the leading photographers of Hamilton county, Ind., was born in Lebanon county, Pa., Oct. 19, 1856, son of Jacob and Susan (Miller) Harnish.

Jacob Harnish was born in Lebanon county, Pa., of old Pennsylvania German stock, and was a member of the German Reformed Church. He was a farmer by occupation, and followed agricultural pursuits all his life in his native county. He was a natural mechanic, and was a skilled mason. He married Susan Miller, and they had these children: William, a soldier of the Civil war, in a Pennsylvania regiment, who died in a hospital in Gettysburg, before the battle of that name, and was the first soldier buried in the National cemetery; Samuel; George; Susan; Amanda and Orlando A.; and six children who died small. Mr. Harnish located in Wells county, Ind., in 1868, and purchased 179 acres of improved land. Here he lived about five years, and died aged nearly sixty years, while his wife attained the age of sixty-six years, she dying at the residence of her daughter, Susan, who married Nason Shelley. Mr. Harnish was an industrious and hard-working man, and highly respected citizen. He reared a family of children of which any man might be proud.

Orlando A. Harnish received his education in the common schools, and was early trained to farming pursuits. He was about twelve years old when his father located in Indiana, and, in Bluffton, he learned the photographer's business, this being during the days of the daguerreotype and ambrotype, and he still preserves beautiful specimens of his early work as an artist. Mr. Harnish came to Noblesville May 27, 1879, and established a gallery. Although he had then two strong competitors, and the business came slowly, he persevered, and after taking first prize at the County Fair, his business grew rapidly.

Mr. Harnish was married Dec. 25, 1881, near Noblesville, to Jennie C. Conrad, born in Lebanon county, Pa., daughter of David and Lovicia Conrad, the former of whom was a farmer, born in Lebanon county, on the line of Berks. David Conrad and his wife had these children: Jennie C., Kate, Jacob, Frank and Henry. Mr. Conrad removed to Hamilton county, Ind., and settled in Noblesville, on the farm on which his family now reside, which consists of seventy acres, and is situated adjoining the corporation on the east. He improved his farm and erected a good frame house, and there he died in 1880, his widow still surviving him.

After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Harnish settled in Noblesville, and here he has since been occupied in following his profession. Both he and his wife are members of the Presbyterian Church, in which they have always taken a very active interest. He has been both deacon and treasurer in this church, and has been secretary and treasurer of the Sunday-school. In political faith a strong Democrat, he takes a great interest in local affairs, but he has never sought office, nor would he accept it. Mr. Harnish built his present home on South Tenth street, in 1890, and there he still resides. He is a straightforward, reliable citizen, and has completely won the confidence of the people of Noblesville. He takes a natural pride in his art, which is of a high order, comparing favorably with the work of the artists in larger cities.

CALVIN F. SIMS, one of the old residents of Martinsville, was born in that city Nov. 27, 1833, and has been identified for more than the Psalmist's allotted span of life with its growth and development.

Dr. William Sims, the paternal grandfather of Calvin F., passed his entire life in the State of New York. He was the father of three children, his son, John W., also becoming a physician.

John W. Sims was born Dec. 25, 1790, in New York State, and about 1827 came to Martinsville, and he was identified closely with the early families of this city, as at his time of settlement there was but one cabin standing in the vacant fields now covered with stately and imposing structures. He died April 22, 1843. On Dec. 18, 1815, he married Ann Winters, who was born in New Jersey, June 13, 1793, and died Jan. 28, 1868, daughter of Daniel Winters, a native of New Jersey, of Dutch descent. He was a farmer in his native State, reared a large family there and died in advanced age. In 1820 the young physician and wife moved to Indiana and, as noted, cast in their fortunes with the other early settlers at Martinsville some years later. He became prominent in public affairs and represented Morgan county in the Legislature one term. To Dr. John W. and Ann (Winters) Sims were born eight children, of whom Calvin F. is the only survivor. One daughter, Elizabeth, widow of Sylvanus Barnard, of Martinsville, died Feb. 7, 1908.

Calvin F. Sims has lived in Martinsville all his life, and has been a leading factor in much of its development. His early education was acquired in the common schools, and later he attended Asbury University at Greencastle. His individual business career began as a merchant and for a considerable period he carried on a large business in dry-goods. His health finally gave signs of failing, and he then embarked in a livery business for some years, but later gave that up and conducted a grocery. The latter business was disposed of in order to engage in farming. His first agricultural experience was in the management of his brother's large estate, which contained 400 acres. It was located west of the city and at the present time building is going on where the old farm was once cultivated. For the past twenty-five years Mr. Sims has not closely confined himself to business, the care of his real estate holdings giving him pleasant employment and keeping him sufficiently occupied.

On March 20, 1856, Mr. Sims was married to Miss Margaret Worley, daughter of Zimri and Sarah (Legg) Worley. Three children were born to this union, Byron, Annie and Katie, the latter being the only survivor. She is the wife of W. B. Tarlton, a druggist in Martinsville, his place of business being on the lot where Mr. Sims was born, and where his father conducted a store. Mr. and Mrs. Tarlton have one child, Maud. Byron, the eldest child of Mr. Sims, died in infancy, and Annie, at the age of twelve years. In political principle Mr. Sims is independent. He has always taken an active interest in the welfare of the city, has held some of the local offices, was city marshal for two terms, and has been active and useful through all these years when the infant village needed help to become what it is today. Mrs. Sims is a member of the Presbyterian Church. Her parents also were early settlers in Indiana, from Kentucky. They lived at Bloomington, in Monroe county.

WILLIAM L. BRAGG, one of the old residents and excellent farmers of Jefferson township, Morgan county, was born Oct. 22, 1859, in Jefferson township, west of Hyndsedale, one of the six children, one son and five daughters, of William J. and Sina R. (Farley) Bragg, the former of whom was born in Tennessee and the latter in Kentucky.

The paternal grandfather of William L. Bragg was locally known as "Grandsire" Bragg, a native of Tennessee, and a blacksmith by trade. Mr. Bragg was one of the earliest settlers in Morgan county, Ind., entering land first in Ray township, later removing to Jefferson, but afterward returning to Ray township. There his wife died, and he broke up housekeeping and made his home with his son, William J., during the remainder of his life, living to be almost 100 years of age. The maternal grandfather of William L. Bragg was a native of Kentucky, a carpenter and cabinetmaker by trade. He was an early settler in Morgan county, Ind., and in later years he went West and died in Iowa, advanced in years.

William J. Bragg, father of William L., was a flat-boatman and blacksmith in his early years, but mainly was engaged in farming and stock dealing. After coming to Jefferson township in its early days he engaged extensively in agricultural pursuits and accumulated much property, owning at one time 700 acres of land. For nearly fifty years he was justice of the peace, and so wise were his decisions that in all that period he never had either Circuit or Supreme court reverse them. Mr. Bragg was twice married, his first wife being a Burkhart, and the three surviving children of that marriage are: Wiley, of Martinsville; Martha, wife of Bedford Warthern, of Texas; and Hugh Thomas, foreman on a railroad section at Casey, Ill. The death of his second wife, Sina R. Farley, occurred Dec. 6, 1899, at the age of eighty-four years. She was a most exemplary woman and a devout member of the Methodist Church, which Mr. Bragg attended and assisted in supporting. Since her death he makes his home with his son-in-law, William Downey. For many years he was a very prominent citizen of Jefferson township. The three surviving children of the second marriage are: Rebecca Jane, wife of William Downey, of Washington township; Miss Hattie V., head overseer at the Insane Hospital at Richmond, Ind.; and William L., of Jefferson township.

William L. Bragg has lived in Jefferson township, Morgan county, all his life, his interests centering here. His education was obtained first in the subscription and later in the free schools, and he remained with his parents until his own marriage. For two years he then cultivated rented land, at the end of that time returning to the home farm to assume responsibilities there. He operated this farm for his parents a number of years and still conducts it. It is one of the well cultivated farms of Jefferson township and contains 128 acres. Mr. Bragg is one of the practical and progressive farmers of his locality, and is well and favorably known all over the township as a man of excellent judgment and good citizenship.

On June 14, 1882, Mr. Bragg married Miss Sarah J. Bishop, daughter of Christopher and Julia (Jerrols) Bishop, and to this union have been born four sons and three daughters, namely: Walter, who died at the age of three years; Julia Dorris, Grace E., Worth W., Hazel P., William E. and Hugh. In politics Mr. Bragg is identified with the Republican party.

Mrs. Bragg's parents were natives of North Carolina who came to Indiana after the Civil War, about 1868, locating in Morgan county. Their family consisted of two daughters and five sons, the six children still surviving being: Sarah J., Mrs. Bragg; Emma, wife of W. J. Harrison, of Jefferson township; Albert and James D., of Jefferson township; Allison, of Colorado; and Charles, at Brooklyn, Morgan county. The family is one which is most highly esteemed in Jefferson township.

HOWARD E. HENDERSON, publisher and proprietor of the Kokomo Daily Dispatch, by the excellence of his paper, through whose editorial columns he advocates such measures as tend to promote the general welfare of the community, holds an important and honorable place among the substantial citizens of his town. He was born in New London, Howard Co., Ind., Dec. 22, 1849, son of J. F. and Cynthia A. (Whitson) Henderson. His education was acquired in De Pauw University, and there he became a member of the Delta Kappa Epsilon and Phi Delta Phi fraternities. Since leaving college Mr. Henderson has given most of his attention to newspaper work, and since 1873 has been the proprietor and publisher of the Kokomo Daily Dispatch. In politics he is a staunch Democrat.

Mr. Henderson married Miss Belle Williams, daughter of Rev. Thomas and Mrs. Williams, and two children have come to brighten their home, Frank E. and Eva. Mr. Henderson belongs to the Masons and to the Elks, and is very popular in both. He has maintained his paper on a high standard of excellence, and is respected by men of all classes and parties.

DR. O. E. DRULEY, a highly esteemed citizen and leading medical practitioner of Anderson, Ind., was born July 25, 1865, in Union county, Ind., son of Nicholas and Elizabeth (Nutter) Druley and grandson of Nicholas Druley, who came from England to North Carolina prior to the Revolutionary war.

Dr. O. E. Druley began his education in Illinois, graduating from high school, and then from De Pauw University in 1886, one of the youngest of his class. From 1887 to 1890 he attended the Ohio Medical College, and again was the youngest member of his class. After his graduation he was made superintendent of the Eastern Indiana Institute for the Insane for eighteen months, and for twelve months was on the staff of the Cook County (Ill.) Hospital, being appointed one of the physicians of the World's Fair, Chicago, in 1893. He was the first physician to introduce examinations by use of the X-ray in Anderson, and the third in Indiana to have a registry in the American Roentgen X-Ray Society, a national organization. In this direction the Doctor has had a large practice. He has also been very successful in cases of cancer, which he treated by electricity, making electric therapeutics a specialty. The Doctor is also a member of the Chicago, Indiana and National societies, has a large medical library, and keeps himself well abreast of the times by subscription to the leading medical journals.

Dr. Druley was married in 1895 in Anderson, to Almeda Miller, born in Newcastle, Pa., daughter of John W. Miller, a manufacturer. To Dr. and Mrs. Druley have been born five children: Julia, Hortense, Virginia, and Edgar and Elizabeth, twins. Mrs. Druley is a member of the Episcopal Church.

OSCAR MATTHEWS, a prominent member of the Indiana Bar, was born Jan 12, 1855, in Dallas county, Iowa, son of Calvin and Catherine (Paddock) Matthews, both natives of Indiana, and grandson of Hiram Matthews.

Hiram Matthews was born in North Carolina in 1797, son of George Matthews, of English birth. He took part in the War of 1812, and came to Indiana among the early pioneers. He entered a tract of land in Brown township, Morgan county, and became a substantial farmer in that locality. At one time he was judge of the Probate Court and acted in many trust capacities. Formerly a Whig, he became identified with the Republican party and was one of the promoters of the Underground Railroad. He died at the age of seventy-nine years, leaving a family of six children.

Calvin Matthews, son of Hiram, was born and reared in Morgan county. After his marriage he and his wife went to Iowa where they lived for four years, during which time their son Oscar was born, and they then returned to Morgan county. Mr. Matthews resides on an eighty-acre farm, located in Brown township, one mile and a half north of Brooklyn. In politics he is a Republican, and from 1878 to 1881 he served as county commissioner. Mrs. Catherine (Paddock) Matthews was a daughter of William Paddock, a native of Ohio, and an early settler in Johnson county, Ind., where he engaged in farming for some years. He reared a large family and died in Boone county, aged eighty years. A family of three children was born to Calvin Matthews and wife, namely: Oscar; Mat Matthews, of Indianapolis; and Miss Anna D., of Morgan county, near Brooklyn. Both Mr. and Mrs. Matthews were most highly esteemed residents of their neighborhood, and Mrs. Matthews was a member of the Christian Church, in which faith she died April 13, 1903. In fraternal life, Mr. Matthews is a Master Mason.

Oscar Matthews has been a resident of Morgan county since the age of four years. He was reared on the farm and attended the district and graded schools, the latter at Mooresville, and the State Normal School at Terre Haute. Mr. Matthews then began teaching school and followed this profession for five years in Morgan and Marion counties. In March, 1880, he began the study of law, in the office and under the tutelage of Judge Jordan, and in 1883, he was admitted to the Bar, forming a partnership with his preceptor in 1884, which association lasted until January, 1895, when Judge Jordan took his place on the Supreme Court Bench. Since that time Mr. Matthews has practiced alone, and has occupied the same quarters in Martinsville, for the past twenty-two years.

On June 24, 1885, Mr. Matthews was united in marriage with Miss Elizabeth Cox, daughter of William and Jane (Mills) Cox. Both he and wife are members of the Christian Church. In politics Mr. Matthews has long been active in the Republican party. He occupies a leading position in his profession, and is recognized as an able advocate, as well as a useful and public-spirited citizen.

JAMES T. KNOWLAND (deceased). In the death of James T. Knowland, which occurred Dec. 28, 1904, Anderson, Ind., lost a substantial and highly respected citizen, and an honored veteran of the great Civil war, Mr. Knowland was born Aug. 12, 1844, in Charlestown, Clark Co., Ind., son of Jacob F. and Mary P. (Tucker) Knowland.

The Knowlands are of sterling Scotch ancestry, the grandfather of our subject coming from Scotland and settling first in Kentucky, but later removing to Clark county, Ind., in the early settlement of this state. He was a Baptist missionary from the Highlands of Scotland. He had six children: Joseph; Thomas; Obed; Jacob F.; David, a soldier in the Civil war; and William, a drummer in the Union army, who had three sons in the drum corps of the 53rd Ind. V. I., to which he belonged.

Jacob F. Knowland was born in Charlestown, Ind., and was bound out when young to a hatter, which business he followed for fifty years. He died at the residence of our subject at Jonesville, Ind., in 1875. In his younger days he was a soldier in the regular army. After the death of his first wife he married again, and to this marriage there were two children born: Jasper and Levisa P. The Tuckers were an old Colonial Virginia family of English descent, related to the Randolphs by both blood and marriage, and were among the prominent families in the foundation of the Virginia colonies. James Tucker, the maternal grandfather of James Tucker Knowland, came from Kentucky to Clark county, Ind., between 1812 and 1820, and afterward settled in Jackson, and later in Bartholomew county. He was one of the pioneers of the State, and late in life engaged in the mercantile business.

James T. Knowland received his education in the district schools of Bartholomew county. His mother having died when he was an infant he was brought up by his maternal grandfather, James Tucker, and early learned to work on a farm, being reared to an agricultural life. When seventeen years of age he enlisted in Jonesville, Bartholomew county, Aug. 30, 1861, in Company F, 39th Ind. V. I., to serve three years or during the war. He served until Feb. 22, 1864, when he was veteranized in the same organization for three years more. The old 39th Indiana was also known as the 8th cavalry, and Mr. Knowland was promoted to duty sergeant. He served until honorably discharged July 20, 1865, at Lexington, N. C., the war having closed. Among the battles—ninety-five in number—in which Mr. Knowland participated were the following: Shiloh, Stone River, Middleton Gap, Chattanooga, Missionary Ridge, the Atlanta Campaign (including the great battles in front of Atlanta), Jonesboro, Lovejoy Station, Black River, Bentonville, N. C., and many others. His regiment was one of the most active fighting regiments in the war. Mr. Knowland was slightly wounded at Shiloh, and his clothing was cut several times by bullets. In October, 1861, he was sick in camp with lung fever. He was also in the hospital at Nashville, Tenn., from June 13, until July 11, 1863, with typhoid fever. He was an active soldier and in his four years service missed only forty days. He was in all the battles in which his regiment participated and saw service in Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Louisiana, Alabama and both the Carolinas.

After the war Mr. Knowland returned to Bartholomew county, Ind., where for a short time he followed farming. On Nov. 3, 1867, he married in Jonesville, Bartholomew county, Mary Hubbel, born in Jackson county, Ind., Jan. 24, 1851, daughter of John and Almira (Blodgett) Hubbel. The Hubbels and Blodgetts are of Puritan New England stock. After marriage Mr. and Mrs. Knowland settled in Jonesville, Ind., where he followed farming for a short time, and then learned the carpenter's trade at which he worked for fifteen years. He then engaged in trading and farming until he located in Anderson, May 22, 1887, when he engaged in the business of securing pension and bounty claims in company with N. C. Newson, who is now in the employ of the U. S. pension department at Washington, D. C. Mr. Knowland was successful in this business, which he continued under the name of James T. Knowland & Sons. The firm does a large business in pensions, claims, etc., and through Mr. Knowland's steady thrift and good management became one of the substantial concerns of the State. He owned a fine residence property in Anderson.

Mr. Knowland was a member of the G. A. R., Major May post, Anderson, and held the offices of junior vice and commander. For four years he was justice of the peace of Bartholomew county, constable for seven years and deputy sheriff two years. In his politics he was a Jeffersonian Democrat, and was a man of liberal views on all subjects. For ten years he was a member of the city gas company, two years of which he was president of that organization. For nine years he was clerk of the board of water works of Anderson. Mr. and Mrs. Knowland were the parents of two children: Sherman V. and Lena May.

GEORGE DUNHAM, late a prominent lawyer and public official at Lapel, Ind., was born at Oxford, Butler county, Ohio, Nov. 25, 1842, son of Franklin and Dorcas (Ellingwood) Dunham, and his death occurred at his home in 1899.

The Dunham family is of old Puritan ancestry, and was early located in Vermont. In the beginning of the nineteenth century, some of the family migrated to Ohio, and there in Butler county, in 1815, was born Franklin Dunham, son of Eleazer and father of George.

When George Dunham was two years old his parents moved toward the frontier, locating on land in Indiana. He received a good common school education and while still very young went into mercantile life in Fishersburg, continuing there till the beginning of the Civil war.

Mr. Dunham was mustered in at Indianapolis in Company G, 12th Ind. V. I., under Capt. Arthur Reed and Col. John M. Wallace; and except for a short time when he was in hospital in Indianapolis in 1862, he shared in all the experiences of his regiment. He was conspicuous for his bravery even when so many others were brave, and secured the notice and respect of his commanders for his meritorious conduct under all conditions. He was in the battles of Richmond, Missionary Ridge, Dallas, Resaca, New Hope Church, Kenesaw Mountain, Jonesboro, Griswold, Savannah, Columbia, Bentonville and Atlanta, participating in the long and deadly Atlanta campaign and in Sherman's March to the Sea, the longest march in American history. At the battle of New Hope Church in June, 1864, Mr. Dunham was wounded in the chin. He took part in the Grand Review at Washington, and received an honorable discharge July 22, 1865. A brother, James, at one time captain of Company G, 12th Ind. V. I., was captured and imprisoned, and suffered so from lack of food that when finally released he was unable to get home without the assistance of comrades.

After the war Mr. George Dunham, then about twenty-three years old, returned to Fishersburg. Four years later he was elected justice of the peace and served eight years. Deciding upon the law as his profession, he began reading and was admitted to the Bar in 1872. He was thoroughly versed in the subject and was the possessor of an excellent law library. After marriage he and his wife settled in Fishersburg, but in 1887 they moved to Lapel and there Mr. Dunham held the office of deputy prosecuting attorney. He was successful in business, and was chosen to fill responsible positions, being treasurer of the school board of Lapel, and a director and stockholder of the First National Bank of Noblesville. He was also prominent fraternally, both as a Mason and Odd Fellow. He joined the former order at Fortville, later affiliating with the lodge of Fishersburg, while he was connected with the Fishersburg Lodge alone in the I. O. O. F. He was a member of the Methodist Church, and in politics was a strong Republican.

On Dec. 10, 1868, Mr. Dunham was married to Miss Virginia J. Cook, who was born Jan. 21, 1853, daughter of Dr. Daniel and Elizabeth (Walker) Cook. To this union children were born as follows: Ida C., who married Edward Hutton, president and manager of the Lapel Bottle Works, and has four children, George L., Anna V., Mary A. and Charles Gerald; and Hazel E., at home. Both daughters were given good educations.

Dr. Cook is of German ancestry, but his forefathers were in America before the Revolution and his grandfather was a colonel in both the French and Indian war and the War for Independence. A great-uncle held corresponding rank in the British army during the latter conflict.

Joel Cook, father of Dr. Daniel, was born in Greenbrier county, W. Va., in 1795. He owned a farm of 100 acres there, and came of slaveholding parents. In 1834 he moved to Indiana, carrying his goods in wagons, and settled in Hancock county, twelve miles from Greenfield, where he cleared a tract of 160 acres. He made his home there all his active life and finally died in Hancock county in March, 1871, one of Indiana's well known pioneers. He was an active member of the Baptist Church, and in politics was a Democrat. Twice married, his first wife was Miss Nancy Farley, of Irish parentage, born in Dublin. She died leaving a family of children, viz.: Nathan F.; Daniel; Adeline; John F.; and Mrs. Jane Yelton. By the second wife, who was Miss Susan Rogers, there were nine children, Sarah, Harrison, Nancy, Joel, Martha, Emily, Eli, Casinda and Mary.

Dr. Daniel Cook was born Aug. 29, 1826, in West Virginia. He grew up on his father's Indiana farm, but he was able to get a fair common school education. When only twelve years old he began the study of medicine, but was not ready to enter a regular medical school till he was seventeen, when he entered one at Louisville, Ky. He began practicing at the age of nineteen at Markleville, Madison county, but did not give his entire time to his professional work, till 1855. He lived in Hancock county for a time, and then went back to his former location, remaining there till 1866, when he settled in Fishersburg to follow his profession there. Later, after the death of his second wife, he spent another two years in Markleville, returned to Fishersburg and finally located for the rest of his life in Lapel, where he died in May, 1901. Dr. Cook was a highly successful physician, besides displaying marked business ability, and was an influential man in his section. A strong Unionist, he did much for the soldiers. At Markleville he was identified with the Masonic Lodge, and was at one time Master.

Dr. Cook married for his first wife, Esther, daughter of Thomas Shelton, of Madison county, Ind. Mrs. Cook died in 1849, leaving two children, Thomas and Mary. The following year Dr. Cook was married to Miss Elizabeth J. Walker, daughter of Seth Walker, and to this union were born: Seth W.; Virginia J., Mrs. Dunham; Joel; Elizabeth J., Mrs. E. R. Rambo; Martha E., Mrs. J. H. Bodenhorn; Ralph; Lustacy J.; and Henrietta, wife of Dr. J. R. Moore.

ALFRED S. DEER. There are no more highly honored pioneer families of Johnson county, Ind., than the Deer and Garr families, and a most worthy representative is found in A. S. Deer, whose fine farm extends over many broad acres in Johnson county, and whose personal standing places him among the most esteemed citizens of his locality.

Mr. Deer was born March 22, 1832, in Union township, Johnson county, son of Willis and Elizabeth (Myers) Deer, the former of whom was born in Virginia and the latter in Kentucky. Willis Deer was a son of Lewis and Margaret (Crisler) Deer, the former being of German extraction, but of Virginia birth. The mother of Willis Deer, and the grandmother of A. S., was, on her maternal ancestral side, connected with the notable Garr family. This was one of the families opposed to Catholicism, and suffered much, with other prominent and wealthy German families, from the religious persecutions of 1729, which continued until 1752. In order to escape these persecutions, Andrew Garr headed a colony of 300 Protestants who left Illenschwang, Germany, in the latter year, for America, and settled in what is now Madison county, Va., where they organized and established the first German Lutheran Church in America. Andrew Garr was one of those broad-minded and intelligent men fitted by Nature for capable leadership, and many of his estimable characteristics have been transmitted to his descendants and appear as admirable qualities in all lines of activity.

Lewis Deer was married, in Virginia, to Margaret Crisler, and his children were: Willis, Wesley, Melinda, Elizabeth, Allen, Alfred, Herman and Emma. By a second marriage, two more children were added to the family: Henry and Eliza. In 1807 he moved to Kentucky, and became a prominent farmer, and there he died a most worthy member of the Baptist Church.

Willis Deer, father of A. S., was born Aug. 5, 1802, in Virginia, and in 1807 was brought by his parents to Kentucky, where he grew to manhood and married, living in that locality until after the birth of two children. In the fall of 1831, he moved to Indiana and located in Johnson county, entering land in Union township, where he improved a good farm. His first farm comprised 160 acres and to this he added two eighty-acre tracts, and labored successfully until he had placed all this land under cultivation. When he first settled in Johnson county, it was almost a wilderness, but small tracts of land having been rescued from natural conditions. Mr. Deer built a cabin and commenced the struggle of redeeming a farm from heavily timbered land. He underwent all the worst trials of pioneer life. He succeeded well, and was long regarded as one of the best farmers and most substantial men of the county. Late in life he disposed of this property and moved to Boone county, Ind., where he died, in 1891. He was a man of medium size, but strong constitution, and kept his strength until late in life. His attitude to his neighbors was that of a kind, sociable, charitable man, and he was respected for his integrity and beloved for his many virtues. Mr. Deer was four times married, and he had born to him a family of twenty children, the expenses of his large family considerably diminishing his resources. His first wife, Elizabeth Myers, died in 1834. She was a member of a prominent pioneer family of Kentucky, her father being a farmer and keeper of one of the old-time Kentucky taverns. His death occurred in that State; his two daughters, Mahala and Elizabeth, married brothers. Wesley Deer, a brother to Willis, and husband of Mahala, also came to Indiana where he entered land and died in Johnson county. The children born to Willis and Elizabeth (Myers) Deer were as follows: Mahala, Mrs. Utterback; Mary J., Mrs. J. Lyster; Alfred S., of Bargersville; and John L., a farmer in Boone county, Ind. Mr. Deer married (second) Gracie Hanks, and their children were: Lewis C., Virginia, Sarah F., Nancy J. and Louisa. His third wife, Rebecca Johnson, bore him no children. His fourth marriage was to Nancy Ellis, who became the mother of Joshua, Hiram, Willis, Margaret, Nora, Ella, Samuel and William H. Three children died in infancy.

Alfred S. Deer remained under the parental roof until he reached his majority. He then rented land and began farming. In 1856 he married, and bought a small tract of land on which he lived for seventeen years. Selling that he bought his present farm, in 1874, a fine piece of property, with a small log weather-boarded and ceiled house. This transaction put him into debt $3,000. As the farm still needed much attention in the way of ditching and tiling, the outlook was serious, but Mr. Deer was a man of pluck and energy and soon had under-ditching started, which was continued for fifteen years before it was completed to his satisfaction. He put in many rods of tiling, and never ceased to improve its condition. By constant and laborious work and provident saving, he not only succeeded in paying his indebtedness by 1881, but was in a position to erect his large barn and out-houses and in 1892, his commodious and comfortable frame residence. Mr. Deer has this fine place all in his own possession, and has made the farm one of the best in the township. His line has been general farming and stock-raising and he has been very successful. Like his father he is of medium size but strong constitution, and although he no longer does the hard work of former days, he still fights the weeds and takes pleasure in the neat and attractive appearance of his surroundings. Mr. Deer through his own efforts has become one of the solid financial men of his township, and enjoys the esteem and confidence of his neighbors. In politics he was reared a Democrat, but in his later years he has affiliated with the Prohibition party, never accepting any office. For many years he has been a worthy member of the Christian Church, one of its elders and a liberal contributor and earnest worker.

Mr. Deer was married to Mary S. Lyster, born Jan. 20, 1835, in Johnson county, daughter of Cornelius and Elizabeth (Utley) Lyster, both natives of Kentucky, who moved to Indiana in 1830, and settled in Union township, Johnson county, became prosperous farming people, and here he died at the age of eighty-seven years and was survived by his wife seven years, both highly esteemed in every way. Their children were: Nancy, Mrs. George Garshwiler; Rachel, Mrs. John Kirlin; Martha, Mrs. S. Garshwiler; Elizabeth, Mrs. J. R. Garshwiler; Susan, Mrs. J. B. Parish; Mary S., Mrs. Deer; Harvey, deceased; Josiah E., of Kansas; James and Peter V., deceased; and John T., a farmer on a portion of the old homestead. To Mr. and Mrs. Deer were born nine children as follows: Cornelius, who died at the age of three years; Willis H., George T. and Frank, who are all successful farmers; Edgar H., who resides in St. Louis; Loring C., who is also a farmer; Elizabeth, who is Mrs. Clare; Mattie C. Holsclaw, who died leaving four children; and Grace G., Mrs. Webb, whose husband is a merchant at Franklin.

WILLIAM W. LAYTON, a progressive and respected citizen of Anderson, was born in February, 1837, in Hamilton county, Ind., and comes of an old Delaware family, of English descent.

Edward Layton, father of William W., was born in Delaware in 1806, but was left an orphan within a few months, and was given into the care of people to whom he was bound out until he was twenty-one. The foster parents moved first to Kentucky, a few years later to Ohio, and there the boy grew up and was married. He was a farmer, and in 1832 went to Indiana to enter land in Hamilton county, clearing eighty acres eight miles east of Noblesville. At a later period he resided a few years in Marion county, but returned to Hamilton county and there died, when only forty-four years old. He was a Democrat in politics, and with his wife belonged to the Methodist Church.

Edward Layton married, in Cincinnati, Mary, daughter of Eli and Margaret Coverdale, who was born in Delaware in 1809. Her parents, who were of German-American descent, had settled on a farm near Cincinnati about 1834, but later moved to Hamilton county, Ind., and took up government land in the woods, eight miles east of Noblesville. The father cleared eighty acres there, but later moved to another farm in the vicinity, and there died when nearly 100 years old, from the effects of burns received while burning brush. Mr. Coverdale served in the Revolution, when only fifteen years of age, and was always a loyal and honored citizen. His children were: Edward, Eliza, Margaret, Sarah, Mary, Rachel, Susan, William and Eli. To the union of Edward and Mary Layton twelve children were born: Margaret, Eli, Clement, John, William W., Susan, Nancy, Richard, Zedic, Edward and two who died in infancy. Of these, four sons were in the Civil war. Eli served about six months in the 75th Ind. V. I., and died of brain fever at Castalian Springs, Tenn. John, who was in the same regiment, served three years in the war, and among many other engagements was in the battle of Missionary Ridge and was taken prisoner there, but recaptured by Federal troops. Although he lived to be forty-eight, his death in 1885, was due to the effects of his army life. Richard, who enlisted when only seventeen, died soon afterward of measles, at Gallatin, Tennessee.

William W. Layton received a common school education and was reared to farm work, being so occupied until he was twenty-four years old. At that time the war broke out, and at Lincoln's first call for volunteers for 100 days, Mr. Layton enlisted in April, 1861, in Company D, 12th Ind. V. I., and the regiment was mustered in for a year. It was divided into three parts, and Mr. Layton went with the last company to Newberry, Ind.; next he was in the battle of Manassas Junction, then was sent back to Indianapolis, only to be hurried to Virginia, where they were in several skirmishes. At the end of the year in April, 1862, Mr. Layton was mustered out at Washington, D. C., but returning to Indianapolis, he re-enlisted in May, in the 3d Ind. Cav. for three years or during the war. It was an old regiment, and in 1865 in North Carolina was consolidated with the 8th regiment of Indiana Cavalry, Mr. Layton being assigned to Company I.

Throughout the four years of his service Mr. Layton was nearly always on active duty with his regiment, mainly in Kentucky, Tennessee and Georgia. He did much scouting and foraging, and was in a number of battles, besides participating in Sherman's March to the Sea. He was honorably discharged at Indianapolis Aug. 9, 1865. His last months in service were as a prisoner, for on March 10, 1865, while out with a scouting party for Kilpatrick, he was captured near Fayetteville, and for the first ten days was kept at Salisbury, N. C., one of the worst of the Southern prisons, where the rations was a small piece of corn bread with sometimes a little rice soup. From this place he was taken with others on top of a cattle car to Danville, Va., and a few days later to Libby prison. After two weeks there he was paroled, sent to Annapolis, Md., and then to Camp Chase, Ohio, where he remained until the day before the news came of Lincoln's assassination. He was in hospital at Nashville, Tenn., three months, and then in Louisville, Ky., for a short time before finally receiving his discharge.

On returning to civilian life Mr. Layton resumed farming, and was located in Hamilton county as before, but before long moved to another farm near Indianapolis, and worked in a stove factory besides operating his place. Several changes of location followed, for in 1873 he went to Madison county on a farm between Lapel and Pendleton, while in 1891, he moved to Anderson, and for six years was engaged as a teamster for a commission house. Later he went into the real estate business, and is still successfully occupied in that line. He has also served, in addition to his private affairs, as constable, elected on the Democratic ticket. For years he belonged to the party, but is now a Prohibitionist.

Mr. Layton has been married three times. His first wife, to whom he was united in Indianapolis, in 1862, just before he re-enlisted, was Miss Sarah Huggins, daughter of Thomas Huggins, a pioneer who had settled near that city. There was one daughter born to this union, Iva Nora. His second marriage, also in Indianapolis, was to Miss Mary Coverdale, born in that city, daughter of William and Louisa (Potel) Coverdale. Mrs. Layton died within two years, leaving no children. The third Mrs. Layton was Nancy, daughter of Crim and Margaret E. (Williams) Smith, who was born in Lincoln county, Ky., Oct. 16, 1853. She married Mr. Layton April 18, 1874, and they have had eight children, three of whom died in infancy. The others are all grown and have been given good educations. They were born as follows: Victoria Belle, Aug. 27, 1875, wife of Edward Shafer, a blacksmith at Grand Rapids, Mich.; Omar Newton, a glass blower in Anderson, who married Miss Ida Moor; Samuel Clarence, Dec. 20, 1883, who was in the navy four years, and is now recruiting officer; Archibald L., Dec. 31, 1885; and Floyd D., Oct. 1, 1888. Mr. Layton, as well as his wife, is a member of the Methodist Church. Fraternally he is a Mason, and belongs to Major May Post, G. A. R.

Mrs. Layton is of Irish ancestry, her grandparents, William and Sarah E. (Edwards) Smith, having come with their family from Ireland to Kentucky in the early days of that State. William Smith was a cooper by trade, and Lincoln county, where he settled, afforded him a good field to ply his trade for it was covered with splendid timber of many varieties. He also owned a farm of 900 acres in the Green River bottoms, acquired from the government. He lived to be sixtyone years old and was survived by seven children, namely: Crim; Monroe; Russell; Ballard, who with three sons served through the Civil war in Company I, 15th Ky. Cav., and was in many battles, including that at Wild Cat Mountain; Sarah; Frances; and Elizabeth.

Crim Smith was also in the war, and served as corporal in the 19th Ky. V. I., and took part in the battles of Wild Cat Mountain, Mill Spring and Cumberland Gap. He was taken ill, was seven months in the hospital at Jackson, Miss., and was finally discharged there after two years service. He started home but was able to reach only Springfield, Ill., and he died there in 1864 of fever.

Crim Smith, Mrs. Layton's father, was born before his parents left Ireland. His father was well off for his day and place, and the son was still more prosperous. Before the war he was a cooper like his father, and did business on a large scale, employing twenty men in getting out heading and staves from the woods. He was also a farmer and owned a tract of 160 acres of fertile land in Lincoln county, while for a time he was in business as a merchant, doing very well in all lines. He married Miss Margaret Williams, and their children were: Preston, who was killed in an accident when five years old; Nancy; William M.; Sarah Elizabeth; Mary Ann; Julia Ann; Susan Frances; and Tabitha Bell. Fraternally Mr. Smith was a Mason, and in religion a member of the Christian Church. His wife, who is still living in Kentucky, now aged seventy-eight, is a member of the Christian Church.

NATHANIEL M. COX, a retired farmer and substantial citizen of Martinsville, Morgan county, was born Sept. 4, 1849, near Franklin, Ohio, son of Arthur and Catherine S. (Denise) Cox, natives of New Jersey.

Arthur Cox, the father, was born in New Jersey, although his parents moved later to Ohio, where his father died in old age, leaving a large family. Arthur lived in Ohio some years, and in November, 1849, came to Indiana, settling in Bartholomew county, where he died at the age of sixty-two years. His political belief was in the Democratic party, and he filled some of the local offices, for many years being township trustee. He married Catherine S. Denise, daughter of Sidney Denise, a farmer in New Jersey, of Dutch ancestry. He was a soldier of the Revolutionary War, and lived to be seventy years of age. Mrs. Cox died two years after her husband, at the age of sixty-three. Of their children, three sons and three daughters, four still survive, namely: Joseph D., of Nebraska; John S., near Edinburg, Ind.; Ellen, wife of J. C. Freese, of Edinburg; and Nathaniel M.
